PUBLISHER'S REPORT

THE Sahitya Akademi is indeed very happy and proud to offer to lovers of Indian literature both at home and abroad, this first volume of its prestigious publication—The Encyclopaedia of Indian Literature, which is in a long line of tradition with other similar tools of reference, such as the National Bibliography of Indian Literature (in four Vols.) the Who's Who of Indian Writers, Histories of Literatures, etc. which the Akademi published in the past.

This volume of the Encyclopaedia of Indian Literature is the culmination of elaborate planning, re-planning and hard work, extending a little over a decade. No doubt, it may seem that a decade is too long a period to have arrived at this take-off point, but when the magnitude of the work involved is taken into account, it may not really appear to be so. To describe the magnitude in brief, the Encyclopaedia will be in five to six volumes, of about 1000 pages each in Demy Quarto size, covering literatures in 25 Indian languages, with entries running into several thousands on every conceivable literary topic like important writers, literary works, ancient, mediaeval and modern, literary movements, genres, etc. all arranged in alphabetical order. Equally important is the fact that it has involved in the process the efforts of a large number of scholars and writers from all Indian languages.

The idea of this Encyclopaedia, the first ever of its kind, was first mooted at a meeting of the Executive Board of the Sahitya Akademi in December 1974. A Committee consisting of its then President Dr. Suniti Kumar Chatterjee, Vice-President Prof. K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar, members Dr. K.M. George, Prof. V.Y. Kantak, S. Amrit Rai, Vasant Bapat was formed to examine and report on the project in detail. On the basis of the recommendation of this Committee, the Project was undertaken on a modest scale, with Dr. K.M. George as the Chief Editor and a suitable editorial unit under him. It was also decided to house the unit in Trivandrum.

After watching the functioning of the unit for about eight months, the Executive Board felt that in the interests of the better working of the unit, it had better be shifted to Delhi, a more central place. As Dr. K.M. George was not in a position to work in the unit from Delhi, a new Chief Editor, Dr. Sitanshu Yashaschandra, was appointed.

The earlier Project Committee was reconstituted as a Steering Committee and in addition to its other members already functioning, it included Sri Gopal Haldar also.

Besides the Steering Committee, an Editorial Committee consisting of the members representing the 22 languages on the then Executive Board, each a scholar in his own right in his language, was formed to assist the Steering Committee in its work.

Dr. Sitanshu Yashaschandra worked for over five years from 1977 to 1982, whereafter he resigned to take up his new position in the University of Baroda.

With the present Executive Board coming into being with Prof. V.K. Gokak at the helm of affairs as the President of the Akademi, there came a dynamic change. It became necessary to reconstitute the Steering Committee once again which now consists of President Prof. V.K. Gokak, Vice-President Dr. B.K. Bhattacharya, members Prof. Vidya Niwas Mishra, Prof. Asit Bandopadhyaya, Dr. H.M. Nayak, Sri S.H. Vatsyayan and Prof. Ramanlal Joshi.

Prof. Amaresh Datta, formerly Prof. of English, Gauhati and Dibrugarh Universities, was appointed as the new Chief Editor in 1984. The Editorial Unit was expanded to include a few Assistant Editors and Assistants also.

One other important change that was effected was the creation of Editor-cum-Adviser for each of the 22 languages in place of the earlier Editorial Committee. These Editors-cum-Advisers were now verifying additional entries besides revising and updating the entries previously prepared, in their respective languages.

The lists of the Members, Steering Committee, Advisory Boards and Editors-cum-Advisers are shown in the perliminaries.

It is because of the untiring efforts of all these people—the members of the various Committees working at different times, the Chief Editors, past and present, and the Editorial Staff that the Encyclopaedia of Indian Literature has now taken a concrete shape, and its first volume is seeing the light of the day.

It had been originally proposed to have the Encyclopaedia in just two volumes of 1000 pages each, but as the work proceeded and the wealth of material which needed to be covered in order to increase its usefulness came to be realised, the proposed number of volumes increased from two to three, and it is now felt that five to six volumes, of 1000 pages each, will be required to do proper justice to the work. The last volume will also contain detailed indices, besides the usual entries.

This Encyclopaedia of Indian Literature is a work of a pioneering nature and as is bound to be in any work of this kind, vast in magnitude and complex in nature, there might be several shortcomings. In spite of efforts towards achieving some kind of uniformity in approach, presentation and style of the entries, there will be variations as natural as in the writings of any two writers. It is hoped that despite these shortcomings, the Encyclopaedia of Indian Literature will serve the intended purpose and prove to be a useful tool of reference both to scholars and lay readers and help fill a long-felt need of the Indian literary world.

PREFACE

AN encyclopaedia is a work that contains information not just gathered as it comes but selected, organized and presented in articles arranged alphabetically by subject. This is generally information given on all branches of knowledge or on a particular branch of it. It may be planned and compiled with children in view or adults. It may confine itself to one area of knowledge or aim at giving information on a variety of subjects. It may use graphs and illustrations for further elucidation. It furnishes a helpful bibliography on each topic and it is prepared according to an over-all plan so that the reader acquires from it accurate knowledge set forth in a pleasing and objective manner. Preservation and easy dissemination of knowledge is what an encyclopaedia aims at. The adult reader and student alike will find that an encyclopaedia is an essential and rewarding aid to study. An encyclopaedia draws on specialists and furnishes only generally accepted views, eliminating axe-grinding and special pleading alike. It gives balanced surveys of facts, not individual interpretations. Hundreds of writers are called upon to contribute to its pages. In fact, an encyclopaedia is a splendid aid to self-education.

This is an encylopaedia dealing with that branch of knowledge (and power) which we call literature. There are literatures which continue to live and grow, ancient though they be and there are others which are defunct, their growth having been arrested long ago. Sanskrit, for instance, has a living literature even today, having adjusted itself to modern thought-patterns, imaginative urges and linguistic turns. But the literature in Apabhramsha is defunct, for it has ceased to grow. Even if a literature is not alive today, its past works will continue to live and make readers experience their 'power', if the works embody living values. An encyclopaedia of literature will make possible to the reader an organised access to the values of the literature, its history, its medium, that is to say, the language or languages in which it is written, its movements and schools which are national, like the Bhakti Movement in Indian literature or trans-national like Romanticism or Modernism. The techniques of literature include features like style, imagery and rhythm and literary forms like epic, comedy, lyric or novel. Poetics brings in all its stages of development—ancient, medieval and modern. Literary criticism deals with the problems, aims, functions and types of criticism, not excluding critical terms like Imagination, Alankara, Akhyana, Aesthetics, Biography, Ghazal, Champu, Elegy, Expressionism, etc.

Another heading to be considered for inclusion is that of the interaction of poetry with other forms and subjects like Religion, Psychology, Nationalism, Broadcasting and Television, Gandhism, etc.

The reader will eventually see that a consideration of techniques and relationships here does not include too many western terms, particularly because Indian literature has also to reckon with techniques in Sanskrit, Prakrit and modern Indian languages as well as Persian and English. On the other hand, we have devoted considerable space to notes on established authors and on outstanding books in Indian literature.

This is an encyclopaedia of Indian literature. There was a time when Indian literature just meant literature in Sanskrit. A little later the connotation widened and the term could take in Pali, the Prakrits and the Apabhramshas. On the eve of Indian Independence, the meaning expanded when Shipley planned his Encyclopaedia of Literature. Modern Indian literatures were admitted along with Sanskrit and the Prakrits. All that is past history. Indian literature today means literature produced in the Indian languages beginning with Vedic Sanskrit in the hoary past to what is written today by Indians in English—the language of our cultural adoption. Sanskrit, Persian and English jostle with each other and with other ancient, medieval and modern Indian languages under the caption 'Indian Literature'.

The diversity of Indian languages naturally led our critics to speak of the plurality of Indian literature. It is said that there is some justification for this use of the plural because substance and form interpenetrate and mingle in literary compostion to such an extent that we cannot isolate language from substance in this charmed chemistry. But we should not forget that there is something much more subtle than a mingling of language and substance in literature. We witness there the extraordinary phenomenon of the genius of a race, the exquisite sensibility of a highly evolved and unique personality, the colour and glow of a steady cultural environment, steady in spite of its almost imperceptible changes down the years and the ethos of a particular epoch concocted together in a work of art, recognisable individually and yet forming an indistinguishable whole, a real synthesis. It is this concoction or synthesis that constitutes Indian literature. One can speak of it only in the singular, for it is singular in the very process of its creation, whatever the language that went into its preparation and compositon, provided it was Indian.

It is this unique quality of Indianness that is shared by the literature written in all the Indian languages.

A word has to be said about the languages in which this literature has been written. They fall into four main groups—Aryan, Dravidian, Sino-Tibetan and Austric. Most of these languages also possess certain characteristics in common—the phonetic character of almost each Indian script, the normal word order of subject, object and verb, etc. Sanskrit, English and to a small extent, Persian have influenced these languages, particularly in their vocabulary. There are about seven hundred languages in all if we take into account each dialect spoken by a thousand persons or more and two hundred and fiftynine languages only if we count each dialect that is spoken by five thousand persons or more. Would we still refer to Indian literature in the singular if literature were to be produced in all these seven hundred dialects and not only in the twentytwo languages, which have a long cultural history and are recognised by the Literary Academy of India? I would answer this question unhesitatingly in the affirmative, because all these languages will have the stamp of a somewhat similar linguistic structure, a more comprehensively similar history and above all a charmed concoction or cultural synthesis, which is indubitably Indian.

It is true that an integral picture of Indian literature has not taken shape as yet. But we are living in times in which it is taking shape every day. Our universities have not ventured so far to lay down a course for the study of Indian literature as such. But a seminar on this subject was organized by Bangalore University as far back as 1969. During the last two decades the Central Sahitya Akademi has been putting forth numerous publications which constitute an invaluable mass of material meant for such a study: more than a hundred books in 'The Makers of Indian Literature' series, ten out of twentytwo Literary histories of Indian languages, numerous translations of famous books written in prose and in verse and also critical studies of other kinds. These publications have been supplemented by other private and government agencies. In fact, on the basis of this material, I taught a course in Indian Literature in 1984 in a deemed university—the Sri Sathya Sai Institute of Higher Learning. The sixth part of my book on The Concept of Indian Literature (1979) is devoted to a discussion of one or two courses of study in Indian Literature.

Just as we have taken into account all the material that is produced in Indian languages, whether ancient, medieval or modern, as Indian literature, we have to consider the writings produced away from India or outside our borders, as material to be surveyed along with Indian literature, if they are written in Bengali, Urdu or Tamil or any other Indian language. We also recognise books written in English in India by Indians as Indian literature. Similarly, we have to describe as Indian literature work written in Indian languages by Indians living away from India in cities in the U.S.A., U.K. or any other country. The literature in Bengali, Urdu and Tamil, written in Bangladesh, Pakistan and Sri Lanka cannot be regarded as Indian literature because there are other geographical and territorial claims on these languages. The literature produced in these and in other such languages, we have to consider in an appendix, as it were, as explorations of the human mind carried out in those areas in these languages.

I should refer here, in passing, to a comparative view of the evolution of Indian, American and Russian literatures. The United States of America evolved into a nation about two hundred years ago. It has, over the year, built up a new civilisation resulting in the amazing vitality and variety of the American nation. The Dane, the Frenchman, the German, the Britisher, the Irishman and the Spaniard and persons belonging to several other nationalities are placed in a "melting pot" and a new nationality emerges from this reformed section of humanity found in the "melting pot". They all severally dream their dreams but express them in one language–American English. This is how a great literature is being produced in the States.

Soviet Russia had to face a more complex problem. In this 'congeries of nations' as Sri Aurobindo called it, the Russia of the pre-revolutinary period, there were many nationl languages, for Russia was a multi-national State. The Communist Government of the Revolution has been trying to weld this State together into one nation. In the fourth Congress of Soviet writers in May 1967, L. Sobolev said that Soviet writers represented seventyfour nationalities and produced works of literature in fiftyseven languages. He compared Soviet literature to Lake Baikal and said that three hundred and thirtythree rivers flow into the lake, but only one river, the Angara, flows out of it. In the same way, multi-national Soviet literature assimilates the best of the fraternal literatures and turns them into a single multi-national literature which is united in its world outlook, in its treatment of reality and, above all, in its loyalty to the party and the sentiments of the people. It is clear that even when unity is achieved by the literature of the Soviet Federal Republic, it will be a multi-national international unity, different from the unity of a single national literature, which Indian literature possesses because of a cultural tradition that has held the States in India together for centuries. This unique unity of Indian literature is there because we are not a young nation like the U.S.A. Nor was it yesterday or today that the component unit-States of India came together as in the U.S.S.R. On the other hand, it was India (Sapta Sindhu) that formed the States from the North to the South and from the East to the West ever since the Aryans and Dravidians first clashed and then joined together on Sapta Sindhu soil. A cultural tradition, which is five thousand years old, holds them together. One or two dents have, no doubt, been made in this unity in recent years. But the unity is there, by and large, and the deviation only proves the norm—that of unity in variety.

The ancient Indian way of compiling encyclopaedias was different from this one. That tradition, however, had its own great features and they are seen vividly in the encyclopaedias of philosophy and the religion—the Brahma Sutras of Sage Vyasa and the Sarva Darshana Sangraha of the great Vidyaranya, the promoter of the Vijayanagaram empire. Even the writers on Indian aesthetics offer remarkable surveys of what obtained in the field before they came on the scene. These features and methods have to be studied deeply and brought up to date before we are able to fuse them with the new tradition of the West that has come down to us. In the meanwhile, in this encyclopaedia, we have taken the one step which can be managed with comparative ease at the present juncture—that of presenting the rich and varied treasures of Indian literature and Indian aesthetics in a form which is current today and suits our purpose well.

With real humility and with the ardent hope that this may be of some use to students of Indian literature in India and all the world over, we present this result of our joint labours to all lovers of Indian literature.

VINAYAK KRISHNA GOKAK
President, Sahitya Akademi

EDITORIAL

THIS Encyclopaedia has been designed to give a fairly clear and comprehensive idea about the growth and development of Indian literature in 22 languages recognised by the Sahitya Akademi. The entries arranged in alphabetical order cover practically all the important aspects of Indian literature and the growth and development have been traced, down the ages, with general historical surveys of genres and movements and adequate notes on established authors born in or before 1947 and on significant books in each of these 22 and if Pali, Prakrit and Apabhramsha are taken separately, 25 languages.

These surveys and notes may reveal to the discerning eye a striking continuity of tradition,both regional and national, from the ancient to the modern times. The regional tradition has its local peculiarities, but it is unmistakably an integral part of the wider literary culture of the whole nation. And the commonly-held belief that the modern Indian literature in different regional languages represents a distinct departure from, if not a revolt against, the tradition is not borne out by the character of the great works of literary art produced during the last hundred and fifty years. The works of Rabindranath and Saratchandra, Premchand and Jaisankar Prasad, Bharati, Karanth, Bendre and Thakazhi Shivashankar Pillai and of Sri Aurobindo, to name only a few, are all of a piece, in that they present a view of life and ethos which are essentially and perennially Indian even though some of them have projected more of secular humanism in their writing. They may bear signs of western impact on form and structure, but with regard to the content the impact is perceptibly marginal.

We perhaps tend to make a little too much of the western influence on modern Indian literature and the impact of English education on our literary sensibility. Even without the British conquest of India and English education, we could have imbibed western ideas and modes of thinking as some Asian countries have done without them. And if we had directly discovered the living tradition of our literary heritage without the aid of the western indologists and without being indoctrinated by the so-called western missionaries of civilization, many of the borrowings might not have been necessary. It is perhaps good to remember that some of the true and outstanding representatives of Indian literature (in the regional languages), which is both Indian and universal, are still the Sangam poets and Kamban, the Alwars, Jnaneshwara, Tulsidas, Vidyapati, Shah Abdul Latif, Mirza Ghalib and the saint-poets of the different parts of the country.

This continuity—the pastness of the present, has been possible because of the cultural unity of India. This unity is a unity in variety not in diversity; it is not an impression of unity created by a putting together of diverse elements into an arranged whole like a bouquet of many-coloured flowers. It is essentially interpenetrative and woven into an enduring texture. The similarity of physical environment, of the agricultural base of life, of attachment to family and land, of rites and rituals connected with marriage, birth and death, in other words, similarity of the mores of living all over the country has strengthened this unity. And this homogeneity has, through the ages, manifested itself not only in a similar rhythm of living, but even in the manner of acceptance of and reaction to social changes and in the mode of resilience or swingback after periodic diversions. In arts and literature its manifestation can be seen in its ritualistic or celebratory and communionist character. In fact, this element of celebration, rather than that of exploration, characterises the typical Indian arts more than perhaps anything else. In any case, it is a remarkable phenomenon that in a country which is more than a continent in respect of its racial, religious and linguistic diversity, this oneness has continued to persist till this day despite violent blasts of change. The British rule brought about only a political unity in the country for a brief historical period; the history of India's cultural unity is almost immemorial. Since the emergence of a world-view born out of the ideational fusion of the Aryans and the native inhabitants of the country resulting finally in the diffusion of an integrated culture throughout the length and breadth of the country, a distinct attitude to life and reality has taken a local habitation and a name which can only be described as Indian. In India, as they say it in French: plus ça change plus c'est la même chose.

But to emphasise this unity is not to deny variety or difference, and talking in terms of literature, the difference in style, treatment and technique. The peculiar genius of the languages also accounts for this difference. The local myths and legends, the regional variations of tales and stories and the level of development in each unit too have contributed to this desirable divergence. 'The race, the milieu and the moment', as Taine put it, have as well made for the separate identity of each regional literature. Yet there is still a strong feeling of shared inheritance and the literature in each language bears undeniable signs of its Indianness.

It is significant to note that traditionally the exponents of this spirit of Indianness like Sri Chaitanya and Nanak, Namdev and Vivekananda among others not only preached this unity but carried the message at considerable strain and risk to remote corners by going round the vast areas of the country as Parivrajakas. Various entries in this encyclopaedia written independently by different scholars from different parts of the country (and without any pre-plan) may bring this fact of unity in variety home to any careful reader.

There are some who still assume that literary culture is completely identified with the language through which it is projected. Such an assumption, apart from being harmful in its political implications, is also not valid at least in the Indian context. If it had been so, Indian literature in English should have presented a view of life that is either British or American and not Indian, which obviously, it has never attempted to do. Language is only one of the factors that constitute the culture of a nation, but it is a body of basic ideas commonly cherished and shared by its people that forms its cultural ethos. In India's literary culture, the national identity should be more striking and important even to a casual observer than its regional distinction.

To the western indologists and encyclopaedists, Indian literature, for a long time, had appeared to be identified with ancient Indian literature. Later, literature of the middle ages also assumed a representative character in their estimate. Of late, modern Indian literature including even that branch which is produced in English has been recognised as Indian. But to the common reader of Indian literature, both here and abroad, what is acknowledged as Indian literature is still a literature of the people and perhaps for the people but not the one produced by the people—the anonymous common men. There have all along been two distinct streams of Indian literature, running parallel to each other in consonance. Even when Sanskrit was the lingua franca of the country, it was only a language of the elite and the literature produced in the language embodied, by and large, the thoughts, ideas and sentiments of a section of the cultivated people. But the presence of various regional languages and literatures in them was also recognised. The Sanskrit dramatists admitted this fact by using these languages in their Sanskrit texts. This popular tradition, however, was built on the basic tenets of the accepted view of life though it has all along projected a character of its own by bringing to bear on them a more immediate, functional and even secular significance. There have been variations on or transformations of these ideas, but no serious deviations. The encyclopaedia has also laid proper emphasis on this literature by the people.

It may appear that Persian in the past played and English at present is playing a similar role as Sanskrit has all along done. Sanskrit was also a new language to the original natives of India, like Persian and English. Both the languages and their literatures enriched our languages and literatures and literary sensibility, but they could never become a living source of inspiration like Sanskrit and its abundant legacy. Persian, partly because of its being an old langauge representing an alien classical culture and partly due to the fall of the Mughal and rise of the British empire, had to quit the scene leaving only elements which could be easily assimilated. While Persian, contributing initially to the genesis of Urdu and its literary style and form, has become an echo in modern Urdu literature, except perhaps in verbal borrowings (for the Urdu writers have their primal roots in this country), Sanskrit came to stay and not only mothered most of the Indian languages but also still remains a store-house of words and ideas for all these languages. And English too continues to be a pervading presence, though the empire has gone, because of its indispensable relevance to the contemporary world situation and is considered now to be the most potent source of influence. Speaking of the nature of this influence one might say that these cultural invasions had come, as it were, like floods and for a time we felt unhinged and even uprooted. But when the floods receded, we also found our soil renewed by a fresh coat of fertility, though the new harvest still smelt and tasted of our familiar earth.

When we came into contact with the new, powerful and aggressive civilization of the West, conceived in a different spirit, and completely in tune with the temper of the age, we were intellectually somnolent, economically harassed and politically subdued by the very power that brought us face to face with it. We almost felt thrown out of our moorings. In the first flash, there was a large-scale imitation both in life and literature abetted sometimes by the political forces at work, followed by a period of adaptation and then one of rewakening to a consciousness of our glorious past and rich heritage. And yet even when we settled down to produce our own literature we continued to rely on English for new concepts, techniques and forms. It is only now that the realization seems to have dawned that English has no umbilical relation with our languages and that it cannot give us a weltanschauung and that even for new techniques and forms we have still our vast resources to explore. In the ultimate analysis the greatest benefit we can derive out of English could be one of accepting the idea that, in the language of Sri Aurobindo, "we can go forward to a large repossession of ourselves in which we shall make a better, more living, more real, more self-possessed use of the intervening experience" with the help of our free and meaningful contact with the West. In fact, the two-way traffic of ideas had started since the indological discovery of India. And, as our complex of confrontation began to wear off, more of mutual understanding began to grow between the East and the West and more areas of agreement came into view. Even the hypotheses of western science now appear to be in unison with ancient India's metaphysical speculations on the physical universe. In this situation of growing intimacy, the revitalization of an ancient culture can be achieved with greater confidence and aplomb.

This encyclopaeida has taken in its purview the whole of Indian literature in its various ramifications, with Vedic/Sanskrit, the most ancient at the one end and Indian literature in English, the most modern at the other. The inclusion of what is generally known as Indo-Anglian literature may be frowned at. For one thing, it has so far produced only a few substantial writers, its history is brief and its tradition not yet well established. And secondly, it may be argued that a literature presented in a language not Indian cannot be Indian. The motivation or the compulsion behind the acceptance of English as a medium of literary expression need not be discussed here. But there is no denying the fact that English is a powerful and elastic vehicle of expression. In fact, English has ceased to be the language of the people of England alone. It has grown into a world language which the Englishmen can only share with others. It is therefore natural that a sensitive few who lived with the language and cultivated it with care, will feel prompted to choose English as the medium of their creative expression. If this literature in an international language can shake off its elitism, can talk of experience not confined to the denationalised city life of the country and eschew the gimmicks and fashions of imitation, it may one day grow into a viable kind of Indian literature at least in spirit.

Even an encyclopaedia survey of the literary culture of a country as big as India, covering an unbroken flow of a period of about five thousand years, cannot but throw some of its salient features into focus. One is likely to be immediately impressed by the astonishing variety of its forms and genres, mostly indigenous, the vast area of experience brought into it for creative treatment, and by the almost bewildering diversification of its themes. No aspect of life is left out of it. From the most profoundly religious and spiritual to the most grossly mundane have found place in it. Alongside the large body of devotional literature, there were literary pieces even on the art or science of erotics. And all along a number of seminal works continued to sustain and inspire. To name a few, the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, the Bhagavata, the Kamasutra and the Arthashastra have proved, through the centuries, to be inexhaustible sources not only of inspiration but of new ideas and thoughts and archetypes of experience. And through literature, the ideas and the thoughts that they embody have now become an inseparable part of our collective unconscious. To ignore this common heritage is to misread the spirit and the drive of India's literary culture.

But inspite of this general trend, India's literary culture has now acquired, through the process of various political and social changes, a composite character. It has taken ideas and modes of expression from Islamic literature, the concept of secular and Christian humanism, as well as socialistic view of life from Europe and found it possible to accommodate them within the ambience of its accepted pattern. Even those who have rebelled against the convention of basic relationships, such as those between man and woman, man and society and man and God, either remained only iconoclastic in their attitude or at least by implication, suggested the central sanity of the Indian view of life. A careful study of the contemporary literary scene may show that the protest is against the peripheral iniquities and that side by side with the questionings there is a growing awareness of a value-system that alone can give us a national identity.

NOTES ON THE MAP, LANGUAGE SCRIPT, TRANSLITERATION, ETC.

THE language map is based on the census of 1971; the one of 1981 census is not yet ready for public use and even if it had been it would still be incomplete as the 1981 census could not be held in all the states. This disadvantage may preclude a knowldege of the latest demographic trend of the country, but not so much that of the pattern of language distribution. One interesting aspect of this pattern is that no state in the country is absolutely uni-lingual. Besides the three numerically important languages shown in the map, there are other language groups as well residing in the areas. This once made for a lot of communal harmony and understanding, so much so that a writer of a small language group could even become a major writer of the main language group of the area. Thus a Maharashtrian Bendre or a Tamilian Masti Venkatesa Iyengar could become two outstanding writers in Kannada, a Bengali Radhanath Ray a pioneering author in Oriya or a Rajasthani Jyotiprakash Agarwala a founding father of modern Assamese literature. This co-existence can still be an asset to a pluralistic society trying to achieve cohesion. Another interesting result of the language distribution has been the emergence of writers who write creatively and with almost equal effectiveness in more than one language and are claimed as their own writers by different language groups. This may appear to be very peculiar to the Indian situation. Incidentally, many of the Indian English writers are also reputed writers of their own languages.

India is a vast multi-lingual country. Apart from 14 major Indo-Aryan and 4 Dravidian languages there are many languages of Austro-Asiatic and Tibeto-Burman origin which are still in living use and if we take all the dialects, each spoken by about 5000 people, the number of the languages, mainly spoken, will be about 250. Fifteen major languages, including Sanskrit have been recognized by the constitution of the country as official languages. The Sahitya Akademi has accepted 9 more for the valuable literature that they have produced. According to the 1971 census report Sanskrit has been claimed to be the mother tongue of about 2000 people. Of the other 9, the percentage of Dogri and Nepali and Konkani speaking people has been shown in the map. English is spoken as mother tongue by only a few, mostly by the Anglo-Indians. Maithili and Rajasthani speaking people are included in the figures shown against Hindi in Bihar and Rajasthan respectively. Apabhramsha, Pali and Prakrit are no longer spoken languages but they are rich in literature next only to Sanskrit among the ancient Indian languages.

The chart of the scripts does not show the scripts used by Konkani, Maithili, Manipuri, Nepali and Rajasthani. Konkani in fact, used Devanagari, Kannada and Roman scripts, sometimes Malayalam script is also put to use, though All India Konkani Sahitya Parishad has accepted Devanagari as the main script for the language. Manipuri is written in the Assamese-Bengali script and Maithili, Nepali and Rajasthani in Devanagari with slight variations.

In transliterating the proper names and words commonly used by most of the languages we have accepted the conventional spellings, that is, the received spellings of the different regions. As a result, it may be found that 'ee' and 'i' 'oo' and 'u' and three sibilants, dental, palatal and cerebal, are inter-changeable. We thought it advisable not to interfere with the regional modes of spelling in transliteration. Thus we have accepted both Siva and Shiva, Vishnu and Visnu, Namboothiri and Nambuthiri or Namputhiri, Sarma and Sharma, etc. Any uniformity in this regard is impossible unless these spellings are standardised by common consent, though in some cases of surnames, with various spellings, we have accepted one uniform spelling for the sake of convenience. We have, however, standardised the spellings of words like Amrita, Jnana, Satya, Skandha, etc. though they are spelt as Amruta, Dnyana or Gyana, Sathya, Skantha etc. respectively in some of the languages. It may be noted that only the names of books, journals and magazines have been printed in italics.

As a rule, the names of the authors have been entered with their surnames first but in some cases the popular names of the authors have been accepted as first names. It may also be helpful to note that 'ch' should be pronounced as 'ch' as in English 'chalk' and 'c' as in English 'cock' though this sound has been mostly represented by that of English 'K'. The table showing the general mode of transliteration in Roman alphabet may be of further help.

The topics for the encyclopaedia, divided into three categories, general, authors and books, were chosen by the expert committee in each language and the entries were prepared under the supervision of the respective language-editors-cum-advisers who also subsequently verified them. All possible care has been taken to get the facts right, but in a pioneering work of this magnitude the possibility of inadvertent errors cannot perhaps be completely ruled out. Important entries, if any, pertaining to this volume and left out owing to unavoidable reasons, will be included in the last volume of addenda and indices.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

THIS work owes a great deal to the whole-hearted support and encouragement of Professor V.K. Gokak, President, Sahitya Akademi. I offer my grateful thanks to him. The members of the Steering Committee which generally met once in every two months helped me all along not only in sorting out problems that cropped up occasionally but also in solving them with their advice and guidance. The Secretary of the Akademi, Professor Indranath Choudhuri, with his enthusiasm for and interest in the work has been a great help. I take this opportunity to thank all of them and also the innumerable contributors and the language editors who have made the work possible. Our thanks are due, too, to the Director, Central Institute of Indian Language, Mysore, for providing us with a copy of the language map and permitting us to use it and to the Director of Indian Museum, Calcutta, for permitting us to use the print of a 2nd century B.C. sculpture plate from their book The Way of the Buddha showing a rishi teaching his disciples,as a design for the end-paper of the encyclopaedia. And finally my thanks to the two former chief editors who ably initiated the work, and my colleagues in the Unit—the assistant editors and office assistants—who have always given me their ungrudging cooperation. I am happy to acknowledge also their contribution to the making of this work of national importance.

AAG KA DARYA (Urdu) is a massive Urdu novel by Quarratulain Hyder, first published in 1960 in Pakistan. In this her magnum opus, Quarratulain Hyder has contemplated over some of the basic issues of human existence like culture and the historical time. It is an enduring work of fiction presenting the whole panorama of Indian life in multiple scenes. These scenes do not outline the solitary and stationary present: the past and the present seem to flow indistinguishably at a stretch. The present in every period of time does get modified, yet essentially it is the same old time one never fails to recognise. Quarratulain Hyder seems to believe that a future with alien and outlandish credentials can never show up in India. It has to keep grooming itself to become a part of the mainstream.

All along the narrative, the reader keeps travelling through the history of the all-embracing Indian thought till he stops holding his breath at the din of the partition of the country. The political division of the old country is supposedly based on the contemporary conviction that the Hindus and the Muslims have separate cultural identities. Deep sadness pervades the last few pages of the novel, yet, although rather uncertainly, the people have already started moulding themselves according to the new times.

As the title suggests, the predicament of the rootlessness of an entire generation of people not only from a place but, more terribly, from a belief, presents the view as Aag ka Darya (The River of Fire). The British rulers conspired with the local feudal forces to strike a deal of convenience rather than of conscience. The resultant suffering of the helpless masses, both emotional and material, was inevitable. Kamal, whose prototype and namesake emigrated from Baghdad centuries earlier and loved and lived and sought his salvation on this soil is also on his way to Pakistan, desperately looking from the window of the train at the open countryside fleeting past. "Each emigration has a meaning," his friend Gautam, used to tell him. It now occurs to him that all emigrations are meaningless. And feeling ill and tired, he spreads himself on the seat to go to sleep.

But Champa Ahmad, who comes of an humbler Muslim middle class, is made of sterner stuff. Determined and involved, she refuses to leave for Pakistan. She would keep striving to grow on from her roots. She has come to realise that the meaning of life lies in the people's capacity to hold on and work hard, whatever their plight.

Hyder's view of ancient India is mainly cultural. The picture, however, becomes concrete and more stable when the story shifts to the new India. All the characters in the young company at Lucknow and later, in England, are real and have an air characteristically their own. They are all self conscious and wishfully believe that their mouthfuls of debating words and handfuls of gestures will automatically bring the country out of the woods. They do not get to know the reality and do not learn to live up to it as adults until they return to India for a direct encounter with life.

Simple narrative, or any other single method, may have failed to portray the cultural synthesis of an ancient society and its subsequent split. So, as we have it, Quarratulain Hyder has justifiably refused to adhere to a single mode of expression. She is fluid and follows a style, at almost all major junctures of the story, differently. But for the vision of a variegated human universe and search for modes of expression, she possibly could not have visualised such a complex pattern in characterisation as that of Gautam who in a long sequence moves from being a regular disciple of Buddha to a diplomat. Aag Ka Darya is indeed a great novel. It has already become a classic in Urdu Literature, and has been translated into many Indian languages.

AARIZ, KASHMIRI (Kashmiri; b. 1916, d. 1965). Shortly before and immediately after independence the verses of Mahjoor and Azad dominated the literary circles in Kashmir. Their ghazals and patriotic songs were so popular that it was practically difficult for a third literary figure to attract the admiration of general public and the reader. Though a caravan of new poets emerged on the literary scene, against this background none could acquire public recognition, except Aariz. It was the sweetness and chastity of his verse which made him popular. His parents named him Ghulam Nabi. Later on he acquired fame as Aariz Kashmiri.

His uncle Azad was a teacher and was then posted as Head Master of a Primary School in village Zowhama. He got his nephew Aariz admitted in the same school. As Azad had no issue of his own he took keen interest in building the career of his nephew, Aariz who completed primary education in 1928 and was taken to Srinagar for further studies. Non-availability of residential hostels at Srinagar forced Azad to leave this child as a paying guest with a remote acquaintance at Srinagar. In these circumstances he could only pass Matric and Intermediate Examinations from the Punjab University in 1932 and 1934 respectively.

He joined the Forest Training School of Chittar Nar and qualified as a subordinate Forest officer. Thereafter he got employment with State Forest Department as Forester and later on was promoted to the rank of a Range Officer. As a man Aariz was simple, upright, soft-spoken and shy. As officer he was a dedicated worker, unassuming and honest. In 1948 when the popularity of Mahjoor and Azad and of a host of new poets had made the situation very competitive for a new poet, Aariz came with his peculiar diction, sweet language and sincere expression and within a brief period of three years acquired fame and popularity. The void which was created by the deaths of Azad in 1948 and of Mahjoor in 1951 was considerably filled in by the popularity of Aariz's verse. He published several smaller compilations entitled Wozamala during this period. His ghazal acquired both appreciation from students of literature and jealousy from his fellow writers. His love lyrics, like folk songs, acquired public popularity. His devotional poems 'Naat and Manqabat' created an impact and his progressive poems depicting socio-economic contradictions dominated the political life especially in the rural areas.

His verse is distinguishable due to its peculiar style and diction. In Kashmiri love poetry woman has been always depicted as lover. While expressing the experiences and emotions of a lover he has so aptly given vent to feminine feelings that even a woman cannot perhaps express such experiences in a better way. His language is both sweet and chaste, his ideas are also lofty and realistic.

His revolutionary poems contain forceful exposure of socio-economic disparities, exploitation of the downtrodden and nepotism of the ruling class. He died a premature death at the age of 49, due to stomach ulcer.

ABBAS, KHWAJA AHMAD (Urdu; b. 1914) son of Khwaja Ghulam Alasletein Ansari and grandson (from mother's side) of Khwaja Altaf Husain 'Hali', was born at Panipat. He passed his B.A. and LL.B. examinations from Aligarh Muslim University in 1933 and 1935 respectively. Soon thereafter he joined the Bombay Chronicle. For two years he worked as Film Critic and was so effective and forthright that the film producers of Bombay threatened to boycott the Chronicle unless Abbas was dismissed. The management was not willing to forego cinema advertisements, but they were also not ready to dispense with the services of a journalist who knew and did his job thoroughly well. Abbas was, therefore, removed from his old job and transferred to the editorial desk of their Sunday Edition, an assignment higher than the previous one. It was here that he launched his famous 'Last Page', the column which was later adopted by Blitz, the Bombay weekly, in 1947. It has continued all these years. After the management of Blitz launched their Hindi Blitz (1950) and later Urdu Blitz (1958), a somewhat identical column became their special feature also. Abbas has been writing these columns under a new pen name 'Azad Kalm.'

Abbas has been a successful man in most of the things he did in life. His marriage to Mujtabai Begum, the result of a tender love affair so lovingly narrated in I am not an Island, his autobiography, was a great success. It is often said that she was the woman behind all his worthwhile achievements. Her death in 1958 left Abbas a lonely man.

In the wake of India's partition in 1947 while most of his relatives migrated to Pakistan, his near and dear ones including his mother (father had already died in 1942) did not do so and had to be escorted out of the riot-torn Panipat at the personal intervention of Jawaharlal Nehru whose friendship Abbas had enjoyed from his student days.

Abbas's long association with the world of films started with his first association with Bombay Talkies as their Publicity Manager, in which capacity he was often present on the sets and had keenly watched the working methods of Company's German directors and technicians. Later he himself made many an important film like 'Dharti ke Lal', 'Anhonee', 'Naya Sansar', 'Do Boond Pani', 'Shehr aur Sapana' and 'Char Dil Char Rahen' besides writing for some of the most memorable Indian films, like 'Awara' and 'Dr. Kotnis ki Amar Kahani'.

In addition to his journalistic and film activities, Abbas wrote and produced a number of successful plays for I.P.T.A. (Indian Peopleś Theatre Association) and wrote dozens of books including short story collections like Ek Ladki, Zafraan ke Phool, Paon mein Phool, Mein Kaun Hoon, Gehun aur Gulab, Nai Dharti Naye Insan and Nai Saree and novels like Inqilab (1945), Char Dil Char Rahen (1959) and Diya Jale Sari Raat (1959). The novel Inqilab was written in English and Urdu. Its Russian translation entitled Son of India was a hit in U.S.S.R. and sold 90,000 copies. Another novel was And One Did Not Come Back (English) on which V. Shanta Ram based his famous film 'Dr. Kotnis ki Amar Kahani'.

Abbas is a widely travelled man. He had gone around the world. He was deeply interested in politics but except for a brief encounter with the 'Quit India' Movement of 1942, he never took active part in politics. His life is a saga of good, hard and sustained work. His literary, film and journalistic activities present him as an idealist, deeply committed to radical humanism, socialism and world peace.

Abbas has won many honours and awards like Padma Sri (1968), Mir Award of Bhopal Urdu Academy, Bihar Urdu Journalists Award for his contribution to national integration, Haryana Government Award for distinguished writing in Urdu, President's Gold Medal for his film 'Shehr aur Sapna' (1963) and international awards like Art Academy Award of Karlovy Vary Film Festival (for film Direction of 'Shehr aur Sapna') as also the Ghumon (Spain) and Santa Barbara (U.S.A.) awards.

His film 'Naxalite' also won a Gold Medal from the Italian Film Festival committee.

ABDALA RAHMAN (Apabhramsha, 11th-12th century) Abdala Rahman (Skt. Abdula Rahman) is an Apabhramsha poet of Mlechchhadesha, a province near Multan in Baluchistan, who authored the kavya Sandesharasaka which deals with the message of the separated heroine to her beloved husband. This poem written in 223 Apabhramsha verses is a beautiful composition with an erotic theme presented with poetic imagery of a high standard and contains many qualities of a literary work—brevity, description of the scenes of natural panorama as well as human emotions. He was of the weavers' caste. His work shows an impact of the Sanskrit literary tradition.

ABDUL KHADAR, VAKKAM (Malayalam; b. 1912) is a creative writer, literary critic and intellectual, noted for his liberal views. He is the son of Abdul Khadar Maulavi. His father associated himself with the rebel K. Ramakrishna Pillai (1878-1916) who was deported from Travancore for his anti-Government activities. Abdul Khadar learnt many languages, visited several places in India and Sri Lanka and worked as editor of newspapers and periodicals.

His writings have been published in sixteen volumes. They include seven collections of pen-pictures and short biographies such as Tulikachitrangal (1945), Chitradarshini (1946) and Pratibhashalikal (1955), two collections of essays, viz. Vichara Vedi (1947) and Sahityadarshanam (1963), two volumes of literary criticism, viz. Vimarsavum Vimarsakanmarum (1947) and Purogatiyum Sahityakalakalum (1948), a treatise on Human Rights (1960); and a play. He has also written three books on Islamic religious thought.

ABDUL MAJID, DARYABADI (Urdu; b. 1892, d. 1977) was the grandson of Mufti Mazhar Karim who was sentenced to life imprisonment by the British rulers in 1857 for issuing a 'Fatwa' against them. His father Abdul Qadar was however in the service of the Government and retired as Deputy Collector.

He was brought up in a religious enviornment. He matriculated from Sitapur in 1908 and graduated from Canning College, Lucknow in 1912. It is here that he came into contact with the rationalist school of the West and became a rationalist and an agnostic.

He had a natural taste for philosophy and joined St. Stephens College, Delhi in 1931 to do his M.A. in Philosophy. He could not pursue this for long and had to leave midway.

He took to a study of Buddhism and Theosophy in 1918. Later, in his own words, he became a 'Muslim de novo' under the influence of Maulana Ashraf Ali Thanvi.

He was associated with 'Khilafat' Conference at Lucknow in 1927 and was President of the 'Oudh Khilafat Committee'.

An eminent journalist and writer, he published over 60 big and small works besides some poems and ghazals between 1914 and 1919 and also a drama. He had adapted 'Nazir' as his nom de plume. A fairly good number of his articles also appeared in the Urdu and English journals of his day.

He started his own Urdu weekly, the Sach in 1925 from Lucknow which continued upto 1933, when it was changed into The Sidq. From December 1950, this was further changed into The Sidq-e-Jadid. He was associated for some time with the editorial boards of The Modern Review and The A'l-Maarif. His earliest essays published in 1909 as pamphlets were Ghiza-i-Insan (Man's food) and Mehmud Ghaznavi. They were followed by Falsafa-e-Jazbat and Falsafa-e-Ijtimaa published by Anjuman-e-Tarraqqi-e-Urdu. These books introduce us to his early rationalist and agnostic convictions.

Psychology of Leadership, also a work of those early days was published in English by a British publisher, Fisher and Unwin. His other important works are Falsafa aur Uski Talim, Falsafiana Mazamin (Lucknow) Mahadi Falsafa in two parts, Payam-e-Aman (Urdu translation of French writer Paul Richard's book with an original chapter by him on Islam aur Iman) Hakim-ul-Ummat (Biography of Ashraf Ali Thanvi) Muhammad Ali. Zaati Diary (two parts) Dar-ul-Musannafin (Azamgarh) Tarikh-e-Akhlaq-e-Europe, an Urdu translation of History of European Morals, two parts, Tarikh-e-Tamaddun, two parts, (Anjuman-e-Tarraqqui-e-Urdu) Tasavvuf-e-Islam five editions), Insha-e-Majid (two parts), Nashariyat-e-Majid, (Radio talks), Khutut-e-Mashahir (letters written to Majid by great men, Lucknow).

His other publications include: Safar-e-Hijaz (travelogue) Joghrafia-e-Qurani Ya Arze Quran (information about places mentioned in the Quran), Shakhsiyat-e-Quran Ya Itaam-ul-Quran (Information about persons mentioned in the Quran), Haiwanat-e-Quran Ya Al Haiwanial til Quran (Information about the animals mentioned in the Quran), Bashriat-e-Arbia Khutbat-e-Majidiya, Sirat-e-Nabavi Quran, Mushkilat-ul-Quran, Tarjuma-O-Sharah Munajat-e-Moqbul (Translation and explanation of the Prayers of Ashraf Ali Thanvi), Sharah Chahal Hidayat (explanation of the forty sayings of the prophet compiled by Shah Wali-ul-lah), Murdon ki Masihai, Sabir Rasul, Yatim ka Raj Yatim ki Jit (all articles on the Prophet). His autobiography Aap Biti was published after his death.

A number of eminent people have written about him. Two special numbers of journals dedicated to him are important: (1) Firogh-e-Urdu (Lucknow, August-October 1971), (2) Naya Daur (Lucknow, April-May 1978.)

ABDUL QADIR (Urdu; b. 1753, d. 1814). Sheikh Abdul Qadir or Shah Abdul Qadir was Shah Wali-ul-Lah's (1703-1762) third son whose Urdu translation of the Quran written in direct, intimate and simple but idiomatic language and style achieved great popularity. He was indeed a worthy successor to his father who is universally acknowledged as one of the greatest of the early religious thinkers in India, besides being a social reformer and an inspiration for the 'Vahabi' movement in India.

He also wrote a treatise in Urdu called Mozeh-Al-Koran which was later translated by Maulvi Abdulla. This translation was published in 1812 at Hoogly.

Abdul Qadir was a quiet worker not much inclined to publicity, hence not enough is known about two elder brothers, were Shah Abdul Aziz (1746-1823) who issued the famous 'Fatwa' permitting the Muslims to obtain English Education (and was on that account interdicted by the rank and file of contemporary theologists as heretical) and Shah Rafi-ud-Din (1749-1818) whose chief work was the literal translation of the Quran into Urdu. As this translation was excessively literal, it did not achieve general acceptance as did the translation of Abdul Qadir.

All the three brothers, like their illustrious father, were cautious reformers and did a great deal to liberate the Muslim masses from unhealthy social practices.

ABDUL SATTAR, QAZI (Urdu; b. 1930) is one of the well known writers of Urdu fiction. He was born at Sitapur (U.P.). He did his M.A. (Urdu) from Aligarh Muslim University. He did his Ph.D. on Urdu-Shairi-mein Qanotiat (Despondency in Urdu Poetry). He joined the Urdu Department of the Aligarh Muslim University in 1956 and since then has been working there. Qazi Sattar has been a prolific writer of Urdu fiction. He has given Urdu Literature about, a dozen novels; more prominent among these are: Dood-a-Chirag-e-Mehfil, Shab Guzeeda, Ghubar-e-Shab, Badal, Dara Shikoh, and Sala-ud-Din. His collection of short stories, Pital ka Ghanta has been noted for style and sociological detail.

Qazi Abdul Sattar has won many a distinction in his literary career, like 'Ghalib Award' (1973), Padma Sri (1974), 'Imtiaz-e-Mir' (1980), two literary awards of U.P. Urdu Academy; first in 1976 and the second in 1978.

ABDULWADUD, QAZI (Urdu; b. 1896, d. 1984) was the son of Qazi Abdul Wahid. He received early traditional education at home and learnt the Quran by heart. He did his schooling from Muslim School, Patna and graduated from Patna University. He learnt Latin, French and German at Bilgram Tutorial College, Aligarh, obtained his Bar-at-Law from Middle Temple, England and Tripos in Economics and Politics from Cambridge.

He had an abiding interest in scholarship but took part in Politics also as a hobby. He enjoyed close association with National leaders like Muhammad Ali, Chittranjan Das and Abul Kalam Azad.

In his youth he formed Anjuman-e-Taraqqui-e-Urdu in Patna and later shaped it into a provincial organisation with the Urdu monthly, Maiyar, as its literary organ.

Abdul Wadud, as the Urdu world knows him today, is no more the name of an individual; it is an institution of research. Among the great researchers who transformed literary research in Urdu into a discipline on scientific basis, Wadud holds a high position. He has not only brought to light some new materials in Urdu Literature but has also further explored certain weil acknowledged facts. His works on Ghalib and Mir and several other classical poets are unrivalled.

His articles published in the standard Urdu journals of India and Pakistan have been compiled by Kalim-ud-Din Ahmad into five volumes, only one of which Maqalat-e-Qazi Abdul Wadud (1977) has so far been published by the Bihar Urdu Academy.

He was honoured with various awards by the Government and Semi-Government organisations. In addition to Ushtur-o-Sozan (1964), Qazi Abdul Wadud edited Diwan-e-Joshish (Poetry), Delhi-1941, Tahqiq (Vol. I) Patna, 1961, Qat-e-Burhan, Patna, 1967 and Qataat-e-Dildar (Poetry), 1959.

ABHANGA (Marathi) was originally a kind of metre. But having been consistently used as a vehicle for expressing the devotional sentiment, it came to be known as a form of devotional poetic composition. It is a regularized and elaborated form of the folklore 'Ovi', which was known as a composition of folk-song in the 12th century. The Warakari or Vaishnava saint-poets like Jnaneshwara, Namadev, Eknath, Tukaram and quite a host of others developed and enriched it. The name of Saint Tukaram is ineffaceably associated with it as is exemplified by the popular Marathi saying which states that Tukaram's abhanga-vani is well-known and everlasting (Abhangavani prasiddha Tukayachi). The name Abhanga became so common in popular usage that the collection of a varied poetical compositions of saint-poet came to be known as Abhanganchi Gatha.

There are two types of Abhangas: One is the Greater (Motha) Abhanga and the other is the Smaller (Lahan) Abhanga. Saint Namadev has given us a metrical analysis of them. The first type has 22 letters in a line, with three beats of 6 letters each and the last one consisting of 4 letters. It is, as a rule, rhymed with other lines; and occasionally there is internal rhyming also, the beats rhyming with each other, but not necessarily rhyming with the end beat of the line. The line in the second type of Abhanga has, as a rule, eight letters in it, but often the first small beat of two letters is dropped and the line then has 6 letters respectively. The lines are rhymed at the end. Irrespective of whether the letters are phonetically short or long, metrically they assume an even range of quantity. Usually every letter becomes, guru or long, and sometimes two laghu or short letters are coupled together to make it equivalent to a long letter.

Abhanga as great devotional composition flourished from the end of the 13th century to the end of the 17th. Its qualitative peculiarity is most probably due to its being irrevocably associated with the beating of Mridanga or Dholak. Bengal's ancient metre, Payar, with lines of 4 letters, is perhaps the only parallel to Marathi Abhanga. Ghanakshari of 17th century Braja (or Old Hindi) poetry was a later development and has its parallel in Marathi compositions of approximately the same period.

The term Abhanga in the early Mahanubhava writings is understood to mean only 'the completion' or 'concluding line of a verse composition'. The contemporary Waakari references are more definite in connotation. Abhanga, in modern Marathi poetry, is quite a rarity. The more flexible 'Ovi' rather than the full-fledged Abhanga is employed for the expression of love, social irony and heroic sentiment, but hardly devotion as in the old Abhanga. Abhanga has been very successfully used to express cynicism and satire by Vinda Karandikar and for reflective moods by Madhukar Keche.

ABHAYADEVA SURI (Apabhramsha and Prakrit). Not much is known about the learned author Abhayadeva Suri. He was a disciple of Jayasingha Suri and the grammarian Hemachandra Suri was the disciple of Abhayadeva Suri. Abhayadeva Suri is also known as the author of Navangavritti. He has also written many commentaries on different books such as Viyahapannatti, Panavagarnaim, and Vivagasuyam. Some scholars think that Abhayadeva Suri is different from the commentator Abhayadeva. In their opinion, commentator Abhayadeva was the pupil of Jineshvara. Peterson says that there are no less than 6 Jaina authors by the name of Abhayadeva. Abhayadeva Suri has also composed Mahaviracharita in Apabhramsha. Suri is also known as the author of Tihuyanastotra, Rishabhajinastotra and Dharmasuristuti. The legend of Jayatihuyanastotra says that the poet, who was seriously ill, recovered his health through this hymn and that he brought to light a statue of Parashvanatha which was hidden for centuries. Dharmasuristuti is a poem of twelve months i.e. Barahamasa. It is in fifty verses. In it, the poet worships his lord in the name of his teacher.

ABHI BILKUL ABHI (Hindi) is the first collection of poems by Kedarnath Singh, a significant Hindi poet, published in 1960 (2nd Edition, 1980) i.e. during the last phase of the 'Nai Kavita' (New Poetry) movement. This collection reveals a sensitive poet who invents his own language. Kedar's poetry is characterized by its rich sensuous imagery and intense lyricism. Kedarnath Singh may sometimes appear to be ambiguous but he has his own optimism and a positive approach towards life. He avoids generalisations and feels concerned with the crisis of his time. One of the poets of Tisara Saptak (1959, ed. Agyeya), several of his poems in this collection, e.g. 'Apni Chhoti Bachchi ke Liye Ek Nam', and 'Rachana ki Adhi Rat' reflect a sense of deep commitment to life. Most of the poems in this collection give an impression of formalistic refinement and perfection. Kedarnath Singh is never loud. 'Prakriya', the first poem in this collection, is a poem on the creative process. As the poet visualises the situation, only a sudden word can express the complex reality where roots appear to exist in light, light in odour, odour in ideas, ideas in memories and memories in colours. In the poetry of Kedarnath Singh, colour-sense is most apparent. In fact, the whole structure of Kedar's poetry presents him as a thoughtful poet. Even landscape becomes an idea in some of his poems. He has used symbols to express ideas in several poems. But he is not a symbolist. Imagist he is, to a certain extent, as far as this collection is concerned, but even here, his imagery is associated with a vision of life. Deliberate stress on poetic refinement has limited his canvas but the poet is not unaware of the challenges of human reality. Interaction with the uncertainties of human future is noticed in a poem like 'Anagat'. However, this collection also reflects a change in the poetic attitude of Kedarnath Singh. 'Chunao ki Purva-Sandhya Par' is a distinguished example of the sense of protest which became the key-point of Hindi poetry in the post-sixties.

ABHIHITANVAYA (Sanskrit) is one of the theories regarding the comprehension of the sentence-meaning, and ascribed to the Bhatta Mimamsakas. According to this theory each word in a sentence gives out its individual and isolated meaning and stops with that, since its significative power is thereby exhausted. Then the syntactic relationship is conveyed through lakshana or secondary significative power on the basis of akamksha, yogyata and asatti.

ABHINANDA (Sanskrit) is often referred to as Gauda-Abhinanda (9th Century) who wrote Yogavashishthasara, an epitome of Yogavashishtha, a work based on the Ramayana with a strong philosophical and spiritual bias. Whether he is identical with any of other two Abhinandas is uncertain.

R.N.

ABHINANDA (Sanskrit), son of Satananda (first half of 9th Century), was a protege of king Haravarsha Yuvarajadeva alias Devapala of Pala dynasty. He wrote in a lucid classical style Ramacharita (Ramacharitam), an epic in 36 cantos, dealing with the Ramayana story from Sita's abduction to the killing of the demons Kumbha and Nikumbha. Through some more cantos (4 or 14), one Bhimakavi attempted to complete the story.

ABHINANDA (Sanskrit) is the son of Jayantabhatta (900) who lived in Kashmir. His seventh ancestor was a Gauda. His Kadambarikathasara epitomizes in eight cantos of elegant verses, mostly shlokas, Bana's famous prose romance Kadambari.

ABHINAVABHARATI (Sanskrit) or Natyavedavivriti is the name of a commentary by Abhinavagupta on Bharata's Natyashastra.

R.N.

ABHINAVAGUPTA (Sanskrit) of Kashmir is considered the final authority on Indian theatre, literary criticism and aesthetics, as well as on Kashmir Shaivism. He was the son of Nrisimhagupta popularly known as Chukhala, grandson of Varahagupta, brother of Manorathagupta, disciple of Utpaladeva, Bhatta Induraja and Bhatta Tautta, grand disciple of Somananda and teacher of Kshemaraja and Kshemendra. He flourished towards the close of the 10th and the beginning of the 11th century, and wrote between 993 and 1015.

Among his works the commentary Lochana on Anandavardhana's Dhvanyaloka (or Kavyaloka); and the commentary Natyavedvivriti or Abhinavabharati on Bharata's Natyashtra deal with literary criticism, aesthetics and the theatre. He has also written a commentary on Ghatakarparakavya, traditionally ascribed according to him to Kalidasa. Among his works on Kashmir Shaivism are Tantrasara, Tantraloka, Ishvarapratyabhijnavimarshini on Utpala's Ishvarapratyabhijna and Paryansthapanchashika. Both Bhatta Tauta's Kavyakautuka and Abhinava's commentary on it are non-extant. He has also written many stotras and stray verses.

Abhinavagupta was a great philosopher who wrote on aesthetics, and his views are held as authoritative by almost all later writers in the field. He followed Bharata and Anandavardhana, and was greatly influenced by Bhattanayaka and Bhatta Tauta. He was an ardent follower of the Pratyabhijna school of Kashmir Shaivism and considered the aesthetic experience of a connoisseur of art to be on the same level as that of the religious experience of the mystic. The aim of aesthetic experience is to sublimate the emotional instincts from the psychological plane, thereby making it non-individual, transcending time, space and circumstances. In real life there is emotional involvement through personal association, but in literature and art there is only pure delight. In the interpretation of the rasasutra, Abhinavagupta followed the theory of suggestion propounded by Anandavardhana, but also accepted the concept of sadharanikarana or universalization from Bhattanayaka, though he rejected the need to accept additional functions of bhavakatva and bhojakatva propounded by him. Bhatta Tauta's emphasis on the need for hridayasamvada or a sympathetic imagination on the part of actor and the audience was also accepted by Abhinava. According to him communication of aesthetic experiences from the artist to the connoisseur is not a one way traffic; the ideal reader has to equip himself through study and practice to be in a position to receive the experience. Temporary willing suspension of disbelief by suppressing his own opinions and convictions is essential for a sahridaya to be an ideal reader or spectator. The word sahridaya itself suggests this need. Abhinava defines a sahridaya as one whose mind has been polished by constant and repeated study of classical master-pieces to such an extent that what is described in the poem will easily be reflected to him, and he will thus be able to respond sympathetically to all good poetry.

Abhinavagupta developed the theory of vighnas or obstacles which have to be avoided for proper rasa-realization. These are seven in number: 1) lack of credibility is an obstacle for sympathetic response; 2) personal involvement which prevents aesthetic distance; 3) an absorption with one's own feelings; this obstacle is removed in the theatre with music, dance, etc.; 4) lack of proper means of perception; 5) lack of clarity; 6) lack of predominance of the main rasa; and 7) the presence of doubt. Many of these are suggested by Anandavardhana under anauchitya or lack of propriety. Abhinava points out that these external and dispersive elements or obstacles have to be removed before the perfect aesthetic experience is achieved.

Like Bhattanayaka, he advocated the universality of aesthetic experience. Rasa is not some concrete thing brought from outside, but consciousness itself, freed from external interference and practical desires and is directly experienced. It has no end outside itself; it is pleasure, beauty and bliss. Aesthetic experience can take place only after the extinction of every practical motive and personal involvement and therefore is the complete submersion of the subject in the aesthetic object to the exclusion of everything else. This experience is unlike the ordinary experiences in this world, and is on a par with the mystic experience of the Absolute.

In the Lochana commentary Abhinavagupta established Anandavardhana's dhvani theory against the attacks of writers like Bhattanayka. Though three types of dhvani are accepted (vastu, alamkara and rasa), ultimately everything leads to rasa-dhvani. Rasa cannot be conveyed by just referring to it, but has to be suggested by depicting the vibhavas, anubhavas, etc. The various elements of beautifying literature have to be employed in keeping with the rasa. Abhinava supported Ananda's theory of angirasa that every piece of literature must have one rasa as predominant keeping the others subordinate to it. Following Ananda, he defended the existence of shanta as a separate rasa, and pointed out its importance. He also ably defended vyanjana as a function of poetic language distinct from the primary and secondary functions (abhidha and lakshana) to show that it cannot be included in inference. It is on the basis of Abhinavagupta's commentaries that we get a clear idea about the theories propounded in the Dhvanyaloka and the Natyashastra. His commentaries are written in a fluent and ornate style, and have a place as pure as literature itself. All later writers on literary criticism and dramaturgy are heavily indebted to Abhinavagupta.

K.K.R.

ABHINAYA (Sanskrit) is derived from Sanskrit root ni with abhi 'carry towards', meaning that which carries towards or presents before the appreciative audience the sentiments of a dramatic composition. It is therefore, a means of an effective presentation of rasas, and as such, is of the nature of creative visual transformation or visualisation of the psycho-physical conditions of the dramatic characters. It is thus a term much more comprehensive than mere acting, covering almost everything that serves to bring out the fuliest meaning of a drama and help the aesthetic experience of a play. It is of four types; angika (physical), vachika (verbal), sattvika (psycho-physical) and aharya (extraneous). The physical gestures, angika, representing some psychic states include movements of the parts of body like eyes, eye-brows, nose, lower lip, chin, head, hands, breast, sides, waist, feet, etc. Vachika consists of a clear, correct, properly intonated (and rhythmical, where necessary) recitation of the dramatic text having literary charactersitics, qualities, faults (to be avoided), figures, metres, etc. When the physical states or changes like stupor, tears, horripilation, trembling, etc., occur in the actor somewhat involuntarily due to his rather deep emotional involvement with the character, it becomes sattvika representation. Aharya includes everything, external, make-up, costumes, even scenic apparatus and mechanical contrivances, etc. A graceful coordination of angika-vachika-sattvika, some natural graces of the female and male actors, and some standard posture for normal recurrent situations are included under samanya (general) abhinaya, whereas certain special postures and movements to indicate special situations (like the spreading of poison) and certain stage-conventions are shown under chitra (peculiar) abhinaya. Two styles of representation are mentioned: lokadharmi (natural, realistic) and natyadharmi (dramatic, artificial, stylised), and generally a judicious and graceful combination of both is favoured.

ABID HUSAIN, SYED (Urdu; b. 1896, d. 1978) is one of the front-rank thinkers, scholars and writers who authored several books of high academic value and national importance. He laboured untiringly in the field of learning and literature and in the service of his country and its people. He was a nationalist Muslim, closely associated with some of the front-rank leaders of India's political movement for national freedom. Strongly influenced by Gandhi, he interpreted ancient Indian thought and wisdom through his writings.

Abid Husain belonged to Dalpur, a village in Farukhabad District, (U.P.). He was born in Bhopal, where his father Hamid Husain was in the service of the Bhopal state. He had his primary education in the village school and passed his matriculation with credit from Jahangiria School, Bhopal. He did his B.A. from Muir College, Allahabad and was awarded Iqbal and Queen Victoria Medals.

In 1921 he joined Aligarh Muslim University but before completing his M.A. he left for Oxford for further education and from there, in 1922, he went to Berlin (Germany) and did his M.A. and Ph.D. in 1925. His thesis was on Herbert Spencer's educational philosophy.

In Germany he met Zakir Husain. And on his return to India he joined Jamia Millia Islamia on a nominal salary, and resided in a rented house with a few dedicated members of the staff. Abid Husain devoted his whole life to Jamia Millia and played an important role in formulating its policies and programmes. He retired from Jamia after thirty years of dedicated service but till his last breath he continued to offer his services to it. He was laid to rest in the Jamia Campus.

His translations of English and German books dealing with biography, social sciences, philosophy and literature which number 22 include Gandhi's My Experiments with Truth, Jawaharlal's Glimpses of World History and Discovery of India, Kant's Critique of Pure Reason and Goethe's Faust. His original writings, numbering about 18 include National Culture of India, The Way of Gandhi and Nehru and Destiny of Indian Muslims. All these books written both in English as well as in Urdu, mark him out as a forceful writer possessing clarity of thought, ease and grace of style.

In 1956 his book Hindustani Qaumiyat aur Qaumi Tehzib won the Sahitya Akademi award. He was awarded 'Padma Vibhushan' in 1957 and Delhi State's Saraswati Award' in 1974. He was also honoured with the D. Litt. by the Kashi Vidyapith. He was a member of the Official Language Commission and a Sahitya Salahkar of the All India Radio as well.

In his last years, he founded a Society 'Islam and the Modern Age Society' with the help of a few intellectuals and thinkers. Its objective was to reinterpret Islam and prove its relevance vis-a-vis scientific and technological discoveries of the 20th century.

AB-I-HAYAT (Urdu) is a monumental prose work of Shams-ul-Ulema Maulana Muhammad Husain Azad who dominated the Urdu literary scene from 1864 to 1910. The volume was first published in 1901 at Lahore. Its second edition with some additions was released in 1905, also at Lahore. Thereafter, except for some reprints, there has been no new edition in the true sense of the term. The book was titled as such, in the words of the author himself, "to put together all that comes handy about the great literary personages through the earlier written accounts or otherwise, in order to present a full-fledged picture of their life style, personality and quality of their work sustaining their memory for all times to come". It is the first ever history of Urdu language and literature. In view of its layout, style and exposition, the volume is a classic giving dynamism to research scholars and literary historians of later times.

The book commences with a long chapter on the origin, nomenclature and the time-to-time development of the Urdu language with reference to its poetry and prose, based on the contribution of traditional and regional dialects of India, like Prakrit, Brajabhasha, etc., and later on, the Persian language with its diction, grammatical formations, literary genres and Arabic terms. The author has been meticulous enough in tracing the origin of Urdu and the evolutionary developments of its idiom, reflecting social, religious, political and cultural influences right from the beginning to the establishment of what later came to be known as the Delhi and Lucknow schools of Urdu literature. It gives a fair and just appraisal of the evolution of Urdu verse, and the limping growth of its prose. Perhaps that is why the author has characterised his writing as Nazm-e-Urdu ki Tarikh (History of Urdu Poetry).

Briefly referring to the origin of Urdu poetry and the contribution made by 'the veteran and versatile' Amir Khusrau, the author has divided this subject into five significant epochs from the late sixties of the 17th century to the late seventies of the nineteenth, dwelling upon the distinct part played by the Deccan luminaries and later the schools of Delhi and Lucknow. The various epochs skilfully evolved and sensibly adhered to by grouping the contemporaries are mentioned here outlining the panorama as it emerged: Vali Dakkini and his contemporaries. Shah Hatim Aarzu and Fughan Mirza Muzhar Janjanan. Mir Taqi Mir, Sauda and Khwaja Mir Dard. Mas-hafi, Syed Insha and Jurrat. Nasikh, Aatish, Shah Nasir, Momin, Zauq, Ghalib, Dabir and Anis.

The author seems to have observed a chronological order, for without it, the grouping of contemporaries and their placement one after the other could not have given it a shape. However, the authenticity of many an event seems to be a little doubtful. Dates of birth, death or other events find little or no mention.

The work throws light on the upbringing, education, life style, social standing, literary pursuits and contribution of an individual author to the literary mainstream of his time.

The writer comes to his own in describing the personality, creative acumen, likes and dislikes, idiosyncrasies, obsessions, behavioural patterns, pride and prejudices, sense of humour, etiquettes and manners of individual or group of contemporary authors against the back-drop of the time. The narrative has been rendered absorbing with a sprinkling of anecdotes, satirical quips and humorous interludes. All such traits of human personality have been deftly worked out and neatly summed up in conformity with the avowed intent of presenting a lively portrayal of the elder luminaries of Urdu literature. Both the Delhi and Lucknow schools have been adequately touched upon.

Azad's ancestors were Persian speaking people, but for a hundred years or so, the family language had been Urdu. So the language used by him is chaste Urdu almost completely divorced from the excessive use of Persian or Arabic diction. The entire narrative may appear to be addressed to a layman or a familiar reader sitting before him. He has further enriched the narrative with specimens of poetry from eminent poets. The book reads like a lucid and racy piece of long fiction.

Ab-i-Hayat (The Fountain of Life Eternal) remains to this day as savory and wholesome as ever.

ABIRAMI ANTATI (Tamil) is a sacred book of devotional poems composed by Abirami Battar in praise of Goddess Abirami. It consists of 100 verses in 'antatittotai' besides one invocatory poem in the beginning and one poem at the end expressing the eternal benefit that can be derived from worshipping Abirami. 'Antatittotai' is a kind of rhyme. It is a consonance or connection in a stanza wherein the syllable, word or words, which end a line, are used for the beginning of the following line.

The book has seven editions. The first was published in 1944 and the seventh in 1977.

Abirami Battar was born at Tirukkatavur. He belonged to the Brahmin community. His father's name was Amirtalinga Aiyar. From his early age he had been worshipping Goddess Abirami at her temple at Tirukkatavur. In course of time he developed an infinite devotion to Abirami, which helped him to rise to the high spiritual realm of divine ecstasy. There is a story explaining the incident which led Abirami Battar to compose the poems of Abirami Antati. The king Sarafoji of Tanjavur, on a new moon day went to the temple at Tirukkatavur to offer his prayers, where he happened to see Abirami Battar at the temple of Abirami. The king asked Abirami Battar whether it was a new moon day and if so how long the influence of new moon would last. Abirami Battar who was in a trance experiencing within himself the Divine Light, replied unmindfully that it was a day of the full moon. The king thought him to be mad and left the place. When Abirami Battar came to himself he realised the mistake of telling the king that it was a full moon day. He became very remorseful. He offered prayers to Abirami and began to sing the Antati poems. By the grace of Goddess Abirami the night had shone with a full moon. The king Sarafoji was surprised to see the full moon in the new moon night. Realising Abirami Battar's spiritual greatness, he went to him and begged his pardon for having slighted him. Abirami Battar said "the wonder was due to the benevolence of Goddess Abirami".

The poems of Abirami Antati reveal the intensity of Abirami Battar's spirit of devotion. His complete surrender to Goddess Abirami, and the yearning for her mercy are expressed in several stanzas such as:

Goddess with the wealth of grace! I came to know the secret which was unknown to others. The secret was that those who took refuge at your feet would be blessed with all the benefits. Having known this truth I surrendered to your Feet.

While I stand, sit, lie down and walk I am thinking only of you; I always worship your Feet which are as soft and beautiful as Lotus flower.

Whether I get pleasure or pain, I consider that everything that comes to me is due to you.

Similar sentiments expressed by Abirami Battar speak of his ardent faith in Abirami.

My soul has been whirling through several births like the churn-staff that churns the curd. I crave your mercy to liberate me from the successive births so that I can attain the eternal bliss.

The sentiments of this kind expressed in his poems indicate Abirami Battar's longing for the mercy of Abirami.

Several poems describe the lustrous beauty of Abirami. Abirami means 'she who possesses exquisite beauty'.

You are a gem, the splendour of the gem and the ornament made of the splendorous gem. Your beauty lends lustre and grace to the ornaments worn by you.

This is the gist of the opening lines of one poem. In another poem Abirami Battar praises the beauty of Abirami as follows.

She possesses a wonderful divine image of beauty. Her face is so exquisitely fine as to be adored by the most beautiful Lotus.

Abirami's greatness is eulogized in several ways. She is the mother of the first three Supreme Gods; in the name of Abirami she is as precious as nectar to the world. She is the wealth, the pleasure got from the wealth, the illusion caused by the pleasure and the enlightenment derived from the illusion. She possesses such divine greatness as to be desired by all the celestial beings to worship and offer their prayers to Her. She is the foremost Goddess who forms the content of the rare Veda, being Herself the beginning, the middle and the end of it. Her Feet are seldom seen by Lord Tirumal, Brahma, and Devas despite the their strenuous search for them.

The benefits that can be derived by the devotees of Goddess Abirami are dealt with in several stanzas. In one of his poems Abirami Battar says that the gracious eyes of Abirami will bestow wealth, education, a lasting peace and strength of mind, divine beauty, relatives and friends of spotless minds and all the virtues.

The style of Abirami Antati is simple and sweet. Sanskrit words are used aptly here and there. A few spoken words such as 'tangachi' (younger sister), 'attal' (mother), 'kannankariya' (blackish) and 'chinnanchiriya' (smallish) are found in the poem. Its simple sytle and its lucid expression of sentiments are so impressive that they may easily infuse bhakti in the minds of the readers.

ABOL TABOL (Bengali) is a collection of forty-five verses of Sukumar Ray, posthumously published on 19 September, 1923. Most of these verses were first published in a journal called Sandesh. The theme of these verses is indicated by the title which means 'incoherent' or 'nonsense'. These poems are indeed the finest specimens of 'nonsense' in Bengali literature. Sukumar Ray has a rare sense of the comic which emerges out of his deft handling of the language and a keen power of observation. The world of Sukumar Ray is a world of incongruities and inconsistencies, a world of hilarity and fun. It is inhabited by strange characters, some human, some imaginary animals, and all of them extremely attractive. His human characters, like Ramgarurh, Hunkomukho Hangla, to mention only two, are unique in any literature, distinct yet a recognizable social type. His verses, generally hilarious in character, are distinguished by their haunting rhythm and flawless metres, and are strikingly fresh and original in metaphors and images. He has almost an uncanny sense of language and an uncommon power of creating a strange word-collocation which heighten the spirit of comicality. Some critics have suggested a possible influence of Lewis Caroll on Sukumar Ray, which is, however, marginal. His world owes its existence to his own uniqueness of imagination and his ingenuity of creative power. Most of the verses in the book are accompanied by the author's own illustrations, which may not be technically of very high order, but are vivid, natural and apposite. The charm of these illustrations and the verses of Abol Tabol appeal to children and adults simultaneously. It is the finest work of Sukumar Ray, having no parallel, inspite of its many imitations, in the whole range of Bengali literature.

ABRAHAM PANDITAR, (Tamil; b. 1859, d. 1919) was a writer on music and the history of music. First of nine children of Muttuswami, an Indian Christian, he served as a school teacher at Dindugul and later became a disciple of Karunananda Siddha of Suruli Malai. He married Ponnammal and settled down at Thanjavur in 1883. He resigned his teachership and took up the practice of native medicine which was more lucrative. He wrote Karunamirta Sagaratirattu (Collection of songs, 1907) to induce Christians to sing their church music in Tamil tunes. He held the strong and revolutionary view (in those days) that only native tunes could melt the heart, evoke devotion and create joy in the heart. He was opposed to the European tunes being imitated here.

His wife died in 1911 and then he married in 1912 Bhagyam, a good musician. He conducted with her assistance eight musical conferences at his own expense and presided over the First All India Musical Conference at Baroda in 1916. He went there with his wife and expressed the opinion that Tamilnadu was the birth place of music and proved that Tamil music was superior to most others. His major work Karunamirta Sagaram, was published in two volumes in 1917. This book traced the history of music in Tamil from the earliest literature and advanced many revolutionary ideas in the field of music. He has shown that the 'shrutis' in any 'sthayi' (pitch) can be only twenty-four and he indicated the manner in which new tunes could be combined and produced.

ABRAVAMCHEM YADNADAN (Konkani) by Luis Mascarenhas (1887-1961) is a poetic drama published in 1948 in Kannada script and is regarded as a masterpiece. Mascarenhas was the first editor of Konkani Dirvem (1912), the fortnightly magazine in Kannada script to be published from Mangalore. This magazine had a seminal influence on Konkani writing there. Although the age was deeply imbued with the captivating religious poetry of the books, like Christa Purana of Fr. Thomas Stephens, the Catholic spirit after the suppression at the hands of Tipu Sultan, had fled to South Kanara where it remained culturally stagnant. All they possessed for their spiritual sustenance was the bulk of innumerable devotional poems composed by anonymous missionaries. These were being sung in churches on Sundays, and the poetic torch was somehow kept flickering. Then Luis Mascarenhas appeared on the scene and in due course of time published numerous poems in Dirvem.

The theme of the Abravamchem Yadnadan (The Sacrifice of Abraham) is from the Old Testament wherein Abraham sacrifices his own son Isaac to God. The second edition of the book appeared in 1982, published by the Punav Prakashan, Mangalore. The book is unparallelled and incomparable for its range, depth and diction as well as style. In the preface, the author explains as to what prompted him to write this book. He mentions that he was disgusted with the vulgar, low-taste plays that were being written and enacted and he felt that they not only lowered the language in public esteem but also brought down the public taste. It was with a view to reforming the prevailing literary state of affairs that he wrote the book. The impact of the book was tremendous and lasting. The author has handled the language admirably bringing to the fore its potentialities and rare nuances. The Palestinian situation and landscape find full identification with Manglorean scenery and environment. The distant venue and context of the original theme perfectly accommodate themselves in the Manglorean mould.

ABRU, SHAH MUBARAK (Urdu; b. 1683-4, d. 1734) was one of the pioneering poets of Urdu in North India. Descendent of the famous Sufi (mystic) saint, Shah Muhammad Ghaus of Gwalior, he shifted to Delhi in his youth and got a State employment. He was one of the first poets who started composing in Urdu and compiled a collection of Urdu poems (Diwan). His poetry is marked by 'Iham Goi' (the style of writing couplets with double meanings out of which the oblique was actually the object of the poet). The trend gained in popularity not only among his own pupils, but also in the contemporary circles later resulting in the launching of many a literary crusade against the artifice by some eminent poets. He also pioneered the writing of 'wasokht' in Urdu—a poetic genre describing the beauty, dress and social and cultural grace of an imaginary beloved with whom the poet threatens to fall in love in the event of her not responding to his overtures. His poetic expression combines cultural and historical references with lucid expression. His Diwan was published in 1967.

ABU-AL-HASAN, MAULVI (Sindhi; b. 1664, d. 1751) was one of the eminent scholars of Thato (Sindh). He brought to the Sindhi language the Islamic laws and religion. He was considered to be a learned Maulvi having a thorough knowledge of Arabic and Persian. In order to propagate the knowledge of Islam among those Sindhis who were new converts and not conversant with Arabic, Abu-al-Hasan wrote in Sindhi verse Muqaddama-al-Salwat (1700, a Treatise on Namaz). The treatise lays down instructions on Namaz (prayer) and Wazu (ablutions). The book is known as Abu-al-Hasan ji Sindhi (A Sindhi book of Abu-al-Hasan). Abu-al-Hasan devised a system for writing the Sindhi language in Perso-Arabic characters, as earlier there existed no standard form of writing the Sindhi language in this script. Considering the written records of the Sindhi language that have come to light so far, Muqaddama-al-Salwat is considered to be the first ever Sindhi book written in standardized Perso-Arabic script. The work set a trend and served as a model for writing in Sindhi. Later, many maulvis followed it up for writings on myriad subjects. With the passage of time such long metrical compositions were renamed 'Sindhyun' (plural form of Sindhi), especially those works which dwelt on imparting instructions about different aspects of Islamic law and religion. Later on, this form of metrical composition was followed by Sindhi folk poets for their narrative poems. The main rule governing the form of these compositions entails maintenance of rhythm and rhyme. The poetical composition may consist of twenty or thirty lines, or it may run into thousands of lines, but the same rhyme, generally of vowel 'a', is normally maintained in the entire composition. It may, however, change after three, four or more lines. Some poets have preferred to change the rhyme keeping in view the change in subject matter. Junejo Abdul Jabbar and some other critics have tried to locate Doho, Soratho and some other metres in these compositions.

ABYAKTA (Bengali) is a collection of twenty Bengali essays by Jagadishchandra Basu (1858-1939), published in 1921-22. Jagadishchandra achieved lasting fame in the world of science for his research in Physics and Botany and particularly for his work Response in the Living and Non-living (1902). Abyakta not only shows his great love for his mother tongue and his literary taste and power, but is also an evidence of his keenness to present scientific thought in Bengali. Some of the essays in the book are scientific in nature, wherein he talked lucidly about the responses in the non-living. The essay entitled 'Nivedan' (1877) is particularly important in the history of Indian Science. There are other delightful essays including the 'Bhagirathir Utsa Sandhane' (In search of the source of the Bhagirathi, 1898) which is one of the finest essays in Bengali. Basu's prose is simple and dignified and at times poetic.

ACCHAMAMBA BHANDARU (Telugu; b. 1874, d. 1905) occupies the foremost place among the Andhra writers of recent times, who, through their writings, served the cause of the emancipation of women in general and welfare of the lowly in particular.

Acchamamba was born at Penuganchiprele of Nandigama taluk of Krishna district in Andhra Pradesh.

Acchamamba was a mere child when she lost her father. The poor widow Gangamamba with her two children left her village for good and settled at Devarakanda where her step son Shankararao was in some official position. It was at this place that Acchamamba, hardly ten at that time, was married to her maternal uncle Bhandaru Madhavarao, a widower.

Those were the days when girls' education was discouraged by parents. Such conditions, however never deterred Acchamamba's efforts in educating herself. Regularly at study time she would sit beside her brother and pursue her studies. Her efforts enabled her to acquire proficiency in Telugu, Hindi, Marathi, Bengali and Gujarati.

Fairly considerable was her contribution to literature. Her major work is Abala Saccharitra Mala in two volumes. It is a collection of biographies of noble ladies Bhavani, Ahalya Bai Holkar, Veeramati, Durgavati, Toru Dutt, Tarabai, Samyukta, Rudrama Devi, Chand Bibi, Jhansi Lakshmi Bai, Channamma, etc.

She published several articles in the magazines of the day. Her literary contributions laid emphasis on moral subjects. Acchamamba's writings reflected the natural good qualities of ladies. She powerfully refuted the arguments of those that attributed dull wit and timidity to ladies. The superb aspects of feminine excellence such as sharp wit, noble behaviour, feminine modesty and the like were projected by her.

ACCHEV (Konkani) is a full fledged novel by Pundalik Narayan Naik published in 1977. It is a landmark in the history of Konkani novel. Rightly called Konkani's Premchand, his short stories predominantly have village background. This novel too bears ample testimony to Pundalik's talent for depicting the woes and general condition of the rustic poor and the downtrodden. In the words of the publisher: "This is the first ever novel of such size, dimensions and depth, to be published in Konkani in Devanagari". The Acchev (Havoc) was originally serialised in the monthly issues of Zaag (now defunct) under the title Meen Piklam Khandyanim (The Rich Harvest of Mine Ore). The novel is the story of a typical Goan village Kolamb with Hindu populace and background. The traditional life of this village and its socio-cultural ethos receive a severe jolt with the advent of industrialisation of Goan variety, namely the flourishing mining activity. The book gives an elaborate account of the havoc played by the mining industry, which brought down the age-old social values, customs and traditional mores of the village-folk. Perhaps nothing more serious and effective was written in Konkani with more vigorous style and sincerety. The novel is replete with abundant poetic elements and diction. Pundalik's real strength lies in his handling of the colloquial language, and also the idiom. There is hardly anyone else in Konkani today who uses such apt, effective and telling imagery in prose. It is powerful without being flowery. Reading this novel is like feeling the pulse of the Goan village.

ACHALADAS KHICI RI VACHANIKA (Rajasthani) is the creation of Gadanashivadas. He was perhaps a contemporary and court-poet of Achaladas Khici, son of Bhoja of Gagarauna Gadha (Kota). This is a small work written in the Vachanika style, and has seen several editions (ed.) Dinanath Khatri. (ed.) Brajnarayana Purohita and Bhupatirama Sakariya, 1981. The published texts and word forms of these various editions do not exactly tally with the oldest text, so far available, in the manuscript of 1574 (No. 99, Rajasthani Catalogue, Anup Sanskrit Library, Bikaner). A scientifically edited text is not available. The work eloquently describes the attack by Sultan Hosanga Gauri of Mandu on Achaladas, the latter's fight until death, and the 'Jauhar' (self-burning) committed by the Rajput ladies. The description of the Sultan's army and that of the 'Jauhar' occupy the most prominent places in this work. The attack was made in 1423. The work might, therefore, have been composed only after that year sometime during 1430-35, which contains an eye-witness's account of events by the poet. The speciality of the poem lies in depicting the high spirits displayed in accordance with the noble ideals of the Rajput traditions. Pathetic feelings also find a place when Palhanasi, son of Achaladas, is persuaded to leave the fort. The Vachanika is also important from some other points of view. It is a mature heroic poem of the historical type created earlier by the Charana in the early period (1050-1450) of the history of Rajasthani literature. As a specimen of language, it is of importance for following historical development of Rajasthani. Both the word-forms 'Aai-Aau and Ai-Au' are found used, which respectively represent the old and new stages of development. The fact thus disproves the theory of old and new 'Dingala', as propounded by L.P. Tessitori and also his date of demarcation-1600. It is also of importance from the historical point of view. It has preserved the facts of an important historical event which was allowed to be almost forgotten. Some of the historical facts need to be re-examined in the light of this work, such as, date of birth of Rana Mokal of Mewar, identity of certain chiefs, etc. The work has also influenced later compositions. Ratana Mahesha dasota ri vachanika by Khidiyo Jaggo carries the impression to a good extent. The language of the work is literary Rajasthani. Apart from prose pieces with rhymed termination, 'Duha' is the main metre accompanied by 'Gaha', 'Rasawala', 'Kundaliya', 'Kavitta', etc.

ACHALAYATAN (Bengali) is a play written by Rabindranath Tagore during the monsoon of 1911-12 and was published in the Puja issue of the journal Prabasi that year. It is primarily an attack on the immovable institutions of fixed and rigid beliefs and conventions in general; hence the title Achalayatan (Immovable Castle). Edward Thompson wrote that the fable was probably suggested by The Princess of Tennyson and more remotely by The Castle of Indolence. However, Tagore denied that categorically.

The play is about an institution, Achalayatan by name, where scholars live together studying old texts and practising rituals which are of little relevance to life. The central character in the play is a boy, Panchak, who is restless and gay, full of life and laughter and unmindful of the rigours of the institutions. He is expected to memorize the rules and regulations of the institutions, but he is negligent in his studies and indifferent to the rituals of Achalayatan, much to the annoyance and disgust of his elder brother Mahapanchak who is a pillar of rigidity. He also goes out freely and mixes with the Sonapamshus, a youthful and vigorous group of people as well as with the humble and gentle villager Darvak. Mahapanchak resents strongly whenever the young boy sings, and chastises him quite often for his defiance of the age-old conventions. This causes tension between the two brothers, representing conservatism and freedom, the spirit of inertia and the spirit of dynamism respectively. The play gains its intensity with the growth of tension and conflict between the two brothers, and with the expectations of the coming of the Guru, the master of the Achalayatan. Mahapanchak insists on strict discipline and observance of all the rules to welcome the Guru. Panchak strikes a note of discord by his sneering attitude to the fossilized conventions and his behaviour is considered to be blasphemous. The action is built up by a series of incidents which sustain the interest of the reader till the climax. The present head of the institution, the Acharya, is not so sanguine like Mahapanchak about the sacredness of conventions. He vacillates between the two attitudes, represented by the two brothers. When Mahapanchak prescribes a severe atonement for a boy who violated one instruction (he opened a particular window of the castle) the Acharya rescues him. He realises the meaninglessness of the injunction. Mahapanchak places these conventions above human emotions. He says, "Life of human being is but insignificant and trivial, but the customs of the religion are eternal." The Acharya, on the other hand, expects the Guru to come to free him from "the bondage of infirmity" to lighten the "burden of thousands of years". He, therefore, loves Panchak, the spirit of protest, the spirit of liberation. The contradictions within the Achalayatan manifest themselves clearly and finally when the Guru comes, himself leading the low-caste tribes whom Mahapanchak hates, and razes the walls of the castle to the ground.

The play evoked strong protest from many critics as it was alleged to be against the orthodox society and because of its attitude to the foreigners and the downtrodden, its ruthless criticism of the age-old conventions and its spirit of revolt. The story is allegorical but the allegory is too thin to hide the real target of its attack. The action has been built up through various dramatic incidents and situations; its dialogues are in lyrical prose and marked by sparkling wit and epigram, and the scenes are heightened in spirit by beautiful songs. The theme and nature of the conflict in the play come to life by its frequently recurring images of summer and rain, representing the aridness and rigidity of mind on the one hand, and the freedom of mind on the other. A shorter version of this play entitled Guru was published in 1917.

ACHARYA, BHANUBHAKTA (Nepali; b. 1814, d. 1869) is regarded as the 'Adikavi' (first poet) of Nepali literature though whole ages of Nepali poetry and prose, extending as far back as the 13th century preceded him. The honorific was first used for Bhanubhakta by Motiram Bhatta (1866-1896) who was also his first biographer.

Bhanubhakta was born at Tanahu and had his early instructions from his grandfather Srikrishna Acharya. The realisation that he should accomplish something worthwhile and earn name and fame came to the youthful Bhanubhakta in the course of a cursory talk with a humble grass-cutter who with the same objective, in his own modest way, was digging a well in the village. The veracity of this anecdote as related by Motiram and staunchly defended by the descendants of Bhanubhakta has, however, been questioned by the eminent literary scholar Baburam Acharya (1887-1972) and several others.

The Ramayana is Bhanubhakta's greatest work. It took him nearly twelve years to complete writing it (1841-1853). He largely based his Ramayana on the Adhyatma Ramayana. The Ramgita part of Bhanubhakta's Ramayana (Uttarkanda, Slks. 120-149) is said to have been dictated by him when he was on his death bed. The instantaneous and immense popularity of Bhanubhakta's Ramayana in sharp contrast to that of the ten or more other Ramayanas in Nepali is mainly due to its being written in the speech then commonly in vogue; and its adaptation to the Nepalese mode of thinking and feeling. The narrative skill and poetic excellence of Bhanubhakta also helped in this regard.

Prashnottar (1853), another important work of Bhanubhakta, is a verse translation of Shankaracharya's Prashnottar Maniratnamala. It does not at all, however, signify conversion of Bhanubhakta from the Ramayana's Vishishtadvaita to Shankaracharya's Advaitavad. Shankaracharya aimed at inculcating 'vairagya'. Bhanubhakta has, on the whole, remained faithful to the original in his translation. But the subtle shifting of emphasis in the translation and larding it with very many interpretative phrases and lines make one think that Bhanubhakta intended his Prashnottar to be used for instructing the wordly people about how to be also religious. The verse translation is for the first thirty five stanzas in the same metre, 'indrabajra', as in the original; then (Slks 36-48) Bhanubhakta changes over to 'vasantatilaka' and gains poetically.

Among Bhanubhakta's works, the second place is given to Bhatamala, an original and beautiful work. It is a devotional poem but the course that it takes is of humble confession, self-reproach and intense remorse of one who remained so long immersed in worldly pursuits, utterly neglectful of the spiritual. It is composed entirely in the 'shikharini' meter which here demonstrably shows itself to be the best aid and fittest vehicle that could be chosen to express the despair and hope of an anguished soul. This work notable for sincerity of feeling, wholesomeness of language, and musicality of cadences, was translated into Sanskrit in verse by Nepali pundits. Lastly, it is here in Bhatamala that we read that great saying of Bhanubhakta: Bado durlav janos bharat bhumiko janma janale (Men, know, difficult it is to obtain one's birth in Bharat land.)

The second original work of Bhanubhakta is Badhushiksha reportedly written by him for the benefit of the household of his friend Tarapati, which he found disturbed by incessant quarrels between the female inmates of the house.

Bhanubhakta's miscellaneous poems, numbering thirty-nine, show him to be a patriot, an observer of society, a lover of beauteous places and nature and also one who could be, on occasions, righteously angry, jocularly humorous, solicitous of speedy administrative justice and vehemently reproving when it was delayed or denied; on the whole a good-hearted man of the world.

ACHARYA, DEBENDRANATH (Assamese; b. 1937, d. 1981) was born at Garakhiya Dal near Jorhat, and had a first class Honours degree in B.Tech from IIT, Kharagpur, a Master's degree in Engineering from London University and a Diploma from Imperial College, London. He started his service career as a lecturer in Assam Engineering College, Gauhati and at the time of his death, he was the General Manager of the Assam Gas Co.

He established himself firmly as a novelist with his first novel Anya Yug Anya Purush (Another Age, Another Generation, 1971), which evokes the milieu of the British Age in Assam vis a vis the traditional social milieu that received a jolt as it encountered the British, but retained still its traditional character. A mysterious ancient man who narrates the tale of those bygone days in his traditional, idiomatic Assamese, is nostalgic about those days. His second novel, Kal Purush (The Orion, 1976) is a historical novel depicting the mid-17th century Assam under the reign of the Ahoms. The Assamese society of his time against the political set-up is successfully reflected here. It won the Assam Publication Board Award of 1978. His last novel Jangam (The Movable, 1982) depicts the story of a batch of Indians on their move from Burma to Assam, as Burma was occupied by Japan during the Second World War. The sad and woeful tale of people leaving their hearth and home, and their bitter-sweet experiences in their tiresome long journey on foot with all sorts of uncertainty find effective expression here. The exodus has a historical background; but the story with the characters involved is imaginary. It is the only novel in Assamese depicting this incident of history that had a special bearing on Assam. The novel posthumously won the Sahitya Akademi Award of 1984.

Though Acharya left only three novels in his short span of life, they have won a distinctive place in Assamese literature. His style with idiomatic sentences and pure Assamese words and phrases has a flavour of its own.

ACHARYA GUNVANTRAI (Gujarati; b. 1900, d. 1965) was a well known novelist and story writer. His father worked in the police department and young Gunvantrai had the opportunity to move with him and see adventures at first hand and hear tales of bravery, courage and romance. At the age of seventeen he ran away from home, and saw many vicissitudes in life. He served as a proof reader at first, but later became a writer of novels and stories of adventure, romance and bravery. His stories about the life of the seafarers of Gujarat and of the adventures of Indians in far off Africa made him one of the widely read writers in the Gujarati language. His Dariyalal (The Beloved Sea) is a powerful novel which has won its author much fame and popularity. It tells us about pioneer Gujarati settlers in Africa. His style is racy, pungent and powerful. In his novels and romances he blends history with imagination. Some critics consider it to be a defect but it was not history he was writing, he said, but a novel, and in a novel, this should not be objected to. Acharya Gunvantrai also wrote the famous play, Allabeli (The God is the Protector). Besides stories of nautical adventure, he has written many historical and social novels. All his life, he had worked as a freelance journalist and an author.

ACHARYA HEMACHANDRA SURI (Gujarati, b. 1088, d. 1173). A great scholar and author of several works, mostly in Sanskrit, Acharya Hemachandra Suri was born at Dhandhuka Distt., Ahmedabad, Gujarat, (probably on a Monday), the full moon-day of the month of Karttika. He was a Hindu Modh Bania and his name was Changadeva. His father's name was Chachinga, who was Maheshvari (Vaishnav) by religion and his mother's name was Pahini, who was a Jain. In his childhood, when a famous Jain Monk Acharya Devachandra Suri visited Dhandhuka he saw the boy and was attracted by his sharpness and intellect. Finding this the mother and maternal uncle were pleased to hand over the boy to the Acharya against the will of his father. Leaving Dhandhuka the Acharya went to Khambhat, where the boy was baptised in the Jain faith on Saturday: 4th day of the bright half of the month of Magh, (13th Jan., 1145) and thence he was known as Somachandra. At that time Uda Mehta was the Governor of Khambhat, who helped the Acharya in the ceremony. Even in his tours the Acharya arranged for the teaching of this boy monk. Within a couple of years Somachandra became well versed in Jain as well as non-Jain scriptures. Finding in him scriptural abilities and scholarship Acharya Devachandra Suri bestowed on him the title of Ganadhara at Nagar in Rajasthan in 1110. Somachandra now became Acharya Hemachandra Suri.

It is not certain when he first went to Anahilla-Pura Patan. But it is a fact that he was introduced to the then famous Chalukya monarch Siddharaj Jaysimha, ruling at Patan in about 1125. It is a religious custom that Jain monks and nuns cannot stay in a single place for eight months of the year; they can stay for four monsoon months generally if invited by the followers of the places. For several years, thus, Acharya Hemchandra used to visit places after places in Gujarat and Rajasthan. It is not known when he began to prolong his stay at Patan. But one thing is certain that he came in close contact of Siddharaj, who accepted the Acharya as the prime scholar in his royal court. In his long stays the Acharya was busy writing scholastic works on different subjects.

After his conquest of Malwa (1135) Siddharaj brought the library of Bhoj of Malwa from Dhar with other bounties. One day he came across a manuscript–Lakshana-Prakasha (a treatise on Sanskrit grammar, known as Sarasvati Kanthabharana also) and was very much impressed by it. In his royal court he asked scholars to write a grammar masterly as well as easy. The Acharya asked the king to fetch eight well known Sanskrit grammars from Kashmir. After studying them he prepared a new grammar in the style of Panini's Ashtadhyayi easier as well as more lucid than those of other old grammars as well as of Bhoja's Sarasvati-Kanthabharana. He completed Sanskrit grammar in seven chapters (every chapter with four sections on the same models of Panini and Bhoj) and treated six Prakrit languages such as Standard Prakrit (virtually Jain Maharastri), Sauraseni, Magadhi, Paishachi, Chulika-Paishachi and Apabhramsha (virtually Gaurjara Apabhramsha of his own country–Gujarat and Western Rajasthan). He treated Apabhramsha at length giving illustrations even from folk literature prevailing in the country. It is the first grammar of Apabhramsha so far known.

To illustrate the whole grammar, the Acharya composed an epic depicting the history of Chalukya monarchy, known as Dvyasraya Kavya. Following the famous Kavyaprakasha of a Kashmiri rhetorician Mammata, Acharya Hemachandra also gave Kavyanushasana on the same lines. He knew Anandavardhana (author of Dhvanyaloka) and quoted Acharya Abhinavagupta (great commentator of Bharata's Natyashastra). Though Acharya Hemachandra Suri did not write on Natyashastra (dramaturgy), his pupil Ramachandra gave Natyadarpana, and several Sanskrit dramas.

After Siddharaj's death Kumarpal came to the throne. With the advice of the Acharya, Kumarpal constructed several Jain as well as Shaiva temples and places of worship all over Gujarat.

It is worth noting that Acharya Hemachandra's contribution in the field of learning was really great. That was the reason why he was called Kali-kala-Sarvajna.

Acharya died in 1173 leaving marvellous works such as Siddha-Hema Vyakarana (grammar), Siddha-Hema Vyakarana Kavyanushasana, Chandanushasana–(prosody), Abhidhana-chintamani–(lexicon), Anekartha-Kosha–(lexicon of words bearing more than one meaning), Deshi-Sabda-Sangraho–(lexicon of words of non-Sanskrit origin), Nighantu-sesa–(botanical lexicon,) Commentary of Alankara Chudamani–(Commentary, on a rhetoric work), Yoga-shastra–(Yoga treatise), Pramana-mimamsa–(logic), Dvyasraya-kavya–(historical epic), Tri-Sasti-shalaka-purusha-charita–(puranic legends), Parishishta-parvan–(puranic legends), Vitaraga-stotra–(prayers), etc.

ACHARYA PARAMANANDA (Oriya; b. 1893, d. 1971) was a great scholar in history, archaeology and in the study of Archives. He combined his historical insight and perception with his literary abilities to produce monumental works on the history, archaeology and literature of Orissa. After his education in a village school he studied at Amarada M.E. School and ultimately passed B.Sc. in 1933 from St. Xavier's College, Calcutta. He worked with Ramaprasad Chandra in the Archaeological Survey of Mayurbhanj and Kahiching. Later on in 1934, he accompanied the prince of Mayurbhanj to England. While in England he studied the ancient inscriptions including those of Chandrika Devi in Royal Asiatic Society. He attracted public attention when he published his study on the inscription of Ananta Basudev temple. He was appointed by the Orissa Government as Superintendent of Archaeological Department in 1950 and with a record achievement to his credit in the field of historical study of Orissa, he retired from Government service in 1958. For his outstanding contributions in the historical and literary field he was awarded Padmashri by the Government of India in 1964. His literary works include hundreds of articles on the medieval poets of Orissa and research papers on the history of Orissa. His publication Radhanatharke Ananya Prativa (The super talent of the poet Radhanath, the pioneer of modern Oriya literature) brought him instant appreciation in the literary circles of Orissa. His translation of Mr. Mottee's Travel Account into Oriya as Sambalpur Yatra is one of the important publications. His studies in the history, archaeology and archives of Orissa established him as a pioneering scholar in the fields. Besides, at times he wrote short stories in Oriya journals.

ACHARYA, P.S. (Tamil; b. 1892, d. 1981) was a reputed Tamil scholar and an interpreter of the obscure Tamil classics. He was born in a village called Vittalapuram in the Tirunelveli district. He joined government service, in the Police department, but soon decided to resign and devote his entire life to literature.

He had a sound classical training both in the hymnistic literature of the Vaishnavas and in the secular poetry in Tamil in his early boyhood and he had increased his knowledge by some assiduous study on his own. He found that the poetry in Tamil was largely inaccessible to the average reader on account of the old diction, the exalted poetic style, the play on words, the many figures of speech and poetic conceits. This made Tamil classical poetry sound foreign to the ears of a contemporary reader.

Acharya quickly developed an attractive but simple style of writing which highlighted the most notable features of the poems which are likely to interest an average reader, carefully omitting references to grammar, prosody and figures of speech which were the happy hunting ground of pedantic pundits. Weekly magazines like Ananda Vikatan with a high circulation published his series of articles which thereby were able to reach a wide readership.

Acharya's serialised books laid bare the delights of Divya Prabandham, Devaram, Periapuranam and above all else, Kamban's incomparable Ramayanam.

If today there is a widespread enthusiasm based even on a small amount of scholarship in Kamban's Ramayanam all over Tamilnadu, the credit should certainly go to Acharya and T.K. Chidambaranatha Mudaliar. They taught a growing generation how to appreciate classical poetry in depth, stimulating hundreds of young men and women to delve deeper into it. He became a household name due to his works.

Acharya has authored nearly 60 works. His work Sri Ramanujar won a Sahitya Akademi Award for him in 1965. He had been honoured in 1959 by the Tamil Writers' Association with a shield.

ACHUTHA MENON, C. (Malayalam, b. 1913) is a versatile man—a revolutionary politician, a social reformer, an administrator, a parliamentarian, an intellectual and a writer all in one. He had a brilliant academic career. A first rank holder in the school final Examination of 1929 in the former Cochin State, Menon had his B.A. and B.L. degrees with distinction from Madras University. He started practising law in Trichur District court.

Simultaneously he became active in politics, trade union and social reform movements. He participated in a campaign for the removal of untouchability, and on land reform agitations. He was arrested in 1940 for his speech against war efforts and was imprisoned for one year. On his release he was elected Secretary of C.P.I. Committee, Cochin, and was arrested again in 1942 and kept under preventive detention for one year. While he was in prison he wrote two important works, Lokacharitra Sangraham and Soviet Nadu. He was again elected Secretary of the Cochin District Committee of the C.P.I. on his release and functioned in that capacity from 1942 to 1949. In 1949, after the merger of Travancore and Cochin states, Achutha Menon became a member of the Secretariat of Travancore-Cochin State Committee of the C.P.I. In the meanwhile he had to go underground early in 1947; after coming out of it on August 15, 1947, he had to go underground again. He reappeared in public in 1952, after he was elected to the Travancore-Cochin Legislative Assembly from Trichur Constituency. In 1957 he was elected from Irinjalakkuda constituency to the Kerala Assembly. He joined the first Communist Ministry in Kerala as Finance and Agriculture Minister and later took charge of the Home Department also. He was again elected to the Kerala Assembly in 1960 from the same constituency and became Deputy Leader of the Opposition. He was arrested and put in prison for some months in 1962, during the Chinese aggression. He was Secretary of C.P.I. Kerala State Council and functioned in that capacity from 1962 to 1968. In 1968 he was elected to the Rajya Sabha, but in November 1969, he became the Chief Minister of Kerala and continued to serve the State in that position until March 1973.

His literary works include: Kishan Patha Pustakam (1954), Kerala Samsthanam Prasangalum Sadhyatakalum (1956), Manushyan Swayam Nirmikkunnu (Translation of Gordon Childe's book, Man Makes Himself), Balya Smaranakal, Teranjetutha Upanyasangal. The last two have won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Awards.

P.

ACHUTHA MENON, CHELANNAT (Malayalam; b. 1894, d. 1952), took his first degree in 1917. After serving as a clerk for a year in the Postal Department and four years in the office of the Director of Public Instruction, Madras, he joined Queen Mary's College as Lecturer in Malayalam in 1922. Seven years later he was appointed in the same capacity in the University of Madras. From 1936 to 1938 he was a researcher in London, and took his Ph.D degree from London University. The subject of his thesis was 'Ezhuthacchan and his age.' On his return he was appointed Head of the Malayalam Department, a post he held till his death.

Menon was a prolific writer. His contributions include seven farces, two short story collections, a collection of poems, a novel and three collections of essays, which reveal his fertile imagination, interpretative power and his vast reading and knowledge. His research work has given him a permanent place in Malayalam literature. Apart from the above mentioned thesis which has served as a model to researchers over the years, his introductions to The Folk Songs of North Malabar and Navaratam Pattu are brilliant critical studies of the respective subjects.

ACHUTHA MENON, C.P. (Malayalam; b. 1862, d. 1937) who was a native of Trichur, took his B.A. degree, with the first rank in Sanskrit, from the University of Madras. After working for a time in Pachaiyappa's College in Madras, he went back to Cochin to take up his new assignment as palace tutor there. With the constitution of a fresh section in the Education Department of that erstwhile princely state, he was appointed Superintendent for the improvement of primary education. In that capacity he pioneered a series of far-sighted reforms. He was promoted as Secretary to the Dewasam. He continued in that post till his retirement in 1912.

It was mainly as editor of Vidyavinodini, one of the early periodicals in Malayalam that Achutha Menon made most of his literary contributions in that language. During the five years of his editorship from 1890-95, he published in it numerous critical articles which fall into two categories, viz. those elucidating the Eastern and Western principles of criticism and those evaluating Malayalam literature in the light of such principles. His observations and comments on some contemporary works, reviewed by him, had a lasting impact on the history of literary criticism in Malayalam chiefly because of the maturity, impartiality and fearlessness of his approach as a critic. According to him Malayalam poetry of his time was either 'rasa' dominated or ornamentation-dominated and he personally preferred, as most critics prefer, the former to the latter. For him criticism meant discriminating judgement. His style is powerful and pungent. He is regarded as perhaps the greatest forerunner of modern literary critics in Malayalam, though there is no published work in book form to his credit in this language.

ACHUTHAN, M. (Malayalam; b. 1930), took his M.A. Degree in 1950 with a first rank from Madras University. From 1956 to 1981 he served Government Colleges as a teacher of Malayalam. Achuthan made his debut as a literary critic with his book on Western literary criticism, Pashchatya Sahitya Darshanam. His book on the Malayalam short story, Cherukatha Innale Innu, a standard work on the subject, won him the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award and the S.P.B. Award. Achuthan was for a while Vice President of the Sahitya Pravartaka Co-op. Society, Kottayam. He is a member of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi, Trichur. He has translated the Arabian Nights Tales into Malayalam. His Vivechanam is a collection of essays devoted chiefly to the criticism of poetry. His Prasnangalum Padanangalum raises certain important issues on the art of the novel. Achuthan's criticism is formalist. At heart a romanticist, he does not hesitate to accept the best in the classicist tradition and the modernist school. According to Achuthan the novel is primarily concerned with time.

K.M.T.

ACHUTHAN, NAMBUTHIRI AKKITTAM (Malayalam, b. 1926), studied Vedas till his thirteenth year and then joined a regular school. He studied up to the Intermediate class, but has been a student all along. For some time he worked as editor of the periodicals Unni Nambuthiri and Yogakshemam and also served Mangalodayam. Later he joined Akashvani. He is interested in painting, Kathakali and astrology. Akkitham can write excellent prose, but he has won renown as a poet. He has brought out a number of poetical collections, Arangettam Idinju Polinja Lokam, Nimisha Kshetram, Irupatham Nutandinte Ithihasam, and Bali Darshanam being the most notable. He has won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi, and the Central Sahitya Akademi Awards. He has produced a number of poetical collections for children. Of Akkittam's works Irupatham Nuttandinte Ithihasam is the most famous; it is hailed as an epoch-making work. In it Akkitham achieved a rare blend of the tragic and the comic which vitalised the romantic poetry of the day and led it to a realm of new sensibility. Akkittam himself has his base on the great tradition of Indian poetry, but his spirit is that of a romantic. Yet his poems opened a new era of modern poetry for Malayalam. He meets the ironies of life with a sense of satire. In Irupatham Nuttandinte Ithihasam Akkittam bewails the lot of a large section of his fellowmen, at the same time he satirises the snobbery of urban middle class and their vanity as well as shallowness. The mood of the present situation is succinctly and poignantly expressed in the lines, 'My child, light is agony. It is darkness that is delight'. Bali Darshanam is another poem which presents Mahabali in a new perspective. The benevolent Asura Emperor, loved by his subjects, was driven underneath the earth by the deceitful Vamana adopting unfair methods. The poem is remarkable for the characterisation of such heroes as Shukra Muni, and its dramatic presentation of the story. Also it is a criticism of the modern human predicament. Akkittam's poetry is noted for its rich intonations, precision, economy of words, and suggestive power. It is a new field of sensibility that Akkitham's poems open to the readers. It embraces the treasures of Indian cultural heritage as well as the new achievements of the modern mind sharpened by its scientific pursuits. Akkittam's poetry has both freshness and vigour and is remarkable for its artistic perfection and the richness of its contents.

ADAPTATION

(Adaptations in different Indian languages have been done mainly from Sanskrit. Even when some of the well-known classical works in Sanskrit were rendered in the regional languages they assumed a regional character––incorporating even stories and incidents from similar sources. But books from foreign or other Indian languages are generally translated. Sometimes names and settings are Indianized (in the case of foreign works) but they remain basically translations of works from other languages. Of late, many plays, particularly plays written in European languages have been adapted in different Indian languages for production, but their essential character as translation is accepted by all concerned. Such adapted or translated works will be discussed under the heading 'Translation' in the normal alphabetical order.)

ASSAMESE

Sanskrit literature, the fountain head of most of the modern Indian literatures, supplied not only the themes of medieval Assamese literature, but has also inspired many a writer of modern Assamese literature to undertake creative productions in the context of modern literary trends and technique. The early Assamese literature, being predominantly devotional in tone and tenor, afforded little scope to writers for translating or adapting pure and non-religious Sanskrit literature of poets like Kalidasa, Bhavabhuti, Banabhatta, and Dandi. Excepting a few stray attempts, three-fourths of the adapted works based on Sanskrit literature are derived from the two epics and the puranas. During the modern period only conscious efforts have been made to adapt classical Sanskrit secular literature into Assamese. The adaptations from Sanskrit texts—religious and secular, are of these two types.

The earliest adaptation from Sanskrit puranas into Assamese, as is available today, is Prahladacharita by the poet-scholar Hema Sarasvati in the early 13th century. It deals with the story of Prahlada from Vamana-purana. The inspiration for selecting this piece of mythology for adaptation into Assamese verse is the desire to spread the bhakti cult, the unflinching devotion to Hari. The Royal patronage served as the incentive for disseminating the knowledge enshrined in the Sanskrit puranas among the masses. It is observed that from the earliest time to the end of 18th century the Royal patronage was the moving spirit in getting Sanskrit literature—both shastras and kavyas translated and adapted into Assamese. The Royal House of Ahoms, Kacharis and Kochas patronised the poets and scholars and provided facilities for the production of literary works in Assamese, the bulk of which was either translation or adaptation from Sanskrit.

The early Assamese literature was either lyrical, or narrative. The first dealt naturally with love and other sentiments or religious devotion subjectively, and the second created objectively, mythological tales and themes from the Sanskrit epics and puranas.

The urge for spreading Vaishnavism prompted many writers to wield their pens, and literature produced in Assamese was based mainly on Sanskrit. When Shankardeva (1449-1568) the saint-poet of Assam educated the masses he picked up Krishna legends from the Bhagavata and other puranas and the process of translation and adaptation from Sanskrit reached its zenith. In short, the translation and the adaptation into Assamese are intimately associated with the Neo-Vaishnava movement started by Shankardeva and followed by many others.

The Sanskrit works of Shakti-cult were also rendered into Assamese. Markandeya Chandi, Ananda Lahari by Adi Shankara and some 'tantras' were made available to the people in Assamese during this period. However, compared to the multitude of the Vaishnava literature in Assamese, the corpus of Shakta literature translated from Sanskrit is very small. Though Shastras and Kavyas formed the bulk of the literature, works on mundane subjects such as Jyotisha, Ayurveda, Arithmetic, Music, etc., were also translated into Assamese. In short, the literature in Sanskrit, which constituted the course of study for acquiring comprehensive knowledge by the society in those days, were made available to the average people of the State.

The Assamese adaptation of Sanskrit classics is mostly of interpretative character. The writer took up the essence of the original Sanskrit passage and explained it in pure literary Assamese, simplifying the difficult phrases and expressions, which were not easily understood by the common people. While doing so, philosophical terms are often avoided and the abstract expressions are couched in concrete terms.

How an abstract expression of the original Sanskrit is rendered into concrete terms in Assamese can be appreciated in the following instance, "Lord Krishna once in a summer season went out for tending the cows on the bank of Yamuna with the herd of cows and the cowherd boys, of course, without Balarama. The cows and the cowherd boys being highly oppressed by the hot wave of the summer season (Nidagha-tapa-piditah) drank the poisonous water of the Yamuna and became unconscious." The Sanskrit phrase 'nidagha-tapa-piditah' meaning 'oppressed by the hot summer', of the verse, has been skilfully rendered as "being oppressed by the hot wave of the month of 'Jyeshtha' (May-June)". Nobody knows when the incident of Kaliyadaman took place, and the author of the Bhagavata says simply 'nidagha'. It is obvious that such an abstract expression does not carry home the idea and hence it is rendered as the month of 'Jyeshtha', the hottest month in Assam with the usual spell of drought.

The poets took unlimited freedom in adaptation. In fact, the adaptation is in a sense, creative writing. Not only in treatment of the theme but in telling the myths also they displayed their ingenuity and told the complete and interesting stories. For this, the different versions of a particular story were picked up, and made into a complete lucid narrative. Shankardeva's Balichhalan (the deception of Bali) is an adaptation, and so stated by the author in clear terms:

"This episode (Balichhalan) from the Bhagavata is itself a nectar; however, I have added something to it from Vamana-purana".

(Bhagavata katha ito amrita sakshat Vamana-purana kichhu mishri dilo tat)

This approach was followed by others also, which betrayed the anxiety of the poets to communicate a whole idea to the people.

The Mahabharata and Ramayana, the two mahakavyas were adapted into Assamese. In the matter of rendering the two 'mahakavyas' the dictum was that they were not Shastras. Hence, addition and superimposition is not to be objected to, because the very nature of the works provided scope for it. Following this tradition, Rama Sarasvati (16th century) in his translation of the Mahabharata introduced quite a good number of new stories in the Vanaparva. The substance of these stories is the encounter of the Pandavas with the mighty and invincible demons, and defeat of the physical force by the moral force in the battle. The aim was to show the moral strength of the Pandavas and thus instruct the people through popular stories. In fact, these stories became so popular that they surpassed the original in popularity and some were taken as separate books.

In the description of cities and gardens, lakes and rivers, flowers and birds, societies and ceremonies though the age-old poetic convention was followed, the poets had the scenes of their surroundings in their view and depicted them as they visualised them. Thus, these descriptions had the conventional scenes as their basis which was refurbished by the new ones.

The chaste and pure literary Assamese with an abundance of Sanskrit words was used in translation and adaptation. However, colloquial words, popular phrases and idioms were also coined skilfully by the scholars. Similies picked up from the scenes or events of daily life, from the field of cultivation, and other avocations of life, were used along with those borrowed from the Sanskrit works.

It does not escape the notice of a reader that the language used by the early scholars contained more archaic forms and was less polished than the language that came into usage after the Neo-Vaishnava movement. The language of this period contains words borrowed from Maithili and Brajaboli and other sources. The similies used by Vidyapati are traceable in some works.

Prahlada Charita by Hema Sarasvati is an adaptation from Vamana-purana. This seems to be the earliest specimen of translation or adaptation from the Sanskrit puranas. The poet received the patronage of the king Durlabhanarayana of Kamata (Western Assam) who is assigned to the 13th century.

Ashvamedhaparva by Harihara Vipra is an abridged rendering of the Ashvamedhaparva of the Mahabharata. Vavruvahanaparva by the same poet forms the part of Ashvamedhaparva but treated as a separate work. Jayadrathavadha by Kaviratna Sarasvati under the patronage of the same king is an adaptation from the Dronaparva of the Mahabharata. Satyakiparva by Rudra Kandali is the rendering of the episode dealing with the heroic utterances of Satyaki from the Mahabharata, and supposed to be a work of the 13th century.

All these point to the fact that the Mahabharata, in part, if not fully, was rendered into Assamese verse as early as the 13th century and the king named above was a great patron of learning. The Ramayana was rendered into Assamese by Madhav Kandali in the late 14th century under the patronage of the king Mahamanikya, perhaps a tribal king. The work establishes the scholarship and the poetic genius of Madhav, who has been praised by Shankardeva as the 'unerring early poet' (Madhav Kandali's rendering of Adikanda and Uttarakanda were lost, later on added by Madhavdeva and Shankardeva respectively). Srimadbhagavata was rendered into Assamese following the original and the commentary of Sridhara Swami by Shankardeva and a few others. Kirtana by Shankardeva is a unique specimen of adaptation from the Bhagavata which narrates the glory of Krishna from birth to the last day of his earthly life.

Bhakti Ratnavali by Madhavdeva, the worthy disciple of Shankardeva, is a translation par excellence of the Sanskrit work of the same title by Vishnupuri. Madhavdev translated a number of didactic verses and included them in his work Namaghosha. Padmapurana by Sukavi Narayana is not a translation of the purana of the same name, but a narrative dealing with the story of Behula and Lakhindara.

All these and a majority of other adaptations are in verse. But there is a surprising departure. Bhattadeva (16th century) an erudite scholar rendered entire Bhagavata and the Srimadbhagavadgita into lucid Assamese prose. Perhaps this is the first prose rendering of these two works in any Indian language.

In the modern period there has not been any serious attempt at rendering Sanskrit Shastras and Kavyas into Assamese; there are, however, some adaptations.

As regards the medieval or early Assamese literature, only a limited number of works belonging to the class secular and pure literature were produced. The Vaishnava movement charged the mind of scholars and poets with so much enthusiasm that they could not conceive of the idea of deriving aesthetic pleasure from works other than those having a religious bias. As a result, the pure literature suffered. Hitopadesha by Rama Misra of the 17th century, and also by Madhu Misra Vagisa of the 18th century, the Shakuntala Kavya by Kaviraja Chakravarti, the court poet of king Shiva Simha (1714-1744), Nitilatamkura, an abridgement of Kamandaki's work on polity, and the translation of Srihastamuktavali, a work on dance, by Subhankara Kavi are the few instances where the author's motive of writing is other than religious.

So far as the rendering of the Sanskrit religious literature is concerned the early Assamese literature can boast of having a large number of translations and adaptations from different puranas and tantras. The earliest one is Haragaurisamvada, the materials of which, derived from Kumarasambhava and Kalika-purana, are utilised to depict the union of Shiva and Parvati and killing of Tadakasura. Hema Sarasvati, the author of Prahladacharita, an episodical Kavya on Prahlada's devotion, is also the author of Haragaurisamvada. Hema Sarasvati is one of the trio who flourished under the patronage of king Durlabhanarayana of Kamatapura (14th century), the other two being Kaviratna Sarasvati and Harihara Vipra. Haragaurisamvada probably provided the first norm of religious episodical Kavyas which gained increasing popularity with the poets of the succeeding periods.

Adaptations from the religious Sanskrit literature are mainly confined to the puranic genre. During the period of the Vaishnavite revivalism, the Bhagavata-purana considered as the sun among the 'puranas', ruled the roost. Shankardeva, the initiator of the movement, started the process of translating and adapting different books and episodes of the above-named purana by rendering no less than seven books (skandha) and composing a few Kavyas based on its stories. Of all the books rendered by Sankardev the translation of the tenth book (Dashama Skandha) is the most remarkable one as it does contain the exploits and glorification of Krishna, the adorable deity of the Assamese Vaishnavas. Portions of the same work left out by the great reformer were subsequently completed by his successors of whom names of Ananta Kandali (16th century), Gopalacharana Dvija (16th-17th century), Keshava Kayastha (17th century), Aniruddha Kayastha (17th century) stand out prominently.

Principal Kavyas adapted from the Bhagavata-Purana are Rukminiharana, Balichhalana, Amritamanthana, Kurukshetra by Shankardeva, Kumaraharana and Britrasuravadha by Ananta Kandali, Rajasuyakavya by Madhavadeva and Dhruvacharita by Vishnu Bharati. It may be mentioned that the poets, in several cases, while mostly adhering to the Bhagavata Purana, have introduced materials derived from other puranas with a view to make the stories interesting. Reflection of Assamese social life is also noticed in the depiction of ceremonies, festivals and popular beliefs.

A prose-rendering of the Bhagavata-Purana was completed in the last decade of the 16th century by Vaikunthanatha Bhagavata Bhattacharya alias Bhattadeva. This attempt to utilise prose as a medium of literary expression opened a new vista for the writers to undertake literary compositions through the medium of prose.

However the most popular story adapted to Assamese verses is from Padma Purana. It is the romantic story of Madhava Sulochana illustrated with an erotic bias, though the original story is narrated to show the efficacy of bathing in the confluence of the Ganga and the sea. The story has been developed into a full-fledged Kavya by three poets. The entire Kriya-yogasara section of the Padma Purana was transtated by Vishnudeva Goswami of Auniati Satra in the last decade of the 18th century. Dharma-Purana, an upapurana dealing with religious and social duties, was rendered into metrical Assamese first by Kavichandra Dvija, the court poet of Shiva Simha (1714-1744) in 1735, and later by Parashurama Dvija in the first decade of the 19th century. In 1708 Bhuvaneswara Vachaspati translated Brihannaradiya-Purana in the court of the Kachari king at Khaspur in the present district of Cachar of Assam. In the early part of the 19th century Ghanasyama Phukan translated the Kalki-Purana into metrical Assamese. Markandeya-Chandi has three Assamese versions translated during the 18th century.

The early Assamese literature presents three metrical versions of Jayadeva's Gitagovinda. Two versions, one by Rama Saraswati of the 16th century and the other by Dharmadeva Bhatta of the 18th century are juxtaposed versions of Jayadeva's work with 'rasakrida' episode of the Bhagavata-Purana. This has been done to accommodate the lyrical and highly erotic work of Jayadeva with the Vaishnavite philosophy of Assam which does not accept Radha as the mistress of Krishna. The third version by Kaviraja Chakravarti is a literal translation of the original Sanskrit work.

BENGALI

BHAGAVATA: The Bhagavata is the most sacred book of the Vaishnavas of Bengal. A large number of the legends about Krishna, widely current in Bengal, comes from the Bhagavata. So, it was quite natural that a considerable number of translations and adaptations of the Bhagavata in Bengali Literature of the medieval period was in existence.

Two things must be remembered in this connection. Firstly, though the Bhagavata consists of twelve skandhas (chapters), only the tenth and eleventh skandhas, where the story of Krishna has been told, became popular in Bengal. Secondly, as most of the devout Vaishnavas of Bengal knew Sanskrit quite well, they used to read the original Bhagavata. So, they were not much interested in the translation or adaptation of the sacred book. This is one of the reasons why Bengali translations or adaptations of the Bhagavata were less popular and less colourful than the Bengali versions of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata.

The literal Bengali translations of the Bhagavata are only a few in number. Not so are the adaptations. It should be mentioned here that these works were called Krishnamangalas. The oldest Bengali adaptation of the Bhagavata is probably the Srikrishnakirtana, written by Badu Chandidasa, though there is some controversy regarding the date of its composition. From the internal evidences it appears that it was written in the pre-Chaitanya period, probably in the 15th century. Srikrishnakirtana is divided into thirteen khandas (chapters).

In the case of the first Khanda, i.e. Janmakhanda the poet has drawn the material from the Bhagavata for the description of Krishna's birth. But in describing the birth of Radha, he has depended on other sources, as there is no mention of Radha in the Bhagavata. There is little influence of the Bhagavata in the next five Khandas. But in the seventh, eighth and ninth Khandas, he has taken the theme mainly from the Bhagavata. After Yamunakhanda, he has followed an independent course.

The next writer, who made an adaptation of the Bhagavata in Bengali is Maladhara Vasu (Maladhar Bose). He came from the village of Kulinagrama in the district of Burdwan, West Bengal. In his work entitled Srikrishnavijaya, the poet has expressed his indebtedness to the Bhagavata. He has stated that after learning the stories of the Bhagavata from the scholars and obtaining an order from Vyasa (the writer of the Bhagavata) in his dream, he started the writing of Srikrishnavijaya. He has drawn the theme of his poem mainly from the tenth and eleventh skandhas of the Bhagavata. Some portions of his poems are literal translations of the latter. But occasionally, he has made a synopsis of some of the episodes described in the Bhagavata. Sometimes, he has drawn his material from other puranas. In some cases, he has depended on local traditions or his own imagination. But there can be little doubt that his work is mainly based on the Bhagavata. After Maladhara Vasu, Govinda Acharya, a contemporary of Chaitanya, wrote a Krishnamangala, which is based on the Bhagavata. Another poet of the same name, Dvija Govinda, wrote another Krishnamangala. In this work, the poet has incorporated many episodes of the Bhagavata, e.g., the episodes of Parikshita, Dhruva, Ajamila, Prahlada and Gajendramokshana. In depicting Krishna's life, he has depended more on other sources than on the Bhagavata. Another Krishnamangala was written by Paramananda, the son of Durlabha. In this poem, we get a free translation of the first nine skandhas of the Bhagavata.

The next poet of Krishnamangala, Dvija Madhava, is very famous. Excepting a few episodes like the Danakhanda and Naukakhanda, his work is more or less based upon the Bhagavata. Some portions of his poem were meant to be sung; others to be merely read. The writer was a devotee of Chaitanya.

Krishnadasa, a disciple of Dvija Madhava, wrote a small Krishnamangala. He came from the west coast of the Ganga (Bhagirathi). The names of his parents were Yadavananda and Padmavati. Krishnadasa, though he generally followed the Bhagavata, incorporated many non-Bhagavata stories like Danakhanda, Naukakhanda, Bharkhanda and Vamshichaurya in his work. It is interesting to note that in this work, the poet claims to have taken the themes of Danakhanda and Naukakhanda from Harivamsha. But the text of the Harivamshapurana, as it is current today, contains no trace of these two episodes. Sanatana Goswami, in his commentary on the Bhagavata, gives the credit of introducing these two episodes to Chandidasa. We have already seen that Danakhanda and Naukakhanda are two important chapters of Srikrishnakirtana, written by Badu Chandidasa.

Two other poets, whose dates have not been clearly established, wrote Krishnamangalas. One of them is Duhkhi Shyamadasa, born of Shrimukha and Bhavani. He, in his work, has closely followed the Bhagavata, but has also brought non-Bhagavata episodes like Danakhanda and Naukakhanda into it. There is some good poetry in his work. The other poet, Daivakinandana Simha, alias Kavishekhara, son of Chaturbhuja and Hiravati, wrote a Krishnamangala entitled Gopalavijaya. From the introductory verses of this poem, we learn that he also wrote a few other books depicting the story of Krishna, but they have not reached us. Gopalavijaya is mainly based on the Bhagavata. The poet has brought in non-Bhagavata episodes like Danakhanda and Naukakhanda, but he has begged the pardon of his readers for this.

In the 17th century, Bengali adaptations of the Bhagavata took a new turn. Erotic elements became less and less prevalent in them. Some new stories, e.g., Suvalamilana, Gopigoshtha, etc., were invented and they found their places in these adaptations. Devotion and poetical genius of the writers became rarer and rarer in this century.

Amongst the writers of the Krishnamangalas of the 17th century, mention may be made of Srikrishnakinkara, who is considered by some scholars to be the elder brother of Kashirama Das, the famous writer of Bengali Mahabharata. His work is more or less a descriptive poem. Another writer, Bhavananda, the son of Shaivananda, came from East Bengal, probably Sylhet. Though his work is an adaptation of the Bhagavata it contains non-puranic elements like Danakhanda and Naukakhanda. It is entitled Harivamsha. Do this fact and the statement of Krishnadasa mentioned above point to another Harivamsha, which is now lost? Bhavananda's Harivamsha which became popular in East Bengal contains stamp of genuine poetical talent.

Dvija Parashurama or Parashurama Chakravarti, a poet coming from Birbhum (West Bengal), wrote a Krishnamangala. Some of its chapters were very popular in West Bengal, because we get numerous manuscripts in this area containing one or the other of these chapters. Complete manuscript of the entire work has also been found, but such manuscripts are very rare. This generally follows the Bhagavata, though it contains Danakhanda, Naukakhanda and a few other non-Bhagavata legends.

Another poet, Parashurama Raya, son of Madhusudana Raya, wrote another Krishnamangala, which is entitled Madhavasamgita. This work contains many non-Bhagavata elements, though the poet has followed the Bhagavata to some extent.

Both the poets mentioned above flourished probably in the first half of the 17th century. Another poet of the period was Ghanashyama Dasa, who wrote a book entitled Srikrishnavilasa. This book very closely follows the Bhagavata. It was written for the purpose of singing, as there are mentions of ragas and raginis in it. The poet was very much devoted to his preceptor, Jayagopala Dasa, as he has been frequently mentioned in this work.

Another poet named Ghanashyama wrote a book entitled Krishnasamkirtana. The materials of this work have been taken from the Bhagavata, as well as from the Harivamsha and the Brahmavaivartapurana.

Another major writer of Srikrishnamangala flourished probably in the second half of the 17th century. His name is Yashaschandra and his work is entitled Govindavilasa. Though he has followed the Bhagavata in this work, it mainly contains those legends about Krishna, which grew in the post–Chaitanya period.

Dvija Banikanta, another poet of the 17th century, wrote a book entitled Srikrishnacharita. In this book, he has followed the technique of the Bhagavata, i.e. here also Shukadeva appears as the narrator and Parikshita as the listener. Except for this formal similarity, there is no influence of the Bhagavata on this work.

Vamshidasa, another writer of Krishnamangala, explicitly declares to have followed the Bhagavata. But he has also incorporated many non–Bhagavata elements in his work.

Amongst the poets of the 18th century, mention may be made of Balarama Dasa, the writer of Krishnalilamrita, Dvija Ramanatha, the writer of Srikrishnavijaya and Kavichandra Shankara Chakravarti, the writer of Bhagavatamrita. Balarama Dasa, in Krishnalilamrita, has followed the Bhagavata and the Brahmavaivartapurana in an almost equal degree. Dvija Ramanatha has closely followed the Bhagavata, but has also included Danakhanda and Naukakhanda in his work. Kavichandra Shankara Chakravarti was the court poet of the Malla kings of Vishnupur. His Bhagavatamrita or Govindamangala is a very large book and it is influenced by the Bhagavata as well as other sources. This book became very popular in West Bengal and numerous manuscripts of either the entire work or its different chapters have been found.

Besides these major writers of Srikrishnamangalas, there were others, whose works were more or less of a trifling nature.

S.M.

MAHABHARATA: The history of Bengali adaptation of the Mahabharata is quite old. During the rule of Ala-ud-din Husain Shah (1493-1519), Paragal Khan, the governor of Chittagong, had a Bengali version of the Mahabharata composed by his court-poet Kavindra Parameshvara Dasa. This is probably one of the earliest vernacular Mahabharatas of Eastern India. Kavindra Parameshvara's work is short, but in it, we get the adaptation of the entire epic.

Paragal Khan's son, Nusrat Khan, alias Chuti Khan, was an admirer of the Ashvamedha-parva (the book of horse-sacrifice) of the Jaimini-samhita. He had it done by Shrikara Nandi, his court-poet. It is worth noting that in the case of the Ashvamedha-parva, the Bengali poets followed Jaimini-samhita instead of the original Mahabharata, ascribed to Vyasa.

The colophon of a version of the Bengali Mahabharata, most popular in Eastern Bengal, attributes it to Sanjaya. According to Dineshchandra Sen, Sanjaya's Mahabharata is the oldest among the Bengali versions of the epic. But this is not accepted by most of the scholars. From the internal evidence of Kavindra Parameshvara's work, it can be easily proved that no poet wrote any Bengali Mahabharata before Kavindra, at least not in Eastern Bengal. Sanjaya was probably the pseudonym of the author of this Mahabharata. From some of its colophons, it appears that his name was Harinarayana Deva. Sanjaya's Mahabharata is a voluminous work as it is an adaptation of the entire epic.

In West Bengal also, composition of the Bengali Mahabharata had a very early beginning. Ramchandra Khan, another governor under Ala-ud-din-Husain Shah, posted in the southern region of his kingdom, composed the Ashvamedha-parva in 1532-33. Another writer of the same Parva was Dvija Raghunatha, the Bengali court-poet of Mukunda Deva, the last independent Hindu king of Orissa. But the most notable amongst the West Bengal writers of Bengali Mahabharatas in the 16th century was Nityananda. He made an adaptation of the entire Mahabharata and his work was of a considerable size.

But the greatest name in this branch of literature is that of Kashiram Das, the son of Kamalakanta Das, coming from the Indrani Pargana (Burdwan) of West Bengal. Though Kashiram could not finish his work and the major portions of the Mahabharata going by his name were written by other poets, he is by far the most popular writer of this branch of Bengali literature. Due to the great popularity of his work, the compositions of the older poets were lost in oblivion.

Kashiram composed his work in the first quarter of the 17th century. After him, Ghanashyam Das, Ananta Misra, Rajendra Das, Ramanarayan Datta, Ramkrishna Kavishekhara, Shrinatha Brahmana and a few other poets of the 17th century composed Bengali versions of the Mahabharata. Many poets of the 18th century also made contributions to this branch of Bengali literature. They were Jyotisha Brahmana, Kavichandra Chakravarti, Vasudeva, Trilochan Chakravarti, Krishnarama, Ramanarayan Ghosha, Lokanath Datta, Shashthibara Sen and his son, Gangadas Sen. But none of them was able to make any lasting impression on the minds of the Bengali readers.

The Bengali versions of both the Ramayana and the Mahabharata were entitled Panchali. But there is some difference between these two forms of the Panchalis. Bengali Ramayanas were generally sung in open assemblies, whereas Bengali Mahabharatas were merely recited. The writers of Bengali Ramayanas were generally Brahmins. But composers of the Bengali Mahabharatas came from the other castes of the Hindu Society of Bengal. Most of them were Kayasthas.

It was a tradition amongst the Hindu kings of Bengal to have the Mahabharata read in the courts. In the Muslim period, this practice was not of course followed in the courts of the kings of Bengal, but it was current in the courts of Hindu zamindars and nobles. Some of the Muslim nobles like Paragal Khan and Chuti Khan had the Mahabharata read in their courts. They appreciated this great epic not as a sacred book, but as a fine specimen of literature.

The names of the Parvas (Chapters) of the Bengali Mahabharatas differ from those of the original epic.

Though the Bengali Mahabharatas (especially the one of Kashiram Das) were as popular as the Bengali Ramayanas, their characters did not attain the same amount of popularity as those of the latter. Rama, Sita, Lakshmana and other characters of the Ramayana conquered the hearts of the Bengalis. To the Bengalis, they were like real human beings. But the characters of the Mahabharata were something quite distant to them. The pattern of the characters depicted in the Mahabharata was quite strange and unfamiliar to the Bengalis. Bengali families may have sons like Rama, brothers like Lakshmana and Bharata and wives like Sita. But no Bengali family would ever dream of having persons like Bhima, Arjuna, Karna and Draupadi as their near and dear ones.

Though the Bengali Mahabharatas followed the original epic to a great extent, here and there we come across new stories and twisted forms of old stories. For example, in the original epic, the story of Subhadraharana is quite simple. Arjuna, in the course of his travel in exile, reached Dwaraka. There he saw Subhadra, the sister of Krishna, and became attracted by her. Krishna encouraged him and according to his advice, Arjuna lifted Subhadra, took her in his chariot and fled. This infuriated Balarama, Krishna's elder brother, and other Yadavas, but Krishna pacified them. The result was a happy ending. But in the Bengali Mahabharata, the story is a complex one, with dramatic touches. Here we find that Duryodhana, the enemy of the Pandavas, was selected by Balarama as a match for Subhadra. Subhadra saw Arjuna and at the very first sight she fell in love with him. Satyabhama, the wife of Krishna, came to learn this and arranged a meeting between Arjuna and Subhadra. Subhadra was taken away by Arjuna quite dramatically and when Arjuna's chariot was chased by the Yadavas, it was Subhadra who drove the chariot, while Arjuna fought. Duryodhana, unaware of these developments, came to marry Subhadra, with a large party of friends and relatives, only to be disappointed.

Another new story told in the Bengali Mahabharata is the surprise of Vibhishana. Vibhishana, the famous king of Lanka, was invited to the 'Rajasuya Yajna' of Yudhishthira. Vibhishana, as a devotee of Rama, considered Yudhishthira not a very important king. But when, at the time of his farewell, he tried to make a courtesy call to Yudhishthira, he was surprised to find that numerous gods and great kings were waiting at the door for having a chance to meet Yudhishthira. At this, Vibhishana understood that Yudhishthira was far superior to him.

The story of a quarrel between Draupadi and Hidimba, found in the Bengali Mahabharatas, is also new. At the time of the 'Rajasuya Yajna', both Draupadi and Hidimba claimed seniority over each other. This caused a violent quarrel between them. Both lost their temper and cursed each other. Draupadi cursed that Hidimba's son would be killed by Karna. Hidimba retaliated by cursing that Draupadi's sons would be killed by Asvatthama. In the battle of Kurukshetra, both the curses came true.

Almost all the stories of the 'Ashvamedha-parva' of Bengali Mahabharatas became popular. For example, the story of Pravira's battle with Arjuna. Pravira was treacherously killed by Arjuna. This infuriated Jana, Pravira's mother. She, after trying in vain to avenge the killing of her son, met her end by drowning herself in the Ganga. This story became the theme of a famous poem of Michael Madhusudan Dutt and a popular drama of Girish chandra Ghosh.

Other stories of this Parva, namely, the kingdom of Pramila (a kingdom consisting of only the women) and Arjuna's encounter with Babhruvahana, his son, also became popular.

Some characters of the original Mahabharata have been glorified in its Bengali counterparts. One of them is Karna, the great hero. Here he stands as a character without a single fault or vice. Brishaketu, his son, finds no mention in the original epic. But in the Bengali Mahabharatas, he plays an important role.

RAMAYANA: The legend of Rama was quite popular in Bengal. But the number of Bengali Ramayanas is not very large. The reason is not far to seek. Krittivasa, the first writer of a Bengali Ramayana was so much popular that few writers had the courage to tread over this field and enter into competition with him. Those poets, who ventured to write new Bengali Ramayanas occasionally, suffered an unenviable fate. Their writings were neglected and their names were even forgotten. Nevertheless, some portions of their poems became interpolated into the work of Krittivasa, and thereby managed to survive.

Krittivasa flourished in the 15th century. The original form of his Ramayana has not yet been properly ascertained. But a careful study of the older manuscripts reveals that he closely followed the Ramayana of Valmiki departing from the latter in only a few cases. But as days went by, his original work suffered a great change. Its language became modernised. New passages, either composed by the singers and scribes, or taken from other Bengali Ramayanas, were interpolated into it. All these happened, because, firstly, the scribes and singers wanted to make the work of Krittivasa "more attractive and up-to-date". Secondly, the adherent of a particular branch of Hinduism prevalent in a particular period interpolated some episodes into the Ramayana of Krittivasa, to vindicate their own religious cult against others. That is why in the modern version of the work, Birabahu, a son of Ravana, lies prostrate on the ground and begs the mercy of Rama, even though he came to fight with the latter; Ravana, the main enemy of Rama, also begs his forgiveness with folded hands in this version. But Taranisena's actions surpass the feats of all others. He comes to the battle-field, writing the name of Rama all over his body and sees Vishvarupa in Rama's face. In this version of Krittivasa's work, we find Rama and Lakshmana weep when the Rakshasas made entreaties for mercy. They remind us of Chaitanya and Nityananda. These things are not found in the other manuscripts of this work. So, it can be safely presumed that they were interpolated by the Vaishnavas when Vaishnavism attained greater prominence in Bengal. But there are other kinds of interpolations too. For example, we find (in the modern version) that Rama worships Durga to receive her blessings, so that he may be able to kill Ravana. This episode is no doubt interpolated by the Shaktas in their hey days, to prove that Rama, the incarnation of Vishnu, had to depend on the mercy of the goddess worshipped by them. In an 18th century manuscript of Krittivasa's Ramayana, we find Hanuman going to the Vacuum (Shunya) to meet Niranjana. This is obviously an interpolation made by the followers of the Natha cult.

There were other such writers who flourished between the 16th and 18th centuries. One peculiarity about these writers was that they did not draw their material from Valmiki's Ramayana only, but also from Adbhuta-Ramayana, Adhyatma-Ramayana, Yoga-Vashishtha-Ramayana and local traditions. Another interesting thing is that instead of the entire Ramayana, most of them preferred to write poems on small episodes like Lakshmana-digvijaya (The Conquest of Lakshmana), Shatrughna-digvijaya (The Conquest of Shatrughna), Angada-rayabara (The Embassy of Angada) and Sitar Baromasya (Sita's grief throughout the twelve months of the year).

The post-Chaitanya Vaishnava Bhakti-cult also influenced the Bengali Ramayanas of this period. Rama, as an incarnation of Vishnu, was worshipped by the Vaishnavas. The followers of Chaitanya were mainly worshippers of Krishna. But they also worshipped Rama. Some of the followers of Chaitanya, e.g., Murari Gupta and Vallabha (the father of Jiva Goswami) were hard-core devotees of Rama. So, poetry on the Rama-legend got a new impetus from the advent of Chaitanyism. As a result of this, many new Bengali Ramayanas were written and new pieces were interpolated in the work of Krittivasa, all of which bore the stamp of the Bhakti-cult.

The most notable Bengali Ramayana, written during this period, came from the pen of a poet called Adbhutacharya (meaning 'the strange preceptor'). The real name of this poet was Nityananda. It is not known why he was called Adbhutacharya. There is a tradition that when the poet was only seven years old, Rama appeared before him in a dream, ordered him to write the Ramayana, and with an arrow, wrote the great 'mantra' on his tongue. As a result of this, the poet composed the Ramayana at a very early age and because of this extraordinary feat, he got this title. But there are other scholars who believe that Adbhutacharya was not the title of this poet. They think that he called his Ramayana, Adbhutashcharya Ramayana. Due to scribal errors, Adbhuta Ashcharya has become Adbhutacharya.

This poet, Nityananda or Adbhutacharya, was born in North Bengal, in the village of Amrita Kundan which was situated near the junction of the rivers Atreyi and Karatoya. The names of his parents were Shrinivas (or Kashi) Acharya and Menaka. According to reliable evidence, he flourished in the 17th century.

Adbhutacharya drew the material of his work from Adbhuta-Ramayana, Adhyatma-Ramayana and Raghuvamsha (of Kalidasa). But in his work, we come across many new stories, which are not found in any other source.

The most striking feature in Adbhutacharya's work is the character of Kaushalya. According to the Ramayana current under the name of Krittivasa, Sumitra, the third wife of king Dasharatha, was neglected by her husband and this fact was liked by his first two queens, Kaushalya and Kaikeyi. But in Adbhutacharya's Ramayana, Kaushalya comes to the help of Sumitra and with great efforts manages to unite Sumitra with her husband.

At one time, Adbhutacharya's Ramayana was very popular in North Bengal. Now it is completely forgotten. But some portions of it have been interpolated into the work of Krittivasa, and have managed to survive, though not under the signature of the original writer.

Another work entitled Shataskandha-ravanavadha (The slaying of the hundred-headed Ravana) bears the name of Adbhutacharya as its writer.

The names of some other writers of Bengali Ramayana deserve mention. One of them is Kailasa Vasu, who lived in the middle of the 16th century. Another is Ramananda Yati, an ascetic. Ramashankara Datta, another poet, wrote his Ramayana either in the last quarter of the 17th century or in the first quarter of the 18th century. He came from the village of Bayra in East Bengal. In his Ramayana, we get a blending of the writings of Krittivasa and Adbhutacharya. He also drew some material from the Adhyatma-Ramayana. Gunaraja Khan, a poet believed to be distinct from the famous writer of Srikrishnavijaya, wrote a book entitled Itihasa-pustaka, which is nothing but a Bengali Ramayana. Another poet, Bhavani Dasa, wrote many books, which deal with various episodes of the Ramayana, e.g., Lakshmana-digvijaya (The Conquests of Lakshmana), Shatrughna-digvijaya (The Conquests of Shatrughna), Ramer Svargarohana (Rama's death), etc. One peculiar feature of these works is that though they deal with war and death, there are many scenes in them in which homely love, happiness, sorrow, union and separation of human beings have been depicted. This poet came from a village called Patunda. The name of his parents were Yadavananda and Yashoda. The manuscripts of his works have been found in even the remotest corners of Bengal. Dvija Lakshmana, a poet having the surname Vandyaghatiya (Banerjee) translated the Adikanda (first book) of the Adhyatma-Ramayana into Bengali. He also wrote a book entitled Shiva-Ramer-yuddha (The Battle between Shiva and Rama).

Kavichandra Shankara Chakravarti was a prolific and popular writer of the 18th century. He was the court-poet of the Malla Kings of Vishnupur. He wrote many books, dealing with various themes. He also wrote a Bengali Ramayana, which is known as Vishnupuri-ramayana. The most popular episode of this Ramayana is the Angada-rayabara (The Embassy of Angada). In the Ramayana of Valmiki, Angada, the son of Bali enters the court of Ravana as a messenger of Rama and scolds him in scathing terms. This episode has been described at length by Kavichandra Shankara Chakravarti, but he has brought in obscenity and coarse humour into his description to cater to the taste of his readers. Taranisenabadha (The slaying of Taranisena), another episode described in the Vishnupuri-Ramayana, has been interpolated into the Ramayana of Krittivasa.

Many other Bengali poets also wrote on Angada-rayabara. They are Phakir Rama, Kashinatha and Dvija Tulsi.

Dvija Bhavaninatha, court-poet of a certain king named Jayachandra, too, wrote a Bengali Ramayana. His work is based on the Adhyatma Ramayana.

In the second half of the 18th century, another Bengali Ramayana was written by one Ramananda Ghosha. Though his work is of a mediocre nature, it has drawn the attention of the scholars for one particular reason. In this work, the poet has styled himself as Buddhavatara, i.e., the incarnation of Lord Buddha. According to him, Buddha was cursed by Kali to be reborn as Ramananda Ghosha to save the country from 'mlechha' or evil practices. This poet believes that Rama and Jagannatha are one and the same deity and both are transformations of Buddha.

In the second half of the 18th century, another Bengali Ramayana was jointly written by Jagatrama Raya and his son, Ramaprasada Raya. In this Ramayana, apart from the original seven kandas, we get one additional kanda, Pushkara Kanda, and a new chapter, Ramarasa. This Ramayana attained some popularity. Raghunandana Goswami, a poet of the early 19th century, also wrote a Bengali Ramayana entitled Ramarasayana. Another Bengali Ramayana has been ascribed to Chandravati a lady poet of Mymensingh. She was the daughter of Vamsidasa, the writer of a Manasa-mangala poem. No manuscript of Chandravati's Ramayana has been found. It has been collected from the oral songs sung by the singers of Mymensingh. Its language is quite modern.

BHAGAVATA: The Krishna cult was most widespread in Gujarat as a result of various causes. In the first place, according to the Mahabharata, Krishna ruled from Dwarka in Gujarat for many years. Secondly, poetess Mira spent later part of her life in Dwarka and guided people on the path of Krishna-devotion. Thirdly, Vallabhacharya the founder of the Pusti sect, and his son Vitthalnathji travelled extensively in Gujarat and attracted thousands of people towards 'Madhura' Bhatki (a type of devotion in which devotee considers himself or herself as a beloved of Krishna). This also made Krishna more popular. Further, it is said that when Narsinha Mehta, the Gujarati poet-devotee of Krishna (1414-1480) was in difficulty, Krishna helped him either by taking a human form or by performing miracles. Such episodes of Krishna's personal help to mortal men were made known by Narsinha Mehta who has written poems on every such occasion describing his personal relations with him. After him, many other poets have written poems regarding those episodes. Gujaratis were convinced that Krishna was the only God who could help them in times of difficulty, hence the Krishna cult became increasingly popular amongst the masses. Besides it was only with Krishna that personal relations could be established and developed, for he was more human than divine. On account of the factors mentioned above, the Bhagavata which depicts the life of Krishna became a book of gospels in Gujarati.

Bhima (1465) was the first poet who in his poem Harilila Shodaskala (Sixteen phases of the sport of Hari) has given in 16 cantos an abridged version of Shrimad Bhagavata. Although he has given some local colour (e.g.

Krishna's marriage with Rukmini is described as taking place not in the Vidarbha region but at a place near Junagadh in Saurashtra), he follows the original text.

In the post-independence period the art of the Bhagavata recitation was revived, and several popular reciters started writing what they recited. They did not strictly adhere to the original text, but added some incidents, which were consistent with the original. This was only to arouse the desired sentiments in the audience. Dongre Maharaj, popular reciter of the Bhagavata wrote Bhagavata in 1961 in which he has added an incident depicting the agony of Yashoda (foster mother of Krishna) after Krishna's departure for Mathura. She notices a crow sitting on a pillar of her house and because of the popular belief that the chattering sound of a crow foretells the arrival of dear ones, she asks the crow whether Krishna is returning. This moves the audience. Such additions enhance the beauty of translation. Krishnashankar Shastri, who is also a popular reciter of the Bhagavata also made additions to his Bhagavata published in 1958. In his work, when Krishna departs for Mathura, Yashoda remembers one by one her harsh treatment to his son, and she thinks that Krishna has left her because she punished him a number of times. Thus the modern reciters of the Bhagavata have successfully revived the art of narrating mythological stories.

From the 15th century upto the second half of the 19th century, poets selected certain episodes of the Bhagavata and developed them according to their own creative genius. There are two types of such adaptations. One is that in which sentiments and emotions are depicted in a lyrical form. The incidents which are selected are: rejoicing in Gokul and celebrations on the birth of Krishna, lullabies to put child Krishna to sleep, childhood pranks and feats of Krishna, various phases of his love-making with Radha and milkmaids e.g. Krishna playing on flute and the infatuation of Radha and the milkmaids who abandoning all their domestic duties run towards him, Krishna's asking for the tax from them and the wordy duel on that occasion, Krishna's teasing them while they go to fetch water, Krishna's playing 'Rasalila' (Rasa Dance) with them in a moonlit night, and the sudden disappearance of Krishna in the midst of dance, Krishna's sudden departure for Mathura and the plight of Nanda and Yashoda (his foster parents) and Radha and 'gopis' (milkmaids), Krishna's jumping into the river Yamuna to fight with serpant Kaliya: all these events are chosen by poets to delineate various emotions. Only the bare outline is taken from the Bhagavata. The poets gave full scope to their imagination and in doing so sometimes Krishna has been downgraded as a women hunter. In the Bhagavata there is no mention of Radha, the milkmaid but in the Brahma Vaivarta Purana Radha is mentioned as a lady to whom Krishna was attached. Almost all the poets have delineated the love affairs of Radha with Krishna. Some poets like, Narsinha Mehta (15th century) Raje (17th century), Ranchod (18th century) have described the marriage of Radha with Krishna. The poets must have felt that Krishna's love affair with Radha did not have the legal sanction and therefore they legalised it by depicting Radha as Krishna's wife. Narsinha Mehta described all the sports of Krishna, from the time of his birth upto departure for Mathura in his emotionally surcharged lyrics, although at times he becomes erotic and transgresses the limits of decency. But on the whole he maintained the dignity of Krishna. Other renowned poets who have been inspired by the Bhagavata are Bhalan (15th century) Mira (16th century) Raje and Raghunathdas (17th century), Pritam and Dayaram (18th century and 19th century). Many of them have described 'Raslila' in a more elaborate manner than the Bhagavata.

Of the longer narrative poems which have been adapted from the Bhagavata, the Bhramargita (the bee song) is the most popular in mediaeval Gujarati poetry. The poem is connected with the episode of Krishna returning to Vrindavan in the guise of a bee and 'gopies' calling names to the bee which indirectly apply to Krishna. Fifteen poets like Narsinha Mehta, Bhalan (15th century), Brehdev, Bhim Chaturbhuj, Keshavdas (16th century), Vishwanath Jani, Raghunathdas, Raje (17th century) Purshottam, Pritam (18th century) and Dayaram (19th century) have written Bhramargita. The episode in the Bhagavata is narrated in two chapters only, while Gujarati versions contain on an average over twenty-five lyrics. They have chosen this theme because it offers considerable scope for expression of powerful emotions as well as sarcasm. Some of the poets like Narsinha Mehta, Pritam, Raje and Dayaram have dropped the incident of Krishna's coming there in the form of a bee because they thought that there was no need of a proxy to use blasphemous language for Krishna. Even though they cast aspersions on Krishna, all the poets who have dwelt upon this theme have been able to show that even in their speaking ill of Krishna their intense love for him was discernible. Some of the poets like Chaturbhuj, Purshottam and Pritam have made gopis use a very coarse language, even then this does not fail to show their emotional attachment to Krishna.

The second Bhagavata incident which has attracted the mediaeval Gujarati poets is the abduction of Rukmini by Krishna and his marrying her. It is known as 'Rukmini Haran'. Rukmini, the daughter of king Bhishmak of Vidarbha, wanted to marry Krishna, but her brother had arranged to marry her to Sishupala, an arch enemy of Krishna. Rukmini sends a secret messenger to Krishna, indicating her plan to elope with Krishna. Accordingly when Rukmini goes to the temple, Krishna carries her away and marries her. The episode is chosen because it gives expression to the sentiments of love and heroism. Further, Rukmini was the chief queen of Krishna. Nine poets have written poems on this episode, chief among them being Shedhji and Fudh (16th century), Devidas, (17th century), Govindram and Premanand (18th century), and Dayaram (19th century). The poets have provided the story with a locale of contemporary Gujarat in the description of places, and for the venue of the wedding ceremony, Shedhji describes a place near Junagadh in Saurashtra (instead of the Vidarbha region as recorded) as the place from where Rukmini was carried away. Premanand's Rukminiharan is the best poem on the subject for he does full justice to the descriptive as well as the emotional part of the episode. In the original, this episode is narrated in one chapter while the poems written on the episode consist of over twenty chapters.

A similar incident in which Krishna's grandson Aniruddha was carried away by the friend of Usha, the daughter of Banasura of Assam, and got secretly married to her in the state of captivity, and the war between Krishna and Banasura in which the latter is defeated, has also been chosen by the poets. There is ample scope to portrary the sentiments of love, wonder and heroism. Being the only incident in which the bridegroom is being lifted from his residence to the residence of the bride and that too by a lady sustains the story interest. The adaptation of this theme began as early as the 15th century and lasted to the end of the 18th century. Seven poets have chosen this theme, chief amongst them being Veersingh and Janardan (15th century), Nakar (16th century), Premanand (17th century), Narsinghnaval (18th century). In the original there are only two chapters in which the incident is narrated, while the Gujarati versions which are called as Usha Haran or Okhaharan (carrying away of Usha) contain on an average thirty chapters because of elaborations and additions. Although the stories in the Gujarati versions are based on the Bhagavata they present a different picture. In the original Usha is the daughter of Banasura but the Gujarati versions tell us that Banasura was childless and that he through long penance got Usha as a boon from Lord Shiva. It seems that some portion from the Ganesh story got mixed up with the Bhagavata story. As the identity of the heroine is changed the Gujarati version differs considerably from the original. After the 15th century the poets who dealt with this theme changed the name of heroine from Usha to Okha. Premanand who is regarded as a great poet, makes Aniruddha behave at Usha's residence like a sex starved teenager.

Sudama Charit (Sudama episode) describes Krishna's attachment to his co-student and poor friend Sudama. Instigated by his wife Sudama goes to Krishna. Krishna gives him all the riches without Sudama's asking for it. This also is a popular theme with the mediaeval Gujarati poets. Narsinha Mehta and Premanand are the prominent poets who have dealt with the theme. Narsinha Mehta does not make significant changes in the original story, and he portrays Sudama as an ideal devotee of Krishna, Premanand portrays the wife of Sudama as an ideal housewife. Sudama of the Bhagavata has been made a comic character in order to entertain the audience. He has paid more attention to exalting the image of Krishna.

From other cantos of the Bhagavata which dwell on the various incarnations of God, only Narsinha incarnation of Vishnu has attracted the attention of the mediaeval poets. It has been described by Surdas and Haridas Valand (16th century), Shedhji and Kalidas (17th century). Premanand and Bhanda also have chosen this incident. The story must have been chosen because its hero is a child. The poets have abridged the account of the birth and the atrocities of Hirnakashyap and concentrated on Prahlad. While describing the student life of Prahlad, poets have presented a contemporary set up.

The other story is that of Dhruva in the fourth canto. This story also has a child as the hero, who because of the taunts of his step mother goes to the forest, practises penance and propitiates Vishnu. As a result, Dhruva's father, the ruler of a state, repents and installs him on the throne. As the evil of ill-treatment by step mother was prevalent in contemporary Gujarat, the theme had a popular appeal.

In his Balirajanun Akhyana (story of king Bali), Veerji (17th century) has narrated the story of Vamana incarnation of Vishnu. While describing Vamana, he gives us a glimpse of a typical Brahmin boy of the 17th century.

In modern times, poet Dalpatram (19th century) has written Ven Charitra (story of Ven) which is given in the sixth canto of the Bhagavata. The poet had written the poem to euologise the British rule. Ven was a tyrant, and was ultimately killed by the Brahmins. Here Ven stands for the pre-British rulers who terrorised the people.

In a dramatic poem 'Krishna Kubja' the poet Umashankar Joshi has selected an incident from the early life of Krishna who, while going to Mathura meets a hunchback woman Kubja. Krishna not only removes her deformity, but also transforms her into a beautiful woman. Umashankar has chosen this theme to show how true devotion can transform ugliness into beauty. In the Bhagavata Krishna performs a miracle by transforming Kubja while Umashankar's poetic miracle makes the transformation convincing and intelligible.

Many poets of the post-independence period have chosen Radha and Krishna as the symbols of true love. They have selected incidents from the Bhagavata and projected Krishna and Radha as more human than divine. Foremost among such poets are Umashankar Joshi, Niranjan Bhagat, Harindra Dave and Suresh Dalal.

Kaniyalal Munshi has written a novel on Krishna entitled Krishnavatara (incarnation of Krishna). It is in seven parts. It is based on the Bhagavata but the author has not taken the miracles for granted, he has tried to explain the miracles in a rational way. In the love affair of Radha and Krishna, more attention is paid to its physical aspect, and they are portrayed as ordinary lovers.

In the novel Madhav Kyanya Nath (Madhav is Nowhere) the novelist Harindra Dave has taken the incident of Krishna's departure for Mathura, to depict the contemporary political situation, the conclusion being ours is a god-forsaken land.

Thus Bhagavata has been a source of inspiration from the 15th century onwards up to the present day, and the Krishna episode has not receded into the background, even with the advent of modernisation.

MAHABHARATA: In mediaeval Gujarat some of the stories of the Mahabharata had a wide appeal; adopting them many poets tried to compose longer narrative poems.

The most popular story was that of Abhimanyu, son of Arjuna, who was killed in the Kurukshetra battle. Dehal and Nakar (16th century), Tapidas and Premanand (17th century) and Lajjaram (18th century) have composed 'Akhyanas' on the incident. But Dehal who initiated this tradition has linked this episode with the story of the Ahiravana, who was earlier killed by Krishna. Dehal describes Abhimanyu as a reincarnation of Ahiravana. Hence Krishna out of animosity towards him, indulges in various unfair means to see that he is killed in the battle. Other poets have followed Dehal's lead.

Another story from the Mahabharata to attract the poets is that of king Nala. Nala had lost in the game of dice and was exiled from his kingdom. This story attracted mediaeval Gujarati writers of both Hindu and Jain traditions, though their versions of the story differ. Bhalan (15th century) was the first to write on the Nala story in 'Akhyana' form. He refers to the Naishadhiya Charita by Magha and to the Nalachampu besides the Mahabharata. Rasivardhan (15th century), in his Naladavadantirasa gives a fresh version of the story. In it king Nala who in the original tale is monogamous, is presented as polygamous. In the end he hears from a Jain monk an account of his previous births and he comes to know for which of his sins and misdeeds he had to suffer in this birth. Ultimately, he renounces the world. Other Jain writers like Nayasundar and Megharaj (17th century) and Samayasundar (17th century) have treated the story in a similar manner. As the aim of Jain writing was to emphasise that one reaps the fruits of one's good or bad deeds, all the Jain stories identify the deeds for which Nala had to suffer. In all Jain stories the characters ultimately take the path of renunciation. The hero Nala retains his name in the Jain versions while the names of other characters are changed. Nakar (16th century), a Hindu poet had added one incident which has later been incorporated in their works by all the non-Jain poets who have written on Nala. It is as follows: Nala and Damayanti while wandering in the forest became terribly hungry. Nala went to a pond, caught some fish and gave them to Damayanti, going back for some more. Now Damayanti had a boon which made the very touch of her body to revive the dead. The dead fish hence, came back to life and slipped from her hand. Nala, unaware of the boon suspected on his return from the pond, that Damayanti had eaten the fish away. In anger, he deserts her. It is likely that Nakar took the germ of this episode from some folk-tale. This incident is not incorporated in the Jain versions. Another incident which is incorporated in both the Jain and the Hindu traditions is as follows: Damayanti deserted by her husband, stayed incognito at the place of her aunt, herself a queen. Not knowing who she really was, the aunt and the cousins put the blame of the theft of a necklace on her. However, the chastity of Damayanti and her trust in God saved her from dishonour, for the real thief was caught. This incident too appears to have its source in some folk tale.

There are some interesting errors to be found in the adaptations. In the Mahabharata, Pushkara, the brother of Nala, who defeat him at the game, is shown to have brought Vrisha with him. The word Vrisha, in Sanskrit has two meanings; Dice and Bull. The poet Premanand who probably was conversant with only one meaning, i.e. bull, depicts Pushkara coming along (to the game) with a bull. Premanand's successors like Vaikuntha, and others have imitated him. In another incident the serpant Karkotaka, whom Nala had saved from fire, spitefully bites poison into the King's body. However, before he does so he asks Nala to utter the word, Dasa. This word in Sanskrit, has two meanings, Bite and Ten. Premanand, perhaps playfully makes the king take ten steps.

Bhalan (15 century) and Bhau (17th century) in their poems Krishnavisti and Pandavavisti, depicting Krishna's peace mission to Duryodhana, have added something of their own creation to the original. In Bhalan's poem, Draupadi scoffs quite spiritedly at the proposal of sending a peace mission and wants her molestation to be avenged. Though not to be found in the original, this addition is quite consistent with the spirit of the original character.

Shivadas (17th century) has elaborately described Draupadi 'Svayamvara'. He has made many additions and alterations. Living in the mediaeval period, he had not always been able to maintain the classical portrayal of Draupadi, who takes all to task and spares none who are sitting in the Kaurava assembly. Her words are harsh, powerful and at times rustic.

Jaimini who was a pupil of Vyasa Badarayana, has also written a Mahabharata. It has neither been translated into Gujarati nor fully adopted. But three stories from the 'Ashvamedha Parva' of the Mahabharata, namely the stories of the son of Arjuna by Chitrangada and of Sudhanva and of Chandrahasa have been popular with the poets. Hariram (18th century) has written Babruvaha- nakhyana. The story of Sudhanva, who faught with Arjuna to capture the sacrificial horse to have a glimpse of Krishna, has attracted the attention of many mediaeval poets. Nakar, Vishnudas, Premanand and Hariram, have all dealt with the story of Chandrahasa.

In late 19th century the poet Narmad wrote a drama entitled Draupadi Darshan. Poet Kant has written two great poems on the Mahabharata themes: 'Vasantavijaya' (The victory of spring) which depicts the death of the king Pandu and sings of the glory of love, and 'Atijnana' in which, using the story of Sahadeva the poet examines the relation of knowledge and action.

Sundaram (b. 1908), a poet who has been influenced by Gandhian thought, selected Karna and Draupadi to depict the problem of social injustice and the agony of an individual.

Umashankar Joshi (b. 1911) has written four dramatic poems 'Karna–Krishna', 'Gandhari', 'Oganisama Divasanum Prabhata' (the dawn of the nineteenth day) and 'Mahaprasthan' (the final departure). The first poem depicts the final efforts of Krishna to win over Karna to the side of the Pandavas. In 'Gandhari' and 'Oganisama Divasanum Prabhata' the poet depicts the ghastly sight of the battle field after the end of the Mahabharata war. The 'Mahaprasthan' depicts the final departure of the Pandava Princes and Draupadi and the death of all but Yudhishthira.

In his play, Paritran Darshaka has dramatised the Mahabharata story. Kanaiyalal Munshi turned to the Mahabharata late in his life. In his biographical novel Krishnavatara, published in seven parts, he has drawn profusely from the epic. He has tried to depict Krishna as a superman without resorting to the idea of divine miracles. But he has succeeded only partly. Pannalal Patel has written Parthane Kaho Chadave Ban (Ask Arjuna to Ready his Bow) in which he has changed the entire identity of some of the great characters. Bhishma who is reputed for his vow of celibacy is depicted as a married man in this novel. In his biographical work on Krishna, Krishna Purushottama, Upendra Sandesara has presented fruits of extensive research.

Karsandas Manek (1903-1978) has written a verse play, Pratijna Purushottama on a Mahabharata theme. In his Radio feature 'Dharma Yuddha' he has chosen Pandava's entry in Viratnagara after twelve years of exile as an occasion to present Pandava's and Draupadi's individual characteristics.

Thus the Mahabharata has been a source of inspiration to Gujarati writers from the 15th century upto this date.

RAMAYANA: In Gujarat the worship of Rama began as a result of the impact of Ramanandi sect and Ramanujacharya's teachings. Though there are temples of Ramanandi sect in Gujarat even upto the present day it cannot be said that the devotion to Rama is popular in Gujarat. And, in Gujarat there was not a single devotee poet of the stature of Tulsidas who could inspire the masses by the Rama story.

In medieval Gujarati literature there were poets who tried to present the Rama episode to Gujaratis by adding something of their own and making the story spicy by giving local touch to it. So, even though some of the poets have tapped the source of the Valmiki Ramayana, they cannot be said to be translators in the real sense of the term.

Mandan (15th century) was the first to present the Rama story. Though his work is called the Ramayana he has not presented the whole of the Ramayana, but only the events upto Rama's banishment and Bharat's going to Chitrakuta mountain to entreat Rama to return to Ayodhya. It consists of cantos of seventy to seventy five lines. He has not been able to bring out the beauty of the original except in the scene of the meeting of Rama and Bharat.

Nakar (beginning of 16th century) in his Ramayana has tried to be faithful to the original, though his translation is not upto the mark. Yet he very well portrays incidents with heroic and pathetic sentiments in excellent manner.

Uddhav and Vishnudas (17th century) have translated six cantos each from the Ramayana, the former has translated first six cantos while the later remaining six cantos. There is nothing remarkable about this translation. They tell the Rama story in a simple narrative style.

Girdhar (1787-1852) has presented the whole of Ramayana. His Ramayana is most popular in Gujarati. It is said that he had an access to Tulsidas's Ramacharitmanas. He has happily blended the works of Valmiki and Tulsi and presented composite character of Rama. He has omitted the depiction of the harsh attitude of Rama towards Sita, when she is reunited with Rama, after Ravana's assassination.

In medieval Gujarati literature, some of the Ramayana episodes were selected and preserving the main sequence of events, some changes were made in the original; some additions were also made to suit the tastes of contemporary audience. In doing so, they have not cared to retain the dignity of the mythological characters, who have been made to act like ordinary human beings with all their limitations.

Rama's childhood pranks have been interestingly depicted by Bhalan (15th century), a devotee of Rama. In some of the poems he asks his mother to give him the moon to play with. In another poem Rama is crying and his mother has not been able to discover the reason of his crying. At last it has been found, that Rama has spread his costly garment on a royal swan, and that the swan fled away with the garment. All these incidents are imaginary, but they provide entertainment to the masses. Bhalan has written Ram Bal Lila (childhood pranks of Rama) and Ramvivah (Rama's marriage). In the former he has depicted the childhood of Rama upto his marriage. As Bhalan was a Sanskrit scholar, he has mostly followed Valmiki. Several other mediaeval poets have written upon this episode, the chief amongst them are Hariram (16th century) Vajiyo (17th century), Kalidas (18th century). There is nothing remarkable about these poems and most of them mock at Ravana when he fails to break Lord Shiva's bow.

No poet selected the incident of Rama's banishment for it was too tragic for entertainment. Karman Maniri (15th century) wrote Sitaharan (abduction of Sita) but he in order to lessen the burden of the tragic element of the incident has carried the story further till the death of Ravana, and thus mixing the heroic sentiment with tragic he has been able to dilute the effect of tragic sentiment. He has not been, however, able to maintain the dignity of the characters. Hanuman is so puffed up that Rama has to make effort to put Hanuman in his proper place. This does justice neither to Rama nor Hanuman.

Angad's going to Ravana as Rama's emissary of peace is the second incident which has been selected by two poet, Kiku Vasahi (16th century) and Shamel (17th century). The pattern in both the poems is that Angad eulogises Rama, while Ravana is continuously speaking ill of Rama. In Shamel's Angad Visti (Peace negotiation of Angad), when Angad hurls abuses at Ravana, one feels that two lowly persons are quarrelling in the street.

Shridhar (1509) wrote Ravanmandodari Samvad (dialogue between Ravana and Mandodari) in which Mandodari (wife of Ravana) entreats Ravana to hand over Sita to Rama and make peace with him. This incident is depicted by other poets also. Shridhar's poem is in a dialogue form, and in the poem, Ravana instead of abusing Rama, praises him. The audience also relishes this change, because their religious sentiments are pampered. Vajiyo's Ranajanga (16th century) and Premanand's Ranayagna mainly deal with Rama-Ravana war. Both of them have made Ravana say to his wife Mandodari, 'I know that Rama is the Supreme Lord, and he has taken incarnation to liquidate me, and hence I want to die by his arrow, and be blessed'. Thus Gujarati writers of the Ramayana have depicted Ravana as a person who recognises the divinity of Rama.

Samay Sundar (16th century) has written Sita Ram Chopai in which he has described the tragic condition of Sita and her mental agony during her captivity. The poet was a Jain monk and he has developed the tragic sentiment in an impressive manner. In his Sita Sandesh (the message to Sita), Vajiyo has dealt effectively with this incident.

Vajiyo, Premanand and Dhiro in the end of the 18th century dealt with Rama-Ravana war in their works. Vajiyo calls his work Ranajanga, other two Ranayagnas which meant the war sacrifice. All the three have described the battle field and war preperations in their contemporary period. All of them have made Ravana and his brother Kumbhakarna praise Rama. When Kumbhakarna in spite of Ravana's herculian efforts does not awake from his slumber, his wife comes and tells Ravana to sing before him (Kumbhakarna) the praise of the Lord of whose he was a great devotee. Ravana arranges for the same and Kumbhakarna wakes up. Such incidents are added to demonstrate the impact of the Lord over his opponents.

But when faked Sita is beheaded by Indrajeet and when Lakshman becomes unconscious, Premanand has shown Rama reacting like an ordinary human being. Rama says to his generals in the battle field, 'there being no chances of winning the war, let us retreat'. Thus Rama is made to appear not only an amateur general but also a coward. The mediaeval poets sometimes lacked discrimination while dealing with a mythological story. Krishnabai has (beginning of 18th century) very aptly depicted the wordy duel at the time when Sita compels Rama to bring to her the deer skin for her blouse. Rama says: 'The deer is an illusion.' Sita replies, 'You kill it and the fact will come out! Rama says,' It is a sin to hunt a deer. 'Sita replies, 'Then tell me why have you kept bow and arrow with you'? Rama says, 'I have to keep them to protect the innocent'. Sita quickly retorts, 'What fault Shurpanakha (Ravana's sister) committed?' All this wordy duel is the creation of her imagination and being a lady, she has concentrated on portraying Sita in a vivid manner.

Sedhaji was the only mediaeval poet to write Hanuman Charit (the story of Hanuman) in 1591. He has done well to select Hanuman (ideal devotee of Rama). He has portrayed Hanuman as one who does not defect from his path of devotion.

In the 19th and 20th centuries the Rama story has been depicted from various angles. Narayan Hemachandra has given a Ramayana digest in Ramayanasar. He has briefly narrated the main incidents. In his Ramayanan Patro (Characters in the Ramayana, 1932) Nanabhai Bhat has by an analytical process, brought out the chief traits of each character. By means of ample instances he has depicted the qualities and shortcomings even of the characters like Dasharatha, Rama, Sita and Bharata. In his booklet Rama Ane Krishna (1932) Kishorelal Mashruwala has given a biography of Rama. The peom 'Urmila' by Damodardas Botadkar describes the reactions of Urmila on hearing that her husband Lakshman intends to accompany Rama to the forest. Urmila magnanimously permits her husband to accompany his brother. She assures him that she will bear the separation boldly and that he need not worry about her. The poem must have been inspired by Rabindranath Tagore's famous poem Kavyer Upekhita (one who has been neglected by the poets), which deals with the same subject, though Tagore's treatment is different. Sunderam, a leading poet of the Gandhian era has in his poem 'Raghavnu Hariday' (1939) depicted the inner working of Rama's mind, his personal sacrifices for the universal good. It is here for the first time in Gujarati poetry that Rama's character is very sympathetically delineated. It might be because Mahatma Gandhi had put Rama as an ideal deity before the public. In the end the poet prays to god to give him a heart like Rama's. Umashankar Joshi in his dramatic poem 'Bharat Bhet' (meeting with Bharat) depicted the union of Rama and Bharat in a vivid manner. Bharat goes to the Chitrakut mountain to entreat Rama to return to Ayodhya and take charge of the kingdom. The love between the two brothers is tenderly delineated, and their emotions are effectively presented. It is the only dramatic poem on the subject.

Thus in the mediaeval Gujarati literature, there were neither translations nor adaptations of the Ramayana in the true sense of the terms. It is only in the modern period translations of the work have been undertaken and adaptations have been made of its theme.

Sanskrit literature has been a great source of emulation and inspiration for Hindi poets and prose writers of all times. Hindi writers, inspired by the rich cultural heritage and literary excellence of Sanskrit literature, aspired to make it available to the Hindi readers for their enlightenment and aesthetic pleasure through translations and adaptations. By the end of the 14th century, Awadhi and Brajabhasha were fully developed as media of literary expression. The mediaeval period of Hindi literature (1400-1850) was especially marked by religious and devotional approach. This tendency is seen in the translators as well. They selected the works known for their cultural, religious, moral or devotional ideas. The Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata particularly drew the attention of Hindi writers. Much of the Krishnaite poetry is based on the Bhagavata. The Sur Sagar of Surdas is a partial adaptation of the Bhagavata marked by originality, poetic imagination, omission and selection. Similarly, the Dasham Skandha Bhasha of Nanddas is an adaptation of the Tenth Skandha but comparatively more faithful. Pradumandas's Bhaktikalpataru (1682) is an abbreviated adaptation of the Bhagavata. Adaptations of the Bhagavata were accomplished by other scholars also, e.g. Gopal (1730); Krishnadas (1795-97); Nagaridas (1801-06); Sevaram Mishra (1827); Lalachdas (Bhagavata Dasam Skandha, Bhasha (1530) and Chaturbhujdas (Bhagavata Purna Dasam Skandha (1567) and Lallujilal's Premsagar (Calcutta, 1803) is a Khariboli version of the last one written in Brajabhasha.

Many other works were translated or adapted e.g. Adhyatmaramayana' (Madhavdas Charan, 1824); Meghraj Pradhan, 17th Century, Sadal Misra, Ramacharita (1806), Gokulnath Gopinath Manidev, Sitaramagunarnav, (1813) Markandeya Purana (Damodardas, 1643), Durgasaptasati (Guru Gobind Singh); Chandicharitra Uktivilas Amarkosh (Bhikharidas, Amarprakash, 1743); Gokulnath–Gopinath Manidev: Amarkosh Bhasha, 1813), Yogavashishtha (Ramprasad Niranjani, 1741), Vishnupurana (Bhikharidas, Vishnupurana bhasha, 1743); Anandaramayana (Vishvanath Singh, 18th Century), Vetalapanchavinsatika (Surati Misra), Vaitalapachisi, 1710; Harnarayan, Vaitalapachisi, 1755; Lallujilal, Vaitalapachisi, Calcutta, 1802); Hitopades (Devichand, Hitopradesorabodhini; Vansidhar, Mitramanohar; Ubhayachand, Hitopadesvachanika- 18th cent.), Mahimnastotra (Maniyarsingh, Bhashamahima, 1784) and Sinhasandvaitrinika (Lallujilal, Singhasanabattisi Calcutta, 1802). Sabal Singh Chauhan accomplished a free translation of the Ritusamhara (1700) and Guman Misra that of Naishadhacharita (1743). The latter used various metrical forms of Sanskrit and Hindi. He is not very successful as a translator but deserves credit for rendering it in Hindi. The mediaeval Hindi poeticians generally borrowed definitions of 'Rasa', 'Alamkara', etc., from Sanskrit poetics and illustrated them with original examples. A few of them are mere Hindi versions of the Sanskrit text so far as the theoretical enunciations are concerned, e.g. Shringaramanjarl (Chintamani, 1650) and Navarasataranga' (Benipravin, 1817) are respectively adaptations of the Sringaramanjari (Sanskrit translation of Akbarshah's Telugu work) and Rasmanjari (Bhanu Misra).

Four dramas were translated or adapted during this period. Malha Kavi (1544) rendered an abridged and free translation of the Prabodhachandrodaya. Kesavdas's Vigyangita (1610) is a partial adaptation of the Prabodhachandrodaya. It also includes matter from the Bhagavata and Bhagavadgita. The Ramagita (1623) of Hridayaram is an adaptation of the Hanumannatak. It is a narrative poem, though divided into fourteen acts, characterised by originality. Shakuntalopakhyan (Newaj, 1670) is another narrative poem dealing with the story of Abhijnanashakuntalam. Madhav Vinod (Somnath Chaturvedi, 1738) is a free translation of the Malati Madhav. Shakuntala Natak (Dhaumkala Misra, 1799), is the first available translation of the Abhijnanshakuntalam. Prabodhachandrodaya was freely translated by many writers, e.g. Jaswant Singh (1643), Anathadas (1669); Surati Misra (1743), Anand (1783), Gulab Singh (1789), and Dhaumkala Misra (1799). Brajavasidas (1759-60) and Nakdas (1789) translated it from the Persian translation. Almost all the translations are in Brajabhasha and in verse, marked by ingenuity. The preference for Prabodha-chandrodaya was due to the spiritual zeal of the authors, especially in the 'Riti'–period when Hindi poetry was dominated by the erotic sentiment.

BHAGAVATA: Translations and Adaptations of the Bhagavata followed in the wake of the great Bhakti movement of the mediaeval period, which was propagated through songs and poetry by saints who rose from amongst the common masses and sang in 'bhasa' (the language of the people). Devotion to Sri Krishna which formed the most important part of the upsurge of this movement was primarily based on the Bhagavata, particularly the Tenth Skandha (Book) and of that too, only the Purvardha (the first half).

To these poets and also to many others belonging to all the sects of the Krishna cult goes the credit of popularising, the 'Lila' of Sri Krishna as told in the Bhagavata. But it fell to the youngest to take up the work of presenting the Dasam Skandha (The Tenth Book) of the Bhagavata in Brajabhasha verse. But the task was perhaps too stupendous for one poet, so Nanddas concluded it after 29 chapters of the Purvardha (First Half) of the Bhagavata. He left the story of the 'Rasa Vihar' (Celestial Dance) at the first of its five chapters. His Dasam Skandha has its roots in the strong 'Pushti Marg', a devotional Vaishnava sect. Vallabhacharya (1478-1530), the great erudite leader of this sect placed the Bhagavata at par with the Upanishadas, the Gita and the Brahmasutra, and wrote a commentary, Subodhini (literally, easy to comprehend) on the Bhagavata.

Many poets of this sect including the great Surdas, wrote lovely lyrics on the theme derived from the Bhagavata. Nanddas has omitted the part of the 'consolation' which is based on the philosophy of non-dualism. While conforming to the views of Vallabhacharya, as contained in his Subodhini, Nanddas also takes into account certain ideas found in the Bhavartha Dipika and the Vaishnava Toshini: the commentaries of the Bhagavata by Sridhara Swami and Jiva Goswami respectively. It appears that Nanddas intended his work to be accepted by, besides his own sect, all the Vaishnava sects in general. Otherwise, he would not have included differing views about 'Nirodha' (restraint) and 'Asraya' (base) as interpreted by Vallabhacharya and Sridhara Swami respectively. Nanddas has generally avoided straying into poetic fancies, but his devotional attitude has betrayed him in a few instances, e.g. elaborate description of the splendour of Mathura in the first chapter.

Dasam Skandha ends at the first chapter of 'Ras Vihar' but the poet takes up this theme in an elaborate manner in an independent work, Rasa Panchadhyayi (Five Chapters of the Celestial Dance), a work in which he is at his poetic best. It is based on chapters 29 to 33 of the Dasam Skandha. There is a marked deviation from the Bhagavata in so far as Nanddas gives free vent to his imaginative devices and his dedication and commitment to the sect. He further expounded this theme in another work, Siddhanta Panchadhyayi (Five Chapters of the Tenets). Based on chapters 46-47 of the Tenth Book, again, he composed the Bhanwar Git (Song of the Bee). Regarded as none-too-ordinary a piece of artistic creation, the work is still mainly concerned with a sort of philosophical discussion between Uddhava and Gopis (the milk-maids) with a view to bring home to the former the futility of following any other path than that of undivided devotion. This work is neither a free translation, nor an adaptation, as such, chapters 52-54 of the 'Uttarardha' (Later Half) of the Dasam Skandha find their independent literary expression in Rukmini Parinaya (Rukmini's Wedding), another work by Nanddas. Despite its literary qualities, the work may be taken as a free adaptation of sorts. Of the aforesaid works of Nanddas, the first is a free versified translation, of course, with a definite sectarian tilt. The rest, excepting Siddhanta Panchadhyayi, may be taken to be free adaptations with a varying degree of looseness in the application of the term. Nanddas was, no doubt, all along closer to the Bhagavata than his elders of the 'Ashtachhap'. He was certainly more conscious of his scholarship.

Religious tradition reckons Surdas (1478-1583) as one of the 'Ashtachhap' group. Likewise, the tradition has gone round that he sang the 'Lila' (Sports) of Sri Krishna in 'Bhasha' in accordance with the Bhagavata. Surdas built his lyrical narration of the 'Lila' on the foundation of and primarily with the material provided by, the Bhagavata. The aesthetically sound structure given to the narrative by the poet could be possible only by adding to the original material and fashioning it anew as an independent artistic unit. Nevertheless, due to a number of factors, stylistic and textual, the true structural form of the narration could not be sufficiently appreciated. The myth that Sur Sagar the collected poetry of Surdas, was a translation of the Bhagavata, with a religious stamp on it found its plausible base when it was given an external appearance of the Purana divided into twelve Skandhas. Manuscript evidence to this effect, however, goes back to the last decade of the 18th century only. It appears that interpolations and additions into the text for the purpose were not made earlier than that. These later additions are descriptive in style, unpoetic in diction and leave an impression that they have been casually done. In order to further strengthen the idea of translation, it has been repeatedly asserted in this descriptive portion that even as 'Vyasa' related the story to Sukadev arranged in twelve Skandhas, so does Surdas, sing in 'Bhasha padas'. These lines, however, do not occur throughout the lyrical narration of the 'Lila', which occupies one-fifth part of the current volume (Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi Edition) of Sur Sagar. This is in contrast with the assertion of the above-mentioned claim though the much smaller part of the work giving it the outward appearance of the Bhagavata occupies a mere one-tenth space of the work. This one-tenth part, however, is important in the sense that it has been responsible for the sanctity of a religious book representing the Bhagavata in Hindi. The deliberate attempt to give this small portion the honour of Sur Sagar in the religious circles, resulted in its being declared 'Translation of All the Twelve Skandhas of Shrimadbhagavata. That this form of Sur Sagar replaced the more reliable and much earlier form, obviously more akin to its original version, despite the latter having been printed and published as early as 1843, shows how powerful the desire to associate the greatest poet of the Krishna-lore with the Puranas has been.

The Bhagavata was more or less the primary fountain-head of the devotion to Krishna. But the school of Bhakti, adhering to the devotion of Rama, also shows its lasting impact. In fact, the synthesis of Jnan (Knowledge), Karma (Action i.e. the ritualistic worship) and Bhakti (devotion), with an unmistakable supremacy of the last, as propounded by Tulsidas, the most powerful exponent of the devotion to Rama, was in greater conformity with the Bhagavata advocated by Surdas or for that matter, any exponent of the devotion-cult. The Ramacharitmanas of Tulsidas, being very close to the Bhagavata in thought and spirit has tended to serve as an easy substitute for the Bhagavata, in so far as its recitation in religious sessions is concerned. But, in spite of this and the numerous borrowings found in the Ramacharitmanas from the Puranas, the former cannot come under the category of an adaptation in any sense of the term.

In view of the deep impact of the Bhagavata in general and its Tenth Skandha in particular on the life of the people of the Hindi region, it looks strange that no translation of the great Purana commanding general repute and respect was undertaken until at least the 19th century, if not the 20th. In this context, the versified translation of Tenth Skandha by Lalachdas Halwai belonging to Rai-Bareilly in 1530 assumes some importance. The author had no pretensions, literary or religious, and that seems to be the reason of its remaining obscure and in oblivion, though it caught the eye of foreigners and it was translated into French. Another versified translation of the Tenth Skandha into Brajabhasha entitled Prem-Sagar was made by one Chaturbhuj Misra in 1567. This, too, could come into light as late as the 19th century through the East India Company. Yet another translation of the same Skandha into Brajabhasha verse was made by Maniram Misra of Kannauj in 1772. None of these translations made any impact either in literary or in religious circles.

Prabhudatt Brahmachari had started bringing out a series entitled Bhagavati Katha (Story of the Blessed) in 1940 from his own publishing house, Samkirtan Bhavan, Jhusi, Allahabad (U.P.). So far, 118 volumes have come out. Of these first 68 are based on the stories from the Bhagavata and the following 50 on the Gita, the Upanishads and the Brahmasutras. This is an on-going series, in which the Bhagavata has been placed at the top. The 68 volumes dealing with the stories from the Bhagavata are the only learned and elaborate expositions of the subject matter in the rambling and popularly interesting style of the Vyasas (preachers). The author has, however, brought out two volumes entitled Bhagavata Charit in Brajabhasa which is in verse, a free adaptation of the Purana with a difference in so far as the author leaves an imprint of his own religious personality on it. The book has gained a wide popularity. Its first edition was published in 1950. The story of Rama occurring in the Ninth Skandha and the story of Krishna from the Tenth Skandha have also been separately brought out by the author, their titles being Raghavendra charit and the Sri Krishnacharit respectively. MAHABHARATA: With the passage of time, Sanskrit slipped out of the reach of the common man in the Hindi speaking region and the mediaeval Hindi scholars and writers, therefore, tried to bring the epics and other outstanding works, including the Mahabharata in verse for the benefit of the common man. They aimed at aesthetic pleasure combined with enlightenment. Vishnudas (1435) narrated briefly in verse and in Brajabhasha the story of the Mahabharata in his Mahabharata Katha– Swargarohan and Swargarohanparva. These works do not possess much literary merit nor do they have much popular appeal. At best, their merit lies in preparing the linguistic and literary ground for future literary activity of poets. Dharmadas also worte his Mahabharata (1607-1654) in verse. It is a Hindi version of the Mahabharata story meant for the a common reader. Many writers rendered only partial adaptations and translations of the Mahabharata. These include Sundardas (Viratparva, 1624), Man Singh (Ashwamedhparva, 1635), Sripati (Karnaparva, 1622), Kulpati (Dronparva Sangramasara 1676), Ramnath (Adiparva, 1783), Bhavanidas (Ashwamedhparva, 1820) and Basant Singh (Bhishmaparva 1843).

Sabal Singh Chauhan's Mahabharata (1661-1724) is the most popular and outstanding adaptation of the Mahabharata in Hindi. The author devoted almost his whole life to the rendering of this work. It is written in Brajabhasha. The metrical forms used are 'Doha' and 'Chaupai'. It is divided into 'Parvas' but their sub-division into 'Adhyayas' has been discarded. It lacks poetic excellence but has been very popular due to its vivid descriptions and simple and forceful expression. Guru Gobind Singh (1666-1707) had very high regards for the Mahabharata. He got it translated by his court-poets Kumaresh, Mangal, Hansaram and others. But much of it was lost in adverse circumstances during his own life time.

However, the loss was made up later by scholars under the patronage of the rulers of Patiala (1813-76). The manuscripts of the translation are available in Gurumukhi script and the language used is Brajabhasha interspersed with Punjabi.

The modern period of Hindi literature is an age of prose writing. This characteristic applies to the adaptations and translations of the Mahabharata also. However, there are some exceptions, e.g. Alha Mahabharata (Naval Singh Kayasth, 1855), Alha Mahabharata (Gangasahay Gaur, 1898) and Sangit Mahabharata (Natharam Sharma, 1924). They appear to be inspired by the popular appeal of the folk songs. These adaptations are of only historical importance. The Jaya Bharata of Maithilisharan Gupta is a piecemeal adaptation of the Mahabharata. Selected episodes of the epic are unified so as to shape it into the form of a long narrative poem. The Hindi Mahabharata (Aliahabad, 1915) of Ramnaresh Tripathi, Mahabharata (Calcutta, 1927) of Umadatt Sharma and Sankshipta Mahabharata (Lucknow, 1939) of Suryakant Tripathi 'Nirala' present in simple prose the Mahabharata story in a more or less condensed form. Two brief adaptations, though not original, deserve mention. The Mahabharata (Allahabad, 1927) by Mahavirprasad Dwivedi and Bharatiya Yuddha (Poona, 1913) by Lakshmidhar Vajpeyi are respectively Hindi versions of Bengali (Surendranath Thakur) and Marathi (Dattatreya Gopal Limave) works.

Bhagavadgita with Shankara Bhashya (Harikrishna Das Goenka, Gorakhpur, 1931); Bhagavadgita with Ramanuja Bhashya (Harikrishna Das Goenka, Gorakhpur, 1947); Bhagavadgita with Gudharthadipika of Madhusudan Saraswati (Calcutta, 1949) and Bhagavadgita (Jaya-Dayal Goenka, Gorakhpur, 1956). The first two and the last one, published by the Gita Press, are very popular and widely circulated.

Thus the various adaptations and translations of the Mahabharata in full or in parts have made the average Hindi reader familiar with the contents of the national epic. We find a gradual change from Brajabhasha to 'Khariboli' Hindi and from the verse to the prose form. Reprints of various published editions are indicative of their popular appeal.

RAMAYANA: The Ramayana is a popular epic and ornate poetry at the same time. Its popularity is evident from the fact that the people are widely familiar with the story and the characters of the great epic. Valmiki has depicted the glorious deeds and character of Rama as a man par excellence, and queen consort Sita who is respected and regarded as the ideal of conjugal fidelity. It is due to the aesthetic, didactic and religious values of the Ramayana that many talented Hindi poets of the mediaeval and modern period, have drawn their materials from it and worked them up anew. Others have adapted and translated it into Hindi in order to acquaint the common reader with the contents of the epic written in classical Sanskrit.

Most of the mediaeval writers preferred to use verse form for a variety of reasons. Rajasthani, Brajabhasha or modern Hindi prose was not so well-developed as to enable them to express their ideas adequately. On the other hand, Brajabhasha had established itself as a powerful and effective medium of poetic expression. Moreover, the translators wanted to retain in their compositions, the poetic effect of the original Ramayana to the maximum possible extent. Vishnudas's Ramayanakatha (1442) is the first available adaptation of the Ramayana in Hindi. Written in Brajabhasha and 'Doha-Chaupai' style, it deals with the deeds of Rama from his incarnation to his 'Swargarohana' (departure to his celestial abode). The poet was a Vaishnava influenced by the Bhakti movement of his times. His approach, therefore, is devotional. He has not exactly followed the pattern of Valmiki. He has divided his narrative into only three Kandas (Sections—Bala, Sundar and Uttar) instead of seven, and further sub-divided them into eighteen 'Sargas' (Cantos) as against the six hundred forty-five of the Ramayana. The Ramayanakatha, though a long narrative poem, lacks the merits of an epic and its poetic excellence. Its importance lies only in presenting the subject matter of the Ramayana in a language which could easily be understood by the people. The Ramacharitmanas (Tulsidas, 1574) and the Ramachandrika (Kesavdas, 1601) should not be deemed as translations or adaptations of the Ramayana. They are original works of the respective gifted poets. Of course, they are primarily based on the theme of Valmiki's epic. Kapur Chand has briefly described the story of the exploits of Rama (Ramayana Bhasha, 1643) as depicted in the Ramayana. The great grand-son of Lal Kavi wrote his Valmiki-Ramayana Slokarthaprakash (1800) in Hindi with a view to making the epic accessible to the common man. Santosh Singh (*Ramayana,*1833) and Harinam (Ramayana, 1837) rendered Hindi versions of the Ramayana in Brajabhasha verse. (Ramarasayan Ramayana 1828); ascribed to Padmakar, the well known poet of the Riti-period, is another adaptation of the Ramayana. Though without much excellence, it is characterised by the use of various metrical forms, fluency of diction and use of Sanskrit in benedictory stanzas and in concluding verses on the pattern of Tulsidas's Ramacharitmanas. The Valmiki Ramayana Bhasha (Varanasi, 1847) edited by Vishwanath Pathak is a Brajabhasha prose translation of the Ramayana which appeared towards the end of the mediaeval period.

During the modern period, many writers followed the trend of verse-rendering, e.g., Giridhardas, father of the celebrated poet Bharatendu Harishchandra (Valmiki- Ramayana 1853); Ishwariprasad (Ramvilasaramayana 1865); Naval Singh Kayasth (Alha Ramayana, 1865) and Maheshdatt (Ramayana 1873). We also have a short adaptation (Ramayana 1966) by Byohar Rajendra Singh which presents the story of the Ramayana in a condensed form.

BHAGAVATA: While the interest of people as well as poets in the Ramayana and Mahabharata was partly literary and partly ethical or religious in the medieval period, it was wholly religious with regard to the Bhagavata. The Bhagavata came to be looked upon as the supreme scripture of Hindu theistic religion, as a result of the writings of Vaishnava Acharyas like Ramanuja and Madhva. These Acharyas had brought the message of theistic religion to the doors of the masses by encouraging them to participate actively in the recitations of poems, songs and musical pieces glorifying the greatness of Lord Krishna. Listening to a story of the Lord's Lila, or even a repetition of his name in full faith and devotion, was held to be sufficient to save one's soul and remove all sin. This new wave of popular Vaishnavism broke the barriers of caste, creed and language and its reflection in Kannada literature is but natural.

The first Kannada adaptation of the Bhagavata is again in the Satpadi stanza-form popularised by Kumaravyasa. The author's name appears in the colophons variously as Sadanda-yati, Nityatma-Sukayogi and Catu-Vitthalanatha. While some scholars hold these as alternate names of a single poet, others have thought that the work is a compilation by two or three authors. The date of the work is usually held to be the first part of the 16th century. The work is voluminous, consisting of 12,247 stanzas divided into 280 sections and inclusive of all the twelve books (Skandhas) of the original. The author dwells at length on the prefatory story of King Parikshit destined to die early of snake bite for his sin of insulting a sage in Yogic trance; and of his listening to the glory of the Lord from Sage Suka to cleanse himself of sin. The scope of the Purana is vast enough to cover all the ten incarnations of Lord Vishnu and stories of several devotees of Vishnu-Jaya-Vijaya, Dhruva, Prahlada, Puranjana, Priyavrata, Jadabharata, Ajamila, Gajendra, Balindra, Ambarisa, Bhagiratha, Madalasa, Kuchela etc. as well as inimical demons such as Hiranyaksa, Hiranyakasipu, Vritrasura etc. who choose to die at his hands to attain early liberation from the trammels of samsara or mundane existence and transmigration. Yet, the vital centre of the Purana is Krishna himself who is depicted as a complete manifestation of the supreme Lord. Two whole books (IV and X) are entirely devoted to his career from his birth to his disappearance stressing how he indulged in variegated sports including gopivastrapaharana and rasakrida to relieve the stress of the over burdened Earth. The poet is successful in narrating the story in easy verse and also in summarising the Vedantic teachings embodied in the original. But its poetry does not rise to the heights of the other sister epics in Kannada except in passages imbued with devotional fervour. Its popularity also is comparatively less for this reason. But its merit lies in making the sacred story easily available to the religious-minded people at large. Its influence on the musical pieces of Haridasas is noteworthy.

The first significant abridgement of the Bhagavata in good Kannada prose is Bhagavatamrita by Venkatesh Kulkarni Galaganatha (1869-1942). It omits much of the details relating to philosophy, and sticks to the main narrative of Krishna and Vishnu's incarnations; it includes also some episodes illustrating the Lord's Grace in relieving the distress of his devotees. An abridged translation of the Bhagavata in the same decade appeared from the religious trust at Agadi (Dist. Dharwad 1919), which was wider in coverage. A more comprehensive and unexpurgated translation of it in nine volumes was brought out by Motaganahalli Ramashesha Sastri. It is at once scholarly and precise, but not attractive in style. The most popular translation of the Purana however, is again of Devasikhamani Alasingrachar. Without curtailment of the text or elaboration, the translation maintains an even flow of narrative, involved sometimes in elaborate of description, but otherwise simple and elegant. An abridged version of the story in simpler prose is Subodha M. Rama Rao's Srimadbhagavatakathasara. But a complete text-cum-commentary in prose embodying the findings of the Madhva tradition is had only in Ghuli Krishnamurtyacharya's Shribhagavatamrita.

Three successful literary attempts to give the highlights of Bhagavata in striking modern prose deserve notice here. The first is K. Venkataramappa's Vachana-Bhagavata; the second is T.S. Shama Rao's work of the same name; the third is Janapriya-Bhagavata by Srinivasa Udupa. T.S. Shama Rao has written a supplementary volume, exposing in detail the teachings of Krishna to Uddhava, entitled Sri Krishnana Kadeya Sandesha.

No significant attempts have been made in verse in the modern period to recount the Bhagavata, which appears a bit unusual when compared with the numerous attempts at verse versions of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. Stray episodes only have found versifiers, which are merely of academic interest and cannot be considered here. Laksmisa's Jaimini-Bharata written in the medieval period in satpadi became very popular and served as a poetic tribute to Vishnu-bhakti with several anecdotes and weaned away poets as it were from attempting the massive Bhagavata with its intractable philosophy.

MAHABHARATA: The first great or major poet of Kannada literature is Pampa, the Jaina poet of the 10th century; and his masterpiece is Vikramarjunavijaya or Pampabharata, (Bangalore, 1977) a classical champu-kavya at its best. This work has inspired many a later poet. But Pampa was neither a translator nor a mere adapter of Vyasa's great epic; he was more of a creative innovator. His Jaina tradition made him underplay the role of Krishna; and his eulogistic intent to equate his patron-king Arikesari with the war-hero of the epic made him depict Arjuna, instead of Vyasa's Dharmaraja, as the hero of his epic. His secular interest and rationalistic mind would not allow him to make Draupadi a common wife of all the Pandava brothers; she is shown as the wedded wife of only Arjuna. Apart from such radical differences from Vyasa's original, his poetic temperament depicts even villains like Karna and Duryodhana in a new light where they become noble and lofty in their own way. All this must have been frowned upon by conventionalists; and though it was applauded by scholars, it remained mostly beyond the reach of common men.

The Vijayanagar kingdom saw an upsurge of literary activity on the part of poets who wanted to reach the masses and who strove to hold up as models the cultural and religious values treasured in the Sanskrit epics in an indigenous style which easily lent itself to musical recitation. In the evolution of Kannada metres, the advent of hexameter or Satpadi as a major instrument, especially Bhamini-satpadi, saw the rise of masterpoets like Kumaravyasa and Camarasa in this period. As historians of Kannada literature have observed Kumaravyasa is almost the herald of a new epoch in Kannada poetry. His work, Karnataka-Bharata-katha-manjari (Bangalore, 1958) more popularly known as Kumaravyasa-bharata or Gadugina Bharata (16 cent.) is a landmark in the world of Kannada letters, combining as it does poetic perfection with religious inspiration. Written at Gadag (District: Dharwad) in the 15th-16th century, it soon acquired popularity throughout the Kannada-speaking country, unequalled by any poet before or after him.

Kumaravyasa could complete only the first ten Parvas of the original Mahabharata; the other Parvas were completed by Timmanna Kavi under Krishnadevaraya, Bangalore, 1979. Like Kumara Valmiki, Timmanna Kavi also pays encomiums to Kumaravyasa. While the first (Kumaravyasa-bharata) is great poetry by all standards, a comparison with others shows how it was a model rarely equalled by later writers in spite of their scholarship and talent.

Kumaravyasa is a devotee of Vyasa and never introduces any major changes in the story. His purpose is merely a representation of the original story with minimum poetic embellishments. He has also the religious fervour that tends to emphasise the divine element in Krishna's achievements; and so he introduces various popular themes where Krishna's boundless grace is illustrated. Episodes like Durvasatithya, Krishna-dautya and Visvarupadarsana are depicted so movingly that they draw large audiences even today when recited by experts in the traditional art of gamaka. The verse account of Kumaravyasa is so dramatic and successful that attempts have been made to present it in a dramatic form on the stage. The poet's genius is seen in his accounts of bumptious heroes like Bhima as well as tender love-scenes as in the case of Urvashi and Arjuna. He is a master in the depiction of popular rasas, viz. Vira, Shringara and Adbhuta, which fills his work with an abiding human interest for all time. He excels in the description of nature and building up of the required epic atmosphere. What is most striking in him, however, is his entirely original wealth of vocabulary and brilliant imagery. He is a master of metaphor and the language in his hands acquires new dimensions. His characters are deeply human; all the heroes except the divine Krishna, are shown often to have human foibles too. These merits of his outweigh his defects like prolixity and effusiveness and make his work dear to the hearts of the young and old alike, refreshingly free as it is from pedantic exercises. A modern prose version of it has appeared recently (Bangalore, 1976). The Sahitya Akademi published an abridged version of this work in 1972.

Timmanna Kavi's supplement appears like a candle beside the dazzling radiance of Kumaravyasa's Kannada epic. Its mood also is subdued shanta or quietude; and we have long accounts of the consolation offered by elders to the dejected Dharmaraja after the horrors of the Mahabharata war. Its interest is mostly didactic and religious, and poetic fervour is scarce.

The Mysore rulers encouraged the rise of Kannada prose by assigning the task of writing in prose a Kannada version of the Mahabharata to scholars in the court in the last century. This work was first printed in 1890 in the name of Krishnaraja Wodeyar, Mysore, 1890 and its style suffers from all the defects incidental to a mechanical translation attempting to retain the syntactic structure of Sanskrit in Kannada.

As in the case of the Ramayana, in the translation of the Mahabharata also, Alasingrachar's attempt presents a marked improvement (Madras, 1912 and 1933). His style is more racy. He has given a close and compact translation of every verse in Vyasa's original as found in the Southern edition. It catered to the interests of the religious-minded public who were many in the twenties and thirties of this century, when the volume serially appeared; and it also saw quite a few reprints.

An equally noteworthy attempt at an abridged adaptation of the work in forceful Kannada in a single volume is by Venkatesh Kulkarni Galaganatha. It is called the Mahabharata (Haveri, 1933). The author was an experienced novelist of the time; and his style was appealing to the public at large, especially because of his use of folk-idioms current in North Karnataka dialect.

One of the most outstanding adaptations of the critically edited text of the Mahabharata in a very homely and chaste Kannada is the Vachana Bharata of the late A.R. Krishna Shastri (Mysore, 1950). He has shown an all too rare discernment in respect of selecting the most crucial portions of the text and eliminating all extraneous accumulations of a later time. He adopted a literary perspective without offence to scholarship, to make his prose as lively as the spoken word, rich with homely adages and apophthegms. His scintillating style, with short and sweet epigrams, makes one feel that the story is originally written in Kannada itself. He compresses five Parvas describing the battle to a bare fifty pages. He has avoided meticulously all repetition in which the original abounds. It is a model in precision, distilling at the same time and retaining the quitessence of the original in a memorable form. Krishna Shastri has shown how a master of modern prose could rewrite on an old theme; no wonder that it has been very appreciatively received and has seen several reprints.

Finding that even his abridged work was above the reach of children who love stories, Shastri composed a children's illustrated version of the epic, and called it Nirmala-Bharati (1960) named after his two grandchildren. Printed in thick type and brought out with taste, this booklet became a treasured possession of the children of Karnataka. He published these books on his own and enriched the language he loved so dearly.

At about the same time appeared adaptations of the first two Parvas of the epic by Bellave Narahari Shastri, who was a writer of puranic plays for the stage. These are more or less conventional in form as well as content.

A project to translate the whole epic was launched by a firm in Hubli. (1957); it started with the publication of parts of the first parva itself. Hence the success of a similar project by Bharata-darshana Prakashan, (Bangalore, 1972) deserves more than passing notice. They are attempting not only a literal translation of the whole epic, but also giving liberal commentary on the select significant verses of the original. They have successfully completed twentyone out of thirty volumes. This dedicated work of a team of traditional scholars deserves a word of appreciation.

Among others, two versions of the epic meant for children deserve mention here: One is Bala Mahabharata by I.M. Muttanna, (Bangalore, 1979) in easy blank verse and the other is Bala Mahabharata in easy quatrains by Narayanarao Talikote, (Raichur, 1980).

RAMAYANA: Though the Jaina version of the Ramayana is as old as Nagachandra's Pamparamayana (1150) which is in a classical champu style in Kannada and which is noteworthy as much for its Old Kannada style as for its original presentation of characters like Ravana (who is almost a tragic hero here), we have to wait till the Vijaynagara period for the advent of a complete adaptation of the Ramayana in Kannada. The doyen of medieval epic poets in Kannada satpadi stanza form is by all standards Kumaravyasa who wrote the Bharata-katha-manjari in Gadag, a little earlier than Kumaravalmiki who wrote the Torave Ramayana (Torave is a place name in Bijapur District) in about 1500. Kumaravyasa observes in the beginning of his work: "Even Adisesa is .smarting under the weight of Ramayana poets; their works are so numerous that we are in a wilderness where it is impossible even to step in"

This observation refers only to the numerous plays, poems etc. based on the Ramayana written in Sanskrit and perhaps also to various other Ramayanas in Sanskrit and not to literary attempts in Kannada.

It has been conjectured that the proper name of the poet might have been Naraharil; however the fact remains that the poet has nowhere given any autobiographical details. Throughout the poem we find that the author is steeped in his devotion to Rama which was at its highwater-mark in Karnataka at the time, thanks to the teachings of religious saints of different orders. The poet has no doubt that Rama is the incarnation of Vishnu while Sita that of goddess Lakshmi. He begins the work devotedly stating that he is recounting the story in Kannada of what was originally related by Lord Shiva to his consort Parvati. At the outset he pays his tributes to the great Acharya Madhava whose tradition he proudly upholds. He shared with the religious public of his day the faith that even a mere chanting of the name Rama was holy and meritorious. A recitation of or listening to a recitation of it even in part, if not wholly, is conducive to infinite grace of the Lord. With this faith nurtured in the masses for well over four centuries, the Torave Ramayana remained a sacred and holy poem near and dear to the hearts of the people at large. The folk-theatre of Yakshagana made use of its sonorous verses while enacting devotional episodes from the Ramayana, supplemented by songs of local singers. Even folk-plays devised in the present century, especially in South Kanara District bear witness to this abiding popularity of Kumara Valmiki's poem.

Kumara Valmiki is first a devoted Vaishnava and then a poet. He skips detailed poetical descriptions in Valmiki's original or condenses them to a minimum. His eye is on the continuous narrative replete with incidents illustrating the boundless grace of Lord Rama, even on errant enemies who fight with him only to be blessed by him. This is true not only of ordinary demons like Atikaya but of the arch-enemy Ravana himself! Ravana realises at the end that Rama is none other than the Supreme Lord Vishnu and hastens to die at his hands with a view to joining him in 'Vaikuntha' early. This is the tradition inherited by the poet form Vaishnava Puranas. Ravana is blessed with the sight of Rama's Visvarupa or omniform immediately before his end.

The influence of this new Puranic tradition is seen also in some of the innovations introduced by the Kannada poet. Ravana is described as one of the suitors present at the time of Sita's 'swayamvara' or choice of a husband. He failed miserably and the seed of jealousy against the successful Rama sprouts in his heart. Manthara who eggs on Kaikeyi to demand the two boons so unexpectedly from the old Dasaratha is a veritable incarnation of the Lord's Maya or inscrutable and delusive power. Sambuka performing penance setting aside his ineligibility is Surpanakha's son and his slaughter by Laksmana during a hunting excursion makes the mother angry against the exiled brothers; and her wrath. Thus the motivation for Surpanakha's anger against Sita is made stronger here.

What, however, strikes the reader most is the high encomium heaped on Hanuman throughout the poem. Following the hints given by Madhavacharya in Bharata–tatparya, the exploits of the messenger Hanuman are made to outshine those of others; and Hanuman is shown as being rewarded with the supreme status of the next Creator for all his services at the close of the work. That is why the poem gives almost the same space to the Yuddhakanda as that given to all the earlier kandas put together. While all this adds up to the high estimation of the work by a religious public, it comes low in the eyes of modern critics who seek broad humanist values and round characters. His poetry does not rise to the heights either of Kumaravyasa or Laksmisa in the power of poetic images or lilt of language. It is sometimes lively, but often pedestrian and revels in the supernatural most of the time. Yet its hold on popular imagination cannot be gainsaid; and it is mostly due to its religious atmosphere carefully built up to highlight the glory of the Supreme Lord on earth as Rama. Though the story is substantially Valmiki's it has been touched up to meet Puranic purpose. Its success can be gauged by the woeful neglect other works of the kind suffered in later times, such as Venkamatya's Ramayana in verse.

The dawn of modern prose in the 19th century heralded a royal attempt to translate Valmiki's epic in Kannada. King Chamaraja with his scholars at court prepared and his heirs got printed a prose version which is only of historical interest today. Its prose was so cumbersome and involved that a refined version of the same has been published recently (1967).

The first sustained attempt at a readable and racy translation of all the books of the Ramayana without taking liberties with the original is that of Alasingrachar (1877-1940). It ran into several editions and was often used in parts as textbook for Kannada in schools. The author's style is less pedantic and the story runs with an even flow. It was designed with the common reader in view. It was published in seven volumes to reach subscribers and soon the parts went out of print. Its impact on modern Kannada prose is worth recording.

Virakesari Sitarama Shastri who was a journalist scholar of repute tried his hand at a Kannada version of the Ramayana in five parts during the late fifties (1958-63). His style is more forceful and literary than Alasingrachar's. But soon they too became rare.

Perhaps the best and most successful adaptation of the epic is the Ramavatara (1965-66) by Siddavvanahalli Krishna Sharma. His three volume adaptation portrays the story vividly and colourfully in a style at once refreshing and crisp. It omits long descriptive portions in the Sanskrit original and retells the story engagingly.

Kuvempu's Janapriya Valmiki Ramayana (1950) is another abridged adaptation of the epic story designed for adult literates. We find the master of modern Kannada hero restaining the refreshing vocabulary of the original when they are readily understandable by a layman. It is indeed a successful exercise in its own way.

The latest and most successful complete translation of Valmiki's epic in prose is that of C.N. Srinivasa Iyengar in two sumptuous volumes (1973). A Professor of Mathematics, this author combines precision with naturalness of Kannada expression; and does not fight shy of retaining the original syntax when it does not offend the Kannada ear.

As already indicated, a number of verse abridgements of parts of the Ramayana were attempted by different public imagination over the whole land. Combining religious zeal with literary sensibility, quite a few pundits have given prose translations of the Sundarakanda in particular. The latest and best of these is by N. Ranganatha Sharma (1964) with a foreword by D.V. Gundappa.

Apart from these, there have been some noteworthy attempts at giving abridged versions of the Ramayana story in easy flowing verse designed for children exclusively. The best among them is the Bala-Ramayana by Narayana Rao Talikote (1975-79). They can be sung also. The other important Ramayanas are: Pamparamayana, Kannada Sahitya Parishat, Bangalore, 1921; Kumaravyasa-bharata, (ed.) Kuvempu and Masti Venkatesha Iyengar, Development of Literature and Culture Dept., Mysore Govt., Bangalore. 1958; Torave Ramayana, (ed.) N. Basavaradhya, Vol. I, Oriental Research Institute publication, Mysore, 1956, Vol. II, 1958; Chamarajokti-vilasa, Vol. I-VIII, 1894-1896; Valmiki Ramayana, Vols. I-VII, 1911-1913; Janapriya Valmiki Ramayana, Kuvempu, Mysore, 1950.

KASHMIRI

Sanskrit has played a key role in the formative stage of Kashmiri language. It owes the tradition of Vakh 'Vatsun' Epic, Pad and marriage songs to Sanskrit. In fact in the earliest phase of the Kashmiri language Sanskrit served as a source of inspiration for the language and literature. In its Prakrit stage Kashmiri is so akin to Sanskrit that it is very difficult to differentiate between the two. Mahanay Prakash, the earliest written manuscript available in Kashmiri in the 13th century, has almost 60 percent words in its text which have their origin in Sanskrit. The 'Vakhs' of Lal Ded (14th century) also fall into this category.

Bhat Avtar, a renowned scholar, poet and musicologist and a courtier of the king Budshah, who hailed from Lar (Ganderbal) adapted the first story from Sanskrit into Kashmiri. The story he selected for Kashmiri version is Banasur Vadhakatha which he took from Hari Vamsha Purana which is a supplement to world famous epic the Mahabharata.

This long descriptive poem is the versified form of the love story of Usha and Aniruddha. Sri Krishna, the hero of the Mahabharata plays a leading role in the development and furtherance of this story. It is Bhler who for the first time made a mention of this poem in his book In Search of Sanskrit Manuscripts in 19th century. The only available manuscript of Banasur Vadhakatha is at present preserved in Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, Pune. This poem is yet to be seen through the press and only a few portions of it have appeared in the press.

Banasur Vadhakatha has indisputable importance in the linguistic evaluation of the language. Recognising its importance the State Department of Research and Publications has obtained a micro film of the manuscript to cater to the need of the research scholars and linguists. The language of Banasur Vadhakatha is very close to the language of the Mahanay Prakash.

The Mahabharata constituted the base of many more translations and adaptations into Kashmiri. Another epoch-making attempt in this direction is the translation of the Mahabharata itself. In the eighteenth century the Mahabharata was translated into Kashmiri by some unknown poet; thus the tradition of epic in Kashmiri ownes its origin to Sanskrit and not Persian. The versified version of the great epic is partly preserved in the research library of Kashmir University. The numbers given on the top of the chapters indicate that the poet had rendered it in full in Kashmiri. The available portion of this translation has not been printed so far. G.G.D. Hajini (b. 1917) has published the chapter 288 of the epic in his book Kashir Shayiri which he compiled for the Sahitya Akademi and was published in 1959.

Another important adaptation from Sanskrit is the story of Nala-Damayanti by Bulbul Nagami (b. 1812; d. 1900). This story is included in the Vanaparva chapter of the Mahabharata. Bulbul has presented this story in the form of a masnavi. His Masnavi has only a few parallels in Kashmiri language. It has been published partialiy and its complete manuscript is yet to be published. It enjoyed great popularity in the past and hand-written copies of this manuscript were purchased at handsome rates. The author has not altered the original story at all. But his style of compositon has made it a peerless piece of poetry. Nala-Damayanti will make him a poet of all times to come, though Bulbul has many more things to his credit.

A drama based on an episode of the Mahabharata is Draupdi Laj written by Tarachand Bismil (b. 1904, d. 1948). The story of this drama has been taken from the Sabhaparva of the epic. It is that very episode which has been versified by Subramaniam Bharati (Tamil poet) under the caption Draupdi Shaptam.

The Mahabharata has been the sole source of inspiration to Bismil. His drama Preamich Kahvat (The Touchstone of Love) is based on another story of the same epic. Based on the Mahaprasthan Parva this drama has some thing peculiar to communicate.

The story of Satyavan and Savitri has been versified by Anand Bhat. It is the story of Harish Chandra which has been tackled by a number of Kashmiri poets and dramatists. This story is the base of two earliest written Kashmiri dramas Satich Kahavat by Nand Lal Koul (b. 1877 and Satichvath by Tarachand Bismal. Others who versified the story include Balak Ram Bhat (b. 1894, d. 1929) and Anand Bhat of Katraso (Kulgam). Some portions of Anand Bhat's versified vesion of Harish Chandra appeared in weekly Chaman in 1971-73.

It took him eight years to translate it in to Kashmiri. There are versions of the Ramayana by Prakash Ram (b. 1819, d. 1879). Shankar Nath (d. 1870). Anand Ram (d. 1889), Vishnu Koul, (d. 1918), Amar Nath (d. 1908). But Sarma's Ramayana alone is close to the original Sanskrit version of this epic. So far as the other versions are concerned we cannot class them as translations. The authors have taken the central theme from Valmiki's version and have made additions and in accordance with their choice.

Others who benefited from Sanskrit literature include Paramananda and Manju Attar (d. 1964). Paramananda based his Sudama-Charit and Radha Svayamvara on Bhagavta Purana and Manju Attar too based his Krishna Avtar Charit and Rukmini Mangal, on Bhagavata Purana itseif.

BHAGAVATA: has been the source of inspiration for Krishna bhakta poets of Kashmiri language for the last three hundred years or so. Although it has not been translated in full, yet its impact and influence on the life and culture of Kashmiri Pandits is undeniable. It is necessary to mention here that it is the 10th and 11th books of the Bhagavata Purana which have mostly attracted the attention of Krishna bhaktas of Kashmir.

The influence of the Bhagavata Purana is evident on old songs which indicate that Bhagavata-dharma had made its way in Kashmir prior to the formative stage of Kashmiri language. It is this influence which is manifest in the form of marriage songs of Kashmiri Pandits long ago. The Puranic theme of Krishna legend is the dominant theme of marriage and dance songs of Kashmiri Pandits. In these songs Krishna is none other then Vishnu, Rukmini is his consort, the name of Radha has not been mentioned in the old songs anywhere. This fact is enough to indicate that marriage songs of Kashmiri Pandits are older than the written and recorded literature. These songs have undergone various changes but have retained the essence of the Puranic theme. It is Krishna, the incarnation of Vishnu, who is the dominating spirit of such songs. These old songs also make it clear that in the last phase of Hindu rule monistic saiva cult was yielding its place to Bhagavata dharma gradually.

Sahib Koul (17th century) was a thinker, seer and Sanskrit scholar of his age. He is the first Kashmiri poet to give expression to his Krishna-bhakti in his book Krishna Avtar Charit (The Life of Lord Krishna). It has been stated that his long narrative was the free rendering of the Krishna's life as depicted in the Bhagavata Purana. This long poem was a milestone of Krishna bhakti poetry in Kashmiri, but it is not available now.

Krishna Avtar Lila (The Play of Krishna) is another long poem depicting the life and exploits of the Lord. The central theme of the poem is to present Krishna as the Lord of the universe. The devotional element of the poem has given a deeper meaning to it. The poem has been composed in the metre of 'pad' and its refrain has given this long poem the sweetness of a lyric. This poem is a composition of Prakash Ram. It is written in four line stanzas and contains 2334 verses. This poem was published by the Royal Asiatic Society in Devanagari script some 55 years back, but is now accessible easily.

Parmananda is the greatest of all the Krishna bhakta poets of Kashmir. The major portion of his poetry is devoted to the various aspects of the life of the lord. His main and unforgettable compositions are those which depict the life and expliots of Krishna.

Krishna Avtar Lila is a fascinating and lovely long poem depicting the childhood of the Lord. Though based on the 'puranic' theme the poem is the poetic expression of intense feelings of the poet. Short melodious and lovely poems inserted in the narrative have a soothing and refreshing effect. These short poems are nearer in spirit to the poems of Surdas and Mirabai. The very opening lines of this poem infuse confidence and hope in the reader:

Your birth has removed the hanging cloud of misery and darkness

A brighter day has dawned in the world,
Hail to thee, victory be thy lot, O Devaki's beloved son all hail!

The characters and episodes included in the Bhagavata Purana form the core of this sweet song. Nanda, Yasoda and Gopis play an important role in the poem. The death of Putana, Kalinaga and tricks of Kansa to kill Krishna have been fully described with poetic vigour and skill.

The description of pranks and mischiefs of young Krishna written in four line stanzas and a refrain after every three lines has made this poem an epitome of sweetness. One who is conversant with the legend of Krishna of the Bhagavata will not fail to derive inspiration from it. Radha Svyamvara is the best specimen of Krishna bhakti of Kashmiri. This long poem is the joint composition of Paramananda and Bulbul Nagami. The composers have made the love of Gopis (Cowherd girls) the theme of the poem. The wandering of the Lord in the forest, stealing of the garments of the Gopis, his playing on the flute and other connected events have been dealt with in detail in the poem. In this poem Radha-Krishna bhakti finds its expression for the first time. The dominating role assigned to Radha in this poem is the only variation in this long melodious poem from The Bhagavata Purana. There is hardly any mention of Rukmini in the poem. In this way the Kashmiri poets too have relegated her to the background like all other poets of Madhura Bhava School.

Krishan Razdan is basically a poet of Shiva bhakti but his eighteen compositions depicting the Bhagavata theme of Krishna are a prized treasure of Kashmiri literature. These sweet poems depict Krishna as a lover of Gopis and the emancipator and liberator of humanity. He is all grace and love. He is the uprooter of injustice and tyranny.

Manjoo Attar (d. 1969) is another important poet of Krishna bhakti school. He versified the life, adventures and exploits of the Lord in his thrilling and melodious Masnavi Krishna Avtar in the third decade of the present century. This long masnavi is not the translation of the Purana but the adaptation of the theme, which has been expressed in poetic idiom.

Other poets who have contributed to the exposition of the 'Puranic' theme of Krishna's life include Bhaskar Razdan (d. 1964), Prem Nath Premi (b. 1922), P.N. Koul Sail (b. 1930), Moti Lal Saqi (b. 1936) and Sarwanand Koul Premi (b. 1924).

MAHABHARATA: The Mahabharata has been a permanent source of inspiration for the poets from the very start of the history of Kashmiri literature. This world-renowned epic has enriched Kashmiri literature to a large extent. The Mahabharata is the first epic that was translated into Kashmiri some time in the 18th century. In this way the tradition of epic Kashmiri started with the translation of the Mahabharata.

Avtar Bhat (1420-70), a great scholar of his age, is the first poet to write the narrative Banasurkatha (The Tale of Banasura) on a theme which has its origin in the Harivamsha purana, the supplement of the Mahabharata. This long descriptive poem is the poetic expression of love story of Usha and Aniruddha. Krishna, the hero of the Mahabharata and Vishnu's incarnation in the Bhagavata, plays an important role in this narrative. Some portions of this poem have been published so far, the manuscript of this poem is at present in the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, Pune. The linguistic and literary value of Banasurkatha is indisputable in the history of Kashmiri literature.

The Mahabharata attracted the attention of some unknown poets in eighteenth century also. Some fragments of the Kashmiri poetic version of the Mahabharata are preserved in the research library at Srinagar. The numbering of the chapters of the manuscript indicates that the poet had rendered the entire text in Kashmiri verse. Chapter No. 228 of this translation has been published in Kashir Shayiri ed. by M.D. Hajini.

The story of 'Nala and Damayanti' is included in the Vana Parva chapter of the Mahabharata. Bulbul Nagami has based his famous Masnavi on this story. This Masnavi is still in manuscript form but it has enjoyed popularity from the time of its composition. Its hand-written copies were purchased at a high price till 1950. The copies of this sweet and melodious Masnavi are still prized by the cultured Kashmiri Pandits. The author has kept the origional story of the Mahabharata in tact but has decorated it with the colours of his imagination and pearl-like words. The descriptive portion of this Masnavi is un forgetable: the meeting of Nala and Damayanti after a long time and a chain of misfortunes and miseries, is described by the poet in these words:

"On seeing Damayanti's eclipsed face Nala melted as the snow melts in the sunshine. He was weeping, as if torrents were pouring down from the sky. "The red lips of Damayanti were pale and her cypress-like body was trembling like a weeping-willow."

Raja Nala, who was the pride of royalty once, was bare footed as if a beggar in the street. That Damayanti who could not bear the weight of a garland round her neck was now ascending and descending the mountains with a heavy load of grief and miseries on her shoulders."

Draupadi Laj (The Honour of Draupadi) is a drama which has its origin in the Sabha-Parva of the Mahabharata. Tarachand Bismil (b. 1904, d. 1948) has described the plight of Draupadi in this drama, when she was brought in the open court of Kuruvas. She invoked the help of Krishna at this time to save her from the disgrace. Bismil has dramatized another scene of the epic in which he has described the birth of Draupadi, and her brother. Preamuch Kahvat (The Touch Stone of Love) is the third drama of Bismil which has its origin in the 'Mahaprasthani ka-Parva.' In this drama Bismil has remained true to the original and has executed the theme with skill in accordance with the tradition of his times.

He is one of the founders of Kashmiri prose. His translation of the Gita is unique in the sense that it is the translation as well as the explanation of philosophy of the Gita. The book has not been published.

The story of 'Savitri and Satayavan' from the epic has been versified in the form of a Masnavi by Anand Bhat of Katraso Kulgam. This Masnavi is a beautiful composition but has not been published so far. Some portions of this Masnavi appeared in Weekly Chaman, Srinagar some time in 1971-73.

RAMAYANA: The composition of the Ramayana in Kashmiri has been the outcome of that country-wide movement termed as 'Rama bhakti' which in itself was the result of Vaishnava influence. This movement started somewhere in the 14th century as a result of the teachings of Ramananda in Northern India.

Kashmiri remained the seat of monistic Shaivism for a long time. It was the result of deep influence of Shaivism that Rama bhakti, established itself somewhat late in the early 19th century here. It was in the 19th century that Rama bhakti began to sprout here and bore the fruit through Prakash Ram (b. 1819, d. 1877) in the shape of Ramavatar Charita (The Life Story of Rama).

In spite of the fact that the Mahabharata is the first epic that was rendered into Kashmiri verse in the 18th century by some un-known poet it is Ramavatar Charita which is considered to be the first epic of our language. There is no doubt that the Mahabharata has a precedence over the Ramayana so far as the chronology is concerned but the version of the Mahabharata in question is that it was composed in an archaic language and hence un-understandable to the common reader. Being available in fragments it is yet to be seen through the press.

There are as many as six versions of the Ramayana available in Kashmiri. Out of these six versions, five are in the versified form, while one version has been given the form of a prose-drama. In this way the Ramayana has played its own part in the development of Kashmiri prose, as its versified form proved to be the beginning of epic tradition in Kashmiri.

The Ramavatar Charita of Prakash Ram had been composed in the second half of the 19th century. Though published for the first time in Persio-Arabic script in 1910 from Srinagar, prior to its publication the book got circulated in manuscript form in the whole Kashmiri speaking area from the time of its composition.

Ramavatar Charita was published by the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal in Roman script in 1930 with a scholarly introduction and summary of the story in English by George Abraham Grierson. For the benefit of Grierson, Mukund Ram Sastri had rendered the original into Sanskrit but the Sanskrit version has been deleted in the Royal Asiatic edition. The critical edition prepared by Balji Nath Pandit appeared in 1965 from Srinagar. In place of Ramavatar Charita the critical edition has been published bearing the title Ramayana only.

The Bhuvan Vani Trust, Lucknow published this epic in full in Devanagari script with Hindi rendering in 1974. The editor and translator of the Bhuvan Vani edition is S.K. Raina.

Since its first edition in Persio-Arabic script the Ramayana of Prakash Ram has run into six editions in Persio-Arabic script and its seventh edition is expected to be published by Cultural Academy in the near future. This in itself is the proof of the popularity of Prakash Ram's Ramayana, which has served as a model for the epic poets of Kashmiri language.

Another version of the Ramayana available in manuscript form has been composed by Shankar Nath (1870) and is called Shankar Ramayana after the name of its composer. As compared to Ramavatar Charita, Shankar Ramayana is somewhat more elaborate but lacks the flavour of language and is deficient in poetic diction and smoothness of metre.

Anand Ram's Ramavatar Charita has been composed in the 9th decade of the 19th century. This Ramayana is more close in its details to Ramacharitmanas than that of Valmiki Ramayana. In style and diction this Ramayana is some-what better than the version of Shankar Ramayana. The only defect of this version is that the poet has inserted pure Sanskrit compounds and tatsama words in the text and has made it too difficult to be enjoyed by an average reader.

Vishnu Pratap Ramayana has been versified by Vishnu Koul (d. 1918). The poet had dedicated his Ramayana to the then Maharaja of the State, Pratap Singh and as a mark of respect had included the name of Maharaja along with his own name in the title of the book. But this dedication proved of no avail and his Ramayana is still in the manuscript form in the Library of Hindi department of Kashmir University.

Vishnu Koul was well versed in Sanskrit, Persian and Urdu. The knowledge of other languages has loaded his version of the Ramayana with unassimilated and unacceptable words of other languages. The inclusion of unfamiliar words in the text has marred the poetic quality of his Ramayana at certain places. But one cannot overlook the fact that at some places his Ramayana has the attraction and charm of its own and touches the heights of descriptive poetry. Some of the songs in it have been composed in a mixed language. The number of verses in the Vishnu Pratap Ramayana, which has been written in the form of a Masnavi is thirty thousand.

Amar Ramayana is the composition of Amarnath (1908). This version has nothing new about it. The language of Amar Ramayana is loaded with Sanskrit words.

The last poetic version of the epic is by Nilakanth Sharma (d. 1969) and bears the title Sharma Ramayana. Sharma was a great Ram-bhakta and his devotion to Rama has found expression in the form of his Ramayana. Of all his compositions the Ramayana is the richest in thought-content and bears the mark of his devotional personality. Some portions of the Sharma Ramayana have appeared in the Monthly Gulrez in late fifties.

All the Kashmiri poetic versions of the Ramayana are in the form of Masnavi. Excepting the Ramavatar Charita of Prakash Ram all other versions are still in manuscript form.

Tarachand Bismil's (1904-1948) dramatized prose version bears the name Ramavatara. The version was completed by the author in 1938. Ramavatara is the first conscious attempt at prose in Kashmiri and has a place of its own in the treasure of Kashmiri prose.

About the Kashmiri versions of the Ramayana one can very safely say that all these versions are not mere translations but are adaptations of various versions of Ramakatha. Every version bears the mark of author's personality. All the versions are somewhat different from one another in detail and execution but the devotional spirit is a common factor in all the versions. The influence of Shaivite cult is visible in all the versions. At certain places Rama has been made to worship Shiva. In Kashmiri versions Ravana too is a devotee of Shiva and Shiva is full of grace for him. It was because of this grace that for a long time nobody was able to harm and hurt Ravana. Rama wins the war when he devotes himself to Shiva and makes Ravana to fault in his devotion. The allegorical aspect of the Kashmiri Ramayana is noteworthy.

Faithful translation of any Sanskrit classic into Maithili has begun only in the 20th century, the only exception being the translation of Purusa Pariksa (1898) by Chanda Jha. Before that only adaptations or abridged summaries of Sanskrit classics were produced in Maithili. It may be mentioned here that a large number of translations of Sanskrit classics into Maithili are still in manuscript forms. Only printed works have been taken note of in the present note.

The first Mahakavya written in Maithili is Manabodha's Krishna-Janma (The Birth of Krishna, 1880). It is an abridged adaptation of the Harivamsha and describes the adventures of Krishna's childhood. Chanda Jha's Mithila Bhasha Ramayana (Ramayana in Maithili language, 1898) is an adaptation of the Adhyatma Ramayana. Laladas's Rameshvara Charita Mithila Ramayana (1914) is an adaptation of the Ramayana of Valmiki. Translations of a few important Sanskrit epics into Maithili were published only after 1930. Achyutananda Datta translated the Mahabharata (1931) and Raghuvamsha of Kalidasa (1938).

As regards khanda-kavyas earlier works were also adaptations of some portions of the Puranas, e.g. Sambhuvinoda, Ganesh khanda (1909-11) by Laladas; Gajagrahoddhara (1914), Sudarsanopakhyana and Gauriparinaya-Prabandha (1921) by Gunawanta Lala das; Naradamoha (1919), Satyavratopakhyana (1921) Sukanyopakhyana (1921), and Sudama Charita (1935) by Gangadhara Misra, Satyavratopakhyana (1934) by Lakshmipati Singh and Rambhasukasamvada (1936) by Pulakita Alaasa. Translated works also appeared side by side with these adaptations, e.g. Kalidasa's Meghaduta (1937) by Paramananda Datta, Parameshwara Jha's Yaksa samagama (1939) by Bhagirath Jha and Bhartrirhari nirveda (1940) by Gaurishankara Jha.

BHAGAVATA is and has been very popular in Mithila (a copy of which from the pen of the poet Vidyapati 1350-1435 is proudly preserved in the library of the Sanskrit University, Darbhanga). But its translation or any kind of adaptation is not noticed. Recently Upendranath Jha Vyas (Sahitya Akademi Award winner) has translated in verse a few stanzas from it known as Sruti stuti (the praise of the Vedas) which is contained in his Stotranjali (Patna Shribhavan, 1981).

Bhagavata has greatly influenced the medieval Maithili literature, especially the songs of Vidyapati. Govindadas and a host of their followers have freely derived their stock in trade from it.

Go.J.

MAHABHARATA has not yet been translated into Maithili, although a project for it was once chalked out as far back as in 1914, and a fragment of translation done under this project by Gananath Jha is preserved in the library of Ganganath Jha Research Institute, Allahabad.

A summary of the main story of this epic in Maithili is Sankshipta Mahabharata Sar by Ramananda Thakur (Madhubani, 1931).

In about the 60s of this century a famous Maithili poet Ishanath Jha started an adaptation in verse, but he died leaving the work incomplete. The manuscript is lying with his son Umanand Jha.

Like all other Indian literature Maithili has amply adopted the main and side tales of the epic in a good number of poems and dramas of all ages, The Gita, inspite of being a part of the epic, is always treated separately.

RAMAYANA: The trend of composing the padas or songs mainly on love-sports of Radha and Krishna started by Vidyapati became so powerful in Maithili that no poet for about four hundred years could think of composing any other thing except Radha-Krishna padas. Vidyapati points out in Kirtipataka that Rama's life was full of misery and so he had to take birth again as Krishna so that he could enjoy mundane life. This perhaps gives the clue why mundane or secular poetry in Maithili which was primarily love poetry is not on Rama but on Krishna. Moreover, Krishna is regarded traditionally as synonymous with a hero or lover and so in writing secular poetry poets looked up to him rather than Rama. For devotional poetry in the past the theme was generally Shakti and Shiva-rarely Madhava or Vishnu. In Mithila Vishnupadas often tend to be written in the language of Braja and not that of Mithila-perhaps because the incarnation of Vishnu took place in Madhyadesha and that of Shakti in Mithila. Of course, now and then Rama figures in the padas also, e.g. in Govindasa's padas we have many padas on Rama.

The Mithilabhasha Ramayana (1898) is the first great Mahakavya based on the story of Rama and Sita. The author himself states at the end of the book that it is a mere translation of the Adhyatma Ramayana and the Hanumannataka popularly known as Mahanataka. Actually it is an adaptation of these two works. The Ramayana of Chanda Jha is so much influenced by the outlook of the Adhyatma Ramayana that the reader is reminded at the commencement of every important incident that Rama and Sita are incarnations of the Supreme God and the Supreme Goddess respectively. This minimizes, to a great extent, the effect of human touch wherever it is expected to be produced by the mere force of description. The Sanskrit work Mahanataka is itself a conglomeration of the existing works on the entire Ramayana story incorporating into itself verses from the known and the unknown sources. The influence of Mahanataka is seen in its preponderance of various types of songs tuned to the different ragas. The main object of the poet is the propagation of the devotion of Rama through the Maithili language. That is why the poet adopted so simple a style especially in narrating the story. But his style is as simple as effective and he uses figures of speech also whenever the occasion arises. Although he follows generally the Sanskrit poetic convention, the easy flow of his idiomatic language especially in rhymed morie metres which he probably adapted from the Ramacharita-manasa of Tulsidas, has made his work the tour de force of Maithili literature. One peculiarity of his Ramayana is the variety of metres which he handles with ease and deftness.

Lala Das's Rameshvaracharita Mithila Ramayana (1914) named after Maharajadhiraja Rameshwara Sinha of Darbhanga, is an adaptation of the Ramayana of Valmiki. But he tapped other sources also for his information. The most important characteristic of this Ramayana is that it portrays the character of Sita more prominently than that of Rama. While Chanda Jha's Ramayana has the usual number of the Kandas or sections, that is, seven, the Ramayana of Lala Das has eight Kandas and in the eighth which is called Pushkara Kanda, Sita is described as the primordial power. Glories of Rama are dependent upon the power of Sita. The author is doubtlessly influenced by the Tantric cult of Mithila which advocates the worship of the Goddess as primordial power. Lala Das only identified Sita with that of Supreme Goddess. While Chanda Jha aimed at the propagation of the devotion to Rama, Lala Das aimed at the propagation of the devotion to Sita. That is the reason why he also adopted the simple style of narration. But his style is more direct than that of Chanda Jha. Chanda Jha's style, however, remains superior in literary qualities.

The Ravana–Vadha (1955) in 12 cantos, by Jivanath Jha, is an adaptation of the Adhyatma Ramayana. It narrates the story from the time of the formation of friendly relation between Rama and Sugriva up to the victory of Rama over Ravana. The book is small, but its smallness is compensated by its ornamental style. In this respect he appears to be influenced by Badrinath Jha's Ekavali-parinaya. Another special feature of this work is the forceful description of the battle between Rama and Ravana.

The Ambacharita (1956) by Sitaram Jha is also an adaptation of the Adhyatma Ramayana. Only the first part consisting of 15 cantos has been published so far. It tells the story up to the marriage of Sita. As the title reveals Sitaram Jha follows the lead given by Lala Das. The use of colloquial language which is the forte of Sitaram Jha has made his work very homely.

The Vyatha (1971) by Ramakant Jha is also an adaptation of the Ramayana of Valmiki with this difference that the story here ends with the departure of Rama from Ayodhya along with Sita and Lakshmana. The work mainly consists of dialogues between persons affected directly or indirectly by the banishment of Rama, the poet has really succeeded in his main object of depicting pain and anguish on the banishment of Rama.

The Sitayana (1973) by Vaidyanath Mallika 'Vidhu' is an adaptation of the Ramayana of Valmiki. But he freely borrows all sorts of legendary material, from the other Ramayanas or Puranas. Sitayana has seven sections each consisting of seven cantos. With 649 pages it surpasses in volume all preceding epics in Maithili. What Lala Das had started reached its climax at the hands of 'Vidhu' by converting Ramayana into Sitayana. The author of Sitayana resembles many of his predecessors in having the same object of propagating the devotion to Sita which has been the main character of Maithili Ramayana. At the same time he is conscious of the fact that he is writing an epic. Sublime character of Sita has influenced all other female characters with the result that their characterizations have an edge over the characterizations of male characters. He adopts simple style like the other Maithili Ramayana writers but he invests it with vigour and naturalness which he displays whenever he uses blank verse. The extensive use of blank verse in Sitayana, although the poet also uses a variety of rhymed metres, marks it out as distinct from other works based on the Ramayana story.

In prose the most eminent adaptation of Ramayana story has been Sita Dai (1937?) written by Kapileshwar Mishra. In folk literature Sita is often equated with an ideal marriageable daughter and Rama as an ideal guest. The whole of modern 'Kirtana' literature often representing Kishoriji's marriage at Janakpur is a typical modern influence of Rasika-pantha and Sakhi-Sampradaya of Vaishnava monks. These may be seen in Sitaramavivaha Kirtan, Modalata Padavali, etc. Another strange deviation from the Ramayana story in Mithila is recorded in one of the folk tales in which Ravana is described as a true lover of Sita and Sita as his true beloved. The idea is so shocking that when this folk story was published, there was an uproar all over Mithila.

Of course, there are good long poems on Sita in Middle Maithili Literature, particularly what are known as 'Sammaras' (Swayambaras) celebrating the marriage of heroes and heroines of old. There is one such good illustration of Sita-sammara in Shivadatta's Sitaharana (mid-19th century).

Malayalam has a long history of translations and adaptations from Sanskrit. One of the earliest was the Bhashakautaliyam. This anonymous work is a rendering of the famous Arthasastra of Kautilya in Malayalam. It is also perhaps the earliest translation of the Sanskrit work of polity in any Indian language.

The spreading of Hinduism, particularly the Puranic cults of Vaishnavism, Shaivism etc. in the Gupta and post-Gupta periods after the 3rd century led to the induction of several Sanskrit texts in these classes into Malayalam as in other regional languages of India. Thus Malayalam came to have renderings of Valmiki's Ramayana, Mahabharata and other texts. The Ramacharitam of the 12th century is the earliest translation of Valmiki's Ramayana in Malayalam. Nothing is known about the author except that he was perhaps known as Chirama. The work is in Dravidian metres in the song style. A couple of centuries later Rama Panikkar, known as Kannassan from the name of his family, again rendered the Ramayana into Malayalam, in Dravidian metres. An uncle of his, by name Madhava Panikkar, produced perhaps one of the earliest translations of the Bhagavadgita in any Indian language. This is the Bhasabhagavadgita or Bhagavadgita in Malayalam. Shankara Panikkar, another uncle of Rama Panikkar, wrote the Bharatamala or a condensed translation of the Bharata. The Ramakathappattu (A Song on the story of Rama) by Ayyippilla Asan is another of the works in this category.

A common feature of all these works is that they are written in a mixture of Malayalam and Tamil. They are also in Dravidian metres and follow the rules of composition of the genre called songs (Pattu).

Almost simultaneously, translations and adaptations from Sanskrit were also being produced in a different form of language, a mixture of Malayalam and Sanskrit in which Sanskrit had its own grammatical endings. This language was known as Manipravalam. The Bhasharamayana Champu by Punam is an important work in this group.

The poet who made the most massive contribution to Malayalam by way of transcreating the epics was Ezhuttacchan, rated as the greatest poet in the language and a moral and spiritual teacher of great importance. He belonged to the 15th century. He transcreated the Adhyatma Ramayana (different from Valmiki's Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata as well as a part of Valmiki's Ramayana, namely its last part. Ezhuttachhan freely transcreated these texts, occasionally condensing and expanding the original as the needs of poetry and context demanded. He adopted a style of composition named Kilippattu or Bird-song in which the poet wrote through the song of a parrot. A great devotee of Vishnu, the poet popularised Vaishnavite doctrines and Vedanta among Kerala's people. The personality of the poet and the dynamic quality of his poetry led to the massive popularity of these works, which is a continuing phenomenon despite changing norms in poetry.

BHAGAVATA : Two varieties of the Bhagavata exist: namely the Devibhagavata and the Vaishnava Bhagavata. The former is always referred to with the prefix 'Devi' but the latter, since it is more popular and inherited from a pan-Indian heritage, is only the Bhagavata with no qualificatory term prefixed. Sometimes the second Bhagavata is called Srimad Bhagavata to differentiate it from the other.

The original Bhagavata in Sanskrit ows its popularity in Kerala to the ceremonial discourse known as Saptaha, the reading and the expounding of the book in seven days continuously. The Saptaha discourses were conducted in temples as well as in private houses. The Sri Krishna temple at Guruvayur continues to be a favourite venue for Saptaha recitations. Several persons were experts in this ceremonial religious discourse. Two of them who were well known in the recent past were Kutallur Kunnikkavu Namputirippatu and Valankunnam Vasudevan Namputirippatu.

These discourses, since they were normally conducted inside the temple premises and inside the residences of the high-caste Hindus, were not popular among the people at large.

The legends of the Bhagavata, especially the story of Sri Krishna constituting the tenth and eleventh chapters (skandhas) of the original Sanskrit text were very popular among the people of Kerala through several literary works. The earliest adaptation of the Bhagavatam in Malayalam was by Rama Panikkar the famous poet of Kannassa family who lived in the fourteenth century. Rama Panikkar is better known as the author of the Kannassaramayanam which is indeed a superior work in respect of literary excellence than his adaptation of the Bhagavata. The Kannassa Bhagavatam (in 2 parts ed. by K. Sambasiva Sastry, 1932, 1938) as it is popularly referred to, is an abridged adaptation of the tenth chapter of the original Sanskrit Purana. In this work one portion of the tenth chapter has been left out and two portions of the eleventh chapter have been incorporated. Kannassa Bhagavatam which is composed in what is called the 'niranam' metre, is not a popular work; its importance lies only in the history of Malayalam language and literature.

Cherusseri Namputiri's Krishnagatha (referred to as Krishnappattu also, both meaning 'the Song on Krishna') is an important landmark in the history of Malayalam literature. This lengthy Kavya, written in the 15th century and based on the tenth and eleventh chapters of the original Bhagavata is not only a work of exquisite beauty but also the first work composed in the modern Malayalam. The excellence of its composition, the modernity of its expression and its euphonic diction have endeared it to scholars and common people alike. The melody of its metre (manjari) is captivating. Krishnagatha was one of the texts used by religious people for daily chanting, especially in the Northern part of Kerala.

A free translation of the entire original Bhagavata appeared in the 16th century. The work is attributed to the famous Malayalam poet, Tuncattu Ezhuttacchan though some scholars dispute this view mainly because of the work's substandard diction and faulty language. These critics point out that Ezhuttacchan, being a master craftsman in the art as revealed by his well known works Addhyatmaramayanam and Bharatam could not have been the author of a mediocre work like Bhagavata. The Bhagavatam is written in Kilippattu metre which Ezhuttacchan had consistently employed for all his compositions.

Perhaps the most popular work on the story of Sri Krishna in Malayalam is Sri Krishnacharitam Manipravalam believed to have been composed by Kunchan Nambiar, who was a very popular poet of the 18th century and was responsible for starting a new school of poetry called Tullal which owed its origin to the launching of a new performing art of the same name. Though Kunchan Nambiar was essentially a humorist as could be seen in his tullal songs, in Sri Krishnacharitam he appears as a serious poet. This Kavya, written in Sanskrit metres and in 'Manipravala' style has been so popular that different portions of the work were included in Malayalam texts in primary stages till very recently. Children after completing the learning of the Malayalam alphabet used to memorise the verses of Sri Krishnacharitam Manipravalam. Some of the epigrammatic lines in this work have entered into the language as proverbs and maxims.

Adaptations in different forms and translations in verse and renderings in prose of the Bhagavata continued to appear in Malayalam. Several editions have been published during the century with the original text in Malayalam script and with elaborate interpretations in Malayalam prose. A monumental work of this genre is P. Gopalan Nayar's Shrimaha Bhagavatam (in 4 vols. 1940). The famous Bhagavata exponent Valankunnam Vasudevan Namputirippatu attempted a similar translation but he died before completing the work. The incomplete version (only the first chapter) has however, been published (1949).

Several other condensed versions of the Bhagavata have appeared in Malayalam both in verse and poetry. The following is a selected list of them: (1) Bhagavatakirttanam– a brief song (anonymous) included in Palaya Pattukal edited by A.D. Hari Sarma (1961); (2) Gadyabhagavatam–anonymous (Tiruvalla, 1921); (3) Gopikagita edited by N. Venkatasubrahmanya Ayyar (portion from 10th chapter, Trichur, 1923); (4) Gopikagitam edited by M. Krishnan (portion from 10th chapter, Quilon, 1931); (5) Gopikagitam explanatory notes by Jnanananda Sarasvati (portion from 10th chapter, Irunnalakkotu, 1958); (6) Bhagavatam Bhasa–an old Malayalam commentary, anonymous, edited by K. Raghavan Pilla (Trivandrum, 1968); (7) Ranthidevicharitam commentary by Sridevi Krishna Variyar (Trippunittura, 1953); (8) Srimad Bhagavatam edited by Chennallur Parameshwaran Namputiri, Vaikkam Nilakanthan Namputiri and Kaypilli Bhaskaran Namputiri (in two parts, Trichur, 1955); (9) Srimad Bhagvatam Bhasa edited by Kolatteri Sankara Menon–prose translation of 10th chapter, anonymous (in 2 volumes,, Trivandrum, 1925,'26) (10) Srimad Bhagavatamahatmayam by Katattanattu Kunnunni Variar (Kolikkotu, 1953); (11) Srimad Bhagavatamahatmayam by Pannappara Kesava Pilla (Trivandrum, 1959); (12) Srimad Bhagavataratnam–by Patirisseri Sankaranarayanan Namputiri (Kantassankatavu, 1952); (13) Shrimad Bhagavatasamgraham by V.N. Govinda Pilla (Trivandrum, 1953); (14) Shri Mahabhagavatam Dhasanam–Keralabhasaganam by Purayannur Manaikkal Bhaskaran Namputirippatu (Trichur, 1907); (15) Rasakrida by Cherukunnattu Narayanan Namputiri (Trippunittura, 1938); (16) Srutigita by Chittur Varavur Samu Menon (Trichur, 1907); (17) Samksipta Bhagavatam commentary by Chunakkara Rama Variyar–128 Bhagavata stories retold (Trichur, 1926).

Two recent additions to the works based on the Bhagavata are Malibhagavatam (1968) by Mali and Sri Krishnakarnamritam (1971) in two volumes by Tamarasseri Krishnan Bhattatiri.

Melpputtur Narayana Bhattatiri's Narayaniyam in Sanskrit is a salutory hymn to the deity of the famous Sri Krishna temple at Guruvayur. This Sanskrit work is very popular in Kerala. The work has many translations and commentaries in Malayalam, two notable translations being those by K.C. Kesava Pillai and Mulannottuvila Krishna Pillai.

K.M.P.V.

MAHABHARATA: The Mahabharata has a deep impact upon Malayalam literature for the past five centuries or more, the first recorded evidence of which is the Bharatamala of the poet Sankara Panicker, one of the three Niranam poets. Bharatamala and Kannassa Ramayana were probably written between 1400 and 1500 and the former is perhaps the older. And the language of Bharatamala bears ample evidence of its earlier origin. Nevertheless Bharatamala is a milestone in the history of Malayalam poetry. Being the first attempt of any kind on the Mahabharata, Bharathamala is wonderful in its design, structure and treatment. Not even a single chapter is translated as such. The poet rather recreates it. The Mahabharata of Vyasa, which contains one lakh and twenty thousand quatrains, is here abridged into one thousand and eightythree songs. Even to conceive of such a work was a challenge, particularly in those early days when Malayalam literature was still in its cradle. Not only did he successfully face the challenge, but even set an example in translation, adaptation and condensation for which he was later followed by the master-poet Tunchat Ezhuttacchan. It was Bharatamala that prepared the design and sketch for Ezhuttacchan's Bharatam Kilippattu, which is described as the greatest wonder in the art of condensation. Even in certain independent ideas of Ezhuthachan, we find that the poet was closely following the footsteps of Sankara Panicker. The spiritual depth, devotional verve and the dexterity in the condensation of the poem would have been received very well then, although it lost some of its popular appeal later due to the deep change that took place in the language. Still Bharatamala certainly had a decisive influence in moulding the aesthetic taste and the spiritual impact of ages to come.

The poet Niranam Rama Panicker, also called Kannassa Panicker, adapted the Mahabharata and it is called Kannassa Bharata. It is not so grand as his Ramayana, neither is it so great as the Bharatamala. Though Kannassa Bharatam also is a condensed adaptation, here the condensation is not so excellent. The poetic texture also has not got any commendable beauty. Still we find here a clear phase in the development of the language from Ramacharitam to Ezhuttacchan.

It was about the same period that Bharatagatha was written in the northern part of Kerala. Scholars do not agree on the authorship of the work. Some believe that Bharatagatha and Krishnagatha are by the same poet. The exact year of its production also is not known. After a detailed study of available records, Chirakkal Balakrishnan Nair says that both the works were written by the same author. N. Krishna Pillai rejects this view, though he admits that both might have been written by two contemporary poets. A careful study of both the poems will make it clear that the poet of Bharatagatha could never have risen to the grandeur of Krishnagatha. The patron king might have encouraged a lesser poet to write a poem on the Mahabharata.

Ayyanappillai, the brother of Ayyippillai Asan, the author of the famous Ramakathappattu, also has adapted the Mahabharata. His work is called Bharatam Pattu. The language is nearer to the conversational language of the common man. But the influence of Tamil is not so dominant.

The Champu movement, which was nurtured by poets and scholars for a period of about one and a half centuries from 1500 onwards, also contributed its own share to the literature on the Mahabharata. The most important of these champus is Bharatam Champu believed in general to have been written by Punam Nambudiri, the author of Ramayana Champu. In poetic quality Bharatam Champu is inferior to Ramayana Champu. In language he clearly shows a partiality for Sanskrit. Not only quatrains but certain prose pieces also are written completely in Sanskrit.

Tunchat Ezhuttacchan's Shri Mahabharatam Kilippattu is the best work on the Mahabharata in Malayalam. In its adaptation, Ezhuttacchan very carefully and intimately follows the pattern set by the author of Bharatamala and the result was a great masterpiece of superb artistic perfection. In translating, condensing, omitting, expanding, modifying and adding novel ideas to elevate situations, Ezhuttacchan proves himself to be a master artist. Even in the structure of the story, the poet adopts an entirely new design of his own depending upon the original to the least possible extent. Words suited to the context rush to him naturally and powerfully.

The works of Ezhuttacchan charmed the minds of many poets for years to come and the result was a flood of devotional poems. Many of these writers were poetasters and many of their devotional works remain anonymous. Such an anonymous work in this flood on the Mahabharatam is Bharatam (Abridgement).

Another anonymous work is Bharata Samkshepam Kilippattu. Internal evidence shows that the poet was a devotee of God Shiva of the Ettumanoor temple and that the work was completed in 1554. The poet says he wrote the poem to worship Lord Krishna. He continues the story of Bharata from Poulosam to Bhishmolpati and only gives passing references to the story thereafter. He ends the book with Bhishma's advice on the duties of a king. A talented poet, the author had a sound philosophical background.

Important among the Mahabharata works are some major Kathakali works. Kottayam Thampuran has written four Kathakali books Bakavadham, Kallianasougandhikam, Kirmiravadham and Kalakeyavadham. These four occupy a very prominent place in Kathakali literature. Rich in melodious music, they are also excellent in stage-representation. Of the four, Bakavadham is too simple, while Kirmiravadham is just the contrary. Kalakeyavadham is widely accepted as a masterpiece. The theme of Bakavadham is taken from Mahabharatam Adiparvam and the other three from Vanaparvam. But the poet, with his profound stage sense, has effected many modifications in the theme to achieve his aim. He has created some new characters also. It was Kottayam Thampuran who established that the quatrains in Kathakali should generally be in Sanskrit and on such occasions he proved his command of Sanskrit. These four works have acquired for him eternal fame as a master-poet. The date of composition of these and even the exact name of the author are not available.

The story of the Mahabharata has been adapted by Kunchan Nambiar into Kathakali, dividing the whole into eight parts. Compared to the poet's other works these are of inferior quality. Based on different situations of the Mahabharata, Nambiar has written Tullal poems. Following Kunchan Nambiar, other lesser poets also have written Tullal poems on stories from the Mahabharata.

The two Kathakali works, Keechakavadham (first Sahitya Pravartaka Co-op Society edition in 1960) and Uttaraswayamvaram (first Bhasha Parishkarana committee edition in 1913) of Irayimman Thampi (1783-1856) are also important. These works have raised the poet to the level of the masters in Kathakali literature. Certain songs in these are very popular.

Pandavodayam of Kodungalloor Kochunni Thampuran is an epic on the Mahabharata story. The poet started writing it in 1910 and completed it in 1912. The poem starts from the Pandavas living incognito and ends with Utharaswayamvaram. He has some other works also based on the Mahabharata like Phalgunaveeryam, Panchaliswayamvaram and Ajnathavasam.

Kathullil Achutha Menon's Jaimineeyaswamedham is a Kilippattu Kavya on a Mahabharata theme. The longest Kilippattu Kavya in the language, it almost equals Ezhuttacchan's Mahabharatam. The poet did not publish it during his life time. After his death it was published by Kochunni Thampuran in 1925. It is a translation and in the original saint Jaimini narrates the story of King Janamejaya and hence it is called Jaiminibharatam. The translation is divided into five parts. Certain stories that do not find a place in Vyasa Bharata are found in this. The translation is commendable and the poetic style is excellent.

Chunakkara Unnikrishna Varier has translated the Bharatam Champu of Anantha Bhattan into Malayalam and this was first published in 1921. Unnikrishna Varier is a good poet and an extraordinary scholar.

Vatakkumkoor Raja Raja Varma has written an epic on the Mahabharata theme, called Uttara Bharatam, published in 1952. It is an epic which observes all the structural formalities and contains fortyfive 'sargas'. It covers the story from the lamentation of Dhritharastra after the Bharata War to Dharmaputra's ascent to heaven.

Kannampuzha Krishna Varier has written a study of the Mahabharata. The first and second volumes of the study were published in 1953, the third in 1959, the fourth and fifth in 1968, and here he left the work incomplete. A prose translation of Bharata was brought out in 1914 by N. Nanu Pillai Asan. Kunnath Janardana Menon also has translated the Mahabharata and the first and second volumes thereof were published in 1924; the third in 1925; the fourth in 1928 and the rest in 1929. Of all the modern works on the Mahabharata, the greatest and the most original is Bharatapparyatanam (1950) of Kuttikrishnan Marar. The author, with his profound knowledge of oriental philosophy, comprehensive scholarship in ancient Sanskrit literature and deep insight into the spirit of the Mahabharata, interprets in his lucid style different significant contexts, incidents and characters in the epic, opening an altogether fresh and bright approach to it. Another important work on the Mahabharata is the complete prose translation in 40 volumes by M. Prakasam. The first volume was published in 1968 and the last in 1972. Mali Bharatam by Mali (V.Madhavan Nair) adapts the story of the Mahabharata for children. Kuttikalute Mahabharata by Cherkil Parukutty Amma and C. Sarojini Nair's translation from Bengali, (the original author being Upendrakishore Roy Choudhuri,) also introduce Mahabharata to the children. Ini Gnan Urangatte ('Let me sleep now', 1973) is a novel by P.K. Balakrishnan, based on a theme from the Mahabharata, giving it a new dimension. Yayati, the Jnanpith award winning Marathi novel by V.S. Khandekar, which adopts its theme from the Mahabharata also has been translated into Malayalam by P. Madhavan Pillai (1980).

K.V.R.

RAMAYANA: The first adaptation of the Ramayana in Malayalam is Ramacharitram, which deals not with the entire story of Sri Rama but with only that part of it which is found in the Yuddhakanda.

The story till then is included here and there, sometimes condensed and sometimes in detail. The aim of the poet was, as declared by himself, to write about "a little of the story of Rama, for the lower ranks in the society." The poet Sreeraman probably lived between 1200 and 1500. The linguistic and other internal evidences, however, put Ramacharitam in the last decade of the 13th century.

The poem, divided into 164 parts, has 1814 stanzas mostly composed in Dravidian meters. Each part consists generally of 11 stanzas and each stanza starts with the last word from the previous. Thus the poem is a pattu or song as defined in the Lilatilakam.

The poet follows Valmiki in general but has deviated from him here and there and resorted to occasional condensation or elaboration with great skill. In depicting Rama as the incarnation of Vishnu and in such other points he is indebted to the Tamil poet Kamban.

The names of characters in Valmiki have been adapted into Malayalam in the light of the meaning implied by the words and in this also the poet follows Kamban. Like any other great work Ramacharitam has also influenced later poets.

That it is the first work in Malayalam based on the Ramayana is not the only greatness of Ramacharitram. Its excellence depends also upon the fact that it is the first serious work in Malayalam in its own style, with a grand form and a lofty theme harmoniously blended together.

There was a stage in Malayalam poetry where the pattu had been established fully. Rama Panicker was the foremost poet of the group. He is the first poet to rewrite the complete story of the Ramayana. This is so excellent a work that it alone would have made him immortal, though he has written also concise adaptations of Bharata, Bhagavata, etc. It is clear from the poem itself that he was born in a family renowned for its learning and literary background. His house was at Niranam near Tiruvalla and therefore these poets were also called Niranam poets. 'Kannassans' may be either the family name or the house name. It is generally agreed that the works of Rama Panicker would have been written only after Lilatilakam and hence the period of the poet might be the 15th century.

The Malayalam poet's aim also was to sing the glories of such an ideal man and he believed that by doing so he could elevate the ordinary man. Nevertheless, he glorifies Rama occasionally as a God incarnate and sometimes praises Vishnu's other incarnations too.

The originality and greatness of the poet lie in the apt condensation and expansion of the original Sanskrit text. He does not deviate much from the original story. Yet it cannot be said to be a mere translation. It is rather a concentrated version of it. The 24,000 quatrains of Valmiki have been condensed into 3059 pattus (songs) or stanzas and to do this without impairing the grandeur of the original is no mean achievement. To spread bhakti based on Advaita, certain parts have been translated verbatim, and certain contexts have been elaborated and beautified by adding the poet's personal ideas. Certain quatrains from Balaramayanam of Rajasekharan have been translated and included. Tunchat Ezhuttacchan, acclaimed as the father of Malayalam literature, owes much to Kannassan in moulding the structure of his language. The basic principles of translation, the meaningful control in the use of words, the simple, direct and powerful method of presentation, the method of mixing Sanskrit and Malayalam, the grandeur and seriousness maintained in the poetic language, that can be observed in Ezhuttacchan are inherited from Kannassan.

Not only is Kannassa Ramayana a connecting link between Ramacharitam and Adhyatma Ramayana but is a significant phase in the whole development of Malayalam literature in general and its poetry in particular.

Of all the champus of the middle ages, the Ramayana Champu is the most important, and perhaps the most voluminous work in the whole of Malayalam poetry. The book is divided into twenty parts of which each is so big and comprehensive as to demand consideration as a separate book. In general the poet follows Valmiki Ramayana. The story of Balakanda and Yuddhakanda is in eleven parts. Three parts deal with the story of Uttarakanda; there are two parts each on Kishkindhakanda and Sundarakanda. The remaining two parts deal with Ayodhyakanda and Aranyakanda. Ramayana Champu contains about 2000 quatrains, about 100 prose pieces and 32 dandakas. The dandaka is a kind of rhythmic prose. The whole work provides a collossal structure, grand enough to cause wonder to lesser poets. 'Manipravalam' became a serious vehicle for poetry mainly in the champus in the middle ages and the credit for this goes to Punam Nambudiri, its author. Though he followed Valmiki Ramayana, he has also either condensed or expanded the story and sometimes changed the sequence of events. As is common in champus, which were meant for presentation on stages in temples, in Ramayana Champu also there are frequent occasions when the poet uses quatrains from other works like Anargharaghavam, Ascharyachudamani, Uttararamacharitam, Balaramayana Prasannaraghavam, Raghuvamsam, Raghuveeracharitam, Ramayanamanjari, Hanumannatakam. Some of the quatrains are likely to be later interpolations. Punam has got his own style and structure, in which he is almost inimitable.

The next work to be mentioned is Ramakathappattu as it is popularly known, though the author called it Ramayanakavyam. The author is Ayyappilli Asan of Thekka Veedu at Auvatutura near Kovalam, whom P.K. Narayana Pillai, who discovered the full text of the book in 1965, calls "the Homer of Malayalam". It is presumed that the poet lived sometime about 1400. The book is in 3163 songs, 279 'Vrittas' or parts and used to be sung in temples with the accompaniment of a musical instrument called Chandravalayam. Throughout the poem, the poet follows Valmiki. But there is no verbatim translation. Many events and narrations are omitted; sometimes the story is changed and new ideas and events introduced. Apart from the lines in Dravidian metres, there are many songs also which people could relish singing and reading. That such a lengthy work could be written without slackening the interest and affecting the charm anywhere is something amazing and is a telling index of the exalted poetic gift of Ayyippilli Asan. He has enriched the poem by giving innumerable rural touches from the life around and he maintained throughout the exquisite musical quality and dramatic effect so as to attract both the learned and the illiterate and has used an effective language taken direct from the people.

Ramakathappattu is essentially an oral epic reflecting the cultural heritage of Kerala. The story of the Ramayana is treated in the book in a charming poetic style harmoniously mingling Malayalam, Sanskrit and Tamil, but the basic linguistic element is that of Malayalam.

Ulloor is of the opinion that Ramakathappattu was a Tamil work because he did not see the full text of the poem. His opinion that Ramakathappattu has not influenced Malayalam poetry is also untenable. The poem in fact is a source-book which inspired the Vrittaprasthanam in which the real genius of Malayalam poetry became manifest. It also throws light on Dravidian linguistics and on the affinity between Malayalam and Tamil in particular. Influence of Sanskrit grammar on Malayalam can be traced in the book. There are many customs and manners of ancient days depicted in the work. In the entire realm of the literature on the Ramayana, Ramakathappattu occupies on unparalleled position.

The most popular work based on the Ramayana is the Adhyatma Ramayana of Tunchat Ezhuttacchan. His original was a Sanskrit work of the same name written in the 14th century. Ezhuttacchan selected it for translation not because there was no good concise translation, but because he intended to write on the Ramayana theme depicting Sri Rama as an incarnation of the Almighty so as to promote his aim of spreading bhakti.

Adhyatma Ramayana is the first literary work which gave cultural unity to Kerala. It gained such popularity throughout Kerala that it began to be read daily in every Hindu house. It worked in the mind of the people as a divine song and kindled a cultural awareness amongst them.

Uttara Ramayana is a work on the theme dealt with in the Uttarakanda of Kannassa Ramayana which follows the Valmiki Ramayana. Its authorship is however doubted. There are several internal evidences to conclude that it is a work of Ezhuttacchan. K.N. Ezhuttacchan after prolonged research and discussion, has tried to establish that Uttara Ramayana is the work of an imitator of Ezhuttacchan, who had gained mastery over the great-poet's language and style.

There are two other works, namely Satamukha Ramayana and Ramayanam Irupattinalu Vrittam which are believed to be the works of Ezhuttacchan. Satamukha Ramayana has also another title, Sita Vijayam. There is no clear textual evidence. The second work is the Ramayana story written in twentyfour metres. It has almost been established that it is not a work of Ezhuttacchan.

Ramanattam or Kathakali literature based on the Ramayana is supposed to have been written between 1653 and 1694. Ramanattam is divided into 8 parts and is designed to present the whole story of the Ramayana on the stage in 8 days. The author is Kottarakkara Thampuran. From the internal evidence the only detail about the author that can be had is that his name is Veera Kerala Verma, a disciple of a poet known as Sankara. The author had a musical gift and mentioned about forty ragas including some unfamiliar ones. Nevertheless his mastery of the poetic medium is not very remarkable. And if at all he could write verse freely, it was in Sanskrit; his name still remains in the realm of literature not as a literary figure but as the founder of the great classic dance form, Kathakali. Ramanattam generally follows the method of hinting the progress of the story by slokas and the conversation by songs and in this it is not different from Krishnanattam and Gitagovindam.

Sitadukham Kilippattu is another work on the story. It is believed to have been written in the 17th century and of unknown authorship. The author takes his story from the Uttara Ramayana of Valmiki, particularly where Rama abandons Sita.

Balivadham Kilippattu is yet another work on the Ramayana story. The author is unknown. From the language and style it can be deduced to have been written in the 17th century. The poet is not very scholarly. The story starts from the beginning of the Kishkindhakanda. After Balivadha, Sugriva is coronated as the king and Rama retires for his religious rituals. The poet has used more than one Dravidian metre.

Bhasha Valmiki Ramayana or Kerala Varma Ramayana is an important work. The author, Kerala Varma Thampuran, is believed to have lived from 1645 to 1698. The poet translated only the first five kandas of the Valmiki Ramayana. Before this, the Valmiki Ramayana had been translated only by the Niranam poets. In the introductory lines the poet has stated that he is translating Valmiki with all lucidity and clarity so that even the ignorant will be able to understand the hidden secrets of the epic. In his work the poet has fulfilled his aim. His language is so simple and lucid that even the ordinary people can enjoy his work. He has not omitted any of the details of Valmiki. The translation is superb and beautiful. And of all the works of the poet, Bhasha Valmiki Ramayana is the best.

Patala Ramayana also is a work of Kerala Varma Thampuran. The book is divided into four parts and each part is in a separate metre. The story deals with an incident supposed to have happened during the battle between Rama and Ravana, in which Rama and Lakshmana were abducted to the underworld by Patala Ravana whom Hanuman defeated thereby saving Rama and his brother. In Patala Ramayana also Kerala Varma's language is lucid and simple and the style powerful.

Putrakameshti Pattu is another work of the 17th century which deals with the Yagna performed by Dasaratha and the birth of Rama. It is divided into four parts. The poet has used only two metres. On the whole the poem is simple and quite natural.

Ramayanagatha a long work based on the Ramayana has no poetic merit of any kind. It is a product of the 18th century and its authorship is unknown. There are internal evidences to show that the poet was a devotee of the deity of the famous temple at Vaikom. The author has no mastery over his medium. That it is based on the Ramayana is the only thing that gives it a place in the history of literature.

A work in five parts, Uttara Ramacharitam Kavyam or Uttara Raghaviyam is supposed to have been written by Kunchan Nambiar. In style and structure it stands with Raghaviyam, a Sanskrit work by the same author. This Sanskrit work deals with the story upto the end of Yuddhakanda and it might have been the reason why the poet, writing on the Ramayana story thereafter in Uttara Ramacharitam condensed the whole of the Ramayana upto Yudhkanda in just 23 quatrains. Certain scholars hold that this is a work of Melputhur, the author of the famous Sanskrit work Narayaneeyam. Ullor refutes this and establishes that it is a work of Kunchan Nambiar.

Rama Varma, the king of Cochin (1763-1809), who was a poet, wrote Sundara Kandam Pana. It is believed that he wrote this in worship of Hanuman, to get himself cured of some illness. It deals with the story of Sundarakanda. Following this, Subhadra Thampuratty of Cochin wrote Yudhakandam Pana also and completed the Ramayana story, continuing upto the coronation of Rama.

During these years Attakkathas were written among which some presented different chapters of the Ramayana also. Of them Balivijayam, Ravanodbhavam, Ravana Vijayam etc. are only for presentation on stage today, leaving all others to the forgotten pages of history.

Azhakath Padmanabha Kurup (1869-1932) was a renowned scholar gifted with good poetic faculty. He used to read daily the Ramacharitamanasa of Tulsidas and Adhyatma Ramayanam Kilippattu of Tuncat Ezhuttacchan and thus he became a devotee of Rama. The result was the epic Ramachandravilasam. The poet started writing it in 1894, but completed it a few years later. It has twentyone sargas. Ramachandra Vilasam is the first epic in Malayalam which secured for the author a remarkable position among poets. Vallathol has written his poem Kilikkonchal based on an incident in the childhood of Sita. Though a small poem, it reflects the culture of the Ramayana and Sita is depicted as an innocent child who was later to become the heroine of the Ramayana and was to be looked upon as the symbol of Indian womanhood.

Kumaran Asan wrote Balaramayana in 1916. Here the poet was writing the Ramayana story in simple and lucid verse, meant for children. But the poet did not complete it. He wrote only upto Aranyakanda. The greatest contribution of Asan to the Ramayana story is his masterpiece, Chintavishtayaya Sita (1919). In this Asan places Sita in an entirely new situation and allows her to give free vent to her mind. When her twin sons go to Ayodhya for singing before Sri Rama, Sita, who is left alone for the time being in the residence of Valmiki, looks back upon her past and surveys it, evaluating the actions of Rama both as a man and as a noble king. Sita is depicted with a deep and keen insight into human psychology, in the light of philosophy. In her excitement, Sita finds fault with her husband for having abandoned her and before her strong words even Sri Rama would not have been able to stand. But then she corrects and consoles herself, telling that Rama, the noble king could not have acted in a different way. Without causing any damage to the esteemed idea of Valmiki's Sita, here the poet conceives of quite a novel and complex situation and reveals the inner recesses of her mind.

Mali Ramayanam by Mali (V. Madhavan Nair) is a book on the Ramayana story written in simple language and intended especially for children. Mali writes the Ramayana story so charmingly that it enchants the children and initiates them into the rich world of the epic.

Borrowing his theme from the Ramayana, C.N. Srikanthan Nair has written three dramas Saketham, Lankalakshmi and Kanchanasita, which give the Ramayana story a new dimension and depth.

MANIPURI

BHAGAVATA: The Operas based on the themes from the Bhagavata have been common in Manipur, the other Bhagavata works are only translations, particularly those of the 10th book which were mostly done in the nineteen twenties.

R.K.J.S.

MAHABHARATA: The Mahabharata was not wholly adapted in Manipuri in medieval times on account of the voluminous nature of the epic. Parts of the epic were however adapted during the different periods of the 18th century and the first two decades of the 19th. Thus parts of Adi Parva relating to Parikshit's exploits and Janmejoy's snake sacrifice were adapted during the reign of Gopal Singh (1709-1748). Kirata Parva was adapted during the reign of Madhuchandra (1800-1806).

MARATHI

BHAGAVATA: Eknath (1533-99) wrote a verse-commentary on the eleventh canto of the Bhagavata. Sri Krishna was held in high regard by both the Bhagavatas and Mahanubhavas, two Bhakti cults in medieval Maharashtra. The Bhagavata Purana was a sacred book for both. Several narrative poems are available on the childhood exploits of Sri Krishna (Bal-Lila and Gaulana) by Namdev, Tukaram and other Bhakti poets.

Mahanubhava poets like Narendra and amongst the Pandit poets Raghunath Pandit and Vamana Pandit (1618-73) wrote on Rukmini-Svayamvara, Venu-Sudha and Satyabhama-episode, G.D. Madgulkar has a popular lyric sequence Gita-Krishnayan.

In prose, V.G. Apte, of Ananda Magazine wrote for children Bala Ramayana and Bala-Bhagavata. There are prose translations of the Bhagavata available in Marathi. On Krishna's flute alone there are a dozen lyrics by modern poets of repute, the most famous being Ram Ganesh Gadkari's Murali. As C.V. Vaidya observed Krishna in Maharashtra is more a divine child, a leader of cowherds, a protector of cows and village–folk from demons, a demolisher of the wicked serpant Kaliya, a warrior par excellence, a hero and a preceptor of Gita; rather than a romantic lover of Gopis. Radha is mentioned by some poets (Jnaneswar's famous lyric is Variyane Kundala Hale/Dole modit Radha chale) but the erotic compositions available in other languages are conspicuously absent in Marathi.

Bhagavata and Ramayana were eternal sources for the Kirtankars, religious stroy-tellers and singers. Many Akhyanas like Rukmini-Satyabhama episode or Sudamacharitra or Kansa-Vadha were very popular. Some plays were also written on the Bhagavata stories, like Kunjavihari (Mama Warerkar) and Krishnarjuna-Yuddha (N.C. Kelkar).

MAHABHARATA: V.V. Parkhe in the manuscript of his thesis named Shrimad Vyasa's Mahabharata in Marathi (Bombay, 1963) has noted about two hundred versions of the Mahabharata in different forms such as 'Full, Partial and Mixed' and also in Cantos. One cannot name the pioneer writer of Marathi Mahabharata unless the identity of Jnaneshvara the writer of the Drona Parva is established. Today at least, Nama Pathak (14th century) the writer of Ashvamedha Parva has to be called the first writer of the Marathi Mahabharata. The Bharatas of Vishnudas Nama (1633), Madhav Swami (1703-1707), Shridhar (1712), Moropant (1772-1782) are famous. In the Bharata of Shubhanand (1766) detailed descriptions of various episodes are given in a very lyrical style. Gopal's Bharata (1768) reaches the number of verses upto nearly three quarters of a lakh. Jivashiv (1703-1828) has written twelve cantos having 10,615 verses divided into 68 parts (Adhyayas). He completed his Chakri Bharata taking help of Mukteshwar's, Gopal's and Shridhar's cantos. The complete story of Bharata is included in the Katha Kalpataru (1623), the encyclopaedic volume of stories. In the Marathi version of Hari Vamsha Purana, Jindas (17th century) has narrated the complete story of Bharata, in the Jain style. The Bharatas written by Krishnadas Mudgal (1598), Ramanand (1568), Bhalnath, Malunath, Vipra Vishvanath are not available today. The Lawani Bharata of Jagannath and the Bharata consisting of one and half lakh of verses composed by Ramachandra Buva (1705-1707) are also not available. There are some poets who are said to have composed the complete Mahabharata but their works are available only in parts today. Their names with their partial works can be noted as follows: Navarasnarayan (14th century; Shalya Purva), Mukteshwar (1574-1640; Aadi, Sabha, Vana, Virat and Sauptik Parvas), Shivnath (1766; Bhishma and Drona Parvas), Balkrishnanath alias Padmanabh (18th century; Udyoga Parva), Haridaskanha (1778; Bhishma Parva), Mairal (Virat Parva). The Sabha, Udyoga, Sauptik, Stree, Shanti, and Ashvamedha Parvas of Naraharisuta Govind (16th century) are also available. This Mahabharata has become dry and too literal because he has adopted a style which first mentions the Sanskrit shlokas and then gives the Marathi explanations. Narahari Moreshwar (1759-1769) has four cantos of Bharata to his credit namely, Udyoga, Bhishma, Drona and Karna. They have become beautiful with their special qualities such as imagination, mastery of diction, intelligence, maturity and its emphasis on valour. It is noteworthy that these poets had the courage to take up the whole Mahabharata though their compositions remained incomplete. Many other poets had concentrated on only one or two cantos of the Mahabharata. There is for example, Adi Parva of Krishnadas Nama. Shivanand Swami had selected noted verses from the Adi Parva by different poets and presented the Adi Parva in diverse metres like Arya, Ovi, Shloka, etc. The Vana Parva by Krishnadas is incomplete. There are Virat Parvas by Waman Pandit, Mahipati (other than Jahanabadkar) and Harisuta Trimbak. Amrit, Udbodh, Gopalnath, Chandratmaj, Rudra, Shambhudas (1553-1613), Ananttanaya have composed Udyog Parva. Krishnadas Nama and Murari have composed Bhishma Parva while Jnaneshwara, Santidas, Mairal and Siddhatanay have composed Drona Parva. The Bhishma-Karna-Shalya Parvas by Krishnadas Nama are also found. There are compositions on Ashvamedha Parva by Nama Pathak, Krishnadas. Vitthalnath, Shivkalyan, Dadosuta Mudgal, Vipra Narayan, Madhaoswami, Shridhar, Jagatjeevanprabhu, Krishnadas, Govind and Moropant. These are the chief compositions of the Vyasa's Bharata Parvas. It must be said that those poets who have dealt with the sub-plots in the Mahabharata have only partly revealed the Mahabharata of Vyasa. The Thalipak story in the Vanaparva of Mahabharata is sung by the poetess Janabai and many other poets like Vishnudas Nama, Waman, Amritrai, Mahipati, Narhari, Ramchandra, Venkateshdas, Das Niranjan Pandurang and Shridhar. The compositions of such episodes from the Mahabharata are as many as hundred and seventyfive in number. The poets, Anant Badve (Bharatakhyan), Siddhakavi (Krishnamritnut), Deodasankit (Bharatparpade), Shyamaradhya (Bharati Akhyane), Wamandeorai (Bharatparpade) and Chaitanya (Pandav Kathasar) have narrated the story of Bharata in concise form without following the original serial order of cantos in the Mahabharata.

Though the Marathi versions of the Mahabharata are many in number, the pieces which have become noteworthy by their various merits are few and far between. The Mahabharata of Vishnudas Nama (1633) cannot be called a replica, a translation or an adaptation of the Bharata of Vyasa. He basically maintained the frame-work of the story of the Mahabharata and filled it with the details from Sanskrit and Prakrit books. He has also interwoven the traditional legendary stories from Marathi. The reflection of the Mahabharata as it obtains in Marathi mind is found in his Bharata. This Bharata composed on the line of Marathi folklore appears like circular stories. The sensuous depiction of the valorous deeds, impressive descriptions and the flowing diction are the special features of this Bharata. Unlimited freedom in composition and impropriety at certain places are its defects.

The Ovi-Bharata of Mukteshwar (1620-1640) which includes Aadi, Sabha, Vana, Virat, and Sauptik Parvas dazzle the connoiseur of literature, with their beauty. The versions of the Mahabharata (in Marathi) before Mukteshwar were small in number and incomplete. These generally suffered from too much of deviations. Against this background, the presentation of Mukteshwar's Bharata, in its original grace, appears to be the first ambitious and sincere effort. It does not take liberty to change the original form of the Mahabharata. So also while meticulously following the original text of the Bharata, it does not turn its back on traditions which have sunk deep down into the minds of the people. It gives us the poetic experience of the Mahabharata of Vyasa by following it closely though not exactly. The awareness of tradition and the process of transforming the stories of the Mahabharata have kept it away from being mere imitation. That is why the Mahabharata of Mukteshwar has become unique among the Marathi Bharatas. Mukteshwar had the courage to narrate the whole story of Mahabharata in detail. He limited his freedom of composition by the loyalty to the original. He used the graceful literary language but maintained the simplicity of expression. He chose the elastic Ovi medium which agrees with the flow of the narration of the story. His Bharata has achieved the poetical height because of neat story-pattern, powerful characterisation, picturesque descriptions, emotional and flowing dialogues and artistic and figurative diction. He tried to maintain the balance between the metaphysical and the narrative elements of the story and tried hard to maintain the original epic form of poetry. The elaborate form of the story which was presented by Eknath in his Bhavarth Ramayana was improved upon by his artistry and maturity. Madhavswami's Mahabharata (1703-1707) with its one lakh verses is the most expansive one among the extant Marathi Bharatas. This epic poet from Tirubelundur has carried the banner of fame of Marathi beyond Rameshwar. Madhavswami tries to remain true to the text of the Mahabharata. He is particular about that part of the story which is differently treated by him. Apart from his loyalty to Vyasa, faultless skill in translation, lively descriptions of places, proper characterisation, impressive depiction of scenes are the special features of this Bharata. The most popular adaptation of the Mahabharata in this tradition is the Pandav Pratap by Shridhar. The writing of Shridhar has been always popular because it is related to the common taste and is congenial to the family traditions, old customs and beliefs. Shridhar has brought out the essence of the story of the Pandavas in 64 cantos consisting of 13,396 verses (omitting Ashvamedha, 12,244). While doing this he has avoided lengthy narrations. He has expounded his story with the help of other books. Charming conciseness, easy composition, heightening of the emotions of valour and pathos, sweet presentation of philosophical thoughts and simple language are the special features of Pandav Pratap. In his narration Shridhar has relied more on the reverential attitude than on maturity of art or profundity of learning. Lucid devotional narration is his forte. This is a successful effort at giving an easy and agreeable form to the tradition of Mukteshwar which was acceptable to the people. In the Arya Bharata of Moropant we find deliberate exhibition of scholarship which is different from the Mukteshwar tradition. Learnedness, clever artistry, compact composition, purity of language and the balanced understanding are the special features of Moropant. His poetry contained all the conventional standards of taste of its time. The Arya Bharata with 18 cantos (224 sections and 17,136 verses) is an effort to give new shape to the Mukteshwar tradition. He replaced freedom of composition by loyalty to the original, expansiveness by brevity and the metre Ovi by the metre Arya, thus producing his new version of the Bharata. The Arya Bharata is different from the other preceding Bharatas by its precision and propriety, maturity of language, as well as cultured taste. Because of his enthusiasm for purity of diction and his love for artifice his language became Sanskritised and consequently lost, to some extent, the vigour of the spoken language.

The Vyasa Bharata unfolds life in all its complexity while the reconstruction of it in Marathi, is devotion-centred. Consequently sociological, political, historical and the reflective part of the original is omitted. The Vyasa Bharata revolves round the valour of the Pandavas, the villany of the Kauravas and the intelligence of Krishna. The Mahabharatas in Marathi shine only with the blue lustre of Krishna. The image of Krishna in these Bharatas is more closely related to his godly image in the Bhagavata rather than his image in the Mahabharata.

Krishna appears in Marathi Bharatas as an incarnation that is to be worshipped. The Pandavas who had Krishna on their side, become the faithful while the Kauravas who were on the other side seem to be the non-believers. Devotion and the ideas of incarnation creep into the original story and the original story, with the physical confrontation inherent in it, is accordingly modified. It goes on changing into a story of conflict of basic values between the devoted and the undevoted. The form of the story changes from the human to the super human. In this way the Marathi Mahabharatas are painted with devotion and love for justice.

There is in the Mahabharata a lot of expansiveness. If this enormous epic was to be brought into the regional language it was thought necessary to give it a concise shape. That is why the Marathi Mahabharata writers decided to narrate it in brief. Naturally they omitted some parts of the original in consonance with poetic attitude and taste of the time. Though they have thus abridged the original, they have also contributed something with their imagination. They told the story of Bharata by maintaining the Sanskrit and Prakrit traditions of the epic which were ingrained in the minds of the people. Contemporary urges, a feeling of indebtedness to the preceding generation of poets, a strong desire for freedom of composition, all-comprehensive attitude, love for descriptions and ornamental narrations have all combined to make the Marathi Bharatas.

A particular form of composition is discernible in the long poetry written for rendering the Mahabharata into Marathi. Eknath created a new type of long narrative poetry in his Bhavarth-Ramayana. Marathi Mahabharatas also imitate it as the Marathi Ramayanas do. Some special features of the forms which the writers of Marathi Mahabharata brought into practice could be stated as follows. There is an effort to register the pulsations of the present. The story is reconstructed keeping devotion in the centre. Didactic and philosophical discussions are included if occasion demanded. Entertaining factors are also presented. Hyperboles, romantic elements, ornate descriptions, humour, allusiveness are some of the constituents of their writings. Mukteshwar perfected his form of composition making it attractive and artistic. The writers of Marathi Mahabharatas that followed him, imitated it again and again.

The Marathi Mahabharatas can be aptly described as a re-creation or transcreation than translations or adaptations. They follow Vyasa only in broad outline. But they transform the Bharata story in two aspects. As far as the content is concerned, they abridge, expand and modify. They also recreate thus bringing about two fold changes– first in content and then in the devices of poetic expression. Their tendency is to accept the all-comprehensive elastic form, at the same time to maintain the basic trend of the original. Their poetic nature and the tendencies of that period have coloured their expression. And to that extent their Bharatas achieve individuality and poetic excellence. In short the contribution of the writers of Marathi Mahabharatas is not that of mere translators. It is that of creative writers who have given new artistic forms to the traditional story-material. Therefore the Marathi versions of the Mahabharata reflect a developed stage of evolution in the art of story-telling.

RAMAYANA: There are prose translations of the Valmiki Ramayana, Ananda Ramayana and Adhyatma Ramayana in Marathi. Translations both in prose and poetry, of famous Ramayanas in other languages, like Tulasidasa's Ramachairta-Manasa are also available in Marathi.

There are independent Ramayanas in Marathi. The more well-known are Eknath's (1533-99) Bhavartha-Ramayan and Moropant's (1729-94) Arya-Ramayana. There are several short and long narrative poems and lyrics composed, inspired by the characters and episodes of the Ramayana. The devotional literature centred round Rama's name and miraculous deeds, is unaccountably large. Right from the Rama-Raksha Stotra which is a part of daily prayers in every household, to Swami Ramadasa's (1608-81) impassioned Karunashtaka and hymns to Maruti, there are poems and plays on Sita-Svayamvara, Rama-Rajya Viyoga, Bhumikanya Sita (Mama Warerkar) Bharata-Bheta and Ahalyodhara. This is a theme which has inspired more poets than novelists. In the modern literature, G.D. Madgulkar's Gita-Ramayana, as sung in gramophone records by Sudhir Phadke, broke all records: 50,000 copies of this work were sold. Acharya Vinoba Bhave had tears in his eyes, when he heard this lyric composed to music. N.G. Gore's Siteche Pohe is a collection of light essays.

Ramayana has been the inspiration to folk-poetry and folk-drama. From the earliest Dashavatara plays to the latest translation in Marathi of Snehalata Reddy's controversial Kannada play Sita, there have been several stage-versions of Ramayana episodes like Sita-Vanavasa or Lanka-dahana and so on. Swami Ramadas was the founder of a Ramadasi cult, in which at several places Rama temples were built and the priests were appointed who would live on alms and serve the people.

In Marathi, there is a Sri Ramayana Kosha edited by Amarendra Gadgil of Poona.

BHAGAVATA: Sanskrit in Orissa remained undisturbed till the 15th century. In fact Oriya as a medium of literary composition came to occupy a special position only during the time of the Suryavamsi rulers (15th century), although it had been used in a limited way under the initiative of the Gangas (13th and 14th centuries). Though the rulers contributed significantly towards promoting the mass literature in Oriya it was actually popularised by Sarala Dasa, Balarama Dasa, Jagannatha Dasa, Achyutananda Dasa and others of the 15th and 16th centuries through their Oriya works such as Mahabharata, Ramayana, Bhagavata and Harivamsa etc, on the models of their Sanskrit counterparts. Among these, Bhagavata came out to be probably the best and the most popular. Unlike the Mahabharata and the Ramayana which were adaptations, Bhagavata was largely a translation from the original Sanskrit. The poet was Jagannatha Dasa (approximately 1490-1550), a devout Vaishnava and a friend of Sri Chaitanya at Puri, and the rendering was in a rhyming pattern which consisted of 9 words in each line. It is said that Jagannatha Dasa composed the Bhagavata in Oriya because of his mother. As the mother did not understand Sanskrit the son did the Oriya version and recited it chapter by chapter to her.

Sri Chaitanya came to Puri in 1509 when Jagannatha was only nineteen years old. By that time he had already completed the translation of canto-10 (Dasama Skandha) of the Bhagavata in imitation of the Bhavarthadipika Tika of Sridhara Swami, a devout worshipper of Kshirachora Gopinatha, the famous deity at Remuna near Balasore, and was in the habit of reciting the same to the crowds near the Bata Ganesh inside the temple of Lord Jagannatha at Puri. Sri Chaitanya was extremely pleased when he listened to the episodes of Krishna's life as recited by Jagannatha and they quickly became friends. Finally, 40 years later, after describing the departure of Sri Krishna to Golakadhama in the last chapter of canto-11, Jagannatha passed away.

Jagannatha wrote Oriya Bhagavata in a musical yet simple and forceful language, and it contained many philosophical thoughts and moral ideas, the whole aim being to uplift people's moral and religious habits. Though it is considered as a translation, it is not exactly a literal one. There have been changes and deviations as well as many elaborations not found in the original. But its general aroma of sanctity, its quiet dignity, and the sublime air of high moral and spiritual life it breathes, have gone straight into the hearts of millions of listeners, making it not only the most prized book in the last 400 years in Orissa, but also the most respected and worshipped book in almost every Oriya house-hold.

The Oriya Bhagavata differed from the original Sanskrit in the subject matter as well as in the number of chapters. The cantos and the number of chapters each canto contained, are as follows: Canto I-19 chapters, Canto II-10 chapters, Canto III-33, Canto IV-31, Canto V-26, Canto VI-19, Canto VII-15, Canto VIII-23, Canto IX-24, Canto X-26, Canto XI-32, Canto XII-13. Though the total was 341, Jagannatha expired after completing 328 chapters upto the end of Canto XI and afterwards the rest 13 chapters were added by his disciple Mahadeva, who pointed out in the first chapter of Canto XII that he had added 13 chapters to his master's original 328, thereby making it 341 in all. The total lines upto the end of Canto XII of the Bhagavata are 3006.

Subsequently another writer, named Dwarika Dasa (approximately, 1657-1736) witnessing a few lacunae in the Bhagavata of Jagannatha Dasa, added thirteen more chapters as Canto XIII, wherein he wrote about Srikrishna, Uddhava and Dvaraka, and discussed the details about the ultimate knowledge of truth such as Ekaksharajnana, Tattvajnana Upadesha, Saguna and Nirguna Brahma, Kayasrijana, Bibhutiyoga, Ghatantara Pravesha, etc. He has mentioned his name in some places as Dvaraka Jagannatha, whereas in some other places he has referred to Jagannatha as its author.

The Oriya Bhagavata has also got another part, otherwise known as Gupta Bhagavata, having twenty-four chapters, and it contains the name of Jagannatha Dasa as its author. But this Jagannatha Dasa was probably another Jagannatha Dasa who lived towards the later part of the 16th century, and was most likely a disciple of first Jagannatha Dasa. He inserted these chapters in the Bhagavata and named it as Gupta Bhagavata. He has explained in chapter one that Jagannatha Dasa (the original) had kept these chapters confidential, and they have now come to light and are named as Gupta Bhagavata or Chori Chavisha (The stolen twenty-four). This book contains two chapters on the birth of Sri Radha whereas the Sanskrit or the Oriya Bhagavata of Jagannatha have never referred to Radha at all.

There may not be many books in the whole of Indian literature that can be compared in depth and in pervasive influence with the Oriya Bhagavata of Jagannatha Dasa. The poet has not only referred to the customs, traditions and religious belief of the people of Orissa, but also to the duties of a householder, housewife, disciple and the king in a graphic manner.

Jagannatha followed the order of the eleven skandhas, adding a few chapters in some and dividing the original chapter into two chapters in some others. Due to this, his Bhagavata including the 12th Skandha of Mahadeva, had 341 chapters against 335 of the original, attested by the commentary of Shridhara.

Not content with these deviations, Jagannatha also added several details in almost every episode. Such additions are very significant in the 10th Skandha. They are: 1) Unlike as in the original, where Vasudeva takes Sri Krishna to Gopapur on his own volition, Jagannatha makes him do so on Sri Krishna's command. 2) Ugrasena sees Sri Krishna in the form of Vishnu, with Sankha, Chakra, Gada and Padma. These details are absent in the original. 3) In Jagannatha's work the serpent Kaliya bites Sri Krishna's tender feet instead of his chest. 4) In the episode of Brahma stealing the calves Balarama sees Sri Krishna as four-armed Vishnu in every calf created by Sri Krishna. This is absent in the original. 5) On the occasion of Vastra-harana, Sri Krishna orders the wind-god to take away the clothes of the gopis, instead of he himself stealing, as narrated in the original. 6) In the Rasalila episode, Sri Krishna left the Rasa ground with Brindabati, whereas the Sanskrit Bhagavata does not name any gopi. 7) Yasoda accompanied Sri Krishna to Mathura, a fact not to be found in the Sanskrit original. 8) Akrura's coming to Gopapur is also different in many ways. In Jagannatha's version Akrura comes to Gopapur with a letter from Kamsa and held out repeated threats to one and all, but all the cowherd boys appeared to him as Sri Krishna which confounded him. These details are absent in the original.

In Jagannatha's version, the demons on being killed by Sri Krishna merge into him. The Bhaktas like Vasudeva, Ugrasena, Akrura, etc. constantly remember his name. This is not that important in the original Sanskrit Bhagavata.

Thus Jagannatha not only cannot forget that Sri Krishna is the Lord Himself but also emphasises the merit of three of the nine categories of devotion (Nabadha Bhakti, i.e. recollecting the Name, hearing the Name and repeating the Name, whereas in the original, Sri Krishna is sometimes portrayed as a human being and almost equal stress is laid on all the nine categories of devotion.

Bhagavata of Jagannatha was universally accepted in Orissa as the holiest of the holy books and also as a piece of good literature. As a holy book, it popularised Vaishnavism and was credited as the greatest of scriptures (Parama Sastra) for Orissa Vaishnavas. Again as a piece of literature, Jagannatha's Bhagavata still remains unsurpassed. Its strength primarily lies in its use of language—simple, precise, colloquial and idiomatic—which was, and continues to be, the standard Oriya, both spoken and written, and is still studied and mastered as embodying the highest knowledge.

RAMAYANA: Balarama Dasa wrote his Ramayana in Dandibritta variety of prose rhythm. This is why his Ramayana is known as Dandi Ramayana. The peculiarity of this form is that though the first line consists of twelve letters, the second line can even exceed from fourteen to twenty-five and though uneven, the metre is put to music and sung by popular religious singers.

Balarama Dasa was probably born between 1460-70 and completed the writing of his Ramayana when he was thirty-two years old, as he indicates in the last chapter of Uttarakanda: "Janmaru murukha mu alapa bayasa, Grantha kalebelaku bayasa batisa" i.e., "I am a fool from the beginning. I am very young in age. I am thirty-two years old by the time the book is completed". He had, however, an excellent command over both Sanskrit and Oriya and grasped fully the significance of the Valmiki Ramayana.

The Lankakanda of his Ramayana tells us that its third name was Mahanataka. This probably is in imitation of Hanumannataka or Mahanataka of Madhusudan Mishra in Sanskrit.

Dandi Ramayana is not a literary translation but an Oriya imitation of Valmiki Ramayana. It is a store-house of the Oriya customs and traditions, rites and rituals, feasts and festivities and the folk tales. The author has given a vivid description of the dress and ornaments of the Oriya women particularly at the time of marriage. The dresses and ornaments of the forest tribes of Orissa are also reflected in the line describing the welcome given to Rama by Guhaka in his forest.

Describing Rama's wanderings after Sita's abduction, Balarama Dasa depicts the hero visiting the sacred places of Orissa. He has made Rama bathe in the rivers like Chitrotpala, Chandrabhaga, Prachi, Rishikulya and visit Konarka, Ekamre (i.e. Bhubaneswar), Puri and Alabukesvara where Gods like Surya, Krittivasa (Lingaraja), Srijagannatha, Alabukesvara were worshipped by Rama. Ramachandra also paid his obeisance to Goddess Ramachandi near Konarka and to Rameshvara at Bhubaneshwar.

In the Adikanda, the poet's treatment of the Jarata and Rishyasringa's episode differs from that of the Valmiki Ramayana. Among the changes and additions made by Balarama Dasa, the following may be mentioned: the abduction of Lilavati and Baka-panchak episode, the boon given to the Kukkuti, the squirrels' help in Setubandha, the battles of Lakshmana with Kartikeya, Siva and Brahma and their defeat, the invitation to Ravana at Setubandha, the Santhapanda episode at the time of Lakshmana's Saktisela and the Urvasi-Mitra-Varuna episode, etc. To Balarama Dasa the Kailasa mountain was located in Orissa, being none other than the Kapilasa hill of Dhenkanal. In the Kishkindha Kanda, the rude tribes of Ranapur, Bamanda and Bonai States have been mentioned among the soldiers recruited by Rama. Ravana does penance at Jajpur in Orissa to get the blessings of its presiding deity Viraja.

Dandi Ramayana of Balarama Dasa was one of the earliest Ramayanas written in any modern Indian language.

RAJASTHANI

RAMAYANA: The story of Rama has always been very popular in Rajasthan. It has always exerted the greatest influence on the formation of the mind and morals of people. The theme has been adopted by many poets and singers in their own way, and Mehoji is the most revered among the poet.

The glory of his Ramayana spread far and wide in no time. It was selected to be sung and recited in Jagarana (night awakening) ceremonies of Visnoi sect in the life time of its founder Jambhoji.

Mehoji's Ramayana is composed in 261 couplets and is singable in various metres and musical modes (Raga-Raginis), like Bhuvaro, Suhava, Dhanasi, Ramagiri, Hamso, Malava or Jaitsri. The story of this work tallies with that of Ramacharitamanasa in general but deviates when it incorporates prevalent folk legends and to his non inventions.

Mehoji in the end of the Ramayana explains the merits of singing and reciting his Ramayana with the words that all those punyas which are earned by bathing in the 68 Tirthas (holy places) can easily be earned by listening to the Ramayana only.

Mehoji's Ramayana is a successful legendary poem. It bears all the qualities of good poetry. It may be said to be the first composition of its kind related to the story of Rama in Rajasthani literature of the 16th century. In respect of subject matter, poetic form, language and style, motto behind its composition, beauty of its poetic qualities and the depiction of the Society of Marwara, it can be said to be an important work. One can easily hear the beats of human sentiments in the hearts of its characters. Though the characters are endowed with supernatural powers, they resemble the human beings of this mortal world, as they have the same experiences and expressions of the sorrows and joys as a human being has. It is full of effective dramatic dialogues according to its contexts, with the ability to move the story ahead. The narrations of this composition are very short and at places they seem to be the short notes only. The poet has presented the effective descriptions of the war with the help of the similes which are popular in the local dialects.

The composition has the full impact of the Rajasthani atmosphere. The characters are always found busy with some creative works such as Rama digging the tank, Lakshamana constructing its bank and Sita carrying water from the tank. Mehoji has successfully examined the interest and the mind of the people. His composition has been given the cultural background of the society and has provided a great source of pleasure and inspiration.

We find in it the correct form of the spoken language of the general mass of the western Rajasthan in the 16th century. Almost all the proverbs, idioms and anecdotes used in this composition are still in use, and as such it presents a reliable material for the linguistic and social study of that period.

SANSKRIT

The idea of translation from one Indian language into another is virtually a borrowed concept from the West; that is why there are only some random attempts at adaptation only till the 19th century in Sanskrit literature, and no translation, literal or liberal, from any of the rich assets in modern Indian literatures.

Some of these which deserve mention here are adaptations from Kannada compositions which blazed a new trail in writing Puranas on Virasaiva saints on the one hand and in attempting easy summaries of subjects like Vedanta. The foremost of this kind is Kanchi Sankara Aradhya's Basavapurana (15th century), an adaptation of the life history of Sri Basavesvara, adapted from Kannada and Telugu sources of Bhimakavi and Palkurike Somanatha respectively. Similar is Prabhulila, a much later Purana of Immadi Gurusiddha Sivayogi (1700), which narrates in ornate poetic language the biography of the highly esteemed Virasaiva saint Allama Prabhu.

There is ample evidence to prove that the Sanskrit influenced sufficiently the Sindhi literature during its early (712-1520) and middle (1520-1843) period of development. Unfortunately, considerable portion of Sindhi literature produced by Sindhi Hindu writers during these periods has not come as yet to light.

As regards the great works of Sanskrit in Sindhi, the only one published during the pre-British period (712-1843) seems to be a version of the Mahabharata. It is not an adaptation or a translation of the Sanskrit epic, but seems to be an independent recension of the Mahabharata, based upon legends and tales regarding Kauravas and Pandavas. The existence of this work came to light from Mujmil-al Tawarikh, a Persian manuscript narrating stories about the ancient history of Sindh, about the Mahabharata heroes, and about some later kings of India from the Puranas. The original source of this information as mentioned in Mujmil-al-Tawarikh was a written work in some Indian language, which was translated into Arabic by Abu Salih. Sunitikumar Chatterji after critically studying the proper names of the Mahabharata characters as given in Persian in Mujmil-al-Tawarikh has come to the conclusion that the original work in Indian language must have been in an old Sindhi language.

The standardization of Perso-Arabic script for Sindhi in 1853 by the British government and its propagation gave momentum to the production of Sindhi literature. It is due to the efforts of these writers that a good number of Sanskrit works were brought into Sindhi.

During this period, the first work in Sindhi which was originally based upon the Sanskrit literature seems to be Toenama; it was adapted from Persian Tutnamah by Udharam Thawardas in 1860. The Persian work itself is a rendering of a book of stories in Sanskrit named Sukasaptati. Ratnavali of Harsha Deva is the first play rendered into Sindhi in 1888 by Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani another educationist, social reformer and early prose-writer of Sindhi. Among other Sanskrit works rendered into Sindhi during the last century, following books are noteworthy.

Baital-Pachisi (an adaptation of Betalapanchavinsatika) by Gurdasmal Kripalani in 1890, Savitri (a legend of Savitri and Satyavan) by Hiranand Khemsingh in 1890, Sabha jo Singaru (selected tales from Panchatantra) by Hasaram and Sobhraj Advani in 1894, Hitopadesa with the same title by Jhamatmal Narumal Vaswani are some of the important adaptations of the last decade of the 19th century.

Among Sindhi plays, following works are based upon Sanskrit legends: Nala-Damayanti (1894) by Jethanand Bhiryai; Harishchandra (1895), and the Ramayana (1898) both rendered into Sindhi by Lilaram Vatanmal; Rama-Banavas (1897) (Rama's habitation in forests), by Deumal Gaganmal.

There are good number of philosophical works in Sindhi based upon Sanskrit texts. For example, Sri Yoga Darsan (1903) by Dayaram Gidumal Shahani: Upanisad-Gyan and Sanatan Dharma both published in 1925 by Jethmal Parsram; Daha Upanishad (Ten Upanishads) and Narad Bhakti Sutra by Tahilram Asudomal both published in 1932; Yoga Vasistha (1935) by Chainrai Bulchand Advani; Kathopanishad published by Balchand Samtani in 1943.

After the Independence of the country in 1947, lakhs of Sindhi Hindus migrated from Sindh and settled in different parts of India. Inspite of various hardships and suffering caused due to the partition, most of the Sindhi Hindus believed strongly in God. Hence, a lot of religious literature in Sindhi was published in India after 1947. Sanskrit epics are reprinted in Sindhi again and again.

There are a good many works in Sindhi on Vedic Philosophy. Prabhudas Brahmachari; 1904–1978) some months before his death had translated some portions of Yajur Veda with a commentary. He along with D. Tilokchand had started a monthly magazine Atma Darsan in Sindhi from Ajmer. It is still being published regularly and deals exclusively with Vedic philosophy and spiritualism.

It is evident, therefore that though a good many books on Vedic religion and philosophy are available in Sindhi, writers of this language have not yet paid much attention to the task of rendering into their mother tongue various masterpieces of Sanskrit literature in the field of poetry, drama and prose.

BHAGAVATA: In 1901, Sanatana Dharma Pracharak Sabha was established in Karachi. Under its auspices, a large corpus of literature pertaining to Hindu religion was brought out in Sindhi. The credit must go to Tejuram Sharma who brought into Sindhi abridged versions of the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, the Bhagavadgita, the Garuda Purana and many Hindu scriptures, He was the first to translate into Sindhi an abridged version of Shrimad Bhagavad Purana. The book is written in lucid style and contains brief notes on the philosophy of the Bhagavata.

During the first decade of the present century, another scholar Ramchand Murjmal brought out a book in Sindhi Shrimad Bhagavata Jo Yarhon Skandu (The eleventh chapter of Shrimad Bhagavata Purana, 1904), which contains in nutshell the main philosophy of the Bhagavata. Upto the year 1947, a few more renderings of this scripture were published in Sindhi. Besides, there were a few booklets on the philosophy of the Bhagavata in Sindhi, which stressed more on having 'bhakti' (devotion) than on acquiring 'Jnana' (knowledge) for attaining 'moksha' (the salvation).

After Independence, a few more renderings of the Bhagavata have been brought out in Sindhi like: Shrimad Bhagavata (1961) by Dvarkaprasad Rochiram Sharma. It contains in abridged form all the twelve chapters of the scripture.

Besides the above mentioned renderings of the Bhagavata Purana, there are a few short summaries and works explaining the philosophy of this great scripture of the Hindu religion. For instance, Dvarkaprasad Rochiram Sharma translated in Sindhi a book Bhagavata Bhashya (1962), originaly written in Hindi by Akhandananda Saraswati. This contains in detail the philosophy of the Bhagavata Purana. In 1960, Popati Hiranandani translated Shrimad Bhagavata of Swami Prabhavananda, who was working in Ramakrishna Mission. The book contains the summary of the 'purana' and detailed analysis of the philosophy of Bhagavata with special reference to the significance of Krishna—Udhava conversation. Another important work is Amrita Sindhu (An ocean of nectar) translated into Sindhi by Bhagvandas N. Gurbaxani. It contains selected legends and episodes from the Bhagavata Mahapurana and their philosophical message.

(But there is yet no full-fledged literal translation of the Bhagavata in Sindhi.)

All the available works are abridged translations in Sindhi prose, which occasionally explain its philosophical message.

TAMIL

The Tamil language along with most other fairly well grounded Indian languages has had a well-established tradition from the medieaval, if not ancient times, of successful adaptations often from Sanskrit. In this manner most of the 'itihasas' and 'puranas' were made available to the non-Sanskrit Tamil tradition. Sometimes exact translations also existed side by side but loose adaptations were the more praised and the more popular as for instance Kamban's adaptation of Valmiki's Ramayana which according to the Tamils, both general readers and critics, may sometimes appear to be better than the Valmiki text.

Later adaptations are too many. But by the 19th century, it was common practice in Tamil to take an original Sanskrit tale and retell it in a completely Tamil style giving the incidents in the original and the men and women a Tamil colour, local names and habitations. The first of the considerable prose works in Tamil, the Panchatantra stories, were translated from a Maharashtrian version according to the author, though he does not explain why he chose the Maharashtrian instead of the Sanskrit and more popular version. Evidently, the author Thandavaraya Mudaliar did not know Sanskrit but was familiar with Marathi, so he preferred to translate from a Marathi original, in the first half of the 19th century. Even though in large parts a translation, it is an extensive adaptation in the sense that the author wanted to grade the Tamil prose from the easiest in the first section to the most difficult in the last and fifth section, where no idea or object is represented by the same word, however often the word has to be used--an exercise in higher pedantry.

Another landmark in adaptation or translation of the same kind was that of the Tales of Vikramaditya from the southern recension available in Sanskrit but done in Tamil by the author, a Muslim, Ibrahim Shah Rowther in Islamic Tamil. In this version, it became a favourite of the Tamils and can be considered one of the best sellers in early Tamil.

The 19th century saw large scale adaptations of Indian puranic tales and legendary material into dramatised versions under the pressure created by the drama movement in the last four or five decades of the century. Many episodes in Krishna's life, in Arjuna's life and in Rama's were dramatised in addition to those from the lives of the saints of the Hindu calendar from Rukmangadha to Dhruva and others. Many of their dates are not known, but the coming of Sambanda Mudaliar on the drama scene, towards the last decade of the 19th century ushered in an era of wholesale adaptation, especially in the drama, both from Indian, English, and other sources.

It must be admitted that the earliest Tamil works show little semantic influence of Sanskrit: it is almost a rule in Tamil that the later a work, the greater the admixture of Sanskrit in it. However, the Tamils from the earliest days appear to have been aware of Sanskrit concepts, the religious ideas of the north and the Aindra Vyakarana which may have influenced the Tolkappiyam, the oldest known Tamil grammar.

Apart from taking some ideas from Sanskrit works, we do not hear of proper translations from Sanskrit during the Sangam era. The trend started later and today the number of translations from Sanskrit into Tamil exceeds 700. Perhaps because of the fact that there had been a vigorous efflorescence of original poetry in Tamil bound by its own conventions, there have been few translations of poetical works of literary value into Tamil. The fields in which the preponderant number of translations has been made from Sanskrit are religion and philosophy, and to a much lesser extent there have been translations from the literary works and from works on aesthetics.

K.N.S. — A.V.S.

BHAGAVATA : The Puranas are held to be as sacred and valuable as the Vedas and Agamas. There are eighteen Puranas which are classified into three equal divisions, viz., Satvika Puranas, Rajas Puranas and Tamasa Puranas, each having six sub-Puranas.

It is stated that Bhagavata is of seven kinds. They are (1) Itihasam (2) Puranam (3) Samhitai (4) Upasamhitai (5) Vishnurahasyam (6) Vishnuyamalam and (7) Gautama Samhitai. A study of each of these Bhagavata, it is believed, will yield different benefits of material and spiritual advantage. The Itihasa Bhagavatam will bestow knowledge, the Purana Bhagavatam will extirpate the sins, the Samhitai Bhagavatam will arouse the spirit of Bhakti, the Upasamhitai will root out the diseases, the Vishnurahasyam will give the desired things, the Vishnuyamalam will lead to eternal Bliss.

The seven Bhagavatas contain altogether 40,000 Sanskrit slokas. The benefits mentioned above are explained in the Gautamasamhitai. It seems that these Bhagavatas have not been either adopted or translated into Tamil except the first two–the Itihasa Bhagavata and Purana Bhagavata.

The Itihasa Bhagavata consisting of 18,000 Sanskrit slokas was composed by the sage Vyasa. ItihasaBhagavata is so called since it deals with the narration of Bhagavan's life story, his greatness, benevolence etc.

It is said that Ariyappa-p-pulavar had written an adaptation of the Sanskrit Bhagavata in poetic form in Tamil. There is also one adaptation bearing the name of Chevvai-c-Cutuvar as the author. But the Chevvai-c-Cutuvar Bhagavata and the Bhagavata by Ariyappa-p-pulavar are found to be the same. The total number of stanzas in both these adaptations and the number and the names of chapters under each 'skandha' are identical. R. Raghava Aiyangar is also of the view that the Bhagavata found in the name of Ariyappa-p-pulavar is in fact the work of Chevvai-c-cutuvar. Perhaps another name of Chevvai-c-cutuvar might be Ariyappa-p-pulavar.

Chevvai-c-cutuvar was born at Vempattur in Pandiyanadu. He belonged to the Choliya Brahmin community. He lived about 200 years ago. His adaptation contains 4970 stanzas. They are classified under 12 major divisions called skandhas. Each skandha contains several chapters.

The first edition was published in the year 1908. The stanzas are mostly in Viruttam verses. There are also verses in Taravu Kochaka-k-Kalippa, Kalinilaitturai and Vanchitturai. For each stanza word to word meaning is given. Another edition of this adaptation was brought out in 1944 by S. Kalyanasundara Aiyar. This edition is only the first volume of Chevvai-c-cutuvar's Bhagavata, containing the first nine skandhas. The meanings explained by U.V. Swaminata Aiyar of rare words in each stanza find place in this work. In the preface of the edition S. Kalyanasundara Aiyar states that the second volume of this adaptation containing tenth, eleventh and twelfth skandhas would be published as soon as the preparation of it is completed. But it does not seem to have been brought out. Each of the skandhas of the Chevvai-c-cutuvar Bhagavata contains several chapters. The Bhagavata begins with the invocatory poems on Lord Tirumal, Goddess Kalaimagal and on the sage Sukar. The first chapter deals briefly with the omnipotence of Lord Vishnu and mentions his various incarnations (Avatars) to restore Dharma in this world. The narration of the following important stories find place in the first nine skandhas of the Chevvai-c-cutuvar Bhagavata (1) Dharmaputtira becoming the king of Hastinapura after the defeat of the Kauravas in the war (2) Return of Lord Krishna to Dwarka (3) The birth of Parikshit (4) Creation of Brahma by Lord Vishnu (5) The Varaha Avatar of Lord Vishnu (6) The birth of Devas (7) The destruction of Dakkan's sacrifice by Virabhadra (8) Duruva's penance (9) The stories of the king Prithu and Bharata (10) Lord Vishnu's Narasimha Avatar and Iraniyan's death (12) The Churning of the ocean by Devas and Asuras (13) the Vamana and Matsya Avatars and (15) The stories of Aricchandira, Sagaram, Baghirata, Rama and Santanu.

The tenth skandha is the biggest of the twelve skandhas. The whole of the skandha deals with the significance of Krishnavatar in various prespectives. Krishna's birth and his being brought up by Yasoda and Nandagopan at Gokula, Kamsa's several attempts through the Asuras to kill Krishna and their destruction by Krishna with his divine power, Krishna's pranks with the Gopikas, Kamsa's death at the hand of Krishna, Krishna's marriage with Rukmini, and killing of Sisupala by Krishna and thereby enabling him to attain eternal bliss are the important stories narrated in detail in the tenth skandha. The eleventh and the twelfth skandha deal with the marriage of Arjuna with Subhadra the sister of Krishna, Krishna's trick of making Basmasura kill himself with his own hand, the sage Bhrighu's tests of three supreme Gods and his realisation of Lord Vishnu as the God of Satvaguna, Krishna's sermons to Uddhava to attain salvation, the destruction of the Yadavas as a result of the curse of the sages at the sacred place called Pindarakam, Balaram and Krishna returning to Vaikunta on account of the advent of Kaliyuga and its effects on the world, the death of the King Parikshit caused by the bite of the serpent called Takshaka, Markandeya's penance and his vision of the nature of the Maya by the grace of Lord Vishnu and the divine effects of the study of Bhagavata.

The Purana Bhagavata was also originally composed by the sage Vyasa. It contains 36,000 Sanskrit slokas divided into 600 chapters. It has no larger divisions as skandhas. This work is also known as Maha Bhagavata. An adaptation of this Maha Bhagavata in Tamil poetic form was done by Madurakavi Varadaraja Aiyangar about 350 years ago. He was called Arulaladasar with reverence. He was a native of Nellinagar. The adaptation was done in two volumes consisting of 9147 Virutta verses in total. There are seventy eight patalas or chapters in the first volume having 4664 Virutta verses. It was edited by T.V. Sinkiri Nayakkarand, printed and published by Vidyaratnakara Printing Press, Madras in 1923. The second volume consists of seventy two chapters having 4483 Virutta verses. It was jointly edited by Muttusami Aiyar, Tiruchirrambalam Pillai and Tirumalaikonda Nayakkar and was printed and published by the Vidyaratnakara Printing Press in 1928.

The first part begins with invocation to Lord Vishnu and other Gods in six Virutta verses. Next to the invocation poems there is a chapter named Tiruvaranga-p-patalam consisting of 155 stanzas, in which the sacred place of Tiruvarangam, the divine greatness of Lord Tirumal at Tiruvarangam, the Kaveri river, and the places of Irajamannarkuti, Tirumuttam and Tirunarayanapuram that are held to be highly sacred by Alwars, are praised. Following the Naimisaranya-p-patalam which is the next chapter consisting of 130 stanzas there are three chapters viz., Arrupatalam, Nattupatalam and Nagarapatalam having 20, 28, and 67 stanzas respectively. These three chapters which deal with the descriptions of the river, country and the city and the chapter Tiruvaranga-p-patalam are not found in the Chevvai-c-cutuvar Bhagavata. It is evident that these chapters are included by Varadaraja Aiyangar in accordance with the purana tradition. The first volume ends with the 78th chapter-Dwarakapuri-p-patalam. The second volume continues with 79th Chapter–Rukmani Tirukkalyanam and ends with 132nd Chapter–Vainateya-p-patalam.

The whole of tenth skandha translated by Ramanujadasar in Manipravala language (i.e. an admixture of Sanskrit and Tamil) was published by Aranganayaka Chettiar about 115 years ago. The translation contains ninety chapters. The first chapter narrates the imprisonment of Vasudeva and Devaki by Kamsa and each one of their children being killed by Kamsa as a result of the divine warning to him to the effect that he would be slayed by their eighth son. The whole story of Krishna Avatar is narrated in detail in the rest of the chapters. The 90th and the final chapter dwells on the benign rule of Krishna as a king of Dwaraka and his happy life with his eight crown queens and other sixteen thousand one hundred wives. The pangs of the wives at the separation of Krishna and their rapturous joy while they are with him are articulated in the chapter. Several sons were born to them of whom eighteen are mentioned to be the stalwarts.

A translation of the first nine skandhas into Tamil prose with the title Srimad Bhagavatam was edited and published by Sridharan Company, Madras, in July 1921. The translator's name is not known. The text of Sanskrit sloka is given first followed by its Tamil translation. Some of the Chevvai-c-cutuvar's poems are quoted in the translation. At the beginning of each chapter the gist of it is given in two or three sentences.

There is an adaptation of the whole of twelve skandhas of the Bhagavata in Tamil prose entitled Srimad Bhagavatam. It was written by Kartikeya, and its first edition was brought out by Vasu Parasuram, Madras, in October 1969 and its second edition in July 1980. The book covers the entire substance of the Bhagavata in 115 chapters. The language is so simple as to impress even the ordinary readers.

There are thirty seven unpublished Tamil Bhagavata manuscripts written on palm leaves in the Oriental Manuscript Library, Madras. They comprise translations, adaptations and critical studies of the Bhagavata which can be useful to those who are interested in the study of Bhagavata.

Besides narrating the stories of various Avatars of Lord Vishnu and their significance, the Bhagavata throws light on several important features.

The origins of various lineages or 'vamsam' and the descendants of each of them are explained in detail. For instance, Guruvamsam, Raghuvamsam, Suriavamsam, Chandravamsam and Yatuvamsam are dealt with vividly.

That one can acquire enormous spiritual power by doing severe penance is emphasised throughout the Bhagavata. The sons of Dakka attained eternal bliss by the sheer severity of penance; the sage Dadhichi discarded his physical body and attained Moksha with his strength of Yoga. Hiranyakasipu got a boon from Brahma to the effect that he should have an invincible strength and that he should not be subjected to death either by men, beasts and other beings or by Asuras and Devas as a result of his fiery penance.

The Bhagavata abounds in moral, religious and philosophical ideas. The man who is seized with egoism will have his downfall however strong and powerful he may be. This is illustrated in the lives of many heroes and also in the case of Indra and other Devas. Basmasura who obtained a boon from Lord Siva that one should die at the touch of his head with his (Basmasura's) hand became overwhelmingly egoistic and attempted to test his boon on Lord Siva himself, and ultimately by the trick by Lord Krishna, he himself perished placing his hand on his own head.

The divine effect of Bhakti is stressed in the Bhagavata. The person who cherishes boundless devotion to the Almighty would be completely devoid of the worldly attachment and would attain eternal bliss. One who constantly hears the sacred stories of the Bhagavata would attain the divine path of Bhakti. God is bound by his devotee's intense Bhakti and he acts according to their wishes. Expression of similar sentiments on Bhakti are found all over the book.

MAHABHARATA: Adaptation of the Mahabharata in epic form in Tamil is quite late, as Villi's Mahabharatam came out only in the 14th century. But we have ample references to Lord Krishna and the Mahabharata incidents in ancient literature.

The Nalayiram of the Alvar, being Vishnava Bhakti literature, relates the childhood of Krishna in various verses.

Bharata Venpa of Peruntevanar (7th century) is extinct now. Only a few stanzas of it are available in the commentaries of certain grammars like Tolkappiyam and Virasoliyam, and in the anthology Purattibirattu. The Pandiya inscriptions refer to the Tamil translation of Mahabharatam and the establishment of the Madurai Tamil Sangam. This might correspond to the above epic. Bharatam Padiya Peruntevanar, who composed the invocation songs of most of the Sangam anthologies, should be this author.

We hear of yet another Bharata Venpa by an author of the same name Peruntevanar (9th century). Prose and verse mix in this composition and so can be considered a Champu Kavya. Only a fragmentary portion of 830 stanzas is available now. Udyoga, Bhishma and Drona Parva portions occur in this. The poetic portions are the dialogues of different characters, while the prose passages are narrative in nature. The first full edition was by Pandita Gopalayar (1925). The last portion, Svargarohana Paruvam, containing 339 verses came to light only later (1950), through Saraswati Mahal.

Through an inscription, we just know of another translalation of the Mahabharata, during the reign of Kulottungan III (13th century).

The period starting from Villi till date, gives us the following account.

Villiputturar (14th century) was patronised by the Kongar king Varapati Atkontan, and according to his wish, the poet translated the epic. The Sanskrit Mahabharata, by Agastiya Pattar is considered to be its original. Villi's Mahabharatam is in 10 paruvam of 4345 viruttam verses, and ends with the 18th day war in the camp. The epic has a special preface by the author's son, Varantaruvar.

The earliest edition (1861) is by Rajagopala Pillai; editions by the Madurai Tamil Sangam (1926), N. Kadirvel Pillai (1933), S. Rajam (1939) are worth mentioning. Abridged editions are by A. Muttupillai (1903) and M. Pon. Ramanathan Chettiyar (1970). Commentaries by S. Krishnamachariyar and Srinivasachariyar, are available.

In the 18th century Astavadhana Aranganata Kavirayar added 2477 verses to Villi's epic and completed it. This edition came out in 1962, edited by Govinda Pillai.

Yet another attempt to expand the work was taken up by Nallappillai and Murukappillai in the end of the same century. They added 11,000 verses to the beginning, middle and the end. This complete work in 18 'paruvam' of 132 Carukkam has 15,300 verses. This Nallappillai Bharatam was published in two volumes by Mutturamalinga Tevar (1838). Another edition was by A. Sundaranatha Pillai (1911).

Mavintam, also known as 'Mavinta puranam' of an unknown period, gives the Bharata story in 1378 'viruttam' verses (Saraswati Mahal. 1950).

Other than these, episodes and incidents of this epic have developed into separate works. Pugazhenti's Nala venpa (13th century) is the earliest. Nala's story was again given in epic form as Naitatam by Adivirarama Pandiyan (16th century). This was based on Harsha kavi's Naishada.

Arichantira Puranam (16th century) by Virai Asukavirayar and Arichantira venpa (18th century) by an unknown author, give the story of Harischandra, found as an episode in the Mahabharata.

In the 17th century, on the request of Maduvaippati Timmarayan, Ampalattatumayyan, composed the history of Shantanu as Atiparuvat tati paruvam, also known as Atiparuvattantati (1951).

The Bharata story is found in folk literary forms also. Vaikunta Ammanai in 7500 lines, Tarumar Asuvameta yaka Ammanai (Arunachalam Chettiyar), Nalac chakkaravartti Ammanai (N. Ekambara Mutaliyar), Maha Baratak kummi (Ramasami Kavirayar), Darumar Asuvameta yakap puranam (Saravanak kavirayar), Mahabharata vilasam-Aruccunan tapasu (Ramanuja Swami), are such examples.

The story and its parts were largely adapted into dramatic form in the 19th century. Arakkumalikai Natakam, Aravan kalabali Natakam (1897), Aruchunan Tapacu Natakam (1891), Arichantiran vilasam (1867), Ariccantiran Natakam (1898) Krishnan Dutu Natakam (1897), Sutu Tukilurital Natakam (1870), Damayanti Natakam (1877), Daruma Puttira Natakam (1890), Nala Vilasam (1882), Sri Mahabharata Vilasam (1882), are some such examples. The Nala and Harishchandra stories are dramatised most.

In the 20th century Mahakavi Bharatiyar gave it a patriotic flavour, in his Panchali Sapatam. It was translated by H.K. Valam in English (1972) and in Hindi (1977).

Translations of Vyasa's Mahabharata are also many. Complete and part-translations are available in prose and verse. Mahabharata Surukkam (H.W. Subbarayalu Naidu, 1880), Mahabharatam (Ramanuja Naidu, 1899), Mahabharatam vachana Kaviyam (Muttusami Mudaliyar, 1855), Viyasar Aruliya Mahabharatam (A.L. Natarajan, 1964) are a few worthy of special mention. Rajaji's (1973) and Krupanandavari's (Sri Mahabharata 1965) are laudable works in prose.

RAMAYANA: The Tamil Ramayanas are mostly adaptations. True translations of original works are very rare and have come out only very recently.

The most important and well known work of the middle age is Iramakatai by Kamban of 10th century. Though this is the only work available in full form, there are ample references to others which would have existed in the early periods.

The time span from Sangam literature to Kamban, a length of ten centuries, comes under pre-Kamban period. Many brief and stray references to the story of Rama are found in the literature of this period. These help us to conclude that the story was well known and many Ramayanas might have existed. It is interesting to note that a few of these references are novel and are not found in the Ramayanas of other languages.

Akananuru relates the scene where Rama quietens the sound of birds in the tree, which disturbs his discussion with Sugriva, about the redeeming of Sita.

Purananuru gives another incident. The abducted Sita throws down her ornaments and the monkeys of Kishkindha come across the jewels, and because of their ignorance wear these in a disorderly manner.

Paripatal provides a reference to the episode of Akalikai (Ahalya). Here, the act of Indra leaving the hut after adultery in the form of a cat, is described.

The epic Silappatikaram compares the grief of Pukar, on the leaving of Kovalan, to that of Ayodhi on the departure of Rama (13.63-66). Kavunti, a character in this epic, quotes the story of Rama (14.46-49) to console Kovalan. In it she refers to Rama, going off with his wife, obeying the orders of his father, and becoming sorrowful on her loss. The reference to the marriage ritual of stepping on the grinding stone, found in this epic while describing the marriage ceremonies of Kovalan and Kannagi, is actually a symbolic residue of the Akalikai story.

Manimekalai relates the construction of 'setu' across the sea by the monkeys to help Rama. Most of these references come as similes.

The devotional literature of the Tamils, by Nayanmar (Tirumurai) and Alvar (Nalayiram), gives ample references to the story of Rama. Gnana Sambhandar and Tirunavakkarasar place the devotion of Ravana in the 8th and 10th verses respectively of most of their Patikam. Gnana Sambhandar portrays the death of Jatayu in his fight with Ravana. Tirunavakkarasar relates the story of Vali and exalts Siva for relieving Rama of his fatigue. Manikkavacakar in Tiruvacakam exalts the grace of Siva towards Mandodhari.

Nalayiram, being Vaishnava literature, gives more place to the story of Rama. The lament of Dasaratha on the separation of Rama is given by Kulasekarar. The message sent by Rama through Hanuman to Sita forms the theme of Periyalvar's verses. Tontaratippoti in his Tirumalai exalts the squirrel which did its mite in helping to build the 'setu'. Tirumankai praises certain valorous acts of Rama.

Other than these scattered references, from the commentaries of certain grammars and from anthologies, we come to know of certain Tamil Ramayanas. Yapparunkalavirutti (10th century) mentions a Ramayana in long 'venpa' metre. Purattirattu (15th century), an anthology of ancient stray verses, has a few stanzas on Râma's story, which may be fragments of a Ramayana in 'asiriya' metre.

Kamban was born in Tiruvaluntur of Chola country and was fostered by the benevolent Chataiyan of Tiruvennainallur. Though he named his creation Iramavataram or Iramakatai, it is more well known with his name prefixed as Kambaramayanam. This epic is made up of six kandas, 118 patalam and 10368 verses. This number varies according to different editions, because of interpolations.

Kamban's work is not a translation of Valmikis's epic. It is not even an adaptation, but a transcreation. The marked differences between the two epics in construction, incidents and characterisation, confirm this idea. Traditional ideas of Rama's story in the Tamil land, the cultural background of the natives and the creative capability of the poet would have effected this.

Differing from Valmiki who shows Rama as a great perfect human hero, Kamban exalts him as God incarnate of Vishnu. The ancient references to his story in the Tamil vernacular provide the base for this. Names Mayon and Netiyon used to indicate Vishnu are used to refer to Rama in the originals of the earlier references. Kamban also portrays Sita as the embodiment of Goddess Lakshmi. Rama is even shown to be the ultimate One, greater than the Three.

The character of Rama and Sita are idealised and they are shown devoid of any human error of thought, word or action. Because of the love for his native country, Kamban shows Rama to be the descendent of the Chola King Manu. This idea of Kamban is not mere myth, but is based on the inscriptions of Cape Comorin.

The pre-marital love of Rama and Sita, the chastity of the widowed Tara, the act of Ravana carrying Sita away from the hut, his fear to touch her, are a few novel aspects in the main story. The addition of Hiranya Vadha is an original episode in Kamban. It forms an integral part by being a miniature parallel plot to the main story. Though we come across references to the story of Hiranya in the Sangam anthology Paripatal, and the epic Silappatikaram the full developed form is given only by Kamban.

The first edition is fragmentary and gives Kamban's Iraniyan vadaip patalam as Pirakaladan Charittiram enra Narashinga Vijayam (1842). Till date there are more than 60 different editions, of which nine are complete. Of the available editions, the one of A. Rangasami (1914) is the earliest. But through other sources we come to know of certain earlier editions. Through the preface of S. Murrey Rajam's edition (1958-59), we get knowledge of a complete edition by Pungattur Kantasami Mutaliyar (1863-64). Through Mayilal Seni Venkatasami's 19th century History of Tamil Literature, we know of yet another anonymous edition (1886).

Kambaramayanam has been published in many volumes with commentary by Vai. Mu. Gopalakrishnamachariyar (1926-32) and U.V. Swaminatha Aiyar (1957-72). The Annamalai University edition (1955-70) gives textual variations also. An abridged edition by Ve. Pa. Cu. Mudaliyar (1936-53) is also available.

As a continuation of Kamban's magnum-opus, Ottakkuttar (12th century) composed the Uttarakandam in 30 patalam of 1532 verses. This is published together with Kamban's epic by Ramaratna Aiyer (1926).

Kakuttan Katai by Kunatittancey (12th century) and the anonymous Ramayana Venpa (15th century) are available only in name. Through Sripuranam we just hear of Jaina Ramayanas, prior to 14th century. A folk version of Ramayana, viz, Takkai Ramayanam of unknown period is available in manuscript form. We also hear of Amirta Ramayanam by A. Darumalinga Mudaliyar.

Kuyil Ramayana or Kokila Ramayana of unknown authorship has been published by Saraswati Mahal Library (1969). It is in 128 viruttam verses, all ending as 'kuvay kuyile', addressed to the cuckoo and hence the name.

Prior to 18th century one Bala Bharati composed Rama's story in Chhanda viruttam metre. Iramanatakak Kirttanai (1771) by Arunachalak Kavirayar is an adaptation in dramatic form with mellifluous songs (1867). This, as well as Iramayana Venpa (19th) of Tanjai Subramaniya Mudaliar (1930) are completely based on Kamban's epic. The latter has 9379 verses in venpa metre. There are also other brief ones like Narayanaswami Aiyer's Iramayana akaval, Rajasekara Mudaliyar's Iramayana Oratik Kirttanai and Bala Ramayanam by R. Ayyasami is written for children.

Many adapted versions in folk lore forms are also available, like Ramayana elappattu (Srinivasa Aiyangan), Ramayana chintu (Satagopa Aiyangar), Sri Ramar Talattu, Sri Rama Vanavasam Ammanai (Ramalinga Pillai?)

More than twenty dramas have come out on the Ramayana theme like, Rama Natakam (1896), Iravana Samhara Natakam (1899), Uttara Ramacharitam (1878), Sitakalyanam (1889), Paduka Pattabhiseka Natakam. Ekai Siva Shanmugam Pillai's Sampurna Ramayanam is well known (1970).

If not the complete story, many sections and episodes of the Ramayana have developed into individual works. Iraniyan natakam (1888), Pirakalata vilasam (1876), Tadakai Samharanatakam are a few in dramatic form. Iraniyan allahu inaiyarra viran by Bharathi Dasan (1939), Akalikai venpa by Ve. Pa. Subiramaniya Mudaliyar, 'Sapa Vimochanam' and 'Naradaramayanam', short stories by Putumaippittan are quite famous.

Compositions against Ramayana and Kamban have also come in Tamil, viz, Kimayanam, Ti paravattum by Anna Durai (1943). Ravanakaviyam (1946) in 3100 verses by Pulavar Kughandai was banned for 23 years.

Prose and verse translations, for the full epic or its parts are available. Valmiki Ramayana is translated most. Adyatma Ramayana Vachanam by V. Balakrishna Mudaliyar (1903), Ananta Ramayanam by Ganapati Sastriyar (1910), Uttara Ramayana Vachanam (1906) and Valmiki Ramayanam (1910) by T.M. Srinivasa Raghavachari are quite famous.

Tulsi's Ramcharitmanas was translated by Srinivasachari (1916),S.Ambujammal (1942), T.Venkatakrishnayyanagar (1967) and S. Jagannarayanan (1971).

Kalidasa's Raghuvamsa is given in Tamil by M.S. Natesa Sastri, Nallur Ponnambalam Pillai, and S.A. Ramasami.

Kavya Ramayanam (1971) by K.S. Srinivasan helps a comparative study of Valmiki and Kamban. T. Venkatakrishna Ayyangar has compared Valmiki with Tulsi in 6000 verses (1975), which is quite novel.

TELUGU

Telugu literature had its beginning in the adaptation of Vyasa's Mahabharata by Nannaya. He bowed to the greatness of the sage Vyasa and expressed his inability to translate Vyasa's thoughts into Telugu. He compared the impossibility of this work to the absurdity of the task of counting the stars in the sky. Tikkana and Errapragada also followed in the footsteps of Nannaya while adapting Mahabharata.

In the 13th century Ketana wrote Andhra Bhasha Bhushanamu by adapting Nagavarma's Kannada treatise on prosody Karnata Bhasha Bhushanam.

Nandi Mallayya and Ghanta Singana adapted the Sanskrit play Prabodha Chandrodaya written by Krishna Misra into a champu Prabandha with the same name.

Kaluva Viraraju adapted Vyasa's Mahabharata into his Vachana Bharatamu.

By adapting the Sanskrit classics Telugu literature enriched itself and the process continues to enhance the scope and variety of Telugu literature.

BHAGAVATA: The first attempt to render the Bhagavata into Telugu was made by Potana, the saint poet of the 15th century. By this time, several poets attempted translations and adaptations of the Mahabharata and the Ramayana, but nobody thought of the Bhagavata. Potana considered it his good fortune to be in a position to undertake this work, somehow left unattempted by his predecessors. And the way in which he handled the work testifies that Telugu language could not have found a better person to do the job.

A Saivite by birth and a devotee of Rama by temperament, Potana decided to sing the glory of Krishna, the Jagadguru. This itself is an evidence of the composite personality Potana possessed. Even the language employed by him presents a pleasant blending of simple native vocabulary and sophisticated Sanskrit compounds. He uses both prose and poetry depending upon the context and handles both with excellence, ease and elegance. The technique of rendering the Sanskrit works into Telugu poetry developed so well by the time Potana started his Andhra Mahabhagavatam that his job was merely to imbibe all the virtues of his predecessors and contemporaries. Added to this, Potana was gifted with a fascinating flow of words which carry the sense direct to the heart. It is easy even for a child to remember his verse because of this mellifluence. It is difficult to come across an average Telugu person who does not know by heart at least four or five stanzas from Potana's Bhagavata. This shows the overwhelming popularity of this work even till today.

The Telugu rendering of the Bhagavata by Potana is more voluminous than the original. The main reason for this increase in volume was that Potana was not content with what the original text contained. He borrowed much from some of the allied works like Vishnu Purana, Harivamsa and Nrisimha Purana and tried to make his presentation more colourful, comprehensive and captivating than the original.

The common notion is that Potana wrote the entire Bhagavata. But the fact is that three of his close associates-Gangana, Singana and Naraya helped him in this great task. According to some, Potana wrote the entire Bhagavatam, but some portions of it were destroyed for some unknown reasons and these were rewritten by his three associates who were either his close relatives or intimate pupils. Whatever may be the reason, in the text available today we have only the first four and the middle four (seventh to tenth parts) Skandhas of Andhra Mahabhagavatam written under the name of Potana. The fifth part is supposed to have been written by Gangana, son of Boppana, the sixth by Singana, son of Kasuvayya and the last two parts by Veligandala Naraya. Thus, out of the twelve parts of this celebrated work, Potana's share was about two thirds. But still the average Telugu reader considers Potana as the author of the entire Andhra Mahabhagavatam.

Apart from the authorship of Andhra Mahabhagavatam, Potana incidentally happens to be a pioneer in the field of Bhakti movement, particularly in the branch of Krishna cult. He was almost a contemporary of Vallabhacharya and Sri Chaitanya, perhaps even their predecessor.

Almost a contemporary of Potana, another poet Madiki Singana by name, translated Dasama Skandha (tenth part) of the Bhagavata into Telugu poetry. Another work Rukmini Kalyanam by the same poet is also popular. Devaki Nandana Satakam, a book of hundred verses written by Vennelakanti Janna Mantri, also a contemporary of Potana, depicts the various sportive actions of Krishna. Several poets like Seshakavi, Bala Saraswati, Koneru Kavi and Bhavanarayana attempted to write on some of the popular episodes of Bhagavata like the story of Sudama, Radha, Satyabhama and Subhadra. The most popular among such works are Parijatapaharanam by Nandi Timmana of the 15th century and Radha Madhavam by Chintalapudi Yellanarya of more or less the same period. Both these poets flourished in the court of Krishnadevaraya and received royal patronage. It is said that by writing Parijatapaharanam, Nandi Timmana managed to settle a petty misunderstanding between the royal couple. The King was so much impressed by the other work, Radha Madhavam that he conferred the title of 'Radhamadhavam' on the poet.

There are some minor works of devotional significance like Krishna Lila Tarangani by Swami Narayana Tirtha (1700), which is in the form of a dance drama sung and staged on festive occasions. Outstanding lyricists like Kshetrayya and Annamacharya also sang in praise of Lord Krishna. But these works do not strictly come under the adaptation of Bhagavata though Krishna forms the central theme for them.

Kudurti Venkata Chalapathi wrote the entire Bhagavata in Telugu prose in the beginning of the 18th century. Vishnupurana was also translated by many, the most popular among the translations being that by Vennelakanti Surana. In recent times Sripada Krishna Murti Sastri (1866-1961), the first poet laureate of Andhra, rendered the entire Bhagavata into Telugu poetry. Later Puripanda Appalaswamy also presented it in simple and spoken Telugu idiom.

But Potana's Bhagavatam stands unique in the field of Bhagavata literature in Telugu.

I.P.R.

MAHABHARATA: The very first work in Telugu literature is the free poetic rendering of the Mahabharata. This was started by Nannayya Bhatt (1000-1060) who is considered to be the first classical poet in Telugu literature. He undertook the translation of Mahabharata at the instance of his patron King Raja Raja Narendra. Even though he set for himself a convenient plan and pattern of translation which should strictly be called transcreation, it was not given to him to complete the work in his life time. He could complete only the first two books Adi and Sabha and a part of the third one Aranyaparva. It was nearly after 200 years that another poet Tikkana (1200-1280) continued the work starting from the fourth book Viratparva. Single handed, he translated the remaining 15 books which formed the bulk of Mahabharata, as competently as Nannayya did. But the later half of Aranyaparva remained unfinished until a third poet, Erra Pragada (1280-1350) immediately following Tikkana undertook it. Thus the poetic rendering of the Sanskrit text Mahabharata is a result of the joint effort of three eminent poets who handled the task in three different centuries.

The Telugu rendering of the Mahabharata by the three eminent poets–Nannayya, Tikkana and Erra Pragada became so popular that no other poet thought of attempting it again until a recent poet Sripada Krishna Murthy Sastry (1866-1961) tried to present a modern version of this epic.

There are two translations of Jaimini Bharatam in parts–one by Pillalamarri Pina Veerabhadra Kavi of 15th century and the other by Samukham Venkata Krishnappa Nayakudu of 17th century. Several poets attempted translation of portions of the Mahabharata like the story of Harishchandra, Yayati, Tapati and even major characters like Arjuna. Vijaya Vilasam by Chemakura Venkata Kavi (17th century), Yayati Charitram by Ponnekanti Telaganna (16th century), Tapati Samvaranopakhyanam by Addanki Gangadharam are some of the important works of this category.

Vachana Bharatam of Kaluve Vira Raju of 18th century is perhaps the first prose rendering of this great epic. In recent times Puripanda Appalaswamy, rendered the whole Mahabharata in spoken Telugu.

There are some plays based on the Mahabharata in modern period. Kandukuri Viresalingam (1880) of Rajahmundry started the tradition by writing a play entitled Dakshina Gograhanam based on the story of Viratparva. Another playwright of the same period and the same place, Chilakamarti Laxminarasimham wrote three plays Keechaka Vadha, Gayopakhyanam and Draupadi Parinayam all published in 1889. Dharmavaram Krishnamacharya of Bellary published two plays Chitra Naleeyam and Brihannala at about the same time. Based on the horrifying incident of Draupadi's Manasamrakshanam, two playwrights Tallapragada Surya Narayana Rao (1909) and Kolachalam Srinivasa Rao (1921) wrote two plays Durnaya Durodaram and Draupadimanasamrakshanam. The most memorable plays based on the Mahabharata are the six plays written by the twin poets of Tirupati (1908-21). The whole story of the Mahabharata was divided into six parts and one play was written on each. Two of these plays became very popular and were staged in almost all parts of Andhra for about three to four decades. All these works helped in popularising the theme of the Mahabharata. There is a saying in Telugu that nothing can please the ears more than the Mahabharata and nothing can satisfy the taste more than the popular pudding 'vada'. This shows the popularity of the Mahabharata in Telugu land.

It is not an easy task to render an epic like Mahabharata, covering about hundred thousand verses in Sanskrit into contemporary, yet classical diction. This task becomes particularly difficult when there was no tradition of classical poetry established in Telugu. Nannayya therefore had to start the whole thing with a clean slate, as it were. He had to set for himself not only an acceptable and adaptable style in the grammatical and idiomatic structure of the language but also in the general criteria of ommissions and commissions in the scheme of transcreation suited to the taste and temperament of the people of his time. In his preamble to the work, Nannayya referred to the valuable help he received from his Kannada speaking colleague Narayana Bhatt. He compares this help to the one received by Arjuna from Krishna in the battle-field of Mahabharata.

Briefly speaking, Nannayya's technique of transcreation can be seen operating in two dimensions–in the choice of words and in the method of narration. In his choice of vocabulary, he made use of Sanskrit as well as the native tongue and tried to evolve a refined form of expression combining the best of the two. Regarding the method of narration, Nannayya found a golden mean between a faithful rendering and a free play of imagination. His idea was to present the material in a pleasant and palatable way so as to make his composition appear to be a Kavya and not an 'Itihasa' like the original. Thus in the hands of Nannayya, a Sanskrit Itihasa took the form of a Telugu epic to suit the taste and temperament of his times. All that he took from the original text was only the broad outline of the story and the sequence of events, but the method of narration, the construction of dialogues, the delineation of characters and the development of the plot were all the products of his own imagination and genius. That is why this translation should not be treated as a literal or mechanical one. It is a transformation or Vinirmana of the original content and form.

There was a pause in this work after the expiry of Nannayya towards the end of 11th century. Inspite of the best efforts made by Nannayya to evolve the most acceptable diction for Telugu poetry, it was not easily understood and appreciated by the masses. The Veerashaiva poets who emerged all of a sudden in the Telugu literary scene in the 12th century took advantage of this situation and developed a language and diction very close to the spoken idiom of the common man and most suited to the dissemination of religious thought. The language and the thought both became so popular that people were not prepared to accept anything classical or pedantic. But Tikkana, a poet of rare vision managed to revive the translation of Mahabharata using the same device designed by the Virashaiva poets. A devotee of Hariharanatha and a master of both—Sanskrit and Telugu, Tikkana adopted a style acceptable both to the scholars as well as the average reader. Tikkana had the rare gift of writing with depth as well as speed. He is said to have dictated the translation to one of his close associates in the same manner as the original Sanskrit is supposed to have been dictated by Vedavyasa to Vighneswara.

Sometime later, the third poet Erra Pragada completed the remaining portion of 'Aranyaparva' by adopting a style which has something in common with both Nannayya and Tikkana. Though there is some uniformity in the technique of translation adopted by the three poets, we find some distinct features in Nannaya and Tikkana. Nannaya attaches more importance to the choice of words, their refinement and their artistic assemblage while Tikkana pays attention to the natural and homely language more expressive and suggestive than their literal meaning. Both the poets present the theme in a dramatic form breathing life into their characters. They aim at poetic excellence in their presentation rather than mythological or legendary monotony. That is why they use their discretion in abridging certain portions while elaborating certain other places. Thus we find highly philosophical discussions and devotional texts like the Gita and the Sahasranam expressed in a nut-shell. The hundred and eight names of Sun-God enumerated by Dhoumya for the benefit of Yudhishthira are also cut short. But certain portions like Menaka's entry into the hermitage of Viswamitra, natural objects and events like ocean and spring find elaborate space. In short, the technique followed by the two poets is that of an epic which became a specimen for most of their successors including Erra Pragada who presents a judicious combination of both the personalities.

RAMAYANA: There is not one Ramayana but many versions of the Ramayana. This creative polysemy is unique in Telugu. The Ramayana is singular in Sanskrit; It is singular in Tamil; it is Kamban's Ramayana. In Telugu the Ramayana poems are a bumper crop from Ranganatha to Viswanatha. In prose or verse, by individual poets or a panel of poets, partial or complete, the Ramayanas may be classified into: translations or adaptations of Valmiki, translations of other Ramayanas in Sanskrit, translations of Ramayanas in some regional languages, Janapada or folklore Ramayanas. The Janapada Ramayanas as listed by Ramaraju are sixty one and the literary Ramayanas as listed by Papayyasastri are eighty five. So approximately the Telugu Ramayanas are a hundred and forty six. No other regional language shows such an impressive figure. The number may be greater as the scholars mention only those their scholarship could lay hands on. Sitapati mentions hundred and one poems and other prose works dealing with the Rama story. "There is hardly any branch of Telugu literature—Drama, Novel, Harikatha, Yakshagana, Song or Sataka—in which the story of Rama is not represented."

The Andhras regard Rama as their 'peculiar' (in its Latin sense) God. The Telugu country, particularly the Godavari region, is hallowed by Rama's feet, and Sita is their very Goddess.

> The Adikavya left the name
> Of Rama to be found, like a wild flower
> All over his dear country, left the deṣh
> Of Rama like a family of ghosts to people the steep rocks > and river banks, her natural sanctuaries.

No wonder there is Ramayana explosion in Telugu poetry. A south Indian king shouted for his arms after reading that Rama marched against Khara single-handed––a vivid example of the hold that the epic has on men's minds. These translations or adaptations raise two seminal literary and aesthetic problems, as we are concerned with these as works of art.

Most of the Ramayanas in Telugu should be called adaptations. They make use of the Ramayana story from Valmiki but take liberties with it adjusting it to their 'criticism of life' and individual talents and supplementing it with matter not traceable in Valmiki.

First, the Janapada or Folklore Ramayanas are dealt with in a lump, as there is no definite chronology for them. They are anonymous and are composed in the popular or 'vulgar' Telugu. They have the freshness of dew drops on the leaves of the forest and the insouciance and naivety of village belles and the rich dye of the customs and rituals among the rural folk. Ramaraju, known for his study of Ballad literature in Telugu, lists the following and remarks that there may be several unpublished Janapada Ramayana or Patalu which have eluded his notice: Kuchakonda Ramayana, Mekshagunda Ramayana, Sarada Ramayana, Sukshma Ramayana, Dharmapuri Ramayana, Samkshepa Ramayana, Guttenadeevi Ramayana, Adhyatma Ramayana, Chitti Ramayana, Adavi Govindnamalu, Santa Govinda Namalu, Pendli Govinda Namalu, Setugovinda namalu, Srirama Dandamulu, Ramakatha Sudharnavamu, Lankasarathi, Ramayana Gobbi pata, Srirama javali, etc. Individual episodes form the theme of many ditties or songs: the marriage of Santa, the ritual for the birth of children, Kausalya's nausea, birth of Rama, Rama's marriage, Rama's sulks, the hermitages, Sugriva's triumph, Keel's embassy, Angada's embassy, Lakshmana's swoon, Rama's coronation, Lakshmana's laugh, Urmila's sleep, sacrifice in the Nothern regions, the battle of Kusa and Lava, Sita's triumph, Satakantharamayanam, Sundarakanda song, Sacrifice in Lanka, etc. There are ditties based on Sita entirely: her birth, her marriage, her being sent to the mother-in-law's house, her puberty, her sulks, her hide-and-seek, her entering the fire, her nausea, and the like. They are derived from Valmiki or Adhyatma Ramayana or Jaina or Bauddha Ramayana or pure creation by the ballad singers. In one song Rama and Sita are made to meet even before their marriage. The songs depict the amorous play of Rama and Sita, Sita's domestic chores, her sprinkling of coloured water, her witty conversation, Mandodari's political astuteness, etc. One song says that Rama and Sita became one like milk and sugar, another says that Lakshmana plaited the braid of Urmila, another narrates how Sita went for a bath but returned swiftly to Rama complaining that the moon and the bees were there to disturb her privacy. Rama accompanies her and discovers that the moon in the stream was Sita's own face and the bees were her dark curls: the naivety and beauty of Sita are dexterously suggested here. The most popular is Urmila's sleep trumpeting the unwavering fidelity of a wife towards her absentee husband, slipping into an unbroken sleep for fourteen years. The folklorists became one with the emotions of the Rama story and composed their songs which in excellence challenge the supremacy of the literary epics. The pedantic scholars have neglected these unaffacted outpourings of the rural imagination, but they are valuable to Telugu Ramayana lore.

J. Papayyasastri, a well-known poet and critic tabulates an impressive list of Ramayanas from Ranganatha onwards:

Ranganatha Ramayana is the work of Gona Buddgareddi (1240 or 1295). It is in 'dwipada' metre. The poem is in six kandas of 17290 'dwipadas' and the Uttarakanda of 5640 'dwipadas' was composed by the poet's sons. Rishyasringa in the story tells the danseuses used as decoys that they have two horns in their chest whereas he has one on the head—a fine touch of the innocence of the sage who never saw a woman earlier. Ravana is made to admire Rama's archery. The story of Indra transforming himself into a cock, of Ahalya petrified by a curse, of Manthara stalling the coronation because she was lamed by Rama, of the squirrel contributing its mite to the building of the bridge, of Kalanemi creating hurdles for Hanumana, of Sulochana committing sati, and the story of Hanumana sitting as high as Ravana on his throne by making a pyramid of his tail are not in the orginal.

Bhaskara Ramayana is authored by Hulakki Bhaskara, his son Mallikarjuna Bhat, his disciple Rudradeva, and his friend Appalarya. There are innovations in it not found in Valmiki: Gautama's curse, Manthara's vengeance, the killing of Surpanakha's son, Tara's curse on Rama after Vali's death, Narada's advice to Rama and Lakshmana's bondage by snakes, the story of Kalanemi, the chalice of nectar at the navel of Ravana. The poem is a ceaseless flow of energetic verse. There are innumerable quirks of fancy not to be mistaken for great poetry. A huge boulder thrown by Nila, the bridge-builder, raised waves to the welkin as if to inform the Heavenly Beings of Ravana's doom and plunged into the nether regions as if to inform the inhabitants there of the same and then bobbed up to the surface, as the magic of keeping the stones afloat lay in Nila's hands.

Molla is the daughter of Kesaya and her Ramayana in six kandas, a garland of nine hundred pieces of prose and verse spreads fragrance like the jasmine that her name suggests. She is supposed to have lived in the first half of the 16th century. Her description of Hanumana's leap over the ocean is graphic. She makes Guha wash the feet of Rama out of fear so that the magic of Rama's feet that had transformed a stone into a woman might change his ship too. Of course this is borrowed from another Ramayana, but Molla has made it her own. Molla is a favourite with the Andhras.

Ramabhyudayam is a kavya by Ayyalaraju Ramabhadra (1540) in eight 'aswasas' containing 1800 items of prose and verse replete with eloquence, 'rasa', 'slesha' and weighty words. The poet makes Rama place the mangalasutra on Janaki's neck. Scholars remark that he is the precursor of Vijayavilasa.

Katta Varadaraja Ramayana: Varadaraja is a 'solar' kshatriya of Cuddapah region. 'Katta' is derived from the dam built by his ancestors across the Kaveri. The poem follows Valmiki scrupulously in 23170 'dwipadas', though there are here and there two or three departures.

Raghunatha Ramayana is up to Balkanda and follows Valmiki. Raghunatha (1600-1673) is one of the greatest rulers of the Nayak dynasty. In his Ramayana the happiness of the child Rama catching hold of the moon in the mirror shows the father a royal heart.

Accha Telugu Ramayana is composed by Kuchimanchi Timmana (1690-1757). He dedicates all his works to his deity Kukkuteswara. He was called 'Kavi sarvabhauma'. His poem in six kandas and in pure Telugu is a honey drip of sweetness.

Gopinatha Ramayana is the work of Venkatakavi and is named after the family. He is of the 19th century and of the Venkatagiri samsthanam. It enjoys great popularity in Andhra. The poet's hope seems to have been that Kankanti Paparaju's Uttara Ramayanamu and his Purvaramayanam should together make the complete Ramayana. His work has the quiet fullness of a river. His narration of Sita's rebuke of Ravana or the behaviour of the monkeys in the Madhuvana are specimens of his poetic talent.

Andhra Valmiki Ramayana is by Subbarao (1863-1936), an erudite poet, a devotee of Rama and a great admirer of Potana. He follows Valmiki and asterisks verses which are un-Valmikian. The child Rama does not sleep, writes the poet, if Lakshmana is not in the neighbouring cradle. The seven kandas are dedicated to Kodandarama, his deity at Ventimitta.

Andhrasrimadramayanam is by Kavyatirtha 'Abhinavandhra Valmiki' Janamanchi Seshadrisarma (1882-1953). The uniqueness in his rendering is in the incorporation of the views of the great Ramayana scholars like Govindaraja.

Dharmasara Ramayana is also by Sri Seshadrisarma underlining the various dharmas embedded in the Ramayana such as those of a king, of a brother, of a friend, of a son.

Sriramakathamrtamu is by Tadepalli Venkatappiah Sastri, a great Shaivite, who narrates the story of Parvati.

Sri Krishna Ramayana: Sripada Krishnamurtisastri (1866–1960) strikes out a new path. In the Balakanda he weaves the stories of Valmiki, of the marriage of Kausalya and Dasaratha, of Dasaratha's hunting expedition and the curse, of Santa's birth, of the birth of Ravana and others and the victories of Vedavati; here Ahalya and Kaikeyi are spotless; Sita gives shelter to Surpanakha, grief-stricken for the death of her son; Ravana carries away the very ground on which Sita was; Sabari gives to Rama fruits tasted by her; Sita is not taken into the bosom of Mother Earth; and Rama does not die. The kavya has a happy ending.

Govinda Ramayana: Atmakuri Govindacharyulu composed this in conformity with Gandhian ideology. One of the veterans of the Freedom Struggle, he brings in politics of a high order, in Ramarajya. Rama is the ideal king. The seven kandas have the bare unadorned simplicity of a Gandhian.

Subhadra Ramayana is the work of Sriram Subhadrayamba. It consists of six kandas and has more than two thousand verses which walk like swans, as a critic puts it, and is illustrated by Dasaratha's grief or Vedavati's beauty.

Saraswati Ramayana consists of seven kandas including the Uttarakanda and 1900 verses a la Potana's poetry. Anjaneya's description of the sorrow of Rama and Sita when Sita was abandoned at Valmiki's hermitage is done with verve by Chebrelu Saraswati.

Manikonda Ramayanas: Manikonda Satyanarayana Sastri calls his poem Telugu Valmikamu, dedicated to Rama. To bring out the effect of the Sanskrit 'anustup' he makes use of 'tetagiti' and 'ataveladi' stanzaic patterns; now and then he does set at naught the restrictions of metre.

Yoganandandhara Ramayana: Chillarige Yoganandayya Pantulu is the author. He follows Valmiki in 1100 items of prose and verse.

Jagannatha Ramayana: Tangirala Jagannathasastri makes Siva narrate the story to Parvati. His style is pellucid and sweet.

Dasarathi Vilapam is by Krottapalli Acchayya of the 19th century. It contains seven 'aswasas'. It is dedicated to Lord Venkateswara of Tirupati.

Ramodayam: Rangaya, a contemporary of Chinnaya Suri, is the author. The poem hints at the divinity in Rama. Episodes from Ranganatha Ramayana, Bhaskara Ramayana, and Adhyatma Ramayana are incorporated. Lord Ranganatha is said to have ordered the composition in a dream.

Srimadramayanakalpavrikshamu: Viswanatha Satyanarayana (1895-1976) is a colossus in modern Telugu poetry. It is a 'kalpavriksha' both literally and figuratively. Unconventionalism is the characteristic of his narrative technique. The child Lakshmana's palm goes over the nose and ears of ladies who take him up and Rama feels for the head of men who fondle him. Anasuya walks up the ramp of the Pushpaka, hands over two mango fruits to Sita who then hands them to Rama and sees Anasuya off and gets back to the plane indicating the birth of the twins. This portion was translated into English for the Triveni. Innumerable are such deft touches in his mighty verse. He is not a slave to mere word—magic; he does not hover over words like a lover; he plays with ideas to which language is adjusted. In Viswanatha, Kaikeyi is portrayed as a noble lady who asks for Rama's banishment at Rama's own request and suffers anguish in silence at the tide of calumny over her.

Uttara Ramayanamulu by Tikkana (1210–1300), the great architect of Telugu Mahabharatam, is a poem of 1300 verses in ten aswasas.

Kankanti Paparaju (1575-1630) composed his kavya in eight aswasas and 3000 items of verse and prose. Episodes left out by Tikkana are included by Paparaju: such as Ulukepakhyanamu, Kurkuropakhyanamu, the coronation of Kusa and Lava, the arrival of Durvasa, the angry sage etc. Paparaju's verse is a mighty river in spate,—fierce, billowy, untameable.

Ghattu Venkata Ramakrishnakavi (pre-1800) is the author of Pattabhiramayanamu in six 'aswasas'.

Upakhyana Ramayanas: In Errapragada's Aranyaparvam of the Mahabharatam there is the story of Rama in 300 pieces of verse and prose as narrated by Markandeya to Dharmaraja. He is of the 14th century. In the Andhramahabhagavatam of Potana (1450-1510) Rama's story figures in 100 verses in the 9th skandha. In the Jaiminibharatam of Pillalamarri Pinavirabhadrudu of the 15th century the story of the capture of the sacrificial horse by Lava and Kusa is narrated.

Sanskrit Ramayanas in Telugu: Bhojadeva's Champuramayana is translated into Telugu by Venkatachalapati, Allam Raju (1860-1936), Rangasayi, Bulusu Sitaramakavi, Pusapati Ranganayakamatya, Jayanti Ramayya Pantulu (1860-1941), Budhavarapu Mahadeva and others. Uttararamacharitam is rendered into a poem by Siram Subhadrayamba and Janakiparinaya by Vengipuram Venkataseshakavi. Anana Ramayana is rendered into verse by Gundu Lakshmanakavi and into prose by Nutalapati Peraraju. Adhyatma Ramayana is Teluguized by Kancharla Sarabha, Kanadam Peddana Somayaji, Mamidanna Subhadramba, Bulusu Venkateswarlu; Munipalli Subrahmanyam rendered it into 'kirtanas' which are very popular in Andhra. This Ramayana tries to provide a rationale for certain inexplicable incongruities in Valmiki–for instance the distribution of the 'payasam' to the wives of Dasaratha. It accentuates the philosopical and the metaphysical. Ahalya's story—a stone becoming a woman like Galatea in Greek myth—is from this Sanskrit original.

Yathaslokatatparya Ramayana: Somabhupala of Gadwal Samsthanam had this composed by six poets of his court into six kandas in about 1798.

The Malika Ramayana: Akundi Venkatasastri, Pantula Lakshminarayanasastri, Devaguptapu Venkataramanakaviraju Chintalapudi Sannyasirae, Meela Perennasastri, Upmaka Narayanamurti prepared of six kandas in six different styles.

Vachana Ramayana: in prose, is attempted by Vavilla Ramaswamisastri, Devarajasudhi Neri Gurulingasastri (1858–1912), Dodda Venkatramireddi, Saraswatula Subbaramasastri, Modeparti Gunnayya, Siromani, Sripada Subrahmanya Sastri (1891–1951), Puripanda Appalaswami (1901–), and Usha Sri (1912–). Kalluri Chandramouli's Ramayana Sudhalahari and Dharmavaram Sitaramanjaneyulu's Anjaneya Ramayanam are to be noted.

Other Ramayanas either in the making or completed are those by Gadiyaram Venkata Seshasastri Puttaparti Narayanacharyulu (1915–), his kavya being called Janapriya Ramayanam. Venkata Parvatiswara kavulu (up to Sundara kanda), Kepalle Sivakameswararao (up to Balakanda), Dhanukudharam Venkatacharyulu of Dhanukudhara Ramayanam. Bulusu Venkateswarlu of Gita Ramayanam and others.

ADARSHA BHARATSEVAK (Marathi) is an Akademi Award-Winning biography of Gopal Krishna Gokhale (1866–1915), a political mentor of Mahatma Gandhi, by N.R. Phatak, a renowed scholar and biographer in Marathi. It was published in 1966.

Phatak came to eminence as a biographer when he wrote a scholarly biography of Mahadeo Govind Ranade, one of the early great intellectuals and Moderates of western Maharashtra. As Ranade was a political mentor of Gokhale, it was quite natural that Phatak should have been entrusted with the task of writing the biography of Gokhale. Phatak wrote it by 1926, but it was burnt to ashes as the press in which it was being printed fell to the rages of fire. Phatak kept collecting the material once again for this biography for 40 more years and he wrote out a fresh biography on the occasion of the birth centenary of Gokhale.

Phatak had the first hand information of the source material for writing such a biography. As he had an inner urge to write this biography and had a great love for Gokhale, he could portray Gokhale's brilliant career with considerable depth.

In the biography Phatak has traced in detail the course of politics in western Maharashtra during the first thirty years of Indian National Congress, as the period coincided with Gokhale's political career. Gokhale's brilliant political record and his activities both in India and abroad are portrayed with the help of authentic first hand records. The study of Gokhale's life thus offers valuable insights into the lives of great moderate leaders of India. However, this biography lacks a well-proportioned and objective account, as the author very often compares the activities of the Moderates with those of the extremists. It is a life of Gokhale in comparison with that of Lokmanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak, an extremist mass leader and colleague of Gokhale in Fergusson College for some time. Phatak lacks the sophisticated literary style. His style is dry, and full of personal mannerisms. However when he compares, his words acquire a quality of sarcasm which is the dominant quality of the most readable part of the book.

ADH CHANANI RAAT (Punjabi) Gurdial Singh suddenly emerged as a powerful novelist with his Marhi da Diwa. This he followed up with Anhoe and Adh Chanani Raat. Gurdial Singh's special field is the depiction of the tragic and wasted life of the peasants of the Malwa region of the Punjab who are given to mute suffering amid their hard toil on a soil that yields its wealth only through back-breaking, and unremitting labour. Added to this is the utter puritanism of a people in whose life few of the softer influences of life enter. He has reflected the bleak lives and silent sufferings of his characters with remarkable skill.

In the novel, Adh Chanani Raat (Half-moonlight) the story, like a play made on the Aristotelian model, remains confined to a small village, one of the thousands in the Malwa region. Its chief character is named Modan (this name is plain to the point of being crude, reflecting the cultural barenness of the area and its inhabitants). He is the victim of a conspiracy of circumstances. He has to avenge the insult heaped on his family by the 'lumberdar' of the village, and he shoots him. For this he is awarded life imprisonment. After serving his term in prison, he comes to the village to join a round of life, dull and empty. He has a sincere friend and confidant Ruldu, a peasant like himself. After some time a widow comes into his life, whom he marries. It is by the standard of the village a successful marriage, and a child is born to him. But as would be common among the peasantry, the woman is whisked away on some pretext by her brothers and sold off to someone else. In the meantime Modan is attacked by the sons of the man he had murdered many years earlier. A little before he dies, the woman with whom he had found some happiness comes to console his last moments of life. Thus ends his unhappy, empty existence. These novels of Gurdial Singh have lent voice to the hard Malwa region for the first time. That is his great pioneering achievement.

The general language-character too of this novel is the Malwai dialect of Punjabi. While it is natural for this to be reflected in the dialogues of the characters, it is a little out of place when it intrudes also upon the narrative portions. The writer, however, steps from Malwai into central, standard Punjabi, which has a somewhat jarring effect. The novel and its companions have power and a kind of stark realism.

ADHAV BABA (Marathi; b. 1930) is a social worker of Pune. He passed his D.A.S.F. examination and started his practice as a physician. Born in a family associated with freedom struggle he was soon drawn into social work and established a hospital for the poor in the rural area. As the demands of his social work became more pressing, he gave up medicine and devoted himself to the cause of the backward classes and launched a movement to draw attention to the various problems faced by them. To this end he founded 'Mahatma Jyotirao Phule Samata Pratishthan'. In the early years of 1970s Adhav realized that even a century after Phule's pioneering efforts, little had been done to remove some of the more glaring instances of injustice perpetrated on the lower castes. One of them was that in most villages in Maharashtra the untouchables were not allowed to draw water from the village wells meant for the upper castes. They had to wait for the upper-caste men and women to give them water. Inspired by Mahatma Phule's example he started a movement Ek Gao Ek Panavatha (A common well in every village). He visited a number of villages with his colleagues and met the low caste people and also the villagers belonging to the upper castes. Sometimes there were angry confrontations leading to violence after the visit. Sometimes the issue was settled amicably with the villagers agreeing to stop the unjust practice.

Adhav wrote brief accounts of his visits for a weekly, Sadhana, published from Pune. Soon there was widespread reaction to his reports and there was a great deal of appreciation not only for his efforts but also for the literary qualities of his writings. Many felt that the account of the movement was too important a social and literary document to be consigned to the files of a weekly. Accordingly Adhav put the accounts together and wrote a long afterpiece.

Ek Gao Ek Panavatha (1976) was something of a literary event in Marathi literature. It was one of the earliest examples of 'reportage' in Marathi. On the surface each 'entry' is an account of a visit and the various encounters that took place during the visit but gradually a very complex web of social relations becomes discernible. One gets a picture of reality prevailing in the rural Maharashtra which normally escapes the routine and academically disciplined 'research'. The contents of the book were a slap on the face of those who had complacently proclaimed that untouchability was a relic of ancient times. Due to the success of the book and this movement, the Dalit movement in Maharashtra got a much needed shot in the arm. The postscript which Adhav wrote for the book examines at a theoretical level the issues raised in the book and brings the story of the movement upto 1978.

The book is remarkable for its style too. Adhav writes in a simple, homely language. His rendering of the persons, situations is picturesque. With a few short sentences replete with the dialectical varieties of Marathi, Adhav recreates the scene before the 'mind's eye'. The style, so effective in its directness is capable of arousing the reader out of his complacency and making him indignant with the way the low caste people are being treated in our society. Indeed the style of the book is an example of a committed work of literature.

ADHIKARI, GOBINDA (Bengali). A well-known Bengali Yatrawala of the 19th century, Gobinda Adhikari had very little formal education, but had a good voice and a natural gift for composing songs. Certain confusing and contradicting facts are available about how Gobinda started as a Yatrawala. One source mentions that he learnt kirtan from Golok Chandra Adhikari of Dhurkhali village, and joined his kirtan party. According to other sources Gobinda was tutored by his father who himself was a good kirtania. After his father's death he joined the Yatra Party, of Badan Adhikari. Later on he started his own Yatra Party. Gobinda Adhikari was a comparatively late exponent of Krishna Yatra. It seems that though songs related to Shaiva and Shakti cult prevailed in Yatra, with the advent of Vaishnavism, Krishnalila had overshadowed them and was the most popular theme. Following the tradition of his time, Gobinda also named his first pala Kaliyadaman (this however was a generic name, since it included not only that particular feat of Krishna but also dan, man, mathur). Gobinda brought some changes in the traditional pattern of Krishna-Yatra by introducing more of prose dialogues between different characters and thus gave a crude dramatic element to it. In this way he had influenced his successors, though his dialogues are generally crude, and full of gimmicks. Gobinda Adhikari's yatra was extremely popular in spite of the growing prominence of theatre and opera. It is said that his acting of 'duti' had almost become a legend. Adhikari's Palagan was first collected and edited by Panchkari Dey (a well known writer of detective stories) in five volumes between 1930 and 1932. It is known as Gobinda Adhikarir Krishna Yatra.

ADHIVIRARAMA PANDIAN (Tamil; 15th Century) is one of the Pandya Kings. The Pandyas were one of the three dynasties ruling different parts of Tamil Nadu, the other two being Cholas and Cheras. Till the first half of the 14th century, the Pandya kings were reigning supreme. The kingdom collapsed and a line of descendents moved down to the South and occupied the Tirunelveli region, paying tributes to the Nayaks of Madurai.

Adhivirarama Pandian is one such, going by epigraphic evidences. According to the same source, he was known as Sri Vallaban and Sivalan. He was also called Raman and Viraraman. He ruled the kingdom from 1564 to 1603.

One great thing about this king is that he was also a poet, like his father. He had immense regard for poets. His court patronised bards from other places also. He is believed to have authored the following works of poetry: Naishadam, Kasi Kandam, Kurma Puranam, Karurai Pathitrupathu Antadi, Karurai Venpa Antadi, Karurai Kalithurai Antadi and Vetriverkai. Two other works Kokkoham (a sex book) and Linga Puranam are also attributed to him.

Naishadam is a work on Nala, based on Sri Harsha's Sanskrit Naishadam, and on Nalodayam, by an unknown author and the famous Tamil poet Pugazhendhi's Nala Venpa. The kingly poet evinced his familiarity with other epics by directly and indirectly alluding to the views and expressions in Kamba Ramayanam, Cheevaka Chintamani and other works. Naishadam runs to 1172 stanzas in 28 divisions. Adhivirarama Pandian is also said to have excelled in portrayal of nature and character delineation. But grammarians think that the work loses its gusto and tempo right from the middle upto the end. Naishadam enjoyed the status of a compulsory text in the curriculum of the traditional Tamil schools.

Kasi Kandam: This is also something like a translation of a part of Skandha Purana in Sanskrit extolling the greatness of the celebrated pilgrim centre Kashi, (Varanasi of Uttar Pradesh). It is composed in two parts, 100 divisions and 2525 stanzas. Its style is pure and simple, but the diction is rhapsodical.

Kurma Puranam: This is the Tamil version of one of the celebrated 18 puranas of Sanskrit. The Tamil work runs to 3,717 stanzas, covering the evolution of the universe, the nature of Godhead, Shiva Puranam, the legends of Sri Rama and Sri Krishna, mundane aspects of the world and rituals. The diction is simple, rhythmic and graceful.

The Karuvai Trilogy: The three works are Karuvai Pathitrupath Antadi, Karuvai Venpa Antadi, and Karuvai Kalithuvai Antadi—all in praise of Lord Shiva in Karivalamvanthanallur. Because of its intensely devotional nature the trilogy is likened to Thiruvachakam of Manicakavasagar. The verse pattern is lucid and charming.

Vetriverkai: Also called Narunthohai, is a 136-line ethical work, often prescribed for school children because of its beauty, brevity and moral instruction in simple diction.

ADHO DURASO (Rajasthani; b. 1538, d. 1651) His father Mahoji, was a native of village Adha situated in the Sanchore region of Marwar which eventually came to be associated with the caste of the family. Durasoji was born at Jaitaran and his death took place at Panchatiya village (Jodhpur). His childhood was spent in acute poverty. He had two wives and four sons. In the last days of his life he settled down with his son Kisnoji at Panchatiya village. Various rulers and 'Thakurs'—Raja Raisingh Kalyanamalot of Bikaner, Sagatsingh, Udayasinghot, Raja Gajasingh of Jodhpur, Rav Surtan of Sirohi, Rao Raisingh II of Sirohi showered wealth upon him in recognition of his poetic talent. From the various legends associated with him, it is known that he had amicable relations with Emperor Akbar and enjoyed a pride of place in his court, as well as in the courts of the Rajput states. He was the leading poet of the historical heroic tradition of Rajasthani poetry of the mediaeval period.

Durasoji's works fall under two groups—large and small. The following are his large works: Virud Chhihattari (A collection of 76 verses in honour of Rana Pratap), Doha Solanki Viramdevji ra (60 verses), Jhulana Rav Surtan ra (145 verses), Marsiya Rav Surtan ra (16 verses), Jhulana Raja Mansingh Macchavaha ra (94 lines), Jhulana Ravat Megha ra (17 verses), Git Raji Sri Rohitasji ra (9 git, 3 verses), Jhulana Rav Amarsingh Gajasinghota ra (64 verses), Sri Kumar Ajjaji Ni Bhuchar Mori Ni Gajagat, Kirtar Bavani (51 verses), and Mataji ra Chhand (22 verses).

The following are his smaller works: Kavitta Devidas Jaitavt ra, Niaani Hathi Gopal Dasota ri, Nawab Mohabbat Khan (Mahavat Khan) ra Marsiya, Kavitta Ranai Pratap ra, Kavitta, doha etc on Tog surtanot, Bhati Bhim, Bhim Amarsinghot, Rav Surtan and others Git (Dingal Git)—about 125.

Besides Kirtar Bavani and Mataji ra Chhand all other works of Durasoji deal with the contemporary minor as well as major heroes and events. These contain vigorous and appealing descriptions of the deeds of the personalities concerned and their virtues—heroism, fame, magnanimity and self respect etc. In their totality, these works make us familiar not only with the major historical events but also with minor ones of local interest.

In Kirtar Bavani there are realistic and touching accounts of how people of numerous social strata compelled by circumstances had to adopt various hazardous and degrading occupations. The authenticity of his Gajagata is doubtful. Similarly, Virud Chhihattari which has been widely discussed, contains many verses that seem to be interpolated. There are various reasons for this, such as the use of immensely impolite words for Akbar, historically inconsistent references and the use of comparatively modern words—Aaraj Kul, Aaraj Bhan Bharatbarsa, etc. On this basis, only about 35 verses appear to have been composed by Durasoji.

Durasoji's masterpiece is Jhulana Rav Amarsingh Gajasinghotara. It contains a detailed and fluent description of how Rao Amarsingh of Nagaur, after slaying Bakshi Salabat Khan at the emperor's court fought bravely and died. This event took place on the 2nd day of the bright half of the month 'Sravan' of the Vikram year 1301 (1644). He has also written works about persons who were always at war with each other—e.g. 1. Rana Pratap, Emperor Akbar and Mansingh 2. Rav Surtan Bhanot and Jagmal Udayasinghot and Raisingh Chandrasenot Kachhavaha 3. Solanki Viramdev and Mahavat Khan and others. These works do not express any conflicting ideas but eulogize the merits and achievements of persons that clashed with one another. This was the common trait of the 'Charanas' of the mediaeval period.

Though there is a fine depiction of personal bravery and virtues of heroes in his works, one does not find any reference to any combined resistance to alien princes. While expressing his deep faith in Hindu religion and poetic appreciation of the bravery of Hindu heroes, he has also talked of the sheer injustice done by the Mughals. It is worth mentioning that in the poems concerned with Raja Rayasingh, Kacchavaha and others, the description is related only to their charity and personal valour and not to them as protectors of Hindu religion.

In his poems there is a vivid account of bravery and manliness. Quick succession of events and their descriptions, and the use of appropriate similies are some of the peculiarities of his poetry. His language is largely literary Rajasthani over which he has distinctive mastery. Diction befitting the mood and the situation makes his narration alive. His works are mostly available only in the form of manuscript.

ADHO OPO (Rajasthani; b. 1752, d. 1843), son of Charana Bhakhtasinha (Bakhataji), was a resident of village Peshwa of Sirohi. He often visited the courts of Maharaja Vijayasinha (1752–1803) and Maharaja Manasinha (1803–43). His creation consists of 'Dingala gitas'. Most of his songs speak of devotion to God and of spiritual feelings. It is on account of these songs that he is so widely known. The number of these songs is reported to be fairly large, but barely 20–21 of them have so far been known. Songs written by him for and on historical personages are also available in old manuscripts (a list may be seen in Dingala git Sahitya by Narayana Sinha Bhati, Jaipur, 1971). The contents of his devotional songs are concerned with exclusive love for God, unwavering faith, offering of the self to God, remembrance of god's name, importance of human life, futility and perishability of the world and moral preaching on duty and the purpose of knowledge. His poems are simple, touching and full of ingenuity of expressions. This ingenuity may also be seen in the particular words used by him. The appropriate use of popular and famous sayings, and the simple similies taken from day to day life of the masses have lent an easy communicability to the subject-matter. Such similies and metaphors have also been borrowed from historical and Puranic references. The historical references pertain to the immediate or distant past of his times. For instance, to illustrate the will of God he has referred to the political conditions of his immediate past, i.e., the rise of the Marathas and the fall of the Mughal empire. This pattern of similies is unique in itself the like of which is rarely seen in the devotional poetry of the 'charanas'. He has seen the utility of human life in the actions for the welfare of the people. His devotion to god is that of a servant to his master, while his spiritual striving was for the negation of duality. The songs are composed in a simple, lucid and impressive form of language. He occupies a prominent place among the devotional charana poets of the 19th century.

ADHUNIK BHARAT (Marathi) by S.D. Javadekar is one of the most comprehensive works in Marathi assessing the Indian National Struggle and its varied strands—political, socio-economic and cultural—that came to be mixed with it. It was first published in 1938. The second revised and enlarged edition appeared in 1953. It is not merely a historical account but basically a discerning analysis of cultural and ideological trends. In the author's own words, it is an attempt to give a general survey of the social, religious and political movements which put new life into the ancient land and brought about a general revolution in the outlook of the nation as a whole.

The work is a treatise of more than 600 pages, divided into two parts, and 15 chapters. The first part deals with the national movement upto 1895 and the second covers the history from 1895 upto 1947, when India became Independent. It deals with the regeneration of India during the period of British supremacy (1818–1947) and attempts made by leaders from Raja Ram Mohan Roy to Gandhi and Nehru to regenerate the nation.

Javadekar was himself an ardent Gandhian nationalist and freedom-fighter, with a scholarly probing, analytical mind. Deeply read in Sanskrit and ancient religious lore of India, he accepted the Vedantic advait philosophy and reinforced it with a study of Western philosophy. The influence of Mill, Spencer, Webb, G.D.H. Cole, Bertrand Russell and Harold Laski is deeply felt all over his book. He also studied the writings of Marx, the Fabian Socialists and the anarchist thinkers of the West. What we find, therefore, is a grafting of Western thought on the tree of Indian culture, with a blending of physical and mental aspects of human affairs.

In doing this, he appears to be free from a blind adherence to any particular trend of thought. His acceptance of Gandhism is a result of his deep probing of Eastern and Western thought and political and social action. Gandhi's Satyagraha he regards as the nectar of Indian culture, fit to be accepted by the whole world. In the thought and action of Jawaharlal Nehru, he believes, there is a synthesis of Gandhism and modern industrial reconstruction. His analytical tool here is not merely the rational intellect, but also an attitude of synthesis (Samanvaya). According to him, Gandhi's Satyagraha, both in thought and action gave a new revolutionary turn to democratic socialist thought. Javadekar was very much influenced by Koestler's Darkness at Noon, where the Russian protagonist is facing the gallows for his so-called anti-government activity. The aftermath of the Russian Revolution gave strength to his idea that Satyagrahi socialism which he had come to accept as a creed was logical and well supported.

Before he arrived at this conclusion, he ranges widely over the whole history of thought and ideologies from the early Indian liberal thinkers with their faith in an all out programme of reform, both in Maharashtra and Bengal. He analyses the ideology behind religious movements like Brahmo Samaj in Bengal, Arya Samaj in the Punjab and Prarthana Samaj in Maharashtra. He points out how the coupling of political radicalism with the go-slow methods in social reform was a unique feature of Maharashtra and that neither Lajpat Rai in the Punjab nor Bipin Chandra Pal in Bengal was a social reactionary. He highlights the all-out radicalism of Agarkar and shows how, after his death in 1895, the liberal thinkers had to retire in to the background of Indian politics as their reformist content was absorbed by the Indian National Congress under Mahatma Gandhi.

Javadekar's great contribution to Maharashtrian political thought has been to make Gandhian thought and action acceptable to the middle classes who were suspicious of it. His hope that Indian culture would absorb the new philosophy of socialism with a proper blending of its ancient heritage remains yet a dream but he has the distinction of putting forth this idea, with a wealth of documentation and a great deal of scholarship.

ADHYATMARAMAYANA (Sanskrit) is a version of the Ramayana attributed by some to Vyasa. The Adhyatmaramayana, considered to be a part of the Brahmandapurana, is vitally related to the Ramayana of Valmiki, and is an effort to give it a philosophical garb. Like the Ramayana of Valmiki it has seven Kandas, i.e. sections, with identical names. As a matter of fact, it is primarily a manual of devotion and of Advaitavedanta philosophy, more or less Tantric in character. Like the other agama works it is in the form of a dialogue between Shiva and Uma in which Shiva instructs his wife. Throughout Rama is treated as Vishnu and Sita as Lakshmi or Prakriti.

The Vedanta philosophy appears when it is asserted that Sita, who was carried by Ravana is illusory, while the real Sita lives hidden in fire as Rama had asked her to do. She comes out of the fire at the time of the fire ordeal at the end when the illusory Sita enters the fire. The work makes no secret of its intentions to preach the Advaitavedanta as the highest knowledge and devotion to Rama as the practical way of securing salvation. It is often seen as critical of the Vishishtadvaita philosophy of Ramanuja.

The Adhyatmaramayana, in its effort to teach its particular philosophy with the help of the Ramayana story, has introduced in the account altogether new episodes and has also given a new turn to the episodes from the epic of Valmiki. Thus, in the Ayodhyakanda, Narada is made to visit Rama on the eve of his coronation and to dissuade him from accepting the throne after reminding him of the true purpose of his incarnation, i.e., to destroy Ravana and his demons. The story of Valmiki, being that of a robber-hunter turned into a great sage through the uttering of the name Rama, is also an addition. The Viradhavadha is here differently narrated. Again, Rama asks Sita to live in fire so that the demon Ravana would carry the illusory Sita. Further, it is shown that Ravana respected Sita as his own mother. The encounter between the presiding deity of the city of Lanka and Hanumat on the eve of the latter's entry into the city is a further addition. Here Hanumat appears before Sita in the Ashokavatika as a sparrow with a red face and the yellow body of a monkey. The Ravana-Kalanemi episode is differently developed and Kalanemi is made to deliver a speech on the divine character of Rama. On the advice of Shukra, Ravana performs a sacrifice to obtain invulnerable weapons and a chariot, nevertheless the sacrifice remains unifinished, being destroyed halfway by the army of Rama. At the fire ordeal, the illusory Sita enters fire to prove her fidelity while the real Sita comes out of the fire. Valmiki never speaks of any illusory Sita. After Rama becomes a king, having returned from exile, Hanumat repairs to the Himalayas to practise penance, a fact unknown to the epic. In short, it can be said that there is everywhere a very systematic effort to preach the advaita monistic philosophy, to emphasise the divine character of Rama and Sita and to teach that Rama is the, highest Brahman, Sita, the Yogamaya and Lakshmana, the Shesha, a secret which all the characters like Vishvamitra, Vashishtha, Janaka, Kaushalya and even Kumbhakarna and Ravana know. Manthara is Sarasvati.

The influence of the Bhagavatapurana is to be clearly seen in the description of the childhood of Rama and his sports particularly when Rama shows his Vishnu form to Kaushalya. The author appears also to have used the Adbhutaramayana, the Pamparamayana and the Yogavashishtha. It has influenced the Hindi saint Tulsidas and the Marathi saint Ekanath. The present text refers to the sacred spot Vrindavan which was practically rediscovered by Rupa and Sanatana in the last quarter of the 15th century. In all probability, the Adhyatmaramayana was composed sometime between 1490 and 1550. The Ramayana of Valmiki is an epic in spirit, conception and characterisation, while the Adhyatmaramayana is more a work on Vaishnava theology and thought. It is fully philosophical and reflects the new theistic movements in Vedanta philosophy.

ADHYATMA RAMAYANAM KILIPPATTU (Malayalam) is a work by Ezhuttacchan. It is a translation of the Sanskrit work with the same name. Ezhuttacchan is considered to be the father of Malayalam literature. He wrote in a language which had all the imprint of modern Malayalam. He popularised Dravidian metres much more than any of his predecessors in an age when Sanskrit metres and forms dominated Malayalam poetry. He did yeoman service to a Vaishnavite renaissance through his saintly life and devotional works.

The Adhyatma Ramayanam and other similar works belong to the category of compositions known as Kilippattu. The name is derived from a device the poet employs. Instead of directly narrating the story the poet speaks through a bird (kili). The work is, so to say, sung by a bird. The poet implores the bird to narrate the story. Ezhuttacchan is the first major poet in Malayalam to employ this device extensively and there are conflicting explanations of why he chose to do so.

In Kilippattus only Dravidian metres are used and this, a major break from the prevailing Sanskritic tradition, caught the popular attention. Besides the Dravidian metres then in use, Ezhuttacchan also introduced another known as 'annanata' (the gait of the swan).

The devotional element in the original attracted the poet more than poetic excellence. The translation has become a unique work combining devotional and spiritual fervour with literary qualities of the highest order. The passages and chapters the translator has judiciously selected and the lines he has equally judiciously added so unobtrusively merge into each other without a gap anywhere that the overall impression is that of an original work with its own strands of plot, beauty of diction and clarity of purpose. No other poet in Malayalam has succeeded in sustaining his eloquence in the manner in which Ezhuttacchan has in his 'Kilippattu'.

The dominant sentiment in the work is bhakti or devotion to Rama, who is portrayed not as a human being but as an incarnation of the supreme God Vishnu. The poet never misses an occasion to sing in praise of the Lord. The sentiments of amour and humour are practically out of place in a work fundamentally devoted to the bhakti cult though the poet has shown his capacity to describe them as well whenever occassion demands. The case of some of the other sentiments is slightly different. Compassion, and wonder for example, find full scope in certain contexts and the poet has done justice to them.

The language used in the Kilippattu is Sanskritized, from the standpoint particularly of the vocabulary. Ezhuttacchan does not shy away even from words with Sanskrit case endings. There are also a few passages of moderate length in Sanskrit without a word of Malayalam, but never has he used a Malayalam word with a Sanskrit grammatical ending, unlike some of his predecessors. His syntax however, is entirely that of his contemporary writers and his works including the present one have served to stabilize it to such an extent that the language spoken and written by the Malayalis of today is practically the same as that of Ezhuttacchan.

The Kilippattu became highly popular in Ezhuttacchan's own days. It came to be looked upon as a religious, spiritual book also and hence several manuscripts of the work have been unearthed from different parts of Kerala, a fact which points to its wide circulation. There are people who read it as a holy book especially in the month of Karkadaka.

The book has run into forty editions, including more than 25 complete ones. The earliest edition is dated 1869 (Calicut) and a copy of this is available in the Indian Office Library in London. Some of the editions have critical introductions. The 1902 edition from Quilon with an excellent introduction by Sahitya Panchananan P.K. Narayana Pillai is an example. Many scholarly studies on the book have appeared since then.

ADI GRANTH (Punjabi) The title of the sacred book of the Sikhs, Adi Siri Guru Granth Sahib (Adi, Skt. first, original, earliest; Sri Skt. Sriman honorific prefix; Guru Skt. Guru dispeller of darkness, spiritual guide; Granth Skt. Grantha book; Sahib or. Sahib Master, used here as an honorific suffix) may be rendered into English as The Most Revered and the Original Guru: The Magnum Opus. Some abbreviated variants of the title are also in common use, viz., Sri Guru Granth Sahib, Guru Granth Sahib, Granth Sahib, Guru Granth and Adi Granth, although the original title of the book, compiled in 1604 by Guru Arjan Dev, the fifth Guru of the Sikhs, was simply 'pothi' (Skt. pustakah; Pali 'pothaka' book or manuscript) Kesar Singh Chibber's Bamsavali Nama Dasam Pat Sahiam ka gives. 1601 as the date of the compilation. The use of prefix 'Guru' with the Granth dates back to 1708 when the Tenth Guru of the Sikhs, Gobind Singh (1666-1708) chose to put a stop to the line of human Gurus, updated Guru Arjan's pothi by inserting the works of his father, the Ninth Guru, Tegh Bahadur, and nominated the augmented Book as his eternal successor. Overnight, the Book became the Guru. The pothi acquired the highly exalted status of Sri Guru Granth Sahib, "the ever-living, ever-awake, wish-fulfilling, boon-bestowing, embodiment of all the Ten Gurus, the abode of God, the spiritual protector of the Sikhs in this world and the next". (a part of the formal Sikh Prayer). Since its installation as the Guru, the Sikhs have always extended to this corpus all imaginable respect that is usually offered to the living gurus. Whenever a Sikh happens to pass by it, he bows his head towards it. Not even a child is allowed to turn his back or feet towards it. Every person wishing to enter the premises of its abode, the Gurdwara (Skt. 'Gurudwar') has to cover his head and take off his shoes as a token of respect towards its august presence. Prayers are offered, supplications are made and offerings are respectfully presented by standing as faithfuls with bowed heads and folded hands.

The use of the adjective 'Adi', before the Granth was introduced to distinguish the Guru Granth from another voluminous anthology, known as Dasam Granth (Skt. dashama-Tenth) The Tenth Book, which, in fact, is an abbreviation of Dasham Guru ka Granth or The Book of the Tenth Master, namely, Guru Gobind Singh.

The Adi Granth is the most lavishly bedecked, the most richly apparelled, the most magnificently-housed, the most demonstrably venerated and the most ceremoniously apotheosized book of all times and places. It may be seen presiding, as a matter of daily routine, over all religious gatherings and most of the social and even political get-togethers of the Sikhs. A Sikh marriage has no legal sanction unless the Guru Granth sanctifies and validates it, by being physically present in the centre of the ceremony.

The original compiler-cum-editor of the Granth, Guru Arjan Dev, was the fourth successor of the founder of Sikhism, Guru Nanak. Culturally, Guru Arjan Dev was one of the most well-connected personages of his time–the daughter of the Third Guru, Amar Das, Bibi Bhani, was his mother and the Fourth Guru, Ram Das, was his father. His maternal grandfather, Guru Amar Das and his father, Guru Ram Das, were influential leaders of men and have left for posterity their complete poetical works, now preserved in the Guru Granth. His maternal uncle, Bhai Gurdas, was also an eminent poet of the Punjabi and Braj languages. His elder brother, Pirthi Chand also dabbled in poetry, while his cousin Meharban and Meharban's son Hariji were prolific writers of prose and poetry. Guru Arjan Dev, thus, grew up in an atmosphere of intense literary and religious culture. Early in life, he flowered into a major writer in the field of devotional poetry. Among other important contributions made by him to the nascent Sikh religious movement, during his tenure of guruship, one was that of giving a practical shape to the idea, already floating among the small but well-knit Sikh community, of having their own independent prayer book. Once his mind was made up, the 'Operation Pothi' was undertaken on a war-footing. A regular camp was set up at a shady place, which he named as Ramsar, not very far from the well-known Harimandir, now known as Golden Temple, in the present city of Amritsar. He had with him all the literary material that had been transferred to him by his father, as a part of the office of guruship, but he also deputed a number of field researchers to tap, verify and collect the material believed to be in the custody of some well-known and not so-well-known people. As soon as the material had been collected, he went through the whole of it, critically sifting the genuine from the fake and dotting, as it were, the i's and crossing the t's thereof. A telling proof of this love's labour is still extent in the words 'sudhu' (Skt. 'suddha correct') at the end of certain compositions (of. pp. 91, 150, 475, 517 and 524 of Adi Granth) and 'Sudhu kichai' "please make corrections (as indicated)" in at least one case (of. p. 323). He rejected straightway every composition that did not conform to Gurmat (Skt. Gurumat) the Guru Ideology. He had associated with the project, from the very beginning, his scholar-uncle, Bhai Gurdas. In fact, the entire work of preparing the final authorised copy, on the basis of the material, verified and corrected by the Guru, was left to him.

After the completion of the 'Operation Pothi' the book was ceremoniously installed in the Harimandir, the Temple of God, which rises lotus-like from Amritsar, the Pool of Immortality, the pool to which the famous city of Amritsar in the Punjab, owes its name. The venerable Baba Buddha, one of the surviving followers of Guru Nanak, was nominated as its First Keeper. The compilation of the 'Pothi' was an event of great religio-philosophical, socio-cultural and literary import. Its impact on the course of Indian history, through the role played by its believers, was destined to be tremendous.

The contents of the Granth may be notionally divided into two parts, the main part consisting of devotional-cum-ethical-cum-philosophical hymns and the other part consisting of a few panegyrical compositions, which also serve as documentary evidence left by the Bhatts and Dums, the traditional Keepers of Records relating to genealogy and successions against spurious claimants to the Guru's office. Actually, however, there are three parts—the Liturgical Part, the Musical part and the Miscellaneous Part. The liturgical part opens with the basic credal formula, called the 'mul mantra (Skt. 'mulam' R root). It is followed by Guru Nanak's well-known composition, the Japu which is recited by the devout Sikhs daily in the early mornings, along with the 'mul mantra'. Out of the next set of 3 compositions, 'So daru', 'So purakhu' and 'Sohila', the first two are expected to be recited by every Sikh around sunset and the last, i.e. 'Sohila', immediately before going to bed. Except for the last hymn of 'Sohila', all the other 14 hymns, comprising 'So daru' (5 nos.), 'So purakhu' (4 nos.) and 'Sohila' (5 nos.) have been picked up from the main body of the Granth, for daily liturgical purposes. Then follows the main body of the text—extending over 1340, out of a total of 1430 standarized pages, each composition of which is meant to be sung in the prescribed 'raga', preferably to the accompaniment of instrumental music. All the hymns of this part are arranged under 31 raga-heads in the following order:—

'Sri' (pp 14 to pp 93); 'Mahj' (pp 94 to pp 150); 'Gauri' (pp 151 to pp 346); 'Asa' (pp 347 to pp 448); 'Gujari' (pp 489 to pp 526); 'Dev Gandhari' (pp 527 to pp 536); 'Bihag' (pp 537 to pp 556); 'Vadahans' (pp 557 to pp 659); 'Dhanesari' (pp 660 to pp 695); 'Jaitsari' (pp 696 to pp 710); 'Todi' (pp 711 to pp 718); 'Bairari' (pp 719 to pp 720); 'Tilang' (pp 721 to pp 727); 'Suhi' (pp 728 to pp 794); 'Bilawal' (pp 795 to pp 858); 'Gaund' (pp 859 to pp 875); 'Ram Kali' (pp 876 to pp 974); 'Nat Narain' (pp 975 to pp 983); 'Mali Gaura' (pp 984 to pp 988); 'Maru' (pp 989 to pp 1106); 'Tukhari' (pp 1107 to pp 1117); 'Kedara' (pp 1118 to pp 1167); 'Basant' (pp 1168 to pp 1196); 'Sarang' (pp 1197 to pp 1253); 'Malhar' (pp 1254 to pp 1293); 'Kanara' (pp 1294 to pp 1318); 'Kalyan' (pp 1319 to pp 1326); 'Prabhati' (pp 1327 to pp 1351) and 'Jaijavanti' (pp 1352 to pp 1353).

In the 'Pothi', i.e. the original manuscripts compiled by Guru Arjan Dev, there were thirty ragas in the same order. The thirty first raga, 'Jaijavanti,' contains only the compositions of Guru Tegh Bahadur, the Ninth Guru of the Sikhs. These were added to the 'Pothi by Guru Gobind Singh.

The arrangement of material in the Musical Part is rather complex but, by and large, uniformity having been observed throughout, it is easy to understand the compiler's system. While it is on the basis of musical measures that this Part has been divided into different chapters, the placement of individual compositions has been done in the twin bases of authorship and metrical form. Besides this, each raga has been sub-divided into Guru and non-Guru section. The Guru section has been arranged on the basis of the inter-se order of the Gurus. In the non-Guru section Kabir always gets the pride of place. Apart from maintaining the inter-se position of the contributors, the other inter-se arrangement, based on the poetical form of the contribution, has also been simultaneously followed. For instance, the first place is always given to 'Chaupadas' (quadrustanzaic hymns), followed, seriatim, by 'Astapadis' (octo-stanzaic hymns), 'Chants' (hymns with variable number of stanzas), ending with Vars (odes). The last Part i.e. the miscellaneous Part, contains various metrical compositions not set to any musical measure. These, in serial order, are Guru Nanak's and Guru Arjan Dev's 'Salokas' in Sahaskriti idiom; 'Gatha,' 'Phunahe' and 'Caubole' by Guru Arjan Dev; the Salokas of Kabir and Sheikh Farid; the 'Sawayyas' of Guru Arjan Dev, and the

'Sawayyas' by the Bhatts in honour of the first five Gurus, Salokas by the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth and Ninth Gurus and at the end the Ragamala—a composition around the authenticity of which has been raging a bitter controversy among the Sikh intelligentisia and which appears to be one of the earliest unauthorized interpolations.

The Guru Granth contains the complete or selected works of thirty-five persons, hailing from different parts of India and belonging to different castes and creeds. They may be divided into four different categories, namely, (a) the Gurus, (b) the Bhagats (Skt. bhakta), (c) the Panegyrists and (d) the One-man category of Sundar, believed to be a descendant of the Third Guru. Given below is a complete list of these contributors with their approximate dates and places, where known. While the name of each contributor is prominently given at the top of each category of his work in the Adi Granth in categories B, C and D, the contributors in category 'A' are identified as 'Mahalla' I, 'Mahalla' II, 'Mahalla' IV, 'Mahalla V' and 'Mahalla IX', which stand for the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth and the Ninth Guru respectively.

Another fact, inattention to which has been making the unwary commit serious mistakes about the authorship of the Guru-compositions is that all the six Gurus whose works are preserved in the Adi Granth, use Nanak as their nom-de-plume. The category 'A' consists of the works of six Gurus, whose names are Nanak (1469–1539), Angad (1504–1552), Amar Das (1479–1574), Ram Das (1534–1581), Arjan·Dev (1563–1606) and Tegh Bahadur (1621–1675). category 'B', comprises the Bhagats, namely, Kabir (Muslim weaver of Kashi, 1398–1495); Namdev (Calico-printer of Maharashtra; 1270–1350); Ravidas (leather-worker of Kashi, 1267–1335); Sheikh Farid (Muslim of West-Punjab, Pakistan; 1178–1271); Beni (not known), Dhana (Jat peasant of Rajasthan, b. 1415); Jaideva (Brahman of Bengal, 1201–1245); Bhikhan (Muslim of U.P., 1480–1573); Parmanand (Maharashtra, date not known), Sain (Barber from Rajasthan, 14th–15th centuries), Pipa (Rajasthan; b. 1425); Sadhana (Muslim of Sindh, Pakistan; date not known), Ramanand (Brahmin of U.P., 1366–1467) and Surdas (Brahmin of U.P., b. 1258). In category 'C' may be included the panegyrists, namely, Balwand, Kal or Kalashar, Jalap, Kirat, Bhikha, Salya, Bhalya, Nalya, Gayand, Mathura, Balya and Haribans—all Bhatts and one Dum, namely Satta, who shares the authorship of a Var with Balwand, the Bhatt. The Bhatts have written panegyrical verses in honour of the first five Gurus. Two Salokas (Adi Granth 553) of Gura Nanak in Raga Bihag are found in the name of Mardana (Musician of West Punjab 1459–1534)—Guru Nanak's companion in his odysseys.

While at one level, the Sikh scripture is the continuation of mediaeval India's powerful socio-religious movement, called 'bhagati' (Skt. bhakti), at another, it is a complete departure from it. For example, it agrees with the 'bhagats' who believe in the existence of a single, conscious, all–pervading, all-surmounting Being, the ground of all phenomena, but it does not agree with those who found it necessary to worship Him in any personified or 'avatar' form. It shares with the 'bhagats' the view that the essential characteristic of all phenomenal existence is transience, but it differs from those who made this fact an excuse to run away from familial and other wordly responsibilities. It is one with the 'bhagats' in holding that it is the devotee's imperative necessity to have a Guru in order to realize the numerous reality within one's lifetime, but it does not rule out the possibility of direct contact with the creator, either through the courtesy of His grace or as a reward for the seeker's devotion. It looks upon with approbation the bhagat's inward journey for discovery of one's self, but it lays equal emphasis on disciplined organization of man's corporate socio-political life on non-exploitative, egalitarian basis. It outdid the 'bhagats' in making personal and social morality as the basic condition of spiritual growth, although according to one of its basic metaphysical postulates, both good and evil, ultimately, flowed from the same and the only divine source, namely, God.

The Granth is neither a text book of theology nor of philosophy; it is a poetical and musical tribute to the creator by a community of devout poets. It is a devotional hymnody composed with the specific purpose of celebrating the multifarious qualities of the Lord and while doing this all types of problems, physical and metaphysical, come to be discussed, occasionally pointedly and mostly in passing. There are compositions, such as 'Siddha Gosta' by Guru Nanak, which concern themselves with specific cosmological, epistemological, ontological and/or ethical problems and it is from these and other similar compositions that a coherent view of the Guru-philosophy is formed. For example, the Granthian God is immanent and transcedent at the same time. He is beyond human comprehension, but is experienceable and realizable. Having created the universe with a bang, he runs the staggeringly massive show through universally-operative scientific principles (hukam bhai), the inexorability of which gives way to none but His will (bhana, raga). He responds to prayers, rewards the devotees and punishes the defaulters. Man, the acme of all creation, is mortal, but is capable of achieving immortality. Predetermination is qualified by the moral responsibility that goes with self-determination. It is man's emancipation from the shackles of space and time, achievable through regulated personal, social and spiritual conduct, with which the Granth concerns itself the most. The Granth lays great emphasis on the meditative remembrance of the nominative identity of the divine impulse (nam), the desirability and unity of mystic experience, strict control over psychosomatic passions of libido, ire, avarice, attachment and ego to bring about equipoise (sahaja) and balance. It does not accept the sacrificial system of atonement, it rejects all superstitions such as magic, ritual, miracle, pilgrimages and purificatory baths. It is, in short, a simple, workable and practical type of humanism, which lays emphasis on equality of man, fraternal get-togetherness, social service and shared wealth. Its message is universal and totally devoid of any sectarian bias.

Like all other major scriptures of the world, the Granth has also served as an agent of social enlightenment and progress. It has served as a booster to the habit of reading and writing in a country in which even the three R's very rarely reached the lower strata of in society. It has encouraged people to work hard, engage in honest production of wealth, concede an honourable social status to womenfolk and develop respect for the rights of others. It refused to grant any spiritual or religious significance to the system of 'sati' at a time when it was a respected custom. It induced people to abstain from intoxicants, larceny, adultery, bribery, exploitation, duplicity, prevarication and haughtiness. God-fearing citizens with such qualities will naturally form good members of society, provided the administrative machinery is not anti-people or oppressive and is just—the qualities without which, according to the Granth, no administration is worth its name.

The Granthian postulate that the contingent nature of the physical world notwithstanding, it has to be treated as a solidly real extension of the divine entity, has put a distinctive stamp on the life-style of its followers. They love to live cheerfully, remain physically fit and instead of complaining, make quick adjustments with their circumstances. They never take to the begging bowl, nor do they turn into recluses. On the other hand, they prefer to engage themselves in productive work, however hard it may be, and strive to raise further their existing standards of living.

The Adi Granth must be given some credit for architectural enrichment of the world also. It is not the Golden Temple at Amritsar alone which elicits high appreciation from the spiritual seeker and the tourist alike, a number of eye-catching edifices built to house the Granth may be seen in almost all countries in which the believers in the Granth have settled in substantial numbers.

The influence of the Granth on post-Granth India's political history has not been fully realized yet, although it is this book, more than any other, which seems to have been thrown up by the Indian mind as a sort of indigenous defiance against further penetration of the semitic-Islamic cultural onslaught, which was downing, one by one, the different provinces of Northern India. By the time the Granth appeared on the scene, North Western Frontier Province, Baluchistan, Sindh, Western Punjab and Kashmir had been almost completely subjugated not only politically but also culturally. The remaining parts of Northern India, starting with Eastern Punjab, would have been similarly submerged if the phenomenon of Guru Nanak had not appeared in the 15th century. It was he who propounded for the Indian people the uncompromising principle of 'patt', i.e. honour—

If you have to live at the cost of your honour, says Guru Nanak in the Granth (p. 142). It is difficult for such exhortations to go unheeded when the Granth is regarded as the living Guru by its followers. A slow but qualitative change in the instinctive response of the Indian mind to political and cultural suppression and injustice is clearly visible, if the course of post-Nanak Indian history is perceptively observed.
Each morsel that goes down your gullet is like forbidden food for you!

It is interesting to view the vast panorama of history as it unfolded itself in the Middle East through the medium of script. Since the time of Caliph Umar, the educational policy of the Muslims towards their conquered lands, did not put any hurdle in the way of Muslim settlers and converts using local or national languages, provided these were written in Arabic script. Persian, Uzbek, Tajik, Turkish, Pashto, Baluchi, Sindhi, Western Punjabi (Lahandi), Kashmiri and Hindi are some of the languages which were extensively put in use by the Muslim writers. In fact, they were as good as pioneers in almost all these languages, but in each case Arabic or modified Arabic script was used with the result that their original scripts alongwith the bulk of indigenous literary and cultural treasures preserved in those scripts were lost for good. Guru Nanak did not want this ancient land of his to be cut off completely from its cultural roots. He, therefore, decided to use the local script, later called Gurmukhi, for all his work. Thereafter, Gurmukhi script became the script of culturally resurgent, identity-conscious Punjab, tracing its roots to his own country rather than to Arabia or any other foreign land. Naturally, the script chosen for the Adi Granth was Gurmukhi. Consequently, almost the whole of non-Muslim literature produced in the Punjab before the arrival of Arya Samaj in this region, was written in Gurmukhi script, irrespective of the language used. Now it is a well-known fact of history that it was the Gurmukhi-knowing followers of the Granth, who, in course of time, struck a fatal blow to the Mughal empire. The Poet of the East, Muhammad Iqbal confirms this fact indirectly when he bemoans, in another context, the decay of Islam in his Javed Nama: (From the heart of the Muslim disappeared the shining dynamism of mercury; who does not know what happended in the Punjab? The Khalsa (i.e. the Sikhs) carried away the sword and the Quran and that is how Islam died in this land).

The inspiration behind this remarkable turn of events in India may be traced unmistakably to the fear-removing, self-respecting, activist philosophy of the Granth.

In the same way, the literary and linguistic influence of the Adi Granth enshrining in its body the most representative devotional work of the whole of Aryan India of over 500 years, could not but be far-reaching and infectious. Thousands of its hand-written copies were in circulation before the invention of the printing press; its recitation in homes and prayer-houses was a daily affair and some of its selected compositions were sung in the Gurdwaras every morning and evening. It is, therefore, not difficult to understand why its influence was so pervassive in the whole region, extending roughly between the rivers Sindh and Yamuna. The religious books in Sanskrit had come to be associated, during this period, with the dead wood of ritual. The popular mood in favour of new scriptures in the languages of the people was, therefore, already there. The impact of this particular scripture, the Adi Granth, once it had come into being, was bound to be great. Apart from the orchestral play of different styles of expression, the Adi Granth is a treasure-house of poetical moods, emotive and imaginative word-pictures and striking similes and metaphors. On account of its prestige, the Granth had become an ideal in the eyes of leading wielders of pen, as the examples of Haria and Darbari aloquently prove. Haria or Hari Das, was the leading exponent of a small sect called 'Diwana'. He has left his works in the form of a compilation which is called Granth Haria ji ka. It begins with his own 'Japu', on the pattern of the Adi Granth, which opens with the 'Japu' of Guru Nanak, and is sub-divided on the basis of different musical measures. Hailing from the present district of Bhatinda in the Punjab, Haria flourished in the second half of the 17th century. His work, which came to be regarded as the Scripture of Diwanas, is of considerable literary importance. Bhai Darbari or Darbari Das, lived at Vairoke, a small village in the present Faridkot District of the Punjab. He authored a voluminous work, structured mainly after the Adi Granth model. The work, captioned Harija ki Pothi, is dated 1803 and starts with the author's own 'Japu'. Bhai Darbari's period of active literary production lay in the second half of the 18th century. Both dictionally and thematially, the Granths of Haria and Bhai Darbari are heavily indebted to the Adi Granth.

These two examples out of many should be sufficient to establish that the Adi Granth was able to generate a cultural climate in which people could take in hand major literary projects. It will not be an exaggeration to say that apart from certain romances and exclusively sectarian works relating to Islam and Hinduism, the bulk of prose and poetry produced in the Punjab, whether in Punjabi, Hindivi or Braj, owes its birth, partially if not wholly and indirectly, to the Adi Granth. Dated prose, especially produced by the Meharban School of Sikh Studies, is nothing but exegesis and exposition of the Granthic texts, hung often on biographical kegs. Poetry, starting with Bhai Gurdas (1551–1629), continues to exhibit, even today, the Granthic influence is one form or the other. It is a fact that, till recently, anything written or printed in Gurmukhi script was considered to be sacred and was never trampled under feet. The position has changed a lot in favour of secularity but litterateurs who need to coin new words are finding the Adi Granth to be an indispensable linguistic source because it represents a linguistic tradition which connects itself more with prakrit and apabhramsa than with Sanskrit. For such purposes the Adi Granth serves as a classical thesaurus, especially for such Punjabi prose writers as do not like to destroy the prakritic character of their language, in the process of equipping it adequately to cope with the advances being made by modern knowledge in all fields of life. Purely literary borrowings from the Granth by poets include concepts, phrases, imagery, metres and verse-forms.

For an ampler perception of the extensive contribution of the Adi Granth to the history of literary culture in the mediaeval Punjab, one has to view it from the stand-point of the 11th century, when the hordes of Mehmud of Ghazni (967–1030) were making the local "infidel-centres" of indigenous culture "disappear like smoke", as Abu Rihan Al-beruni puts it graphically in his Kitab-ul-Hind. The few still living custodians of the local culture, we are told, escaped, helter-skelter, either to Kashi or to Kashmir, where the conqueror had not yet been able to put his foot. That the evidence of literary creation during the quincentenary following Mehmud is scanty, is borne out by all historians of Punjab's literature. However, suddenly, there is a spurt in literary productivity which starts with Guru Nanak and culminates in the compilation of the Adi Granth. In order to meet the various needs engendered by the scripture, there sprang up numerous centres of specialization in such disciplines as Calligraphy, Recitation, Exegesis, Lexicography, Poetics, Grammar, Comparative Philosophy and Devotional Music. It was thus that the gap caused by Mehmud was plugged by the Adi Granth.

The Adi Granth is, therefore, much more than a Sikh Scripture. Besides being a valuable spiritual heritage and an epitome of wisdom, it is a compendium of great historical, socio-cultural, literary and linguistic significance.

ADIB MASUD HASSAN RIZVI (Urdu; b. 1893, d. 1975) was an eminent Urdu researcher and author. He graduated in 1918 from Canning College, Lucknow and did his L.T. from Training College Allahabad. He passed his M.A. (Persian) in the first division and won University gold medal for his outstanding merit. He joined Lucknow University as Junior lecturer in Persian in 1927, became Professor of Urdu and Persian and headed the Department till his retirement in 1954.

His first publication was the translation of a poetic story of Tennyson, which he published in 1918 with the title Imtihan-i-Wafa. His other published works include—Hamari Shairi (a book explaining the great creative potential of Urdu poetry), Lucknow Ka Shahi Stage and Lucknow Ka Awami Stage (these two books are a substantial contribution to Urdu drama) and Urdu Zaban Aur Uska Rasm-i-khat which deals with the aesthetics and importance of Urdu script. In addition he edited a number of compilations covering great poets like Mir, Rangin, Anis etc. Three of his books which appeared after his death are: Anisyat, Wajid Ali Shah and Madras-e-Rekhta.

He dedicated his life to the improvement of the standard of Urdu Research and built up a personal library which contains a large collection of manuscripts and many rare books of great value to researchers of Urdu. Although his main fields were Drama and Marsia, he was also considered a balanced critic of other genres of Urdu literature.

ADIGA GOPALKRISHNA (Kannada). Adiga Gopalakrishna (b. 1918) is probably the most influential, and complex poet of contemporary Kannada. His cultural-literary criticism, Mannina Vasane (1966) and his poetry have led to imitation and a wide following among the young. His early collection of poetry (Bhavataranga, 1946, and Kattuvevu Navu, 1948) are chiefly memorable for their romantic character and rhetoric. Since Nabedu Banda Dari (The Road We Have Walked, 1952), and the works like Cande Maddale 1954) and Bhumigita (Song of Earth, 1959), his work has attained an unparalleled passion, and complexity, irony, and an unflinching attention to bitter contemporary reality, and a sinewy language. He edits the important Kannada literary review, Saksi (Witness). Adya Kavanagalu (Selected Poems) was published in 1968.

ADIGAL MARAIMALAI SWAMI VEDHACHALAM (Tamil; b. 1876, d. 1950) is a Tamil savant whose life is a noble example of high principles and dedication to his mother tongue Tamil. He is known as the father of Tamil Puritanism (Chaste Tamil Movement). His loving parents christened him Vedhachalam and brought him up with love and care.

Vedhachalam had his schooling at the Wesley Mission High School at Nagappatinam up to the Fourth Form and had to discontinue his studies as his father died when he was just twelve years old. However, he continued the learning of the Tamil language at the feet of one Narayanaswami Pillai, a Tamil scholar who eked out his livelihood by selling Tamil palm leaves. He learnt Tamil so well that then even he was contributing many articles to a Tamil monthly called Neelalochani. Besides, he also studied the Philosophy of Shaiva Siddhantha under a great master of Shaiva Siddhantha popularly known as Somasundara Naicker. His thirst for knowledge was so great that he studied many works with great zeal and by his own efforts climbed up the ladder of scholarship.

With the help of Sundaram Pillai, the famous author of Manonmaniam, a poetic drama par excellence in Tamil, he worked as a Tamil teacher in one of the school, in Trivandrum.

At the age of seventeen, he got married and moved to Madras where he worked as the sub-editor of a journal, Siddantha Deepikai for some time. Then he became a co-worker of V.K. Suryanarayana Sastriyar, a great Tamil Scholar and teacher in the Christian College, Madras, from 1898. Here, he earned a name as a good speaker, an excellent teacher and an ardent researcher. He toured many parts of Tamilnadu, lecturing on Shaiva Siddhanta. He chaired many a conference on the subject of Shaiva Siddhanta.

Vedhachalam was not only a good orator, but also a good author and composer of poems. Once when he was suffering from a disease, he sang songs of devotion in the name of Lord Muruga. This work called Murugan Mummanikkovai (1900) is replete with deep thoughts and fertile imagination. Another work of this kind Somasundarar Kanciakkam (1901) is also considered to be one of his best works, which he composed on the death of his teacher.

Of his research works, Mullai Pattu Araichi and Pattinappalai Araichi were written for the benefit of the students of Tamil Literature and are considered to be the best in the field.

On 10.4.1911, Vedhachalam resigned his Tamil teacher's job and moved over to Pallavaram. On 27.8.1911, he put on the sack cloth and ashes, the robe of a sanyasin while remaining at the same time a householder (in Grihasthasrama). Thus, Vedhachalam became Swami Vedhachalam. 'Mankind is one, and God is one' (Onre Kulam, Oruvane Devan) became the cardinal principle of an institution, which he started by the name 'Podhunilai Kazhagam' which attempted to make people worship God without any distinctions of caste, creed or religion. He also started a monthly called Gnana Sagaram (Ocean of Wisdom).

In 1916, he became a great exponent of pure Tamil and as a result his Gnana Sagaram was renamed as Arivukkadal (Ocean of Wisdom) and Swami Vedhachalam came to be known as Maraimalai Adigal (Swami-Adigal). Thus the great credit for introducing pure Tamil in speech and writing goes to him, giving him the name and fame of being the Father of Tamil Puritanism.

Maraimalai Adigal was a great shaivaite in religion and offered prayers to and worshiped Lord Ambalavanan everyday in his house in his special puja room. He attracted people of the North and South of India as well as those of Sri Lanka to Shaivaite religion by his discourses on Shaiva Siddhanta.

Maraimalai Adigal was a man of great qualities of head and heart and led an orderly life. Most of his income was spent on buying good books. And with his collection of books which by will, he left for the people of Tamilnadu, the Marai Malai Adigal Library was started in Madras in 1958.

All his works bear testimony to great research and erudite scholarship. Of them the biography: Manicka Vachakar Varalarum Kala Araichiyum (Manicka Vachakar and a research study of his times, 1930) is worth mentioning. Some of his religious works are: Shaiva Siddhantha Gnana Botham (1906), Shivagnana Bodha Araichi, (1958), Pazham Tamil Kolgaye Shaiva Samayam (1930), Tamilar Matham (1941), Ambalavanar Thirukoothu (1924), Kadavul Nilaikku Marana Kolkai Shaivamaka (1926), Shaiva Samaya Padhukappu (1902).

Books dealing with the Tamil language and style are: Tamil Thai, (1902), Tamil Nattavarum Melnattavarum (1920), Murkala Pirkala Tamil Pulavarkal (1936).

Of his dramatic works Sakuntala (1907) based on Kalidasa's famous drama Sakuntalam is considered to be the best.

He has also written stories rich in imagination. Of them 'Kumudhavalli' or 'Naganatharasi' (1911) shows his rich creative imagination.

His Kohilambal Kadithangal (letters of Kohilambal) (1921) is full of good thoughts and ideas.

Other research works of Maraimalai Adigal are: Makkal Noorandu Uyir Vazhkai (How can people live for 100 years) (1933), Tholaivil Unarthal (Development of Extra Sensory Perception) (1935), Thirukkural Aaraichikkovai (A research on Thirukkural) (1958), Velalar Nagarigam (Culture of the Velalars) (1923), Porunthum Unavum, Poruntha Unavum (What to eat and what not to eat) (1921), Yoga Nithirai (Slumber of Yoga) (1922).

He wrote with equal felicity useful books for children too. They are Siruvarkana Senthamil (Chaste Tamil for the children) (1934) and Arivurai Kothu (Collection of Wisdom) (1921).

ADIPURANA (Kannada). Adi-Tirthankarapurana—the first great epic in Kannada, written by Pampa in the champu form, depicts the legendary story of the first Tirthankara, Purudeva or Vrisabhaswamy, also known as Adinatha. It is an adaptation of the Purvapurana, a Sanskrit work composed in 838 by Jinasenacharya, a preceptor of Amoghavarsa I or Nripatunga (814–878) of the Rastrakuta dynasty. The story of Adinatha, which is originally, said to have been imparted by Adinatha himself to his son Bharatesa on the occasion of his 'Samavasararana Kalyana', and was narrated at length by Gautama to the King of Magadha in the presence of Vardhamana Jina the 24th Tirthanakara. Pampa states that this very story traditionally dealt with in Puravapurana was narrated by him in Adipurana, 941 A.D., with the deepest devotion. Purvapurana and Adipurana are both poetic in character. Pampa owes much to Jinasena in respect of the story, sequence of narration, and also to some extent, the poetic approach. Pampa has condensed and refashioned the Purvapurana so as to suit his main claim that in his Adipurana one may find religion plending with poetry. In Adipurana poetic element predominates over the religious or the mythological, whereas Purvapurana is overridden with Jaina mythology and doctrine. In the depiction of situations and characterisation Pampa wields a magic wand though he never loses sight of the religious approach which also is no less a poet's stance. Pampa suggests at the beginning of the epic that he wrote it not for any material profit nor reputation but for the satisfaction of his inner self (A.P. I-36). The poets who wrote Tirthankara Purana in Kannada later, have followed Adipurana as an authentic model.

The Jainapurana in general, may be divided into three main parts: the first deals with 'Bhavavalis' or the previous births of a Tirthankara or Jina. The 'bhavyajiva' of a prospective Jina travels through a number of births minimising its 'Karma' and thus bettering itself in each birth, ultimately taking the final birth of a Tirthankara. The second part narrates the Tirthankara's life with the 'Pancha Kalyanas' or the five stages of Tirthankara's life, 'garbhavatarna' (descent of the jina-jiva into the mother's womb), 'Janmabhiseka' (birth of the Jina), 'Pariniskramana' (renunciation), 'kevala-jnana' (attainment of the supreme knowledge) and 'Parinirvana' (final salvation). The god Indra himself being aware of these stages, in advance with his 'avadhijnana' (occult knowledge), arranges for suitable festivities at each stage with divine pomp and splendour. The third part deals with the stories of the other 'salakapurusas' like the emperors and 'Baladeva-Vasudevas' pertinent to the concerned Tirthankara. Accordingly, Adipurana depicts, besides the main story, the most fascinating episode of the grand conflict between the first emperor Bharatesa and his younger brother Bahubali, the great sons of Purudeva. Adipurana thus, covers the spiritual journey of Purudeva stretching over ten previous births. The 'bhavyajiva' passing through the previous births gets itself purified progressively, in each earthly life of intense enjoyment and suffering. And in the last birth, getting transformed into a life divine, it turns from the mundane life of enjoyment to renuciation and penance, finally attaining the 'Kevala-jnana'. Then, Purudeva achieves 'Divyadhwani' (a divine voice) on hearing which all movable and immovable beings get the knowledge of 'Dharma', (righteonusness.) Purudeva preaches dharma, sitting in 'Samavasaranabhumi', (a supernatural assembly hall) specially created by god Indra. The life of Purudeva thus, liberating itself from the bondage of 'Karma' attains 'mahanirvana' the highest state of salvation, following the path of 'ratnatrya' 'Samyakdarsana' (right vision), 'Samyakjnana' (right knowledge), 'Samyakcharitra' (right character). The liberated 'Jiva' possesses 'anantachatustaya' (fourfold dimension of infinity), 'anantajnana' (infinite knowledge), 'anantadarsana' (infinite vision), 'anantasukha' (infinite bliss) and 'anantavirya' (infinite power) .

From the foregoing brief analysis of the metaphysical theme, it appears that the epic is very complicated for the non-Jaina readers. But by the touch of Pampa's genius, the metaphysical and religious content has assumed a poetic form delightful to the poets and the religious folk. Of the sixteen chapters, the first six narrate the ten previous births of Purudeva. The idea of an evolving 'jiva' from birth to birth ultimately reaching its climax is something inspiring. Man's natural tendency is towards 'bhoga' (enjoyment) to achieve which he gets himself absorbed in 'samsara' (this life) only to face dissatisfaction and frustration. Unless man realises that the end of enjoyment is self-denial, and that of glory renunciation, he shall never be liberated from the bondage of life. This is the truth discovered by both the vedic and non-vedic philosophies in India. But Jainism prescribes severe penance, supports self-denial and renunciation as the highest human values. Each and every life-story of Tirthankara makes us realise the futility and hollowness of this life and the importance of renunciation. This is depicted in a masterly way in Adipurana making it a truly religious and poetical work.

A few illustrations may suffice to prove this: first, the life story of Vajrajangha and Srimati: the 'bhavyajiva' of Purudeva is born as Vajrajangha in the third previous birth and Srimati was his wife. The living couple enjoyed a very happy life to their heart's content. One night, when they were in their bed sleeping in each other's arms, they died suffocated by the smoke of incense spread in their chamber due to negligence of the servants who had forgotten to keep the windows open. The poet explains that they were killed by the black snake in the form of a black smoke of incense and that theirs was the death of ideal lovers since they had not loosened their arms even when they were choked to death. Happy lovers, they lived together and died together. Who could be, the poet exclaims, more fortunate. The vision of irresistible love defying death is something magnificient. Though Pampa follows Jinasena at every step in depicting the bed-room situation, this particular concept of love with a redeeming touch in a tragic situation is original. Pampa is so fond of this concept that he repeats this very verse in his Vikramarjuna Vijaya with a slight variation in the context of the conflagration of 'Khandava' forest creating a similar situation. Pampa's greatness as a poet is exemplified in such casual expressions in which his imagination scales great heights. The second illustration is that of the dance programme of Nilanjana which caused the renunciation of Purudeva in the last birth. This is one of the most impressive situations depicted not only in Adipurana but also in the whole gamut of Kannada literature. Indra arranges a dance programme to entertain Purudeva foreseeing his 'Pariniskramana' (renunciation). An august assemblage of princes, both gods and demons was to witness the dance of Nilanjana, a heavenly damsel. Like lightning she entered the stage as though a live and sharpened flower-arrow of Cupid and entered the hearts of the Purudeva appeared pleased with the dance, untouched like a pure crystal brought near a coloured object. But, the dancer Nilanjana, all of a sudden, vanished from the stage when the dance had reached the peak of its glory. Her life had just ended. Indra instantaneously, created and replaced a replica of the dancer lest the joyous atmosphere should be spoilt. The whole assemblage could not in the least apprehend the change but the wise Purudeva could see through the game but was, at once disillusioned by the transient character of the body. He turned introvert and exclaimed to himself: this charming woman's body melted away suddenly. I am convinced of the insecurity and transience of this life which must be renounced. This heavenly dancer, while displaying the dance-drama of myriad forms, drove home to me the drama of life! Innumerable kings and emperors were caught in the whirl of unending cycles of birth and death oblivious of their identity, merged in their sensual pleasures unaware of true religion. I am no exception to this. I shall get rid of it. Thus he took to renunciation and set his foot on the path of liberation. The very situation in its origin is dramatic and Pampa made it hundred-fold more dramatic. As usual, Indra celebrates the 'Pariniskramana Kalyana' amidst a celestial shower of flowers and sound of drum-beats as Purudeva hands over the emperorship to Bharata the eldest son, makes Bahubali the second son the next heir-apparent and retires to the forest. Pampa's depiction of Purudeva's 'Pariniskramana' and Bharata's Cornation festivities, simultaneously the spiritual and earthly glories, put in a significant jutaposition, is superb. The third example is the conflict between the two brothers Bharata and Bahubali. Bharata the emperor who had turned greedy with power returned to his capital after his 'digvijaya' the traditional world-victory campaign. The 'Chakraratha' (the discus) which moved forward, all at once, stopped at the gates indicating that the 'digvijaya' was incomplete for his younger brothers had not accepted his supremacy. Bahubali the bravest of them all, challenges Bharata for a duel 'dristiyuddha' (duel of eyes) 'Jala-yuddha' (duel in water), and 'bahuyuddha' (boxing). Bharata is defeated in all the three duels. Bahubali is adjudged the victor beyond doubt as the discus thrown at by Bharat unjustifiably, stands by the side of the right shoulder of Bahubali. Humiliation over powered Bharata. Bahubali was humble despite the victory. He reflected over the mighty brother's debacle and pitied him for his greed for power coupled with egotism, which mostly caused his fall. Though a victor Bahubali did not desire to enjoy the sovereignty of the world which his elder brother Bharata desired to own and enjoy. He was disgusted with power and pomp for the sake of which his brother had no scruples whatsoever in doing anything disgraceful. Ashamed of his own behaviour towards his brother Bharata bowed, expressed his repentance shedding tears profusely at Bahubali's feet. Moved by the sight, Bahubali too shed tears over Bharata's bowed head symbolising the auspicious coronation bath.

In the depiction of this episode, Pampa evinces subtle art in character portraiture and development of a dramatic situation. The poet plumbs the hearts of the great legendary heroes and drives home their humanity as well as their magnanimity so naturally manifested in appropriate circumstances. The demands of poetry and religion are, thus vouchsafed in Adipurana. Pampa's concept of religion is liberal and broad and, at times, it becomes universal. He emphasises that true religion is that which consists of 'daya' (compassion), 'dama' (self-restraint), 'dana' (charity), 'tapas' (penance) and 'Sila' (character) which are virtues as true of Jainism as of universal religion. The poet also proclaims that humanity is essentially one though people belong to different 'varanas' (communities or castes) according to their 'Vrittis' (callings). Pampa who uttered such eternal truths is, no doubt, a poet of universal vision.

ADIVISHNU (Telugu) is a short-story writer, playwright, novelist, feature writer, dialogue writer and screen play writer for Telugu movies. His full name is Adivishnu Vighneswara Rao. He uses humour as a weapon to entertain and enlighten the reader. He produces all types of humour. Both the readers and audience like his writings immensely. His very name evokes laughter.

Adivishnu was born in Machlipatnam on a festival day, Vinayaka Chaturthi. That is why his parents named him Vighneswara Rao. He graduated from the Hindu College, Machilipatnam and started writing short stories while he was in college. He acted in a play called Anantam while he was a college student and won the best actor prize. His short-stories were published by the well-known literary magazines Bharati, Andhra Patrika, Jyoti etc. He established himself as a talented short-story writer with his pungent satire and conversational style. A well-known short story writer Singaraju Ramachandra Murthy encouraged him to write short stories and praised his skill in the field of humour.

Adivishnu started his career as an accountant in the state Road Transport Corporation. Later he became a public relation officer for the R.T.C. He came into contact with K. Venkateswara Rao, a great actor and epoch-maker in exhibiting the social dramas. Venkateswara Rao liked Adivishnu's short stories and requested him to write a play for his troupe. Adivishnu tried his hand by writing a playlet Arakurani (Heart's queen in playing cards). But people did not receive this playlet well.

He wrote another play Manchutera (Fog-curtain) which is a good combination of tragedy and comedy. He arrived into the field of drama with a bang through this playlet. Several drama troups exhibited this playlet in several places and even now it is a big crowd-puller in Andhra.

Adivishnu wrote several plays in quick succession. Some of them are: Ratimanishi (Stone-hearted man) Ententa Durum (How far is the Goal), Choodu Choodu Needalu (Lo, the pitiable shades), Pandagochindi (Here is the festival), Atithi Devullu (The Godly guests), Vallid-darito Villu Mugguru (These Three with Those Two).

Adivishnu's anthology of short-stories Kalectaroo Kshaminchi (Excuse me, collector), won the acclaim of the critics. In the title story one bright student is heckled for his industry by fellow students. They nick-name him 'collector'. The boy feels humiliated and discontinues his studies. After many years his classmates meet and express their regret for spoiling his career. But the boy who missed the chance of his life takes it easy and talk to his friends saying that he is happy with his lot in his rural life. This may be considered one of the good short stories in Telugu.

Adivishnu's novel Sagatu Manishi (Common Man) depicts the small pleasures and miseries of the common man.

In the playlet Nothing but Truth Adivishnu fancies a machine which helps to reveal the true nature of man.

'Pakundu Ratlu' is the story of Manjari, an actress and a woman of loose morals. One enterprising drama contractor takes her to the movieland. There she had many bitter experiences in the beginning. With sheer will power and intelligence she overcames the adverse circumstances. She shrewedly manipulates men and matters and becomes a big star in the film world. She earned huge sums of money and fame. But she was not happy with all the wordly possessions. She gambled with life and lost was committed suicide. This is a gripping story.

'Kariminguna Velaya Pantu' is a very good fantasy. A husband and wife want to get transformed into others of the opposite sex which God permits. One fine morning their sexes are changed. On that day they realise the others' difficulty and wish to be their own selves once again which God gracefully grants.

Bharadwaja won the peoples' applause and praise for his feature Jeenana Samaram. He interviewed different people belonging to different professions and recorded their experiences in an artistic form. As one critic remarks Bharadwaja can read the fear in the eyes of an ant. So his attempt to portray the lives of daily labourers is a big success. He won the Sahitya Akademi Award for this book.

ADIYARKUNALLAR (Tamil) is one of the noted commentators of the celebrated Tamil epic Silappathikaram. The term Adiyarku Nallar is an attributory nomenclature to one of the Hindu Trinity–Lord Shiva, meaning "Good to Devotees." But the commentator has made so much of a name for himself that the very mention of the name denotes him and none else. He has carved a niche for himself.

Legend goes that Adiyarku Nallar was born in Nirambai of Kongu Nadu, the present area of the Coimbatore and Periyar districts in Tamilnadu and was patronised by the chieftain of a small kingdom by name Poppanna Kangeyan. In his introduction to the commentary on Silappathikaram, Adiyarku Nallar has acknowledged the chieftain as one who sustained him, as was the wont of Tamil poets of yore who paid respects to patrons in their works. Some hold Adiyarku Nallar as a Shaivite as he bears the name of Lord Shiva. But it should be noted that the commentator used the word 'Iraivan' meaning God in general. His commentary on Silappathikaram is available as a whole covering the entire text and all through one wonders at the erudition of the commentator in drawing with ease liberal references from ancient Tamil works on verse, prose and drama while elucidating the chosen epic. As a commentator he pinpoints his sources. External texts so cited by him are 56.

Apart from that, his prose style is so charming that it claims kinship with poetry. His lexcicographic acumen is also astounding. Wherever he introduces non-native words while paraphrasing the text, he traces their origin and illustrates their usages. Thus he provides a fund of knowledge to linguistis too.

As one conversant with the nuances of prosody, Adiyarku Nallar, through his commentary, refers to the verse patterns and reading deeper into the text than any other commentator, gives new and refreshing interpretations to some oft-quoted words.

Adiyarku Nallar's insights into astronomy is also amazing as evidenced by his pointed reference to some days and dates relating to events in the plot of the epic.

Adiyarku's Nallar's period is put somewhere in the 12th century because some of his views came to be countered by a later commentator Nachchinarku Iniyar.

ADVANI, BHERUMAL MAHERCHAND (Sindhi; b. 1875, d. 1950) was deeply affected by the partition of the country and found it difficult to get reconciled to it. Retiring from the Salt Department, he adorned the Sindhi Chair in D.J. Sind College, Karachi, for more than a decade. Research was in his blood, and a keen observation of men and things was food for his soul. The Salt Department proved to be a blessing for him in as much as it provided for him opportunities to study the life of the people in almost all the parts of Sindh, including the desert province of Thar.

In 1923 appeared his travelogue Sindh-jo-Sailani (Traveller of Sindh) which contained an introduction by the renowned scholar Jethmal Parsram (1885–1948). In 1924, he published Sodhan-Ji-Sahibi or Ranan-Jo-Raj (The Rule of Sodhas or the Reign of Ranas), wherein he pictured the history in the desert province of Thar and his life there. His masterly research work on Shah Latif was Latifi Sair (Latif's Travels, 1929) in which he has depicted in detail Shah Latif's journey to Hinglaj and back to Girnar and Thar. This volume was adorned with Mirza Qalich Beg's preface, in which the Grand Old Man of Sindhi letters observes: "For a long time I have been yearning to do this work . . . but Bherumal has done it better than I could ever have accomplished it."

Linguistics and social study were a passion with this indefatigable and venerable scholar and writer. In 1925 he wrote Sindhi Boli (Sindhi Language), and it was supplemented by another valuable and more comprehensive work Sindhi Boli-a-Ji Tarikh (History of Sindhi Langauge), which appeared in 1941. In the latter volume he has also briefly reviewed the historical course of Sindhi literature. He was also an eminent grammarian and his work on Sindhi grammar, which is now lying in manuscript form reveals his knowledge of the development of the Sindhi language from Sanskrit to its present form. His Qadim Sindh (Ancient Sindh), written in 1944 and published in 1957 and Sindh Je Hindunji Tarikh (History of Sindhi Hindus, 1946 and 1947–Two parts) are a standing testimony to his love of historical quest and social understanding.

Bherumal in his young age also practised his hand at poetry, naming himself 'Gharib' (Humble). His contribution to text books for children was both vital and delightful. For children he wrote Gulzar-e-Nazm (Garden of Poetry, 1909). To his credit are two social novels– Ananda Sundrika (1910) and Mohini Bai (1917). They deal with problems of Hindu domestic life, customs and manners, female education, dowry system, etc. His language is simple and sweet. So are all the characters in his novels. They should, however, be treated as valuable records of the social life of the times and not as novels of a very high literary order.

In 1915 Bherumal wrote a detective novel based on Muslim life under the title Varial and Naimat. His translation of Uncle Tom's Cabin under the title Golanja Goondara (Sorrows of slaves, 1928) makes very touching reading.

Bherumal's two short dramas Bazaziun jo natak (Drama of cloth venders, 1921) and Pangati Muqadamo (Social Trial, 1927) make very delightful reading. They are full of mirth and hilarity, especially the first one. How clever and sweet-tounged cloth venders with their pot bellies and huge and attractive bundles of a variety of cloth used to visit homes and persuade ladies to purchase rich and exquisite textiles, muslin, satin, brocade, etc. is beautifully and humorously portrayed in the drama.

ADVANI, HIRANAND SHAUKIRAM (Sindhi ; b. 1863, d. 1893) was a Sindhi prose writer, journalist, educationist and social reformer. He was popular as 'Sadhu Hiranand'. He was a younger brother of Navalrai Advani under whose able guidance, he worked for the uplift of the suffering humanity. Hiranand went to Calcutta in 1879 and passed the Entrance Examination of Calcutta University in the same year. Hiranand obtained his B.A. degree from Calcutta University in 1883. He lived there in Bharat Ashram, the main centre of Keshab Chandra Sen's (1838-1884) activities, and came in close contact with the great thinker of Bengal. For a time he stayed back in Calcutta to be by the side of his ailing Guru Keshab who died on the 8th January, 1884. On his return to Sindh after Keshab's death, Hiranand devoted his life to the service of the people. He accepted the editorship of Sindh Times (English) and Sindh Sudhar (Sindhi), two periodicals published from Karachi by Sindh Sabha, an association of learned persons, thinkers and social workers of Sindh. Through the columns of these journals, for four years Hiranand kept raising the voice of the down-trodden and the oppressed. In November 1887, he left Karachi and went back to Hyderabad to assist his elder brother Sadhu Navalrai in the social and educational activities. On 28th October, 1888, Sadhu Navalrai and Hiranand together with other friends founded 'Union Academy' in Hyderabad. The main aim of this school was to impart moral and religious instruction, to spread the knowledge of Sanskrit, and to build up on a sound footing the character of the young generation. In November 1890, Hiranand started a literary monthly Saraswati in Sindhi. It was the first literary magazine in Sindhi, which was popular among the Hindus and the Muslims primarily owing to its standard and literary merits. Hiranand, as an editor, regularly contributed interesting anecdotes, stories and essays on contemporary subjects to every issue of the journal. Bherumal Maherchand Advani complied a book Hire Jun Kanyun (Diamond Nuggets, 1926) containing selected writings of Hiranand published in various issues of Saraswati. The book is a good specimen of early Sindhi prose and contains a good many interesting short stories. Sadhu Hiranand died at the young age of thirty. Hiranand was an inspiring source behind the social, cultural, educational and literary activities that were shaping the destiny of Sindh during the last two decades of the 19th century.

ADVANI, KALYAN BULCHAND (Sindhi ; b. 1911) after obtaining his Master's degree in English and Persian Literatures, took up appointment as the Head of Sindhi Department in D.G. National College, Hyderabad (Sindh) in 1942. He succeeded the great educationalist and eminent writer, Jethmal Parsram, who retired that year. As a college student, Advani contributed articles to the college magazine Phuleli. After joining college as a Lecturer, he started the well known literary magazine Latif Bari named after the great Sindhi Saint poet Shah Abdul Latif.

Advani migrated to India in 1948 after the partition and joined Jai Hind College in Bombay. He retired in 1976 as Professor of English and Persian.

Advani's first award winning Sindhi version of Kalidasa's masterpiece Shakuntala appeared in 1946. Earlier he has contributed regularly to the well-known literary magazines like Sindhu and Latif Bari, the main thrust of his critical articles being on Shah Abdul Latif and other mystic poets of Sindh.

In 1951 his critical work on Shah Latif entitled Shah was published. The work presents a comprehensive study of the various aspects of Shah's poetry. This work was followed by his similar studies of Sarni and Sachal in book form in the years 1953 and 1954 respectively. Advani's complete edition of Shah-Jo-Rasalo appeared in 1958; the critical work involved hard labour and earned him critical acclaim. Another of his exhaustive works on Shah Abdul Latif entitled Shah Jo Rasalo Mujamal was selected for Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968.

The author's poems compiled in Raz-o-Niyaz was published in 1960. The Sahitya Akademi published his Selections from Sachal's Poetry in 1963 and his two monographs in English entitled Shah Latif and Sachal Sarmast in 1970 and 1971 respectively in the series 'Makers of Indian Literature'.

ADVANI, KEVALRAM SALAMATRAI (Sindhi; b. 1809, d. 1876) was born in the Amil family of Hyderabad Sindh. He entered the administrative service of Mirs, the last Muslim rulers of Sindh, who were defeated by the British in 1843. He remained in the service of the new government for quite some time. After retirement the author devoted himself to the study of different literatures and religions. During a short span of about seven years, he wrote three books in Sindhi; viz Gula (Flowers), Gulu-Shakar (Mixture of rose petals and sugar) and Sukhiri (A present). He submitted all the three manuscripts to the Education Department of Sindh for publication. But these works written during 1864-1870, remained unpublished with the government for about thirty-five years and were brought out only in 1905.

Gula and Sukhiri contain interesting short tales, stories and anecdotes bearing moral lessons. The author has followed the method of Hitopadesha and Panchatantra. for describing his stories, which though narrated in prose, are generally interspersed with verses. The moral is imparted mostly in the form of verse. The first work contains small essays on different subjects.

The third work Gulu-Shakar is the first ever compilation of Sindhi proverbs and sayings along with explanatory notes. The work is more important especially when the writer, while explaining the proverbs, generally gives quotations and proverbs from Persian and Hindi together with translation in Sindhi verse.

The works of Advani are good specimens of early Sindhi prose. Though the writer was well versed in Persian vocabulary, the great asset of the author was that he wrote in the chaste and colloquial Sindhi language.

ADVANI, NAVALRAI SHAUKIRAM (Sindhi; b. 1848, d. 1893) well known as 'Sadhu Navalrai' was a Sindhi prose-writer, educationist and social reformer. He was born in a learned family of Khudabadi Amils who had originally migrated from Punjab and had initially settled in Khudabad and then in Hyderabad (Sindh). He was one of the first batch of four Sindhi students who had gone to Bombay in 1862 to appear for the Matriculation examination of the University of Bombay. Navalrai, after returning to Sindh, entered the Government Service in 1863 and passed the examinations of Revenue and Law Department while in service. His honesty and hard work brought him responsible and higher posts in different departments of the Government. Navalrai devoted his life to spread education in Sindh and eradication of social evils. He had faith in the teaching of Guru Nanak. He established Sikh Sabha in Karachi in 1866. Later on, Navalrai got highly impressed by the philosophy and preachings of Keshab Chandra Sen (1838-1884). He went to Calcutta in December, 1873 to meet this great thinker of Bengal. After returning to Sindh, he founded on the third Sunday of September 1875, Brahmo Mandir in Hyderabad. The consecration ceremony of the Mandir was performed by Satyendra Nath Tagore, son of Devendra Nath Tagore, who was in those days Sessions Judge in Hyderabad. In order to spread the knowldege of Sanskrit, and to impart moral values and religous education to the young generation, Navalarai established Union Academy in Hyderabad Sindh in the month of October, 1888. This school became one of the important centres of culture and education in Sindh.

In the field of literature, Navalrai was the first Sindhi scholar who translated into Sindhi many books on Law. The very task demanded coining of appropriate law terms in Sindhi. In order to propagate the philosophy of Brahmo Samaj, he wrote a number of books in Sindhi on the subject. In 1890, Navalrai started Sudhara-Patrika, a monthly magazine in Sindhi. It was written in Gurumukhi characters, because the periodical was especially meant to enlighten the Hindu women of Sindh who mostly knew only that script. He regularly wrote articles on socio-cultural subjects for another monthly magazine Saraswati, edited by his younger brother Hiranand, which was published in Arabic script. Navalrai, in collaboration with Udharam Thanwardas Mirchandani translated into Sindhi Rasselas, an Englaish novel by Johnson in 1868. It is the first novel in Sindhi written in lucid and colloquial language. Navalari, contributed significantly to socio-cultural, educational and literary developments in Sindh during the later half of the 19th century.

ADYA RANGACHARYA (Kannada; b. 1904). An eminent playwright, novelist, critic and thinker, also known by his pen name 'Sriranga' and his former name R.V. Jagirdar, was born at Agarkhed of Bijapur District in Karnataka. He received his education in Deccan College, Pune and the School of Oriental Studies, London and has held several positions-Lecturer in Sanskrit, Karnataka College, Dharwad (1930-1949); an appointment in the Ministry of Information and Broadcasting (1954); Producer of Drama (A.I.R.) Bangalore (1956-59); Honorary Director; Kalidasa Academy (1979) and Producer Emeritus A.I.R. (1979-81), Adya's reputations as a dramatist has overshadowed his achievements in other fields. He is the most complete man of the theatre Kannada has produced so far. He has not only written more than forty full length plays and nearly a hundred one-acts plays, but directed and produced many of them, and he is an acknowledged authority on the theatre and dramatic art. He has been the spearhead of the theatre movement in Karnataka for more than four decades.

Adya's career as a dramatist falls into two divisions. The first group of plays, from Udaravairagya (1930) to Sokachakra (1952) explores social and moral problems through the comic form. Harijanvara (1933), Sandhyakala (1939) and Sokachakra (1952) are the most successful plays in the first group, Kattale Belaku and Kelu Janamejaya, both written in 1959, mark the beginning of a new phase in Adya's development as a dramatist. These plays, created an original dramatic style and initiated a new wave in Kannada drama, which through translations and performance reached other languages like Hindi, Marathi and Gujarati. Adya's dramatic style which had earlier relied mainly on comic situation and witty dialogue, now turned to image and symbol and there was a corresponding movement from the literary to the theatrical idiom. Rangabharata (1965) and Svargakke Mure Bagilu (1970) are two other important plays of the second phase. Adya has been continuously experimenting with dramatic forms and styles and is as active at his present age as he was at 30, as can be seen from his recent output, Gummanelliha Toramma, Bharata Bhagyavighata and Ni Mayeyo Ninnolu Mayeyo. He has been consistently supported by able amateur troupes like the Kannada Amateurs of Dharwad, the Karnatak Theatre of Bombay, and by gifted director-producer like Satyadeva Dube, Mohan Maharsi and B.V. Karanth, who have enabled him to reach audiences even outside Karnataka.

Another area in which Adya's creative urge has found powerful expression is the novel. Visvamitrana Sristi (1934), Purusartha (1947), Prakrti Purusa (1954) and Anadi Ananta (1959) are among his best known novels. Adya was given the Sahitya Akademi award in 1972 for his book on Kalidasa, but literary criticism like his work on dramaturgy, is a byproduct of his involvement in the theatre. His Drama in Sanskrit Literature (1947) has been acknowledged as an original contribution to the subject and Bharata's Natyasastra and other handbooks on dramaturgy have proved invaluable guides to the students of the theatre. His two books on the Gita, Gitagambhirya (1941) and Gitadarpana (1972) contain some of his most seminal ideas and are essential reading for any one who wants to grasp the intellectual basis of his writings. In these books Adya explores such basic concepts as the nature of man, the idea of progress, the structure of human organisations and institutions, and the role of leadership. His approach throughout is rational and secular and the prose of these books is one of the finest in Kannada.

He is one of the most widely honoured men of letters in Karnataka. He presided over the Kannada Sahitya Sammelan in 1955. In 1963 he won the Playwright's Award from the Sangeet Natak Akademi, of which he was elected Fellow in 1967. He received the Padmabhushan Award in 1972, the year in which he was given the Sahitya Akademi Award. The University of Mysore has conferred on him the honorary degree of D. Litt. Yet, Adya has never truly belonged to the establishment. He has always been a rebel and a lone fighter and has gone his own way. And because of his heroic commitment to his own art and his profound concern with the fate of the contemporary man and his society, he occupies a unique position in Indian literature. Kannada has had a long literary tradition but Adya is the first great dramatist it has produced.

AESTHETICS (Bengali). The term 'Aesthetics' (French esthetique; German asthetik; Greek aesthetikes, 'things perceptible through sense-organs'; 'aesthethai', 'to perceive'), which implies 'the philosophy of the Beauty of art' has been variously translated into Bengali as 'Saundaryadarsan', 'Saundaryatattwa', 'Silpadarsan', 'Silpatattwa, Nandantattwa', etc. In Bengali the kaleidoscopic aspects of art have been probed into from different standpoints. The main line of approach is that of the creative artists including poets, painters, etc. The first in this line, Bankimchandra Chattopadhyay, though he did not write any systematic treatise on aesthetics, explored in a few essays some fundamental aspects of aesthetic consciousness and different branches of art necessitated by difference in the medium of expression. Rabindranath Tagore, the greatest poet-cum-aesthetician of Bengali literature, enunciated his theories of general aesthetics with the help of one branch of art, i.e. literature, in his three major works viz. Sahitya (1907), Sahityer Pathe (1936) and Sahityer Swarup (1943). His aesthetic theory is far from that of a scholastic philosopher, and in the course of its evolution it has suffered from controversy of Beauty versus Truth, and Beauty versus Goodness. And the solution that has emerged out of his own experiments in artistic creation is a unique synthesis of Truth, Goodness and Beauty. Like Rabindranath Tagore, Mohitlal Majumdar has also expressed his aesthetic theory taking one branch of art, viz. literature, as his primary concern. In his Sahitya Vichar (1947) he has discussed with Arnoldian 'high seriousness' some intricate problems of artistic creation, such as the relation between the poet and poetry, between poetry and life, etc. Abanindranath Tagore, the artist-cum-aesthetician has explored the myriad aspects of artistic creation in Bageswari Silpa-Prabandhavali (1941), originally a course of lectures delivered at the Calcutta University (1921-29). His theory is almost the same as that of Rabindranath Tagore. His Bharat-silper Sadhana (1943) is a systematic exposition of the basic principles of Indian art. Nandalal Basu, another artist and art-theoretician, wrote three books viz. Silpa-katha (1944), Silpacharcha (1953) and Rupavali (1955). His aesthetic theory is basically in tune with Indian spiritual tradition as he holds that the realisation and expression of the universal bliss (Ananda) is the aim of art. Two other significant works of this kind are Art (1968) by Annadasankar Ray and Nandan-Tattwer-Sutra (1981) by Arun Bhattacharya.

Some thinkers, who are not creative artists but renowned critics, have also contributed to aesthetic studies. Subodhchandra Sengupta who is well-known for his English work, Towards a Theory of the Imagination, has given a very lucid and critical exposition of the fundamental issues of art and literature in his small illuminating treatise in Bengali, Sahitya Pather Bhumika (1957). Other landmarks in this field by the critics of the first rank include Sahityer Swarup (1957), Silpalipi (1961) by Shashibhusan Dasgupta, Sahityachinta (1972) by Amalendu Basu, Silpatattwer Katha (1960) by Sadhankumar Bhattacharya, Samalochanar Katha (1959) by Asitkumar Bandyopadhyay, Rup O Rasa (1975) and Silpa-katha (1976) by Nalinikanta Gupta, etc.

Aesthetics, being a liason discipline between art and philosophy, has been approached by artists and poets on the one hand and philosophers and thinkers on the other. Parallel with the line of works on aesthetics by creative artists and poets there has developed another type of works by philosophers and thinkers. A 19th century writer, Shyamacharan Shrimani, wrote a book on art entitled Suksmasilper Utpatti O Aryajatir Silpachaturi, which has been referred to by Bankimchandra but is extinct now. Ramendrasundar Trivedi, a scientist by education and profession and a philosopher by the bent of mind, wrote some essays on the theory of beauty (Saundaryatattwa) and aesthetic sense (Saundaryavuddhi) included in his Jijnasa (1904). Abhayakumar Guha in his Saundaryatattwa (1916) has summarised the theories of the Greek, German, French, Italian and Dutch aestheticians and has finally discussed some problems of aesthetics from his own standpoint based on Indian scriptures and supported by quotations from great Indian spiritual leaders. Philosophical approach to aesthetics in Bengali has reached its culmination in Saundaryatattwa (1950) by the esteemed scholar-philosopher Surendranath Dasgupta. He is original in thought and he departs from Tagore's synthesis and holds that Beauty is different from Truth and Goodness. Prabasjiban Chaudhuri's Saundaryadarsan (1954) is a lucid and precise work on aesthetics. Sudhir Kumar Nandi's Nandantattwa (1979) is a relatively elaborate discussion on art-issues and the theories of some Indian and Western aestheticians. Among the works by serious thinkers Debiprasad Chattopadhyay's Rup, Ras O Sundar (1981) represents the zenith of recent aesthetic thinking with philosophical insight.

A qualitatively rich tradition of exposition-works by writers dealing with theories of other great aestheticians has also developed in Bengali. Rabindranather Saundary-adarsan (1956) by Prabasjiban Chaudhuri and Rabindra-Silpatattwa (1970) by Hiranmoy Bandyopadhyay are two outstanding works in this field. Satyendranath Ray with a sharp philosophical acumen avowedly concentrating on the theoretical exposition has gone deep into the core of Tagore's aesthetics and has studied it in correlation with Tagore's integral philosophy of life in Sahityatattwe Rabindranath (1972). Sahityajijnasay Rabindranath (Vol. I-1969, Vol. II-1980) by Asitkumar Bandyopadhyay is specially significant as it traces with unprecedented historical fidelity the evolving phases of Tagore's aesthetics which Tagore himself held as the very nature of a living mind. Rich in profundity of scholarship and depth of appreciation the work is both a chronological and critical analysis of Tagore's aesthetics. Other very important works are, Sahityajijnasay Bankimchandra, Bakimchandra O Rabindranath (1974) by Satyendranath Ray and Abanindra-Nandantattwa (1977) by Satyajit Chaudhuri.

Exposition of Sanskrit poetics and translation of Sanskrit classics on aesthetics occupies an admirable position in Bengali. These include Kavya-Jijnasa by Atulchandra Gupta, Kavyalok by Sudhirkumar Dasgupta, Prachin Bharatiya Alamkarasastrer Bhumika, Kavya Kautuk, Sahitya-Mimamsa and Kavya-Mimamsa by Bishnupada Bhattacharya, Rasasamiksa by Subodhchandra Sengupta and Kalipada Bhattacharya, Sahitya-Darpan by Bimalakanta Mukhopadhyay etc.

Translation of outstanding works from European and Indian languages has also enriched aesthetic study in Bengali. Sadhankumar Bhattacharya has translated Aristotle's Poetics (Eristataler Poyetiks O Sahityatattwa), Croce's Aesthetic (Silpatattwa), Horace's Arts Poetica (Horeser Ars Poyetika) etc. Other significant works translated into Bengali are Aristotle's Poetics (translated by Sisirkumar Das: Kavyatattwa: Aristatal and by Bhabanigopal Sanyal: Aristataler Poyetiks ba Sahityatattwa), Tolstoy's What is Art? (translated by Dwijendralal Nath: Silper Swarup), Sri Aurobindo's The Future Poetry (translated by Rameswar Shaw: Bhavisyater Kavita), Nagendra's Rasasiddhanta (translated from Hindi by Indranath Chaudhuri: Rasasiddhanta), Caudwell's Illusion and Reality (translated by Ranedranath Bandyopadhya: Illusion O Riyaliti), Plekhanov's Art and Social Life (translated by Sarbajit Sen: Silpa Ebam Samajjiban).

AESTHETICS (Hindi) The term 'aesthetics' (Greek- 'aesthetokos', Neo Latin- 'aestheticus, German - asthetisch) means sense of perception i.e. things perceptible through sense organs. Alexander Gottlieb Banmgarten, who coined the term 'aesthetics' aimed to provide an account of poetry (and indirectly of all arts) as involving a particular form or level of cognition-"Sensory cognition". Its basic principle is still the imitation of nature. Thus aesthetics implies the philosophy of beauty of art.

Various equivalents of the term 'aesthetics' have been used in Hindi, e.g. 'Saundarya Sastra', 'Saundarya Vigyan', 'Saundaryavad', 'Nandan Sastra', 'Lalitya Sastra', 'Saundarya, a bodh Sastra', 'Lalit Kala Vigyan' and 'Saundarya Darsan' etc; the first of them being the most acceptable. Aesthetics as an independent discipline in Hindi does not have a long history. Hindi scholars and writers have tried to express their new conceptions about Saundarya Sastra taking the basis of Western aesthetic contemplation and developing it on the basis of ancient Indian contemplation,and giving them new interpretations. There is a class of scholars linked with Sanskrit-Hindi poetics which still keeps arguing as to whether there exists or not an independent discipline like Saundarya Sastra'. However, in a number of Indian languages e.g. Bengali, Marathi, Kannada, Gujarati and Hindi-there exists an evolution of thinking about aesthetics. Among those who have made a minute and profound study of 'Saundarya Tatwa' in the context of poetry and fine arts, may be named Anandkumar Swami, Surendranath Das Gupta, Prabasjiban Chaudhary, Kantichandra Pandey, Marthekar, Badekar, Shyamsunder Das, Ramchandra Shukla, Lakshminarayan Mishra 'Sudhanshu', Jaishankar 'Prasad', Sumitranandan Pant, Nagendra, Kumar Vimal, Hardwarilal Sharma etc. The views of Hindi scholars are mostly found scattered in their writings. The first work in Hindi characterizing the background and evolution of Indian aesthetics is Nagendra's Bharatiya Saundarya Sastra Ki Bhumika, 1976.

The term 'Saundarya' has a number of synonyms in Hindi 'Ramaniyata', 'Charutwa', 'Chhaya', 'Vichchiti', 'Kanti', 'Dipti', 'Roop', 'Sushama', 'Prabha', 'Manoj', 'Manohar', 'Kamaniyata', 'Madhurya', 'Lalitya', 'Lavanya', 'Audatya', 'Abhiram' 'Manju' etc. All these expressions reflect the significance of sensuous quality of beauty. The term Aesthetics also denotes the science or discipline of sensuous sensitivity. If we get into the depth of the subject we find that Aesthetics is the study of the beauty of nature in relation to the poetry and fine arts. That is why Hegel (1770-1831) has called it the philosophy of art. New thinkers prefer to call it a 'science' or 'discipline'. In brief, Aesthetics is the 'Sastra' (discipline) which aims at describing and analysing aesthetic processes, aesthetic experience, aesthetic sensibility and aesthetic value judgement.

One thing especially noteworthy here is that the historical, sociological, cultural contexts of the tradition of contemplation of western Aesthetics and Hindi Aesthetics have been different. Therefore, though influenced by Western Aesthetics, Hindi aesthetics, is not merely an imitation of it. There exists in it an independent and original tradition of contemplation of Indian Aesthetics. Unlike Western thinkers Indian thinkers have never accepted 'poetry' as one of the fine arts. They accepted poetry as a 'Vidya' and art as a 'Upavidya'. These Acharyas have not kept poetry even among the sixty-four skills (Chaunsath-Kalayen). Though sculpture, painting and music etc. find a place in poetry and drama yet poetry has been kept above all of them. Due to this concept contemplative conceptions of fundamental questions differed from each other. Jai Shankar 'Prasad' made it clear through the title and articles of the books Kavya aur Kala Tatha Anya Nibandh (1939). Ramchandra Shukla has established the Indian concept of poetry and art in Chintamani (Part I, II), essays- 'Kavita Kya Hai', 'Kavya Mein Lok Mangal Ki Sadhanavastha' and in the other book Rasa Mimansa (1948, edited by V.N. Mishra). Looking at the influence of western theory of 'art for art's sake' on Hindi Chhayavadi poetry and especially on Sumitranandan Pant, he has severely criticised that viewpoint and said that all this confusion is created because of accepting poetry as an art. Shukla's attitude towards art and poetry received a good deal of support afterwards. Agyeya, the pioneer of new poetic movement in Hindi, has given extensive support to Shukla's view in his collections of essays - Sarjana aur Sandarbh (1985) and Atmaparak (1983).

While discussing 'Saundarya Sastra' Hindi scholars have concentrated on two issues - 'Saundaryavidhan' and 'Saundaryanubhuti'. This has been the main line of their thinking which was commenced by Bharatendu Harish chandra (1850-1884). Though Bharatendu did not write any systematic treatise on aesthetics yet in his few essays and poems he has explored some fundamental aspects of aesthetic consciousness and different branches of art, necessitated by difference in the medium of expression. His views about aesthetics may be found in Bharatendu Granthavali (Part II, 1935) and (Part III, 1937) in his essays 'Jatiya Sangit', 'Vaishnavata aur Bharatvarsh', 'Hindi Bhasha' 'Natak' etc; in poems 'Yamuna Varnan', 'Vijaya Vallari', 'Bharat Virtwa', 'Vasant Holi' etc.

Shyamsundar Das has given a detailed discussion on the inter-relationship of poetry and fine arts. This contemplation becomes more profound and comprehensive in the discussion of drama and fine arts in 'Rupak Rahasya' (1931). He has explained Hegel and Croce's views about aesthetics and while doing so he has also discussed the views of Sanskrit Acharyas i.e. Bharata, Bhamah, Anandvardhan, Abhinavagupta, Bhoj, Vishvanath, Jagannath etc. but Das has not accepted Aesthetics as an independent discipline like Kavyasastra (poetics), rather he has accepted it as a branch of poetics.

Mahavirprasad Dwivedi in his books Rasagya Ranjan (1909), Sahityalap (1926) and Sahitya Sandarbh (1929), has discussed the changed aesthetic vision of poetry, and art and has stressed the need to form the poetics with new aesthetics.

Ramchandra Shukla (1884) has interpreted the Indian theory of 'Rasa' in a new way. He has seen the aesthetics of Rasa in the perspective of psychology, sociology and other new sciences. Thus he has given a new interpretation to the tradition. I.A. Richards, Croce, Bharata and Vishvanath have found a new meaning in the interpretation made by Shukla. His views presented in Chintamani part I,II, III and Rasa Mimansa (1948) indicate that individual forgets or abondon the feeling of his separate entity when he is attracted under the spell of the feeling of beauty. In the essasy 'Sadharanikaran aur Vyakti Vaichitrayavad' he has established the process of poetic experience or aesthetic experience and the theory of impersonalisation in the art. He examined and analysed the western theories of art as expression, art as recreation, art as reproduction, art as communication, art as aeasthetic pleasure, art for art's sake and art for life's sake. He has accepted the theory of 'Lok Mangal' (greatest good of greatest number) as the supreme theory of Rasa through memory, direct imagination and made it free from the theory of art as an imagination. Thus he did an important work of forming a realistic aesthetics through the theory of Rasa.

Ramdahin Misra presented Indian and western poetic theories in Kavyalok (1944) and Kavya Darpan (1947). In Kavya mein Aprastuta Yojana (1951) he has explained the creative factors of beauty in the poetic craft.

In Nava Rasa (1920), Kavya ke Roop (1947), Siddhant aur Adhyayan (1946) Gulab Rai (1888) has presented along with his views about poetry a profound discussion of the aesthetic process, aesthetic experience and aesthetic values of fine arts. In the same line Lakshmi Narayan Mishra 'Sudhanshu' (1908) has made a deep investigation of Indian and Western aesthetic philosophy in his book Jivan ke Tattwa aur Kavya ke Siddant.

Among the 'Chhayavadis' poets like Jai Shankar 'Prasad' (1829) Sumitranandan Pant (1900) and Ram Kumar Verma (1905) have given new dimensions to Indian aesthetics. In 'Kavya aur Kala tatha Anya Nibhandh (1939) 'Prasad' had interpreted the Indian viewpoint of Rasa-pleasure and beauty - against the background of philosophy. He has given importance to the poetic experience and established 'Rasa-Sidhdanta' in Abhinavagupta's tradition of Anandvad. Nirala has dis-

Sastra ki Bhumika (1976) Nagendra has contemplated on inspirations of poetry and art in the essays compiled in Prabandh Padma (1934), Prabandh Pratima (1940) and Chabuk (1946). In the introduction to Pallawa (1928), Pant has made a subjective analysis of Swachchandtavad and Saundaryavad of Chhayavad. In the essays compiled in Sahityakar ki Astha (1955) Mahadevi Verma has analysed the mundane, spiritual and mystical relations of poetry and art.

Hazariprasad Dwivedi (1907-1979) has done a good deal of work in the field of Hindi Saundarya Sastra. Kalidas ki Lalitya Yojana is a prominent achievement of practical criticism. Accepting 'Saundarya' as synonymous of 'Lalitya' he has inter-mingled the aesthetics with the principles of literary criticism in his books titled Sahitya ka Marma (1954) and Sahitya Sahachar (1961) and the research paper, 'Lalitya Tattwa' (1971). His book Prachin Bharat Mein Kalatmak Vinod (1935) is a unique work in this field.

In Rasa Sidhdanta (1964) and Bharatiya Saundarya Sastra ki Bhoomika (1976) Nagendra has contemplated on the problems of poetry and art in the perspective of Indian and Western thinking.

Marxist writers, artists and thinkers in Hindi have bitterly criticised western aesthetics. At the same time they have tried to establish the significance of Marxist aesthetics. Accepting art as an expression of social beauty they have considered only social values as aesthetic values of life. This idea of aesthetics has been presented in Rangeya Raghava's Pragatishil Sahitya ke Mandand (1940); Shivdansingh Chauhan's Alochana ke Man (1944), Sahitya ki Parakh (1948), Sahityanushilan (1950); Ramvilas Sharma's Pragatishil Sahitya ki Samasyayen (1948), Sanskriti aur Sahitya (1954), Parampara ke Swar (1984), Namwar Singh's Itihas aur Alochana (1952), Kavita ke Naye Pratiman (1968), Muktibodh's Naye Sahitya Ka Saundarya-Sastra (1971), Nai Kavita ka Atmasanghars tatha Anya Nibandh (1964), Ramesh Kuntal Megh's Athato Saundarya Jijyasa (1977), Sakshi Hai Saundarya Prashnik (1980), Madhyayugin Rasa Darshan aur Samakalin Sahitya Bodh (1969).

Ilachandra Joshi has presented a specific type of aesthetics in the essays of Vivechana (1972). Here he has discussed the beauty of creations of art in its psychoanalytical aspect. In Agyeya's Tar Saptak (1943); Dusara Saptak (1951), Adhunik Sahitya: Ek Paridraysheya (1967), Trishanku (1945), Kendra aur Paridhi (1984) and Vijaydev Narayan Sahi's Sahitya aur Sahityakar ka Dayitwa (1983) organic totality of art object has found importance. The aesthetic criticism emphasizes on the autonomy of the work of art or literature. Explaining the aesthetic factors of poetry, art and culture Agyeya has given a new direction to Hindi aesthetics.

Other books on Hindi aesthetic are Hardvarilal Sharma's Saundarya Sastra (1953), Kumar Vimal's Saundarya Sastra ke Tattwa (1967) and Chhayavad ka Saundarya Sastriya Adhyayan (1971).

The interpretations of Sanskrit Kavyasastra and translations of classics of Sanskrit literature have also given a new dimension to Hindi aesthetics. Among such works may be noted Raghuvashmsa's Bharat ka Natya Sastra (1964); Kedarnath Sharma's Kavya Mimansa: Vyakhya, Anuvad (1943), Satyavrat Singh's Vishvanath ka Sahitya Darpan (1957), Premswarup Gupta's Rasa Gangadhar ka Sastriya Adhyayan (1962); Acharya Vishveshvar's translations of Dwanyalok (1962; ed. by Nagendra), Hindi Vakrokti Jivitam (1960, ed by Nagendra), Hindi Abhinava Bharati (1960, ed. by Nagendra), Mammat ka Kavya Prakash (1960) and Devendranath Sharma's translation of Bhamah's Kavyalankar (1963).

Translations of outstanding works from European and Modern Indian languages have also enriched aesthetic study in Hindi. Among translations from English may be noted Jagannathdas Ratnakar's translation of Pope's Essay on Criticism under the title Samalochanadarsh (1919), Mahendra Chaturvedi's translation of Aristotle's Poetics, Arastu ka Kavya Sastra (1957, ed. by Nagendra), Nemichandra Jain's translation of Longinus's On the Sublime–Kavya mein Udatta Tattwa (1961), I.K. Shukla's Translation of Tolstoy's What is Art-Kala Kya Hai (1952) and Madan Mohan's translation of Rene Welleck's Concept of Criticism-Alochana Ki Dharnayen, (1967).

Among translations from Modern Indian languages may be named Surendra Barlinge's book Saundarya che Vyakaran translated by Manohar Kale – Saundarya Tattwa aur Kavya Siddhant (1963).

Karim Ud-Din Ahmad's Psycho-analysis and literary criticism has been translated by Devendra nath Sharma under the title Manovishleshan aur Saundarya Sastra (1969).

The basis of Indian, mainly Hindi, aesthetics is Kavya Sastra. In Indian poetics the development of the theories of Rasa, Alankar, Riti, Vakrokti, Dhwani etc. is the direct result of a constant search of beauty. It is through these theories that Indian scholars have developed the conception of the form, the relish, purpose, value, medium, instruments of beauty and the completeness or the whole indivisibility of a piece of art. This analysis has been done through a poetic vision of see the beauty of word and sense (meaning) and it is helpful in understanding the beauty of all fine arts.

AESTHETICS (Punjabi). There are not many works on aesthetics in Punjabi, but certain scholars have studied this subject in the field of criticism.

Gopal Singh in a chapter on this topic in his book Sahitya di Parkh (1953) mentions Greek sources such as Socretes. Plato and Aristotle in addition to English and German authors to delineate the main characteristics of an aesthetic writing.

On the other hand Gurdev Singh, while editing a special number of Sahitya Samachar (1969) mainly draws upon the Eastern tradition of 'rasas' to establish the fundamental features of aestheticism.

Entries on aestheticism have been included in some dictionaries on Punjabi literature, compiled by certain universities of the Punjab such as Punjabi University's (Patiala) Punjabi Sahitya Kosh, Part I (1971) and Punjabi Sahitya Kosh, Part II (1972) of the Punjab University, Chandigarh.

Keeping in view its significance in Punjabi literature, a doctoral thesis entitled Hir-Kavya Da Raswadi Adhiyan (Aesthetic study of Hir-poetry, 1974) by Tarlochan Singh, was submitted to and approved by the Punjab University, Chandigarh. This thesis thoroughly studies the Hir-poetry of Punjabi in the light of Indian 'rasa' theory.

This topic has also been discussed at seminar levels. Guru Nanak Dev University, Amritsar, organized a seminar in 1975 in which Satinder Singh Noor contributed a paper on aestheticism on the basis of western theories.

All the papers of this seminar have been published under the title of Sahitya Adhiyan Parnalian (1977) ably edited by Karnail Singh Thind.

Harbhajan Singh has studied this human faculty in the context of 'Gurbani' composed by the sikh gurus, in one of the chapters of his book Sahitya Adhiyan (1981).

At the end, it can be said that aestheticism in Punjabi, as in other languages, has persistently found expression in the creative writings and books on criticism of its literatures. Its growing importance has enhanced its status and is now being studied as a separate branch of philosophical knowledge.

AGAL VILAKKU (Tamil) is a novel by M. Varadarajan. It won for the author the Sahitya Akademi Award of 1961. The tragic story of Chandran dealt with in the novel Agal Vilakku, is narrated by Velaiyan one of the arresting characters of the novel. Message of the novel is that, good characters and qualities alone would give us happy and harmonious life, and education, beauty wealthy etc. should not be blocking stones for the blooming of good character and quality. Chandran's life is compared to the oleander plant and brass lamp whereas Velaiyan's life is compared to the sacred basil plant and earthern lamp. The story in brief is :

Samanna is a wealthy person who lived in a village called Perunkanchi. He lived happily with his wife and his son Chandran and his daughter Karbagam and also his elder sister Sivakami, who was a widow.

He first refused permission to his son after his primary education in the village to continue his studies in Walajapet, a nearby town. He was of the opinion that urban life would harm his son's character and qualities. But the teachers of Chandran and the school Inspector met his father, talked of the intelligence and interest of Chandran and persuaded him to send him to an urban school. Hence Samanna hired a house in Walajapet and sent Chandran there. Sivakami was also sent there to look after him. Chandran's neighbour was Velaiyan whose father ran a provision shop. Both Chandran and Velaiyan became very thick friends ; they were class-mates. Chandran stood first in the class, Velaiyan had frequent consultations and guidance from him.

Velaiyan happened to meet Chandran's sister Karbagam whose beauty and qualities had attracted him very much. He fell in love with her. Meanwhile, Velaiyan failed in the school final examination whereas Chandran joined the intermediate class in a college at Madras. The city life gradually wrecked the life of Chandran. He could not top in the class. His interest turned to the field of drama. He happended to meet a girl Imavaty by name on the stage. His acquaitance grew as love. But he was shocked at the wedding invitation of Imavaty. It was a big blow to him. He left the hostel. The news reached his father. His father along with Velaiyan came to the city and went in search of Chandran, but in vain. They met Imavaty who told them that she had never loved him.

The days rolled on. Karbagam was wedded to Malan, the classmate of Velaiyan. Though Velaiyan was disappointed as he could not marry Karbagam whom he loved, he was interested in arranging for her a happy marital life. He married Kayarkanni his aunt's daughter. His sister Manimekalai was wedded to a poor teacher.

Velaiyan after passing B.A. Examination was appointed as joint Registrar in the Co-operative department at Coimbatore. Then he was transferred to Erode and then to Madras. He earned more than Rs. 3000/- p.m. and his life went on smoothly. He arranged for a job for Malan which was not satisfactory to him; therefore Malan pressed his wife Karbagam to get money from her father to start a rice mill; but her father didn't give any cash to her. On the contrary he transferred some of his properties to his grand daughters Tiruvaimozhi and Tiruppavai. Therefore Karbagam was driven to her father's house. Because of the worries over the departure of Chandran his mother passed away. Now Karbagam had to look after her father.

One day Velaiyan was informed that Chandran was in Aravankadu near Ooty with Santalingam, a former classmate of Velaiyan and Chandran. Velaiyan accompanied by Samanna and a teacher went to Aravankadu. There Chandran was living with a lady, who was a labourer in a tea estate. She had the credit of having murdered her own husband. Now this cruel lady was the wife of Chandran, who was working as an accountant in a company. Velaiyan and others mananged to bring Chandran to Perunkanchi. He was married to Valli who was humble and modest, but Chandran was still unchanged. Once when his wife started advising him, he severely beat her, which led to her suicide. Chandran ran away. It is said that he had been affected by leprosy and was admitted to a hospital somewhere.

One day on the way to his office Velaiyan turned back on hearing the voice of someone calling him. By the side of the road an ugly man sick with leprosy was lying and calling him. He went near and found it was Chandran. He took him to his residence and treated him as his guest. Chandran melted in sorrow and expressed regret for his past life. Soon after that he fell seriously ill and died.

AGAMA LITERATURE (Sanskrit). Agamas are sacred and reliable traditions and form the basis of Hindu religious practices. The Agama traditions often run parallel to the vedic traditions (the Scriptures or Nigames), and there has been some criticism against them as deviating from the vedic tradition, and also a strong defence of the Agamas as being within the vedic tradition itself. The Agamas give prominence to devotion or Bhakti to the Supreme Being and are interested in temple worship and pilgrimages; the Agama texts are divided into three main divisions- Vaishnava, Shaiva and Shakta. There are several later Upanishads belonging to these schools (Vaishnava Upanishads, Shaiva Upanishads and Shakta Upanishads).

The subject matter of the Agama texts is classified under four heads jnana (knowledge leading to release), yoga (concentration and meditation), kriya (action such as building of temples, installation of idols, etc.) and charya (performance of daily worship, rituals, festivals, etc.) The practice portion-namely kriya and charya-are dealt with in detail.

Vaishnava Agamas are divided into two sections Pancharatra and Vaikhanasa. Pancharatra literature is very rich, containing more than 200 texts- Ahirbudhnyasamhita, Lakshmitantra, Padmasamhita, Parasarasamhita, Sattvatasamhita, etc. The term Pancharatra has been variously interpreted, but none is quite satisfactory. The texts belong to a period between 600 and 850 A.D. and some of them may contain later accretions. The Pancharatra form of worship is followed in Srirangam and Kanchi temples. The Vaikhanasas belong to the Tamil and Telugu area. Atrisamhita, Kasyapasamhita, Marichisamhita, Bhrigusamhita, etc., belong to this school. The rituals and worship at Tirupati temple are conducted according to Vaikhanasa tradition.

The Shaiva Agamas have three sub-divisions-(1) the Pashupata Schools ascribed to Lakulisha, (2) The Shaivasiddhanta School popular in Tamilnadu which has 28 Agama texts such as Kamika, Karana Suprabheda and Vadhula, etc., and (3) the Pratyabhijna School of Kashmir whose authoritative works consist of Shivasutras of Vasugupta, Spandakarika of Kallata, Shivadrishti of Somananda and Pratyabhijnasutra of Utpala (with Abhinavagupta's commentry).

The Shakta Agamas are concerned with the worship of Shakti or the World-Mother, Lalitasahasranama, Saundaryalahari, Varivasyarahasya of Bhaskararaya, etc., belong to this school.

Some of the Agama texts are also in the regional languages like Tamil, Kannada, etc.

All the Agamic texts accept the three realities - the Supreme Being, the individual souls and the objective universe. Bhakti is predominant.

AGAMANI (Bengali) On the eve of the great autumnal festival known as Durga Puja in Bengal a form of traditional song of lyric character is sung over the rural areas welcoming the Mother Goddess at the hearth and home of the people, not as a goddess but as a daughter, who had been given in marriage to a distant village, returning home. The songs express the most faithful sentiments of affection of the parents, the mother in particular, towards the daughters who were given away in marriage in childhood according to the prevailing social custom. The idea is, however, expressed through the Puranic characters like Shiva to whom is married Uma, the daughter of the Mountain-king of the Himalayas. Her mother, queen Menaka, plays the role of the eternal mother in relation to her daughter.

In the Agamani songs are reflected the anxious moments that the mothers pass or used to pass at one time by sending their immature daughters away to houses of their husbands. There were polygamy, unequal marriage between rich and poor and old husband and young wife and above all the dowry system. Therefore, there were apprehensions of sufferings of the daughters at their husband's places. All these are reflected in the Agamani songs. Shiva who represents a poor husband marries the daughter of the king Himalaya, a representative of the rich. Nobody knows how old is Shiva, but Uma or Gauri is only eight years old. Mother Menaka has no peace in her mind for that. She prays to her husband to bring her daughter for at least three days during the autumnal festival. The husband agrees. This in brief is the theme of the songs.

Agamani or advent is almost immediately followed by separation known as Vijaya. On the day of immersion of the image of the goddess Durga, the songs of Vijaya or separation are sung. These songs reflect the painful feeling of the parents bidding farewell to the daughter at her departure for her husband's place.

At the beginning, Agamani used to be orally transmitted by a class of traditional musicians known as Bhat. During the early 18th century it developed literary character for the first time at the hands of the noted devotional poet of the age, Ramprasad Sen. A number of poets followed till the middle of the following century.

AGARKAR, GOPAL GANESH (Marathi; b. 1856, d. 1895) was a renowned social reformer and founder-editor of the Kesari and the Sudharaka. He lost his father in the early childhood and had to suffer many hardships to continue and complete his education. While still a student at the Deccan College, Pune, he and Bal Gangadhar Tilak formed a close friendship. They were inspired by the patriotic articles of the eminent Marathi essayist Vishnushastri Chiplunkar. The three of them, along with a group of enthusiastic young graduates, established the New English School at Pune (1880), an educational institution in which all of them served as teachers. Agarkar was the first editor of the Kesari, a weekly journal sponsored by Chiplunkar and aided by Tilak (1881). Within a short period after the untimely death of Chiplunkar, the Deccan Education Society was formed to establish the Fergusson College, where both Agarkar and Tilak taught as Professors. Later on, Agarkar became the Principal of the College.

Although between Agarkar and Tilak there was a basic identity of views with regard to religion, education, political awakening and social reform, in the routine workings of the two institutions, Deccan Education Society and the Kesari-Maratha, they could not carry on amicably together. So Tilak offered to resign from the society and take charge of the Kesari, and Agarkar went on to start another weekly journal, the Sudharaka (The Reformer), in 1888.

While Agarkar was still the editor of the Kesari, both Agarkar and Tilak came to be imprisoned together for publishing objectionable material based on false information. Agarkar has written a very moving account of their stay in prison in a small book called Dongarichya Turungatil Ekshe ek Divas. While undergoing this sentence Agarkar prepared a Marathi adaptation of Hamlet called Vikar Vilasita. Its introduction deals with several literary issues related to translation and adaptation. He also made a notable contribution by writing a handy text-book of Marathi grammar.

The main bulk of Agarkar's writing consists of the innumerable editorial articles he contributed to the Kesari and the Sudharaka. Agarkar's interests were no doubt manifold and his literary essays on Shakespeare, Kalidasa, Bhavbhuti and on poetry reveal a profound understanding of literary works and genres. But Agarkar is now mainly remembered for his advocacy of all kinds of social reforms. The theories of Darwin, Mill and Spencer had a vital impact on his thought. He was a stern and uncompromising rationalist and believed that the out-moded and hence out-dated social customs would have to be eradicated or modified, irrespective of their time-honoured persistence. He was aware that the old order would necessarily have to change yielding place to new, but he pleaded for the expeditious emergence of the New Order.

When Agarkar fought for radical social reform the society itself was not prepared for it, and he had to face public opposition as well as domestic strife. Being a life-long patient of asthama, his health was always indifferent and he died a premature death. Agarkar's writings, contentwise and stylewise, inspired succeeding generations of poets, play-wrights and novelists in Maharashtra.

AGARKAR LEKHA SANGRAHA (Marathi) is the title of a collection of Gopal Ganesh Agarkar's selected writings edited by G.P.Pradhan. It was first published by the Sahitya Akademi in 1960. The essays reveal the wide range of Agarkar's interests as well as his intellectual vigour and courage of conviction. Some of these essays deal with his disillusionment with the British Rule, his views on the prevailing condition of the country, and the ways and means of getting out of it.

The essays like 'Tin Arthashastre' (Three Types of Economics), 'Ingraji Rajyachi Ulat Baju Athava Amache Ghor Daridrya' (The Reverse Side of English Rule or Our Poverty), 'Hindustanas kshyaya Lagala' (India suffers from consumption), 'Vachal Tar Chakit Whal' (You will be surprised, if you will read this!), Hindusthanatil Annannadasheche Dushparinam' (Evil effects of Starvation), etc., expose the degenerating effects of British rule. He advocates promotion of trade and emphasises the need of political agitation through Indian National Congress.

In many of these essays Agarkar particularly castigates with fearless honesty many social evils such as neglect of women and harsh inhuman treatment given to widows. These essays were powerful enough to create public opinion against social evils. Through a process of analysis and criticism based on worldly secular values in place of the spiritual and metaphysical ideas based on Hindu religion and scriptures, Agarkar created an atmosphere where reason would prevail over emotions and change would take the place of tradition. Time and again therefore, he urged his contemporaries not to be deterred by 'Vichar kalaha' or thought-conflict, which led to a clarification of issues and principles. 'The evils of Hindu Society', he wrote in his essay entitled Tarun Sushikshitas Vidnyapana (Open letter to Young Graduates), 'arose not from an excess of thought-conflicts but because of its absence.'

Religion, he thought belonged to the undeveloped intellectual state of man, which made him believe in ghosts and natural phenomena which he could not explain. With development of science these beliefs would vanish. Therefore, there is no need to believe in an all-powerful creator or practices like idolatry. 'Dharmakalpana Ali Kothun' (The Origin of Religion), 'Thadagi Va Devata' (Tombs and Temples), 'Murtipujecha Udbhava' (Origin of Idolatory) and 'Devotpattivishayi Shevatche Char Shabda' (Last words on the Origin of God). The last essay concludes with the belief that the highest state of religion is a belief that the self would merge in an absolute,... 'Aham Brahmasmi'. This, he thought, was an apotheosis of individualism.

In his analysis of social and political problems, it is the ideal of secular equality that he advocates. He subjects all the customs and beliefs to a searching analysis and advocates a rational mode of life and actions which would benefit the individual and the community. In these essays he ranges over such topics as items of dress, footwear, beliefs and practices to intellectual pursuits such as Reading (Vachan), Poets, Poetry and Love of Poetry (Kavi, Kavya, Kavitarati) where he is keenly aware of the imaginative aspects of literature.

AGARWAL, BHARAT BHUSHAN (Hindi; b. 1919, d. 1975) was a poet, play-wright and satirist, who studied English literature for his M.A. at the Agra University and got his Ph.D. from the Delhi University. He was the editor of the Hindi weekly, Samaj Sevak, Drama Producer and Programme Executive, All India Radio, Deputy Secretary (Programme) of Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi and Visiting Fellow of the Institute of Advanced Studies, Simla. His collection of poems Chhabi Ke Bandhan (Bonds of Beauty, 1941) was followed by other poetic collections entitled Jagate Raho (Keep Awake, 1942), Mukti Marg (Path of Salvation, 1947), 'O! Aprastuta Prashna' (O, Unpresented Question, 1958), Kagaz Ke Phul (Paper Flowers, 1964), Anupasthit Log! (Absent People, 1965), Ek Utha Hua Hath (A Raised Hand, 1971), and Utna Vah Suraj Hai (That much Sun He is, 1977), (a posthumous Sahitya Akademi award winner of 1978) which were applauded for their pungent satire on the contemporary society. He also wrote plays entitled Palayan (Escape, 1942), Aur Khayi Badhti Gayi (And the Gulf Widened, 1955), Agnilik (Fire-line, 1976). He also wrote a novelette titled Lautati Lahron Ki Bansuri (Flute of the Returning Waves, 1965). A collection of his critical essays Prasangavash (Incidentally, 1970) and his research work entitled Hindi Upanyas Par Pashchatya Prabhav (Western Impact on the Hindi Novel) are known for their analytical freshness.

Though he made his mark mainly as a creative writer, he also translated profusely from English and Bengali into Hindi.

Bharat Bhushan will be remembered for his stinging satire on the hollowness of the present day society, the yawning gap in practice and profession of each one of us on the one hand and our righteous stance and pious posture of hypocrisy on the other. Bharat Bhushan is superb in pointing his unerring finger at such anomalies which are too many and too frequent to be missed.

His posthumous publications are: Kavi Ki Drishti (Poet's view, 1978), Adhe-Adhe Jisma (Half Bodies, 1978), Bahut Baqi Hai (Much is Left, 1978), Setu-Bandhan (Bridging, 1979), Tin Kavya Natak (Three Verse Plays, 1979), Lik Alik (1980).

AGARWAL, KEDARNATH (Hindi; b. 1911) is a leading poet of the progressive poetic movement in Hindi, Kedar nath Agarwal's forte is his meticulous and meaningful selection of moods and forceful expression of emotion. A genuine attempt to investigate the emotive aspect of life and its realisation at the human level through poetry is amply reflected in the poem compiled in his collections Yug Ki Ganga and Nind ke badal. He gives expression to the common man's thought-pattern. He has, therefore, succeeded in putting across touching scenes of country life encompassed by nature's beautiful expanse.

His poetry is imbued with a deep sense of awakening and struggle. Its rich emotional content guards it against the accusation of rigid progressivism. Social contexts assume a greater depth in his later creative efforts. His smaller poems are more effective in the expression of subtler passions. They are richer in terms of dictional finesse and artistic structuring.

His Gulmehndi comprises the poems of Yug ki Ganga, Nind ke badal and Lok Aur Alok along with an introductory note, the collection being titled after the last poem. While 'Ag ka Aina' attempts to assimilate the contemporary style. 'Pankh aur patwar' owes its richness to the variety of content. Politics have been transformed into an integral part of his poetry. 'Dhup ki Talwar' and 'Duj ka Chand' are replete with deep and rich natural imagery.

Kedar's poetry abounds in rich and varied images, his diction has remarkable spontaneity and rhythmic pattern. He successfully tries his hand at both lyrical and free verses. A number of his poems have been translated into foreign languages. His other works are: Translation:– Desh-Desh ki Kavitayen (1970). Essays:– Samay-Samay par (1970), Vichar-bodh (1980).

AGARWAL, VASUDEV SHARAN (Hindi; b. 1904, d. 1972) was a scholar of ancient and mediaeval literature, history, culture and art. He was born in a respectable Vaishya family. He was awarded Ph. D. degree in 1941 and then D. Litt. in 1946. He served as Head of the Archaeological Museum, Mathura; Superintendent, Central Asian Antiquities Museum and Head of the Indian Archaeological department from 1946 to 1951. He also served as curator of provincial Museum, U.P. In 1951, he was appointed professor in the College of Indology, Benaras Hindu University. In 1952, Lucknow University requested him to deliver a series of lectures on 'Panini' under 'Radha Kumud Mukherjee Lecture Scheme'. He became the president of several institutions from time to time, such as, of Indian Council of Coins, Nagpur, Indian Council of Museum, Patna, and All India Oriental Congress (Fine Arts Section), Bombay.

Agarwal was an ardent student of literature. In the field of Hindi literature his commentary and textual criticism of the famous epic Padmavat (by Jayasi) is a very significant contribution.

FURTHER WORKS: Prithvi Putra (Son of the Land) 1949; Urujyoti (Light of the Heart) 1952; Kala Aur-Sanskriti' (Art and Culture) 1952; Mata-Bhumi (Mother land) 1953; Harsh Charit: Ek Sanskritic Adhyayan (A Cultural Study of Harshcharit) 1953; Bharat Ki Maulik Ekta (Fundamental Unity of India) 1954; Malik Muhammed Jayasi: Padamavat (ed) 1955, Panini-Kalin Bharatvarsh (India as known to Panini) 1955, Bharat Savitri 1957.

AGARWAL, VIPINKUMAR (Hindi; b. 1931) is a poet, dramatist and painter. He has been associated with the later creative endeavour in 'Nai Kavita'. Being a teacher of Physics in the University of Allahabad for over two decades, Vipin has a scientific approach to life and the nature of his poetry in ultra-modern. He is dissatisfied with the exquisiteness, effusion and extravagance of the earlier poetic compositions. He mantains his insistence on ridding poetic compositions of these cumbrances. He makes a genuine effort to imbue his 'Motor, Lal battian aur abhiman' and 'Zarurat Se Zyada' with his realistic responses.

Vipin's scientific self-control impels him to communciate the maximum of experience through minimum of means on the expression level. His consistent effort has, therefore, been directed to achieve his end through understatement, meticulously guarding himself against extravagance and exaggeration both at the emotive and linguistic planes. He, therefore, never attempted any long poem beyond 'Nange Pair'. His apparently simple and commonplace poems make a serious effort to express his characteristic experience through the medium of linguistic structure. Not being associated with any particular poetic tradition, he draws upon the routine of daily life for his poetic base.

Vipinkumar Agarwal gives a cool and subtle expression to a tired country's irreversible inertia. 'Praja Ka Man', 'Nange Pair' are two of his representative poems; in the one, he lays greater emphasis on the living or the vibrant as compared with the tradition ('Astha') in the other he ventures out to investigate the status of the common man within the society, the country and the world at large. He makes a sincere attempt at 'impassioned introspection and this to articulate things, events, situations, experiences and sensual perceptions in a detached, adult-like manner with an intelletual spontaneity.

In his collection of one act plays titled Khoye Hue Admi Ki Khoj, he represents the anomalies and incoherence of life on all levels. These verge on 'Absurd' plays.

Biti ap biti ap is his first novel wherein giving a go-by to the traditional structure of the Hindi novels, he tries to weave echoes and re-echoes, slices of memories and symbols into a viable pattern. His style is imbued with new artisitc coherence in all his pursuits, viz. poetry, plays and painting. The ultra-modernism, ultra-realism and cubism of his painting spill over into his poems and plays.

AGARWALA, ANANDACHANDRA (Assamese; b. 1878, d. 1940) was born in Tezpur. His father was Kashinath Agarwala. After completing his high school education in Tezpur, he left for Calcutta to study F.A. He was the leading organiser of the Asamiya Bhasa Unnatisadhini Sabha in Calcutta and he was also a pominent writer in Jonaki, a well-known periodical of that time. After finishing his studies Agarwala joined the police service and eventually he rose to the post of Superintendent of Police. Resigning from this post later, he settled in Tezpur permanently.

While he was a student, along with Krishnaprasad Agarwala and some other friends, he wrote some songs and collected them in a book called Dharma Sangit. Apart from helping the publication of a children's magazine called Larabandhu (1888) of Gunabhiram Barua he published two children's books called Sishupath and Komalpath.

Anandachandra Agarwala is known in Assamese literature as Bhangani Konwar (Prince of translation) for his wonderful talent in the field of translation. He enriched Assamese literature by some extremely beautiful translations of a few selected English poems. These pieces are examples of how a poet's talents can make even translations so spontaneous and enjoyable. His famous translations like 'Jiban-Sangit', 'Sukgar-Thai', and 'Chacha-Aru-Pandit', 'Aji-Aru-Kali', left a deep impression on the minds of the Assamese readers.

Though the number of original poems of Agarwala seems to be very small yet whatever he had written succeeded in giving us a true picture of his great poetic talent. The neatness of thought and imagination and simplicity of expression found in his poems like Devakanya Manabibeser', 'Toi', 'Balam' etc. make them the most enjoyable. The beauty of nature is expressed impressively in Agarwala's poems. In this context we can say that the ancient folk proverbs and ballads as well as the folk songs seemed to have left a great effect on the mind of the poet. Jilikani (1920) is the only book which contains collection of all his published poems. He completed another collection of all his poems called Padumani for publication before his death.

He was not only famous as a poet but also known for his interest in archaeology and spiritual truth. In his Presidential speech of Asom Sahitya Sabha (1936) he announced, 'If we make our small spring flow like a big river, the tiny spring would flow into the sea all by itself. Every individual of our state must serve his state and his people and their language, and work for the overall development.' The main reason behind his antiquarian study was to re-establish the proud heritage of ancient Assam. Another noteworthy contribution is his Notes on the Ancient History of Assam written in English in 1921.

There may be a difference between the findings and judgement of the modern archaeologists and the conclusions of Agarwala. It may be due to the fact that he was dominated and guided all the time by one passion, that was patriotism. So instead of using a scientific approach of research to form an opinion about his subject matter, he let his ruling passion override truth. Inspite of this we have to admit that he was the pioneer in the field of archaeological research.

Agarwala expressed his own opinion through articles like, 'Asamiya Bhasar Prakriti Aru Baisista,' 'Asamiya Akhar Jotanir Niyam', 'Tantra Sastra Aru Amar Varnamala', 'Asamiya Akhar Aru Akhar Jotani', Sanskritimulak Asamiya Jharooa', 'Shabda' and 'Sahityar Jatkinchit'.

His 'Srishtitatta 'Karmaphaltatta', 'Paraloktatta' 'Arundhatir Upakhyan', 'Sita', etc., were published serially in periodicals like Alochani, Awahan and Jayanti. These articles successfully established him as a true seeker of the spiritual truth.

N.B.

AGARWALA, CHANDRAKUMAR (Assamese; b. 1867, d.1938), was a prominent Assamese romantic poet. He was the first editor of the Assamese monthly Jonaki (Calcutta, 1889), the mouthpiece of an epoch-making literary organisation-Asamiya Bhasar Unnati Sadhini Sabha (The Assamese Language Developing Society), formed by a few promising Assamese students who went to Calcutta for higher education. His anthologies - Pratima (The Image, 1913) and Bin-Baragi (The Lyric Ascetic, 1923) have become extremely popular for their simplicity of diction, addition of strangeness to beauty, love of nature, creation of supernatural in the natural through indigenous folk-beliefs and tales, and genuine humanitarianism. His tenet—sundarar aradhana jivanar khel (the worship of the Beautiful is the play of Life)—has become almost a gospel in Assamese. As a utopian visionary he wants to rebel against all shackles and vices of the society, but he never forgets the earth; and a robust optimism, born out of his innate faith in the Vedantic philopshy, leads him to glorify the essential greatness of man.

P.S.

AGARWALA, JYOTIPRASAD (Assamese; b. 1903, d. 1951) was popularly known as Rupkonwar (a Worshipper of Beauty in Truth). He was an epoch-making artist of Assam. A musician, an innovating playwright, a great thinker, a powerful poet, a film-director and producer, a stage actor and dancer, fiery orator, a scholarly essayist, a freedom-fighter, a proud patriot and a broad humanist, he was born in the famous Agarwalla family of Tezpur with a silver spoon in his mouth. He took the thorny path of a revolutionary artist and spent his eventful life for the cause of art and culture as a means to the redemption of mankind. He had his higher education in Calcutta and London (1926) but he left it incomplete as he was more interested in the art of film-making that led him to Germany to complete a seven months' training in it. (1930).

Returning to India, Jyotiprasad played the double role of the artist and the freedom fighter. He became a Commander (Adhinayak) of the Peace Army (Santi Sena) (1931-32) and had to undergo fifteen months' rigorous imprisonment. After his release from the prison he worked with his sincerest devotion to release the first film in Assamese entitled 'Joymati' (1935) a soul-stirring tale of martyrdom of an Ahom princess for the cause of her motherland. His second film 'Indra-Malati' (1939) was based on a social theme. His project for the third 'Manar Binar Agnisur', a tale on the Burmese invasion of Assam that dealt a death blow to the Ahom administration in Assam, was nipped in the bud.

The best of Jyotiprasad, the artist, is in his musical compositions and renovations of indigenous tunes, which have formed a new type of music known as Jyoti-Sangit. Traditional in tunes and universal in appeal his songs, which are supposed to be more than six hundred in number, are indeed priceless in the domain of Assamese music. A long-playing record of his popular songs, mostly taken from his poetic plays, was produced in the seventies.

The musician was also a first-rate playwright who produced a series of modern plays, befitting the modern stage technique, weaving appropriately into the dramatic sequence some of his highly popular songs. Some of his plays may be called poetic dramas for their abundance of poetic passages, melodious music and variety in characterisation projecting the artist's broad ideals. He has offered a few gems to the treasury of the modern Assamese drama. His Sonit-Kunwari (1925) (The Princess of Sonitpur) is a modern dramatised version of the mythological theme of Usha and Aniruddha, taken from the Assamese Vaishnavite epic-Kumar-Haran written by the great poet Chandrabharati (Ananta kandali). Jyotiprasad started the process of experimentations in renovating indigenous Assamese tunes with modern musical instruments in this play. His Karengar-Ligiri (1936) (The Maid of the Palace) is another bold experiment not only in the musical renovation, but also in projecting the clash between the revolutionary ideal of the artist and the age-old taboos of the traditional society through psychological conflicts of the characters. His Rupalim (1960) (An Imaginary Tribal Girl) is not only musical in texture and revolutionary in ideal but also a projection of the artist's ideal: the conquest of Light over Darkness. This is by far the best of all his plays, and, if properly rendered into English, it may establish Jyotiprasad as a topranking dramatist of the country. His Nimati Konya (or Rupkonwar, 1964) is a symbolic play, showing the role of the Artist who alone can usher in world peace and happiness. His Labhita (1948) is an exception both in the stage technique and creation of characters. Two other plays that have remained incomplete are Son Pakhili (Another symbolic play meant for children, 1964) and Khanikar (1977) (An Artist's struggle in his pursuit).

The musician-playwright also composed a good number of lyric poems, short-stories and children's poems. His Jyoti-Ramayana written in modern verse for children was indeed an ambitious and purposeful project which unfortunatley remained incomplete. He was also a powerful prose-writer and a great thinker. His speeches delivered on different occasions dealing with topics like 'Modern Culture', 'The Role of the Artist in the World' and the 'Role of the Woman in the World' are model literary essays. His biographical work, Chandrakumar Agarwala (1967) dealing with the inspiring life of his own uncle who was the pioneer romantic poet of Assam, is a model of the new biographical writings in Assamese.

Jyotiprasad was the editor of a language daily Dainik Asamiya, 1944, and was actively associated with the establishment of the University of Gauhati. He had a design of his own for the University Building, which, though not accepted, shows the artist's view of a University as an epitome of the cultural heritage of the people. Jyotiprasad, the great revolutionary artist, lived to see India free, but he was disillusioned after the Independence (1947) and succumbed to cancer at the age of forty-eight.

AGASTYA PANDITA (Sanskrit) belonged to the court of the Kakatiya ruler Prataparudradeva (1294-1325) of Warangal in Andhra. He was often identified with Vidyanatha, author of a useful and basic alamkara text Prataparudrayasobhusanam, who was also patronised by the same Prataparudra, but this view is not accepted now.

According to poetess Gangadevi in the Andhra region who was very close to Agastya in point of time, he was a learned and prolific author of poems. However, only three works of Agastya are now available—Krishnacharita, a prose composition, Nalakirtikaumudi, a minor poem in two cantos and Balabharata, a mahakavya in twenty cantos. It is to the credit of Agastya that his Balabharata is the basis for the well-known Tamil Bharata of Villiputturar. The Krishnacharita and Nalakirtikaumudi have been recently critically edited by T. Venkatacharya. The third work Balabharata was partly printed from Srirangam many years ago in a journal.

AGHA HASHR KASHMIRI (Urdu; b. 1879, d. 1935) was a poet and playwright. He was born at Benaras in an othodox Muslim family and educated in oriental learning for ecclisiastic competence. He also received English education upto the sixth standard. His real name was Agha Muhammad Shah. He started writing poetry at an early age and used to get his poems corrected by Muhammad Husain 'Faiz' Banarasi. He witnessed the first stage performance of Tenuchand Ghatak's Jubilee Theatrical Company against which he wrote his first article in Rafi-ul. He wrote his first play Aftab-e-Muhabat in 1896 after witnessing the stage play of Mehdi Hasan (Ahsan) Lucknawi's Chandravati. Soon thereafter he left home for Bombay to join stage and after a great deal of struggle got employment in the Alfred Theatre Company.

He made his debut with the adaptation of Shakespeare's Winter's Tale in his Murid-a-Shak in 1899. He served various other companies till in 1909 he founded his own unit The Great Alfred Theatrical Company of Hyderabad and wrote Silver King or Nek Parvin (1914) for the same. He also worked for a Theatre Company of Jullundhar (Punjab) owned by one Bhai Gyan Singh. He was awarded the title of Indian Shakespeare by the Delhi public in a reception held in his honour.

He joined maiden's Theatrical Company, Calcutta in 1919 and took to freelancing in 1923 and taking interest in films. In 1933 he launched 'Hashr Pictures' and commenced the shooting of Bhisham.

His important plays include Asir-e-Hirs (1900) based on a Sheridan's play, Safed Khun (1907) King Lear, Said-e-Hawas (1908) (King John), Khwab-e-Hasti (1909 Macbeth), Khubsurat Bala (1090), Yahudi Ki Larki (1913), Bilvamangal (1915), Ban Devi (1916), Madhur Murli (1919), Bhagirath Ganga (1926), Turki Hur (1922), Ankh ka Nasha (1924), Sita Banbas (1928) Rustam-Sohrab (1929), Dil ki Pyas (1930), and many others.

The real pioneer of Urdu stage in modern time, he introduced new style of acting and dialogue delivery. His poetic and melodramatic phrases, suited ideally the needs of the corweded open air tented Show Houses devoid of any mechanical devices or sound systems. Free use of appropriate couplets, and embellishment of songs and music added rich literary flavour to his dialogues. Themes of his plays mainly centre round moral issues with either mythological or historical overtones. He introduced adaptations of Shakespearean plays in Urdu and popularised them with the addition of musical and comic interludes to suit Indian audiences. All his plays contain an undercurrent of contemporaneity, touching upon several aspects of social reforms, nationalist feelings, urges for political and social emancipation. He was also a noted poet whose satirical poem Shukriya-i-Europe which he had first recited before a large public gathering in Lahore become very popular. (In this poem poet thanks the West for all its political and cultural exploitation of Asia and India and its evil effects on our civilization). He was however, best admired for his tragedies which touch the heights of melodrama. His characterisations are often simple and without much psycholgical depth.

AGILAHEE (Maithili) is an incomplete novelette by Kumar Gangananda Sinha. It is the story of a young girl of 12 years who is innocent but mischievous. The entire story is full of humour and the portrait of the heroine emerges as lovable and extremely interesting. It was published partly in Maithili Sahitya Patra in 1938.

AGNIBINA (Bengali) is the first Bengali book of verse by Kazi Nazrul Islam which made him famous almost overnight. The book contains twelve poems, some of them fairly long, including his most well-known as well as his most representative writing 'Bidrohi' (the Rebel). All these verses reveal a happy blending of intense romanticism and keen social awareness, a robust masculinity and a youthful exuberance. Nazrul Islam's style is facile and felicitious, his metre fluent and his voice passionate and loud. He never cared much for formal perfection and artistic finish. Nevertheless, it is the passionate expression and sincerity of feelings that endeared Nazrul Islam to his reader, and made Agnibina (lyre of fire, 1922) extremely popular. The very title of the book suggests its nature: a combination of fiery incantation and the sweetness of the Veena. The poem 'Bidrohi', certainly one of the great poems written by Nazrul Islam, is a strange mixture of serious and trivial, a fierce denunciation of social injustice and oppression and also of romantic ebullience, and impetuosity of emotion and it has a haunting quality about it. It not only contains many memorable lines but it overpowers the readers with its magnificent rhetoric. It is indeed impetuous and overwhelming and such unbridled and tempestuous outburst is unprecedented in the history of Bengali poetry.

There are other remarkable poems in the book, for example the dramatic monologue, 'Kamal Pasha' or the 'Satyagraha', which breathe the same spirit of rebellion, but all of them suffer technically and there is a lack of artistic finesse. But all of them, again, seem so natural and inevitable. Nazrul Islam draws his metaphors and imagery from both Hindu and Islamic sources with great ingenuity, and employs a large number of Persian words in his highly Sanskritic style creating a new and vigorous rhythm. Agnibina inspired youngmen and women during the days of freedom struggle and its power can be felt even today.

AGNIPURANA (Sanskrit): A Purana of a later day the Agnipurana is so called because Agni is supposed to have originally communicated it to Vashishtha, Vashishtha to Vyasa and the latter to the Suta, the usual narrator of the Puranas. In its 382 chapters and about 11,000 verses it covers the five characteristic topics (pancha lakshanas) and also deals with the popular phases of Hindu religion and philosophy, worship of different deities, religious vows and observances, tantric practices, politics and sociology, poetics and dramaturgy, arts and sciences.

The typical puranic topics, namely creation and counter-creation (sarga, pratisarga) or origin of the universe and cosmogony are described according to the Samkhya tenets (chs. 17–20); Manu-periods (Manvantarani) are given (ch. 150); Genealogies of kings and dynastic lists (vamsha, vamshanucharita) are presented (chs. 272–77). The Puranas, which Winternitz describes as 'the religious works of the second grade' centre round the cult of a popular god; here it is Vishnu, whose avataras (including that of Buddha) and worship are described in 15 chapters. The Shaivite influence is also clearly seen in the description of the mystic cult of Linga, of Durga, Tantric rites, worship of such deities as Ganesha, Surya, Agni, Chandra, Kubjika, Ashtashtaka Devi, Tvarita, etc. (chs. 21–106; also 143–49).

The context of Rama and Krishna, while describing the avataras, leads to the summary of Ramayana (chs. 7–13), Harivamsha (ch. 12) and Mahabharata (chs. 13–15). Doctrines of the Gita (ch. 380), Yamagita (ch. 381), Yoga (368–69) and Vedanta philosophy (chs. 376–379) are also described. The contents of Dharmashastra which include ashrama and varna duties and practices, daily and occasional rituals, expiations, griha and pakayajnas, etc. are borrowed from Smritis and given in chs. 151–174. Mystic formulas, Gayatri mantra, Sandhya, etc. are discussed in chs. 214–17.

In its desire to include everything, it gives astronomical information, effects of stars, propitiation formulas, devices and totems (chs. 121–142). An interesting section is Rajadharma (chs. 218–242) which deals with the science of government, politics and art of war.

The doctrine of Bhuvanakosha (chs. 107–120) is a geographical account which includes importance of sacred places and holy rivers.

It describes the Vedic literature (chs. 259–271), Science of Medicine (Ayurveda, chs. 278–297); more interesting perhaps are the sections on construction and consecration of image of gods, house-building, and on the literary topics, like Metrics, Phonetics, Grammar, Lexicography (summary of Amarakosha), Poetics and Dramaturgy (chs. 336–346).

A critical estimate of the Purana leads one to believe that the original Purana must have been greatly amplified to include different kinds of material and give the work a comprehensive character. Besides the Suta there are several other narrators like, Narada, Hayagriva, Bhargava Rama (Rajaniti), Dhanvantari, Palakapya (elephant-lore), Shalihotra (horse-lore), Skanda and Kumara (grammar), etc. They really are authorities on the different branches of knowledge; the author of the Purana must have included their names to lend authority to his collection of material. The original chapters in it must have been those where Agni through Suta is the narrator. The next phase of its development is represented by the influence of the Bhagavata or Vishnu cult, which dominated northern India during the 6th–7th century. Another phase is that of Shaivite or Tantric elements, marked by Ishvara as the narrator and falling between 7th and 8th century. In the final phase miscellaneous matter on various subjects was gathered; this appears to have happened in the Gupta and the post-Gupta periods which witnessed the growth of Dharmashastra, worship of minor deities, of arts and sciences, sculpture, architecture and iconography. Three principles seem to have governed the composition and growth of this Purana: summary of a work chapter by chapter; summary of material from standard works; and adaptation of whole chapters or works without acknowledgement.

Written in 'the manner of epics and religious works in the simple shloka metre', without verbosity or any attempt at stylistic display, this Purana is not an original literary work. Scholars are not agreed about the nature and period of its composition. But considering the inclusion of several topics, summaries and collection of various works and treatises on diverse subjects, one may take it obviously as a work of 'a band of authors, separated by centuries', and that the extant Purana must have attained its present form by about the 11th century.

Some particular features of the treatment of its topics may be noted. The apparent quest in dealing with topics of religion and philosophy is for the essence of knowledge leading to perfection. It deals with para and aparavidya: the knowledge of Vishnu-Brahman is regarded as perfect; the Vishnu-stotra (ch. 45) is expressive of this cult. But Winternitz points out the Shaivite character of the Purana. Probably, like some other puranas, it tries to present popular deities and religious modes and practices without a pronounced sectarian bias.

Dealing with poetics and dramatics, it discusses the characteristics of kavya definition and classification of kavya, gives a brief account of rasa both as a principle of poetic and dramatic compositions, of riti, alamkaras, gunas and doshas, and the topics from Natyashastra. The material is collected from Bharata, Bhamaha, Dandin, Vamana and Dhananjaya, that is, the early writers on poetics. It presents a peculiar view about rasa: Brahman transforms itself as alamkara; it leads to abhimana which overflows the three worlds; from abhimana comes rati, which developed fully as Shringara-rasa; the nine rasas (including Shanta) are aspects of Shringara.This is a doctrine which Bhoja develops. In its treatment of dramatics it includes the Upa-rupakas and certain items, like nandimukha which are not found in Bharata's purvaranga. It thus seems to stand mid-way between the earlier and later works, possibly suggesting some new literary ideas.

The total cultural data supplied by the Agnipurana is corroborated by the evidence available from the Chinese travellers Yuan-chwang and I-tsing, from the epigraphic records of the later Gupta period, the age of Harsha and Gurjara-Pratiharas, and from the data in Manu, Yajnavalkya and later Smritis. As Winternitz pointed out, the distinctive feature of the Purana is its encyclopaedic character. 'It gives a complete picture of the society during the period 700–800 to 1000–1100, reflecting the religious beliefs and practices, as also social customs and manners of the masses, and the intellectual progress of the elite as revealed in the development of arts, sciences, religion, philosophy and literature.'

AGNISAKSHI (Malayalam) is a work by Lalitambika Antarjanam. It was published in 1976. It presents the gripping spectacle of a young, ebullient Namboodiri woman Thethikutty, successively becoming a social reformer, an ardent nationalist and an earnest ascetic under the conflicting influence of tradition and modernity.

Thethikutty is married, according to Vedic rites, i.e. making Agni (fire) a witness (sakshi) to the ceremony (and hence the title Agnisakshi) to Unni Namboodiri of the well-known Malayala Brahmin family named Manampilly Illam. He is young, virtuous and loving but too orthodox to be the husband of a woman with Thethikutty's views. Feeling frustrated, Thethikutty leaves him once and for ever and reaches her paternal home. Unni ridden by customs, does not care to call her back; nor does he marry again. Instead, renouncing all wordly possessions, he lives a life of piety, is branded as an eccentric and dies a tranquil death when engaged in prayer before the family shrine. Thethikutty, in the meanwhile, being driven from pillar to post by her irresistible spirit finds no peace anywhere. At last, in the Himalayas, she meets with her old friend and her husband's cousin, the sixty year old K.M.K. Nair. Though she is upset at first the final meeting infuses into her a sense of fulfilment, she finds her unborn son in Mrs. Nair's son and hands over her wedding pendant to her daughter with the request to cherish it with due regard.

The story centres round almost a single individual. It depicts certain related problems such as the fortunes of the heroine's family and of the nation in a period of unforeseen changes. Basic problems that incidentally come into view are also significant. What, for example, is the ultimate meaning of existence? How far is destiny responsible for man's success and failure? The novel thus becomes something more than a contribution of topical value. No wonder it won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award and the Sahitya Akademi Award in the same year, 1977.

AGYEYA (Hindi; b. 1911) Sachchidanand Hiranand Vatsyayan 'Agyeya' has been more of an institution in himself than a mere individual author and over a period of four decades has exercised greater influence on the course of Hindi literary development in its different genres. His imaginative and innovative literary creativity, chartering a distinctly different course from the traditional one and constant experimentation both on the plane of content as well as form, is unparallelled. Novelist, short-story writer, essayist, critic, journalist, travelogue-writer, stylist and above all a poet of variegated experiences of life, Agyeya has had a chequered career—at once rich, multi-dimensional, vigorous and endowed with a rare fullness.

Born in a scholarly family and son of Hiranand Sastri, a high official in the Archaeological Department, Agyeya had to shift to different parts of the country during his childhood and developed steady interest in different languages and literatures which helped in developing his mental make-up. His father encouraged him to study Hindi and write in that language. A sense of revolt against the British imperialism, had already grown within him and before he could complete his M.A. (English), he had to plunge into the fray of the freedom movement. He, however, continued his intense study of Indian as well as foreign literature which helped him acquire a wider and more liberal perspective of life and men. He is a widely read and widely travelled man and has thoroughly studied significant Indian and foreign authors.

Agyeya has edited a number of Hindi newspapers and journals e.g. Vishal Bharat, Pratik, Vak, Dinman and Navbharat Times. He has been the pioneer of 'Prayogvad' and 'Nai Kavita' movements of modern Hindi poetry. He is essentially a writer endowed with deep cultural perception and a rare intellectual faculty. Thoroughly conversant with the trends of western culture and literature, he has, however, never been an imitator. In him, we find the glimpses of the cadence of Kalidasian melody as well as the sense of new visionary awakening of the leading lights of 'Chhayavad', viz. Jai Shankar 'Prasad'. 'Chhayavadi' poets did make an impact on Agyeya, yet he is a different poet with a distinctly different make-up. He gave new creative possibilities of poetic diction to 'Nai Kavita'. He has a marvellous combination of originality, novelty and the indomitable will to face new challenges. His contemplative personality has an immense capacity to carve out new ways discarding outdated tracks in the true fashion of an investigator of new courses (Rahon ke Anveshi, Introduction, Tar Saptak). Though Agyeya represents many facets of creativity, he is first and foremost a poet. His main collections of poems are Bhagnadut (1933), Chinta (1942), Ityalam (1946), Indra Dhanu Raunde Hue (1957), Ari O, Karuna Prabhamay (1959), Angan ke Par Dvar (1961), Sunahre Shaival (1966), Kitni Navon Mein Kitni Bar (1967), Kyon ki Main Use Janta Hoon (1969), Sagar Mudra (1971), Pahale Main Sannata Bunta Hun (1974), Mahavriksh ke Niche (1980) and Nadi ki Bank Par Chhaya (1981). Alongside his poetic execursions of more than four decades, both form and content received a constant shape in his poetry. But the freshness which was radiated by Hari Ghas Par Kshan Bhar and Mahavriksh ke Niche is rare. The freshness of his poetic sensibility, vision of Nature's beauty, understanding of human emotions, language of poetry, symbolization, imagery, rhythm, tone and metre have all a novelty that has left a deep impact upon modern Hindi poetry. The poet feels he has a responsibility to society, but at the same time he is a supporter of the freedom of the individual. Therefore, his poetry does not become the protector of individualism, rather it supports the values of the freedom of individual. He became a bridge between the old and the new through a meaningful dialogue and communication between tradition and modernity. The essence of his long poem Asadhya Vina' is a complete dedication to the creation.

Advocating novelty of experiment, tradition and progressiveness, Agyeya edited Tar Saptak in 1943. The preface to Tar Saptak is the most revolutionary document of new poetic writing in Hindi. The points raised in this preface have been further discussed in the prefaces to Dusara Saptak (1951), Tisara Saptak (1959) and Chautha Saptak (1979). In the preface to Dusara Saptak he wrote, 'Prayog' (experiment) does not have any theory. We are not theoreticians, nor the experiment is an aim or end in itself. Therefore, to name us 'Prayogvadi' is as meaningful or meaningless as to call us 'kavitavadi'.

Agyeya's contribution to novel is no less important than to poetry. His Shekhar: Ek Jivani (1941–44) (two parts), written in an autobiographical style, indicates a new beginning in Hindi novel. The story of the gradual revolt of the individual against the oppression of the society marks a new attitude to life. It is indeed a novel of unique sensibility. His next novel Nadi ke Dweep (1951) is again a new experiment. It is an exquisite example of technical perfection of the Hindi novel. Apne-Apne Ajnabi (1961) also is typical both in its technique and content.

Essayist Agyeya also has made an important contribution to that genre. He has written contemplative, theoretical and elegant essays that are collected in Trishnku (1943), Atmanepad (1960), Hindi Sahitya: Ek Adhunik Paridrishya (1972), Sab Rang Kuch Raag (1970), Al-Bal (1971), Bhavanti (1972), Antara (1975), Likhi Kagad Kore (1972), Jog Likhi (1977), Adyatan (1977), Samvatsar (1978) and Kahan Hai Dwarka (1982). In these essays, he deeply reflects upon his experience of literary writing, essential factors of creativity and basic values and standards of writing.

His short stories evoked considerable controversy due to their experimental character. His collection of short-stories Vipathaga (1937) marked a break from the basic sensibility and form of Hindi short story. Other collections: Parampara (1944), Kothari ki Baat (1945), Sharanarthi (1948), Jai Dol aur Anya Kahaniyan (1951), and Ye Tere Pratirup (1961) signify an important contribution to the Hindi short story.

Agyeya, a wanderer by temperament, has presented his experiences during his journeyes to far off places in and outside the country in his traveloque-memoirs Are Yayavar Rahega Yad (1953) and Ek Bund Sahasa Ucchali (1960). A collection of his literary memoirs Smriti Lekh was published in 1982.

The experimentalist author has also written a poetic drama Uttar Priyadarshi. Translator Agyeya is of no less importance to the literary world. In 1944, he translated Sarat Chandra Chaterjee's novel Srikant into English. In 1946, he translated Jainendra's Tyagpatra into English under the title The Resignation. He has also met the challenge of translating his own poems from Nilambara which have been published in the collection Signs and silence (1976).

As an editor, Agyeya has given ample evidence of being a good planner. Among his edited works, along with four Saptakas, may be named Adhunik Hindi Sahitya (1942), Pushkarini (Part I and II) (Collection of poems) (1959), Naye Ekanki (1952), Nehru Abhinandan Granth (in collaboration 1949), Hindi ki Pratinidhi Kahaniyan (1952) and Rupambara (Collection of poems, 1960).

His literary talent has been amply recognised from time to time by awards and honours. Angan Ke Par Dvar was honoured by the Sahitya Akademi Award, 1964. Kitni Navon Mein Kitni Bar got Bharatiya Jnanpith Award, 1978. In addition to this, he has also been honoured by a Czekoslovakian Award.

AHALYA (Kannada) The story of Ahalya which figures as no more than a passing episode in Valmiki's Ramayana provides the source material for P.T. Narasimhachar's Ahalya, a poetic drama of rare beauty and lyrical charm. The story recounted in bare outline by Vishwamitra (to Rama and Lakshmana when they inquired about the deserted hermitage) describes only the main incidents—Indra's infatuation, Ahalya's surrender to temptation, Gautama's curse and her final redemption by Rama. Obviously intended only to highlight Rama's greatness, the original story does not go into details of how or why the whole thing came about so that it strikes one as little more than a brief account of passion and its punishment. But the present play weaves out of it a human drama with a clear perception of the motivation of the principal characters—Ahalya, Gautama and Indra. This makes the story more human and the developments logically more convincing. The few changes which the author has introduced like Satananda, a son for Ahalya and other subsidiary characters like Rambha and Madana do not interfere with the main developments of the story but on the contrary make them more probable.

Gautama after giving Ahalya a son had been inspired by the ambition to acquire through penance the power to master the three worlds. In the process he had starved his young wife's natural longings. That was precisely when Indra comes down as Rambha failed to distract Gautama with the aid of Cupid but finds himself struck by his arrows when he seeks Ahalya. Indra had nymphs at command but had not known love and so his attraction for Ahalya soon develops into an infatuation. She too who had all along admired Indira finds herself torn between duty and desire but finally yields just when Gautama, wheedled by Cupid breaks his vow and approaches her. He came to love but finding that he had lost both his love and his vow, he curses her to an invisible existence feeding on air until Rama should arrive to redeem her and walks away to the mountains to regain his lost peace of mind.

With the triumph of temptation and the fall of Ahalya the play reaches its climax but that is only half the story. It has to achieve her redemption and reunion with her husband. Preparation for this in the form of burning remorse on the part of Ahalya and rigorous penance for peace on the part of Gautama mark the second part of the play which bridges ages of travail for both until Viswamitra passes by the hermitage now deserted and in ruins. The sight rouses Rama's curiosity—already troubled by the thought that in destroying Tataka he had killed a woman. His mind full of strange disquiet is further troubled by wailings heard in the air. That was Ahalya whose long remorse had made her ready for redemption for which the moment had arrived. The moment she sights Rama she regains her human form and wonders, like him, whether what was happening before her eyes was fact or fantasy. Gautama too after years of penance and quest for peace realised one fine morning in the presence of the beautiful birth of spring that total abnegation is futile. as total involvement, returns in time to welcome the distinguished visitors. So ends the curse and the estrangement and the play closes on a happy note.

The present play transforms a story of passion into one of purification by remorse and suffering. The gross in the natures of both Gautama and Ahalya—the ambition of the one and the temptation of the other—had to be cured through a cathartic experience to result in a new realisation of the nature of human passion and its perverse extremes. Narasimhachar perceives and brings out a new aspect of the significance of the brief Ramayana episode.

AKHANANURU (Tamil), known also as Akappattu or Netuntokai, is one of the anthologies of Ettuttokai of Tamil literature. It consists of 400 Akam (Love) poems in the Akaval metre, ranging from 13 to 31 lines ascribed to 145 poets. There is an invocation of Siva by Paratampatiya Peruntevanar. Poems 114, 117 and 165 are anonymous.

The poems are numbered schematically; those bearing odd numbers belong to the Palai (arid) setting; poems bearing numbers 2 and 8 (2, 8, 12, 18 etc.) relate to the Kurinchi (mountainous) setting; those having numbers 4 like 4, 14, 24, etc. deal with the Mullai (pastoral) setting; those with the number 6 (6, 16, 26 etc.) with the Marutam (riverine) situations and those having ten or its multiples relate to Neytal (littoral) setting.

This anthology is divided into three sections i.e. Kalirruyanai nirai of the first 120 poems, Manimitaipavalam of the next 180 poems and Nittilakkovai of the last 100 poems. Uruttiracanman, son of Madurai Uppurikutikizhar, was the compiler of this anthology and Pantyan Ukkira Peruvazhuti the patron. There is an old commentary on the first 90 poems of Akam.

Pankaneri Tamil Sangam has published this work in three volumes with a modern commentary by Na. Mu. Venkatachami Nattar and Ra. Venkatachalam Pillai. The five aspects of love, viz, Kurinchi (union of lovers), Palai (separation), Mullai (patient waiting), Neytal (despair) and Marutam (sulking) form the essence of these poems. The four-fold division of the land, their changing aspects with the time of the day and with the changing season, their flora and fauna, their people and their lives which get picturesque description in the poems form the concrete background. In the description of nature the poets offer not only a proper context to the aspect of love treated in the poems but also suggestive and symbolic meanings which enhance their aesthetic value.

The poets of this anthology concentrate more on the major theme patterns. The Kurinchi poems of Akam are focussed mainly on the situation leading to the marriage of lovers (variatal vetkaipporula). Neytal poems of Akam (with the only exception of Akam 170 which sings the despair of heroine, the proper Neytal theme) treat Kurinci theme in Neytal setting.

Akam supplies many historical facts. Certain poets like Mamulanar, Paranar, Nakkirar and Kallatanar have utilized relatively long poems of Akam to supply reference to historical episodes. References to the Nandas (251, 265) to the Mauriyas (69, 251, 281) to the Yavanas (149), to the Gangas (44), to the Banas (113, 325), to the Vadukas (107, 213, 253, 375), to many kings and chieftains, to many countries, cities and rivers and to some celeberated battles of Sangam age are found. There are also allusions to Puranic heroes Krishna (59), Muruga (59), Parasurama (220) and Rama (70). References to marriage customs (86, 136) to religious rites (22, 98), to sea-borne trade (149, 255), to local administration (256) and to many other facts of interest are also available. Elaborate narration of historical episodes sometimes mars the organic unity of Akam poems. But in the hands of those poets who successfully utilize the poems to narrate the successive events of a situation (48, 66) or to unfold the intricate emotional fabric of characters (5), the relatively long poems of Akam get excellent poetic expression.

AHIARI (Maithili) is a kind of riddle. There are other names also for riddles in Maithili, each with a slightly different shade of meaning. thus, 'Kuta', is a literary riddle; 'pihani' is a folk riddle chiefly meant for children. 'Ahiari' is perhaps a word from Sanskrit prahelika, but in common parlance it is used for riddles during marriage, particularly meant to test the intelligence of the bridegroom.

AHMAD MAULAVI C.N. (Malayalam; b. 1905) is a translator of the Quran and a prolific writer on Islam. He had a chequered educational career. His primary school education lasted only for three years; and later he studied at Karuvarakundu Grand Dars under Kunjalan Musaliar and, after a few years' interval, under Kattukundan Kunjahamed Musaliar. Jamaliyya College, Madras, was his next resort; from here after a short while he went to Bombay and studied under K.T. Ibrahim Maulavi. Since 1928 he studied at Baqiyyat at Salihat, Vellore and after passing Afsalul 'Ulama' examination from there in 1931 he became Religious Instructor in Malappuram Training School. Leaving that job in 1944 he engaged in business and literary activities.

Although he is the fourth translator of the Quran into Malayalam his was the first published complete translation with interpretation (1962) and this work gained popularity for him. His so-called progressive ideas and independent outlook have been subjected to severe criticism. Besides this translation he has to his credit, Islam Oru Samagra Padhanam (1965). It was translated into English as Religion of Islam, a Comprehensive Study (1979). Islam Charitram (History of Islam) is another work. Mahathaya Mappila Sahitya Parampariam (1978) is a work on the life and writings of the Muslim literary men of Kerala from the very ancient period till the present day, jointly written by K.K. Muhamed Abdul Karim and C.N. Ahmad Maulavi.

Sahihul Bukhari (Malayalam translation with interpretation 3rd ed. 1984) and Yassarna at Quran (a guide to the easy understanding of the Quran, 1981) are also the works of Ahmad.

AHMAD HAZARIKA, MAFIJUDDIN (Assamese; b. 1870, d. 1958), a rare talent in the 19th century Assamese poetry, came of the historic Assamese Muslim family of Bagh Hazarika. He had his early education up to the Entrance Examination in Dibrugarh. He served first as a forester and then as a head of the ministerial establishment of the Dibrugarh District court, from which he retired. Mafijuddin was actively associated with many a cultural and literary organisations. His simple living and pious thinking endeared him to all sections of the society. His election as the President of the Shankardev Sangha (1948), a Vaishnavite cultural organisation of Assam, set the seal of recognition on his catholicity. His lifelong dedication to the cause of Assamese literature led him ultimately to adorn the Presidential chair of the 12th session of the Asam Sahitya Sabha (1929). The concluding paragraph of his presidential address speaks for itself about his sincerity of approach to the cause of communal harmony between the Hindus and the Muslims.

Mafijuddin reached the peak of prominence as a modern Assamese poet when he was only twenty-six, with the publication of his famous anthology-Jnan Malini (A Gardener of Knowledge, 1897). The poems included in the book may be taken as a sign of the poet's spiritual regeneration. The poetry is unique for abundance of aphorisms, moral ideas and adages, use of pure Assamese idioms and sonorous rhymes. The poems, usually included in the prescribed text for students, have become extremely popular with the entire reading public of Assam, mainly because of their chaste Assamese style. Two such famous poems of the book are 'Din-Kana' (The Day Blind) and 'Marisalikhani' (The Burial Ground). The poems such as these are highly philosophical in nature and may be taken as an ethical guide by the mortal man. Two other anthologies of the poet are Tattwa-Parijat (A Heavenly Flower of Thoughts) and Malinir-Vin (The Gardener's Lyre) which remained unpublished during his life-time. But the former was published in 1970, synchronising with the birth centenary of the poet. Though Mafijuddin came to limelight in the efflorescene of Assamese romanticism, his poetry is an exception, without the avowed characteristics of the romantic poetry. It may be called romantic with a difference, that is, in its outward garb only, not in the flight of imagination.

The poet who lived up to a ripe old age was awarded in 1926 a literary pension for life by the state Government in recognition of his poetic gift and services rendered to the cause of literature.

AHMAD YAR (Punjabi) was born in a peasant family and was fond of studies. In his youth he left his native village to live at Murala. In 1840, he was sent for by Gulab Singh at Lahore and commissioned to write a History of the Khalsa which he duly completed in Baihlavi entitled Fatuhaat-e-Khalsa. This creative ability grew all the more because of patronage by the Sikh Sardars. He studied several books on Islam in both Arabic and Persian. He wrote the highest number of Kissas–more than 40–Hatim Nama, Kam Rup, Chander Badan, Saiful Maluk, Yusuf Zulekha, Hir Ranjha, Sassi Punnu, Laila Majnu, Sohni Mahiwal, Raj Bibi are prominent among them. 'Swaiya chhand' seems to be the favourite metre with the poet. But he wrote Sassi Punnu in beats. His writings resemble the Kissa stories of the middle-east countries.

All these Kissas except Hatimnama are love romances. Hatim Nama is a long narrative of the adventures of Hatim Tai, famous in old Persian lore as a man of charity. Ahmad Yar's style is truly oriental in its excessive use of similes and metaphors and of miracles and supernatural events. Not much attention is paid to realism in either narration or portrayal. Excessive use is made of Persian diction. He was well conversant with the early Punjabi Kissas and gives his judgement about these writings, which is an ample proof of his critical faculty.

AHUJA SUGAN (Sindhi; b. 1921, d. 1966) was an eminent Sindhi poet. Born in a business family, he obtained his B.A. degree from Bombay University. After the partition, he migrated to Bombay and finally settled down at Ulhasnagar where he started his small business. In 1952, he gave up his business and took to teaching as his career. After a year he left the job of a school teacher and took up a part time lecture ship in Khalsa College, Bombay. In 1964, he entered the field of journalism and took up a job of a sub-editor with Hindvasi, a Sindhi weekly, and remained there till his death. His first collection of short stories Aish Ji Kimat (What Price a Pleasure, 1960) has its place in the modern Sindhi short stories. This was followed by Be Aag Jalan Tha Parwana (Moths burning without flame, 1967), yet another collection of short stories, Arman (Desire, 1968), Kanwal Jagi Uthya (Lotus Blossom, 1968), a novel. Pyari Chiza (A Thing of Beauty, 1969) is a collection of his articles on criticism and poems. The last four books were published posthumously. He is considered to be a fine ghazal writer. His critical evalution of the collection of poems of Narayan Shyam entitled Roshan Chhanwaro (1962) is a landmark in the field of new criticism in Sindhi literature. As a pioneer of modern Sindhi ghazal, he struggled hard to pave new ways in this form of poetry and came out successfully. His powerful and bold diction of poetry coupled with lyricism of thought inspired his readers and influenced the youth in particular.

AINKURUNURU (Tamil) is a collection of 500 Akam (love) poems in the Akaval metre ranging from 3 to 6 lines. There is a brief invocatory verse by Paratampatiya Peruntevanar. This anthology consists of five sections of 100 poems each dealing with the five Tinais of Akam. Each hundred is again divided into tens. The tens of this anthology are named after a word or phrase repeated in the poems or after the message or situation shared by the poems. The poets who composed centums on Marutam, Neytal, Kurinchi, Palai and Mullai were Orampoki, Ammuvanar, Kapilar, Otalantaiyar and Peyanar respectively. Ain was compiled by Pulatturaimurriya Kutalur Kizhar under the royal patronage of Yanaikkatcey Mantaran Seral Irumporaiyar. There exists an old anonymous commentary on the work. U.Ve. Swaminataiyar who first published Ainkurunuru (1903) has added a detailed commentary and a glossary. There is another edition with the commentary of Cu. Auvai Duraiswami Pillai published in 3 parts by Annamalai University.

The poems are individual poems independent of each other. But the method of singing 10 poems under a heading as practised by the poets of Ain is responsible for the following characteristics of Ainkurunuru. This has initiated the tradition of singing the Akam poems in a sequence; In some decades the same sentence pattern is repeated in all the ten poems; In certain other decades the poets have created new modes of expression to convey the message of a particular situation.

A good percentage of the minor theme patterns treated in the whole of Sangam literature is found in Ainkurunuru. This has initiated the tradition of singing the Akam poems in a sequence;

A good percentage of the minor theme patterns treated in the whole of Sangam literature is found in Ainkurunuru.

The Utanpokku situation of Palai, the situation of the hero's return and that of wedded life in Mullai and the situation of reconciliation in Marutam have been utilised by the poets to create many new minor theme patterns. The literary technique of blending a theme with an unconventional setting (Tinai mayakkam) receives good attention in the poems of Ainkurunuru. For example, Kurinchi theme is treated in Neytal, Palai and Marutam settings. Repetition, antithesis, brief forceful implied similies (ullurai uvamai) and suggestiveness (ullurai) are the main literary devices which enhance the poetic value of Ainkurunuru.

This anthology is considered by some scholars to be the earliest of the Sangam anthologies. According to T.P. Minaksisundaram, the Ainkurunuru poems with their recurring lines, phrases or ideas remind one of folk songs.

AITAREYOPANISHAD (Sanskrit) is a part of the larger Aitareya Aranyaka beginning with the fourth section of the second chapter of the Aranyaka up to the end of that chapter. There are three chapters of this Upanishad and all are important. The first chapter gives a description of the creation of the world by the primeval Atman through the intermediary Viraja. The second contains the famous philosophy of 'three births' probably belonging to the sage Vamadeva, a Vedic sage mentioned in the Rigveda (IV, 27 I). Vamadeva is introduced in the Brihadaranyaka (1.4.10) where he declares himself as having been Manu and the sun in a previous birth, as well as in the Aitareya (II.4). Here the theory of 'three births' is declared to have been in consonance with his teaching. This sage, who seems to have been intensely interested in the question of rebirth, declares that "while yet in embryo he tried to know all the births of the gods". He also seems to have held that there were three births of man: the first birth of a man occurs when the spermatozoon combines with the ovum; his second birth occurs when a child is born to him; his third birth takes place when he is himself reborn after death. It appears from the contents of this chapter that the idea of life after death is definitely introduced.

Finally, the last chapter of this Upanishad is a very bold statement of the fundamental doctrine of an idealistic philosophy that all psychical and cosmic existences must be regarded as the expression of a common principle. Prajnana (chaitanya) alone helps realization and mental stability. It is the Brahman (Prajnanetro lokah Prajna Pratishtha Prajnanam brahma).

The first chapter tries to establish that it is from the activity of Atman alone that the whole world comprised of the animate and the inanimate is produced (atma va idameka evagra asit). It further describes that the Atman enters the body through the opening in the head. This is called vidriti or nandana.

In intimating to the readers that the universe is created by Atman through the intermediary person the Upanishad tells the readers that the four worlds were first created, namely, ambhas, marichih, marah and ap. Then guardians (deities) of these worlds were created. These deities desired for an abode and they preferred a human being to a cow or a horse. These deities accommodated hunger and thirst in the body. Then the Atman created food and entered the body through the opening called vidriti. The Atman has got three abodes (mastaka, kantha and hridaya). In consideration of the turiyavastha (the fourth stage) these three abodes are like dreams. This Atman saw this very Purusha, i.e., Brahman and said, "I saw it". Therefore Indra is his name indirectly (derived from Idandra). Gods always love indirectness or secrecy (parokshapriya iva hi devah).

The theory of 'three births' referred to above is described in this Upanishad in a cryptic but suggestive manner. The semen in the man suggests that the embryo is first conceived by himself. When the semen is sprinkled in the woman, the Purusha is born. This is the first birth of the Purusha.

This semen becomes one with the woman's body and hence does not injure her. She thinks that the soul of the Purusha has gone in her embryo. She thinks of the future birth of the child, i.e., she thinks of the Purusha reborn. Thus the worlds continue their existence. This is the second birth of the Purusha. The third birth takes place when he dies and is reborn. One who knows this goes to heaven and gets all his desires fulfilled and becomes immortal.

All sensual objects, senses, heart, consciousness, chaitanya, intellect, etc., i.e., all psychical and cosmic existences are but the names of Prajnana (chaitanya). All gods, like Brahma, Visnu, Prajapati, the five elements, all kinds of seedlings, the oviparous, the viviparous, the sweat (warm vapour)-born, the sprouting plants, animals, birds, the animate, and the inanimate are established in Prajnana (chaitanya). This Prajnana is Brahman, is the

AIYYANGAR, RAMASWAMI GORUR (Kannada: b. 1904), is an eminent Kannada writer of short stories, novel travelogue and criticism. At the age of seventeen Gorur gave up education to join the struggle for freedom and went to Ahmedabad, where he joined the Gujarat Vidyapeeth. Gandhiji became the inspiration of his life and he worked under and travelled with the Mahatma. When he returned to Mysore State he plunged into constructive work. He was a journalist for some time, worked for the promotion of village industries and was connected with the Khadi Vastralaya Association. He suffered imprisonment in 1942 and again in 1947. His son, Ramachandra, was killed in a police firing in 1942. After independence Gorur continued to work for the upliftment of villagers. He was nominated as a member of the State Legislative Council for two terms and won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1980.

Halliya Chitragalu (1932), the first work of Gorur to be published, contains lovely vignettes of rustic life. The exquisite blending of keen observation, delight in the oddities of human nature, sympathy, tenderness and a sense of the comic and the ridiculous, won him popularity. Since then, in a series of collections, the more important of which are Bestara Kariya, Sivaratri, Usubu, Vaiyyari and Kammara Virabhadrachari, he has brought rustic life into Kannada literature on a splendid scale. It is true that he seldom gives a picture of villagers engaged in their professions. It is also true that the rustic life has been transformed in the last forty years by technology and the winds of change have been strong. Gorur portrays the superstition, the casteism and the other curses of village life, but also conveys the joys, the simplicity and the strength and resilience of that life. He has a fine sense of humour with a lively sympathy for the naive and the eccentric. In his other stories Gorur portrays the hardships of city life and life's little ironies. Among his best stories are Naty Bala, Bestara Kariya, Gandubiri Hosabi, Kammara Virabhadrachari, Butayyana Maga Ayyu Mullu Gida, and Kortinalli Gedda Ettu.

Gorur has published several collections of sketches, skits and essays. Bettada Maneyalli Mattu Itara Prabhandagalu and Hemavatiya Tiradalli mattu Itara Probhandagalu contain the more serious essays. These are the reflections of one who has become a part of the life of rural India but has also breathed the air of the modern world. Though steeped in Vedic philosophy and the Sanskrit classics, he is keenly aware of the exploitation and injustice in the traditional Indian community. He combines with a sense of humour a serious concern for the meaning and fulfilment of life. 'Bettada Maneyalli' is one of the best essays in Kannada. Other excellent essays include 'Devaraugalu Democresiyu'; 'Saphala Jivana' and 'Setuve'. The seemingly lighter pieces depict the wealth and variety of human nature and the beauty and joy of life in the village.

The novel Hemavati depicts the changes that modern education brought in village life. Gorur's other novel, Merevanige, is one of the first novels to depict the freedom struggle. These are the works of one who is essentially an essayist. Although loose-knit, they recapture the pressures and undercurrents of the village life of the pre-independence era.

Amerikadalli Gorur (travelogue) won the Sahitya Akademi Award. It narrates vividly and with a fine sense of humour, the experiences of Gorur and his wife in America; he has an observant eye and a catholic outlook, and he can laugh at himself. But what makes the work particularly interesting and valuable is that it presents the confrontation of one steeped in Indian culture and Gandhian thought and ways of life with the highly mechanized and sophisticated society of today.

Gorur has written several biographies and books of reminiscences; among them are the biographies of Kasturba and Maulana Abul Kalam Azad. He has translated Gandhi and Tolstoy. It was inevitable that this lively student of rural life should be interested in arts and literature. He has published collections of folk songs and written and lectured about them. His Sahitya Rasmi is practically his only work on poetics and literary criticism (apart from his lectures on Kumaravyasa, a 15th century poet).

Gorur has a unique place in modern Kannada Literature. He belongs to the Navodaya or Renaissance Period. The literature of this period was largely the creation of the well-educated urban middle class. Gorur brought to it a live contact with rural life. Again, he is one of the few writers who have enriched this literature with genuine humour. This humour is always blended with tenderness and a lively appreciation of the unusual and the eccentric. He has wide sympathies. He comes from the masses and understands and cares for them. He is not a sophisticated writer consciously concerned with technique; but the seeming artlessness and loose structure of his best stories hide a lot of stresses and conflicts.

AJAIB SINGH KAMAL (Punjabi; b. 1932) was born in the family of Babu Jung Singh at Village Dandin (Distt.

Hoshiarpur, Punjab). After completing his earlier education in his own district, he got his higher education in Khalsa College, Mahilpur and then in Khalsa College, Amritsar.

He is a poet who has successfully travelled from traditionalism to modern sensibility. He started his literary career as a writer of ghazals but soon shifted to other forms of poetry. He has written some successful verse-dramas such as Chaanak Anne Han, Hatheli te-Ugya Shehr, Dahri Wala Ghora, Urf Unniso Narrinve, and Langra Aasman. His forte is long poems, the dearth of which is very much felt in the realm of Punjabi poetry. His famous long poems are 'Khla Vich Latkde, Manukh', 'Ekotar so' 'Akhan Wala Mahabarat', 'Singan wala Devta' 'Khali Kursi da Dukhant' 'Banere te Baithi Aukh', 'Africa vich Naiter heen', 'Likhtam Kala Ghora', etc.

He has also written a few novels and books of criticism, but he is mainly known as a poet.

His nostalgic feelings have kept his poetic sensibility very near to the life of his motherland, in spite of the fact that he is living abroad for more than a decade. He is an ardent lover of Punjabi language, literature and culture. But he does not forget to enrich Punjabi poetic sensibility with such personal experiences, as he had the opportunity to gain during his long stay in foreign countries.

Being a rebel by nature, he makes artistic and forceful use of satire in his poems. At times, he seems to be an advocate of diffused style–a modern trend in literary expression.

AJA RAMITACHA (Nepali) a novel by Indra Bahadur Rai (b. 1927), published in 1964, is one of the outstanding Nepali realistic novels.

The writer takes a hard look at social realities generic to Nepalis, depicts them truthfully but without the least rancour. His is an endeavour to understand the prevalent situations as well as people associated with them as their begetters or mere pawns. Times and people are delved in depth.

Janak, a well-meaning politician and businessman, despite many a trivial success that keeps coming his way, has failed to genuinely lead his people as also to stave off his economic ruination. Yet, he is Janak still, the sheet-anchor of all in times of tumult and turmoil. After a longish period of ennui that seemed never to be ending and which sapped his moral strength and physical vitality too, he is seized by a labour union -cum-political upheaval for which he has to activate himself as the leader. Maybe he was really only a pawn. He readies himself to lead the movement the way he is bid to lead by a conjunction of fitful situations and a conglomerate of head-strong associates.

The novel has been acclaimed by critics for the portrayal of an assemblage of life-like characters. And they interlock so to say with one another in multifarious ways. Some characters visibly age and mature, a few strangely remain constant and invariable, while there are some important few who have forcefully presented their personality facade, but are not truly characters in the round.

The narrative does not follow a linear development. A multiplicity of social consciousness and pursuits are accommodated. Not all of them have been interwoven meticulously in the novel. Those that emerged as dominant have been allowed to direct the progression of the first-order theme.

B.D.

AJANTA (Telugu; b. 1929) is the pseudonym of Viswanadha Sarma Penumarthi. He studied commerce up to the Hons. level, though he did not take a degree from any university. His temperament is marked by a ceaseless quest for an individual mode of expression to communicate his ideals and ideas, dreams and fancies.

He made his debut as a poet in 1952 and at once caught the attention of the readers and the critics. He is a poet whose tone is introspective and intellectual, whose diction fits as a glove to the thought content which is strikingly modernistic. Though he has only fifteen poems to his credit and has not brought out so far a single collection of his poems, Ajanta has made his mark as a poet with a distinct stamp. This is borne out by the inclusion of his pieces, published only in magazines and journals, in all important anthologies of modern poetry like Kavita, Kalpana, Sinduram's and Mahasamkarpam. His poems were translated into English and some of them were published in Indian and foreign collections of modern verse like East and West, This Tense Time and Inferno and won the admiration of lovers of poetry.

Ajanta roamed about for nearly twelve years groping for something ineffable and pining for what is not. His whereabouts were not known even to his kith and kin, until he joined the staff of a popular weekly Anandavani in 1952. "Ajanta fashioned his razor-like sharpness of expression around the destiny of death, falling trees and resonant roadways" during his nomadic ramblings across the country.

He was influenced by the intellectual poet Varada Rajeswara Rao when he stayed in Hyderabad during the sixties. He is considered today a poet who is not prolific but profound, significant though not simple and sweet. There is an intellectual quality which stimulates and provokes thought though it does not stir the feelings and emotions. He has the eye of an abstract painter and the outlook of an Existentialist, whose vision is never blurred. 'The Sordid Dawn', 'The Frightened', 'Slumber', and the 'Touch of fire' are the captions of some of his poems which established his individuality as a poet. His free verse has a distinct stamp of cerebration which is missing in the free-verse of the slogan-mongering progressive writers. There is an abstraction in his verse but it does not bog him down in obscurity which is the bane of modern poetry.

On rare occasions Ajanta attempted literary criticism. His perceptive interpretations of the poems of Sri Sri and Seshendra Sarma reveal his critical acumen and creative insight.

He is currently working as assistant editor of the Telugu Daily Andhra Prabha at Vizianagaram.

Extreme self-restraint is the hall mark of his literary compositions. His intellectuality is neither barren nor smug but it is ever on the move, seeking fresh woods and pastures new in the realm of poetry.

AJIT KUMAR (Hindi; b. 1933) was born at Lucknow in the illustrious family of poetess Sumitra Kumari Sinha. It was perhaps natural for Ajit Kumar to be drawn towards literary pursuits. After a short stint at the D.A.V. College, Kanpur, as a teacher, he joined the Hindi section of the External Affairs Ministry at New Delhi in 1956 and continued there till 1962. From 1962 onwards he again took up teaching and joined Kirori Mal College, Delhi.

He has tried his hand in more than one literary genre but his first love continues to be poetry. In between his creative poetic endeavours, he has found time for compilations, anthologies and writing diary, sketches, appraisals of literary works, essays and even Acharya Shukla Vichar–Kosh. His better known works are: Akele Kanth Ki Pukar (Poems, 1958); Ankit Hone Do (Miscellaneous, 1962); Ye Phul Nahin (Poems, 1970); and Kavita ka Jeewit Sansar (Essays, 1972).

His edited works are: Amitabh, Varsha ki Kavitayen (1954, 1963, 1964, 1965); Bachchan Nikat Se (Sameekshayan), Gadya ki Pagdandian, Acharya Shukla Vichar–Kosh, Hindi ki Shreshtha Pratinidhi Kavitayen (Pahli Pankhuri); Athven Dashak ki Shreshtha Pratinidhi Kavitayen (edited along with Bachchan).

Besides published works, his miscellaneous writing is scattered in various journals and magazines.

AJNAPATRA (Marathi). Ramchandrapanta Amatya who was honoured as 'Hukamatpanha' by Chatrapati Rajaram (Shivaji's second son) wrote this well known Ajnapatra (the political code of conduct) in 1715 at the order of Sambhaji (second son of Rajaram and Rajasbai). He was assigned the task of re-establishment of the Maratha kingdom in the crucial circumstances when Aurangzeb, the Mughal Emperor attacked the Marathas. Rajaram, the king, had to flee to Jinji.

Ramchandrapanta worked as 'Panta Amatya' in Shivaji's Ashtapradhan Mandala from 1672 to 1677. He was 'Panta Sachiva' during the reign of Sambhaji from 1680 to 1685 and was again appointed as 'Panta Amatya' during the reign of Rajaram from 1693.

He performed his duties vigorously, faced the Moghal attack bravely, grouped the Maratha armies for guerilla tactics, compelled the Moghals to retreat and recaptured the forts and the vast territories occupied by them.

He served the Maratha Kingdom for four decades and witnessed the rule of three rulers. He was involved deeply in many political events and had thorough knowledge of the Maratha state policy. He had acquired command over the principles laid down by Shivaji as a statesman and as an administrator.

The Ajnapatra has nine chapters but they may be divided mainly into two parts. The first part consists of two chapters in which a detailed survey of Shivaji's struggle for independence, Aurangzeb's attack on Marathas and Rajaram's brave struggle to save the kingdom and his victory has been undertaken. It also mentions the territories of the two provinces under the rule of Shivaji–one from Salheri Fort to Tungabhadra and the second one from Kolhar-Belapur to the barriers of Kaveri inclusive of Jinji and Yelore. It describes the critical circumstances after the cruel murder of Sambhaji.

The second part of the Ajnapatra is the principal aspect of the book, and consists of the third chapter to the last conclusive ninth chapter. Here Ramchandrapanta formulates the code regarding the role and function of the king, his character, his duties towards his subjects, and the education of the Princess (3rd chapter). Further he describes the duties of the ministry, kings's behaviour, responsibilities, and integrity as well as the subject's dependence upon his efficiency for their welfare. (4th chapter). A separate chapter on money lenders and merchants coming from foreign countries is also written by him. He discusses the adoption of the policies regarding foreigners, especially from Portugal, Holland, France and England. These merchants, Shivaji warns, should not be given any place near the sea-shore to construct their godowns since they would convert the same into small forts. The navy, the cannons and the artillery are their real strength and they would use it freely if a place near the sea-shore is given to them (5th chapter).

Two chapters are written on Samanta (feudal chief) and Samanthood, their treacherous behaviour especially at the time of enemy's aggression. The general policy of not creating new Samants is discussed here (6th and 7th chapters).

In those days forts had great importance since the life of the kingdom solely depended on them. The eighth chapter discusses the building and designing of the forts, the water-supply system and the system of the storage of grains, the artillery, etc. He also speaks of the duties of the Chief of the fort, the army on the fort, the maintenance of the fort in this chapter.

The ninth chapter is on the Navy. The hierarchy and the administration of the navy, the policy regarding foreign cargo ships, the naval war system, the building of the war ships, the places useful for the camps or harbouring the ships at the time of storm have been thoroughly discussed in it.

Ramchandrapanta Amatya realised the significance of the political code of command laid down by Shivaji properly as he had to practise those principles in day to day administration. T.S. Shejwalkar has rightly said, "The Ajnapatra is a unique document, every line of which bears the impress of a master hand, where nothing seems to be written which had not been tasted by personal experience, nothing expressed which had not been sometimes felt, and not moved the inmost recesses of the heart".

AJWANI, LALSINGH HAZARISINGH (Sindhi; b. 1899, d. 1976), after completing his schooling at Khairpur Mirs and Sukkur (Sindh) joined D.J. Sind College, Karachi, in 1915 where he secured first position in both B.A. and M.A. examinations. He won the Dakshina Fellow Scholarship in 1916. Later he was awarded the Ellis Scholarship for securing first position in B.A. degree examination. He remained Chairman, Sindhi Advisory Board, Board of studies in English (Bombay University) and was convener, Sindhi Advisory Board of the Sahitya Akademi for over ten years. He retired as Principal of the National College, Bandra, Bombay.

He had tremendous control over expression in Sindhi as well as in English. A fluent orator in Sindhi and English, he was considered to be an essayist and a critic of repute. His writings have an easy style and a free flow, which help him to drive home the point easily. A number of his 'forewords' to the books of many eminent writers provide a thought-provoking reading.

He edited a collection of Sindhi poems Shair ji Sukhdi (1931), and a collection of Sindhi essays Vichar (1949). Some of his essays are an eloquent evidence of his control over his mother tongue. To name a few: Nasru, ke Ghurjun (prose, a few requirements), Hindustan Mein Nain Jagriti Ain Sindhi Boli Aim Sahitya (New awakening in India and Sindhi language and literature, 1942–1946). A compilation of his important essays appeared in a book form entitled Uchhal (1961). However, his major contribution to Sindhi literature is the History of Sindhi Literature. published in 1970.

AKAL USTAT (Punjabi) is a long devotional hymn written in the praise of 'Akal' (the Timeless, Immortal God) and preserved as the second Bani in Sri Dasam Granth Sahib (1726), the holy book of the Tenth Master, Guru Gobind Singh (1666-1708). Composed around 1698 at Anandpur Sahib in Braj language and recorded in Gurmukhi script, it consists of 272 chhands (verses) set in twelve poetical metres (such as Kavitt, Swaiyya and Chaupai) befitting various aspects and moods of its content. The ten quatrains, called 'Sudha Swayyei' (v. 21-30), included therein form a part of the Sikh Nitnam (daily prayer texts of the morning service) and are also recited during the baptismal ceremony (called Amrit sanchar) of the Sikhs. Many a Sikh has been adding its entire text to their morning devotion.

Its singular theme is significantly indicated in its invocation, seeking God's protection by addressing Him as the Timeless Person who is the Eternal One, All-steel, All-power", exhibiting thus the Guru's conception of God having undergone a martial metamorphosis from the common concept God to a concrete and a powerfully living being. "There is hardly any other religious composition in the religious literature of India which is so exclusively devoted to the revelation of a true vision of God in all His manifest and unmanifest forms." He is the Creator and the Saviour of all; Omnipresent, Omniscient and Omnipotent; Immanent, Infinite and Absolute, etc. (v.11-20, 51-68). Disapproving of asceticism, castigating fetish worship and false practices passing for religion and proclaiming that devotion is the essence of God's worship, people are exhorted to 'Sach kahon sun leoh sabhe jin prem kio tin hi Prabhu paeo (Hear me all, hear the Truth: 'They who truly love God, they alone shall meet Him'.–v–29). Condemning the caste-system and similar canons aimed at separating man from man, Guru Nanak's remarkable maxim, "Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man", is emphasised in the motto: Manas ki jat sabe eke pehchanoo (Know all mankind as one caste-v. 85). Elucidating it further, it is stated: "There is no difference between a temple and a mosque, between the Hindu worship or the Muslim prayer: because men are the same and are made alike, though they appear different. (v. 86). Sovereign remedy for their ills and sufferings is Nam, a life of prayer and praise of God; and the end of their life's journey is the merging of their souls in the Supreme Soul which is Timeless (v. 87-90). Hence people are exhorted to lead a life of devotion to God and dedication to duty and warned at the same time against involvement in the world whose glory is evanescent.

Akal Ustat is considered both in spirit and style, from the literary as well as philosophical point of view one of the best compositions of Guru Gobind Singh, interspersed with gems of great poetry imbued with Shant and Adbhut rasas, such as v. 51-70 wherein singing 'Jale Hari, Thale

Hari....Tuhi Tuhi' (God is in the waters as He is upon the earth.... Thou alone art, Thou, O Thou!), he loses himself in the most elevated state of realisation, feeling the entire Universe losing its separate entity and melting into the Supreme Being he is addressing. 'The quatrains, in particular, are marvellous compositions–complete in themselves, ornate in structure, strong in diction, rich in poetic fancies and superb in imagery; and are also marked by brevity, lucidity and undulating rhythm.

AKAM (Tamil). The four-fold goal of family life as conventionally laid down by the ancient Tamil scholars are: 1. aram (virtue), 2. porul (wealth), 3. inpam (pleasure) and 4. vitu (salvation) of which the first two are dealt with under 'puram' and third under 'akam' in Tamil literary works.

The ancient Tamil literary works, known as 'Sangam' works are conventionally grouped into two categories, viz., akam and puram. Akam is the theme of an idealised form of love as depicted in these works characterised by conventionally codified principles of composition whereas puram is the theme of life other than love. The idealised poetic treatment of akam love, otherwise known as 'akattinai' is of three major classes, namely, 'kaikkilai', 'aintinai' and 'peruntinai'.

Kaikkilai means a mode of love in which a lad falls in love with a lass and complains of her indifference. It is not one-sided or unrequited love as considered by some, since the girl has not yet attained puberty to understand either the pleasures or pangs of love. The lad's anguish is generated by his own ignorance of approach. Peruntinai is a mode of love where excessive passion prevails under the following situations: 1. the lad's actual riding the 'matal' chariot when he is unable to secure the object of his love, 2. protracted separation so as to lose the cream of youth without sexual union, 3. lass pining away beyond consolation, 4. any venture resorted to by the lass due to excessive lust. Kaikkilai and peruntinai are respectively the abortive and excessive forms of akattinai whereas 'aintinai' is its best and normal form.

The ethical codes of aintinai love which refers to themes of perfect mutual love or the perfect union of hearts are divided five-fold as given below: 1. kurinci, 2. mullai, 3. marutam, 4) neytal, 5) palai. The enumeration of such divisions is based on the psychological and emotional feelings or conducts of the lovers. When the lovers unite in love, it is called 'kurinchi' which refers to mountainous regions within their neighbourhood. When they are separated later, it is called 'palai'. It has no separate region. It denotes the waste tracts of rocks and lands scattered about in all regions. When the lass blames her separated lad in feigned anger and charges him of infidelity and so on, this sort of variance between the lad and lass is called 'marutam', which refers to the plains with fields. However the lass waits in patience, with a sense of reality, for her lad who has gone on business. Such patient waiting is called 'mullai' which indicates the region of forests and woods. As the days roll on, if the lad does not return, the lass suffers terrible pangs and this pining is called 'neytal' which refers to the sea and the coastal region. Thus the five conventional divisions are used to refer to the five types of aintinai love.

Aintinai love is clearly divided into two phases, viz., 1. 'kalavu' course (pre-nuptial love) and 'karpu' course (post-nuptial love). Among the four levels in the 'kalavu' course, the first is the union through destiny. The lad and lass happen to see each other. The two pairs of eyes react and speak to each other passionately. The union of their glances is an index of their union in heart. Such a mental union takes place due to destiny. On the second level, the passionate lovers, hoping that they can meet again, go to the place of their first meeting. Being attracted by each other, they meet there. The lad speaks to her in such a language that could drive away her inborn modesty. The purport of this second meeting is to subdue their mental feverishness caused out of the first meeting, and to show that their union is not the result of mere seasonal sexual instinct, but is the effect of inborn, ever-growing and lifelong affection towards each other. In the third and the fourth phase of the Kalvu course, a series of meetings between the lovers take place through the help of the male companion of the lad and the female companion of the lass respectively. Their love for each other by this time will grow so thick as to make them feel that they cannot live without each other. Though their love is kept secret, it is very difficult to keep it thoroughly so from the eyes of the public and hence the public begin gossiping about their love. In the meantime the mother or the nurse of the lass feels distressed to see her waning everyday. Ignorant of the real cause of her emaciation, the orthodox mother arranges for Veriyattu, a kind of spirited dance to evoke the blessings of God and relieve the lass of her emaciation. But once the lady gives her heart away to a man, it is not expected of her to worship any God since such a worship is considered as running counter to the virtue of chastity. So she sends word to her lad to claim her in public. She also tries to enlighten her parents through indirect means of her clandestine love with the help of her maid-companion. This indirect intimation of her secret love to the parents is called 'arattotu nirral' or revelation of love with virtue. If this revelation fails to produce the desired effect, then the lad and lass elope without the knowledge of the parents. The elopement results in marriage. Thus 'kalavu' course is a means to an end.

The next phase of aintinai love is 'karpu', the general custom of which is the lad's acceptance of the lady from the right persons in the appropriate manner with due ceremony. The couple falls into the wedlock which is regarded as a great social institution. They live together as husband and wife. The wife concentrates on household or domestic life, dedicating her all to her husband. The husband does not entirely lose himself in the gloss of wedded life; he has other pursuits also as a dutiful citizen. He gets himself separated from his wife in the following four kinds of pursuits: 1. education for attaining scho larship, 2. acquiring wealth, 3. defence of the country, and 4. ambassadorial activities. This separation is an occasion when the wife experiences sorrow on the eve of her husband's departure. The husband offers comfort to her. She is relieved of her gloom and puts up with the separation and awaits eagerly for the day of his return. Another cause of separation between the couple is the hero's attraction for courtesans. It is usual for the heroine on such occasions to tease her husband on his return, levelling charges of infidelity at him. She would sulk and pretend indignation. Then the hero would prove his fidelity and his companions would help him clear himself. This part of 'utal' (love-taunts) and union are a unique feature in the 'karpu' course. This offers great satisfaction for the lady who must be assured and reassured of her supremacy in her lord's affection. This, the hero must do with all gusto, as this is a great source of her joy in life.

The next stage in the karpu course begins with the birth of the child. The love between the sexes blossoms into pure, passionless affection towards the child. With the birth of more and more children, the hero thinks less and less of himself and as he attains old age, he learns to be detached in his attitude towards life. He begins to concentrate on spiritual pursuits, assisted whole-heartedly by the heroine. Thus the grammar of akam love teaches us to establish an ideal society. Tolkappiyam, Iraiyanar Kalaviyal and Nampiyakapporul are some of the grammatical works which throw light on the aspects of 'Akam'. Sangam literature offers a portrayal of such 'Akam' poetry.

AKANANDUN (Kashmiri) is the most popular folk legend of Kashmir. The legend is of local origin. This legend has some resemblance with the Hebrew tale of 'Abraham and Issac'. There is a common belief that the tale originated in Sindmat Nagar, a legendary city of hoary past, which traditionally flourished on the present day site of Wullar lake.

The legend of Akanandun is simple. Long ago a king ruled the city of Salabat Nagar (Sindmat Nagar). He had seven daughters but no son. All the efforts to be blessed with a son proved futile. Finally a Yogi appeared and told the king that he would bless the king with a son provided he gives the word that the boy would be returned to him after twelve years. The king gave the word to the Yogi, who left forthwith. In due course a son was born to the king, who was given the name Akanandun. The boy happened to be very sharp and intelligent. For twelve years he pleased his parents with his childish pranks and laughter but at the appointed time the Yogi came and forced the king to abide by his promise. The Yogi ordered the boy to be slaughtered and cooked. This order raised a hell of lamentation in the palace. The boy was killed and cooked. Then the Yogi divided the flesh into eleven equal parts including the share of 'Akanandun', then he asked the king to call Akanandun, which he did only to satisfy the Yogi. But to the surprise of all of them, at the king's call a boy appeared in a gay and happy mood; in the meantime the Yogi had disappeared.

This theme has attracted the attention of five Kashmiri poets. Excepting Samad Mir (b. 1894, d. 1959) all other poets have tackled the theme in seven cantos. Samad Mir has expanded the theme in fourteen cantos.

The version of Prakash Ram (b. 1819, d. 1877) is lost. Others who versified the theme include Ramzan Bhat (b. 1887, d. 1918), Tarachand Bismil (b. 1904, d. 1948), Bhadur Gani and Abdul Ahad Zargar (b. 1908).

The version of Bismil (1938) is a combination of prose and poetry. Ramzan Bhat has adopted the form of masnavi. Bhadur Gani (1962) has described the legend in the Padas. Samad Mir (1933, 1973) and Zargar (1923) have combined the lyric and masnavi in their versions and have given a spiritual turn to it; both these versions are rich in thought content.

All the available versions of the legend have been published in a single volume. All the previous editions have appeared from Srinagar and bear the name Akanandun.

AKASHDEEP (Hindi) is a collection of short stories by Jaya Shankar 'Prasad'. Though basically a poet and dramatist Jaya Shankar Prasad's short stories are also of no mean importance. In the earliest phase of the development of short story in Hindi, during the twenties and thirties of this century, Prasad pioneered a distinct type of story typical of this century. An accomplished dramatist, his stories generally open with a dramatic start that is at once gripping and fascinating. It is because of these characteristics that critics used to speak of a 'Prasad School' of idealistically realist stories with a commonplace and routine backdrop of everyday social life of the ever-afflicted common man.

Prasad has five short story collections to his credit viz. Chhaya, Pratidhwani, Akashdeep, Andhi and Indrajal. In these collections, we find the author steadily developing into a master story-writer with command over the content, structural technique and language-style. Contentwise, his stories differ widely and Acharya Ramchandra Shukla has divided them into two broad categories:

1. "Short stories that develop through artistic synthesis of profoundly expressive episodes and dialogues and captivating imagination, e.g. 'Bhikh Mein', 'Chitrawale Patthar', 'Patthar Ki Pukar', 'Banjara', etc.
2. Short stories that forcefully put forth a fascinating scene of a historical era with the aid of a touching and sensitive event or episode of a bygone age.

To the latter category belong Prasad's best and most successful stories, like 'Akashdeep,' 'Mamta', 'Swarga Ke Khandar Mein', 'Puraskar' and many others.

The stories included in the collection Akashdeep, belong to the middle period of his development as a short story writer. 'Akashdeep' is one of Prasad's most outstanding stories. The nineteen stories of this collection were written during the period 1926-29.

Prasad is unparalleled in recreating the past with his vast historical background, his insight into the truth of human nature and mastery over the effective use of the language medium. With the minimal use of carefully chosen words he can conjure a world that is altogether different environmentally to the one we know, a world we can recognise as one of the bygone ages. In the best of his stories there is an undercurrent of intense love and romance and an inner conflict that rouses a compassionate feeling of empathy for human affliction and circumstantial predicament. The overall impact is one of awe, fascination, curious wonderment and deep severity.

'Akashdeep' also opens with a dramatic suddenness. Its heroine Champa is torn between her passionate love for the pirate Buddhagupta and also intense hatred of him as the alleged assassin of her father. It is a curious love-hate relationship which is incredible and pathetic at once. The pirate tries his best to convince her of his innocence but all his explanations only aggravate her torment because she cannot persuade herself to believe them and the lurching suspicion never abates. The conflict never allows her to love freely and without reservation and makes for an intensely dramatic situation and her pathetic plight is reflected in her exclamatory remark addressed to the pirate, "I hate you and yet I can sacrifice my life for you, what a tragedy, pirate! I love you!" And ultimately this feeling of pathos reaches its culmination with the victory of filial love over personal love. Until then, Champa was destined to ever burn within like the 'Akashdeep'.

'Akashdeep' is a near-perfect model of a subtle, sensitive and soul-stirring short story. It leaves the reader stunned and awestricken and yet full of praise for Champa's self-sacrificing steadfastness.

AKATTIYAR (Tamil) was an ancient Tamil grammarian, considered to be the first to write a grammatical treatise on Tamil. The work is said to be named after its author. There is a great deal of hagiographic information on him. A Puranic story claims that Akattiyar learnt Tamil from Lord Shiva. According to this Puranic account, Devas had assembled on the Mount Kailasa to witness the marriage of Lord Shiva with the Goddess Parvati. Their crowding in a large number caused the North to go down and the South to go up. Akattiyar went to the South and equalized both quarters of the universe. At that time he learnt Tamil from Lord Shiva. There is also another hagiographic tale saying that Akattiyar is the originator of the Tamil Language. It is said that his treatise had been on all the three divisions of Tamil, viz. iyal, icai and natakam, i.e. literature, music and drama. It is also said that there had been two treatises by him, Chirrakattiyam and Pera Kattiyam but both of them were lost in a deluge, that he had lived on the banks of Curuti in the country called Kocala in Kuncara Hills, South Sri Lanka.

In Purananuru, one of the Sangam Anthologies, there is a reference that Akattiyar had brought 18 Velirs to the southern land and made them settle there. In Paripatal also there is a reference to Akattiyar imagining him as a star when it appears in Gemini in the zodiac the sea will dry up and when it disappears from there the sea will be full of water. Maturaikkanji mentions that the Saint Akattiyar had defeated Ravana in a music competition and thereafter the defeated Ravana could not enter into the southern land. In the earlier epics, Silappatikaram and Manimekalai there is also a reference wherein Sugriva advises his army of monkeys to worship Akattiyar at Potya Hills on their way in search in Sita.

In the copper plate of Velvikkuti Chinnamanur an Akattiyar has been mentioned as the Purohita, i.e. Royal Priest of the Pandyas. In the commentary on Iraiyanar Kalaviyal he has been mentioned as the poet of the first Tamil Academy. Tolkpipiyar, Atankottacah, and Panamparanar are said to be among the 12 of his disciples.

There are some in the name of Akattiyar among siddhas who wrote treatises on medicine. The name Akattiyar, however, is best associated with the poet of the first Tamil Academy, the author of Akattiyam, the mythical contributor to the development of Tamil language.

AKBAR ALI, M. (Kannada; b. 1925) was born at Ullegaddikhanapur, in the Belgaum District. He passed the B.A. (Hons) examination from the University of Bombay in the year 1949, and took up the job of teaching in a High School. In 1960 he passed M.A. from Willingdon College, Sangli and joined as a Lecturer in Arts and Science College at Karwar, where he worked for 14 years. Since 1975 he is on the staff of the Institute of Correspondence Course and Continuing Education, University of Mysore. In 1980 he was awarded the degree of Ph. D. for his doctoral thesis 'Sarvagnana Samaja Darsana Mattu Sahitya Satva' by the University of Mysore. Akbar Ali is famous as a poet and a good critic. He has won both the State and Central Govt. awards for his works: Sumana Saurabha (Karnataka State Sahitya Academy award for the year 1967) and Gandha Ke Sara (Central Govt. Education Dept. award for the year 1974). Following are his works: Poetry: Visha Sindhu (1951), Anna (1952), Sumana Saurabha (1965), Gandha Kesara (1972), and Tamasanadiya Edabaladi (1977),. Criticism: Sahitya Vivechane (1975), Sarvajnana Samaja Darsana mattu Sahitya Satva (1983). Novel: Niriksheyalli (1955). Essays: Prabandha Parichaya (1955).

Akbar Ali started writing poetry under the great influence of romanticism, which was in much vogue in Karnataka before the Indian Independence. He was particularly influenced by K.V.Puttappa, D.R. Bendre and V.K. Gokak. Akbar Ali soon widened his field of poetry, as far as technique and imagery are concerned, which is evident in his collections, when they are seen from the angle of chronology and development. Visha Sindhu is a collection of thirty-eight sonnets, written mostly in the style of Kuvempu. Anna is a short collection of Chutukas (Limericks) written by Akbar Ali and his friend Topakhane Srinivas. In his writings the Hindu envirnment and its mythology are projected more than those of his own religion. Akbar Ali is a humanist in his approach. Welfare state, socialist state and the democratic state are more important to him than any regional prosperity. This attitude finds expression in his critical writings. For his services to the Kannada literature, the State Academy honoured him in 1984.

AKBAR HUSAIN AKBAR (Urdu; b. 1846, d. 1921) popularly known as Akbar Allahabadi was born at Barah (Dist. Allahabad). His father Syed Tafaz-ul-Husain, a Naib Tahsildar, was known for his Sufistic learnings. Akbar thus inherited strong bias for Sufism from his father. He did not receive any formal education and whatever traditional education he received at home could not procure for him a decent job. He got his first job as Munshi in 1863 with a contractor when the Jamuna Bridge was under repairs. Later he served as a railway clerk till 1866. In the meantime, he had studied English privately and passed the law examination in lower grade in 1867. Soon after that he officiated as Naib Tahsildar for a few months in 1867. Afterwards he joined the excise department and was subsequently appointed as a 'Misal Khwan' (copy reader) in the High Court in 1870. He took this opportunity to apply himself diligently to the further study of the English language and passed law in 1873 and practised as a High Court Pleader. He was then appointed as a Munsif and subsequently promoted to Sub-judge. He retired in 1905 as a Judge of the court of small case, at Allahabad. In appreciation of his judicial services, he was awarded the title of Khan Bahadur by the then British Government. His Ghazals, Nazms, Rubaiyats and individual couplets comprise three volumes besides a collection of his poems on Mahatma Gandhi, entitled Gandhinama. He earned the title of Lisan-ul-Asr in literary circles in recognition of his literary eminence and was also made an Hony. Fellow of the Allahabad University.

A master of wit, humour and satire, he combined in his person a moral preacher, a socio-political critic and a literary caricaturist. His humour, often smacking of sarcasm was often directed against the so-called highly westernised Indian Muslims.

Indian's contact with a commercially practical, politically shrewd, socially advanced and technologically superior Britishers who had come to stay as rulers in India had brought forth mixed reactions. So far as the North Indian muslims were concerned, smarting as they were under the ignominy of having vacated power to a cleverer and stronger foe, they developed an attitude ranging from hostility to sneering indifference against everything that was British and denied themselves the benefits of the British rule which had brought in its wake political stability, social security, scientific knowledge and an advanced educational system. Instead, they took refuge in the glorification of their not too distant past and clung fast to their indigenous culture. There, however, gradually emerged a class of people who saw the danger of such an obdurate attitude under the changed circumstances and decided to avail themselves of all the benefits afforded by the British rule, particularly the western system of education through which they hoped to emancipate the Indian Muslim society from its social and economic backwardness. The cause of the anti-British Muslims was championed by a noted Urdu newspaper-cum-magazine, Oudh (Awadh) Punch, started by Munshi Sajjad Husain (1856-1915) in 1877 at Lucknow. The other class of people was led by Syed Ahmed Khan (1817-1898), the noted reformer, educationist and the father of modern Urdu prose. The social policy of Oudh (Awadh) Punch was to defend and extol the so-called virtues of Lucknow culture and to denounce, and caricature the followers of Syed Ahmed Khan. As against this obscurantist social policy, the magazine adopted the progressive political policy of securing political rights for the Indians. Its editor, Munshi Sajjad Husain was a member of the Indian National Congress and a strong supporter of its political policies.

Himself a staunch defender of the cultural identity of the North Indian Muslims, Akbar lost no time in identifying himself with the social policy of Oudh Punch and started contributing poems to it at first, of course, under the pseudonym Alif Hai (i.e. A.H., which stands for Akbar Husain Allahabadi). The literary aim of the magazine was to amuse and entertain its readers by presenting humorous writings in prose and poetry in chaste Lucknow style, consisting of retorts, repartees, idiomatic phrases and pun upon words. This policy and the literary style it sought to popularise, coincided, exactly with Akbar's literary genius. In fact, it was Oudh Punch which gave Akbar a wider readership and at the same time afforded him an opportuity to develop his newly discovered talent. Before contributing to Oudh Punch, Akbar used to compose ghazals in a serious vein and had also mastered all the various devices and artifices of the Lucknow school of poetry including Zila Jugat (Punning on the forms and meanings of words) and employment of difficult rhymes, under the guidance of his literary master, Wahid-ud-Din Wahid. This earlier training in an otherwise insipid and hackneyed style, stood him in good stead in the exploitation of his talent for humour, irony and sarcasm. Akbar deliberately employed many English words to create humour and used symbols like Syyid, Jumman, Bafati for the first time in Urdu poetry.

The popularity of Akbar's humour does not lie solely in meeting the aspirations of the socially obscurantist and anti-British North Indian Muslims, his poetry possesses that intrinsic quality also, which appeals to even those who are opposed to his orthodox views on women's education, purdah system and his obsession with secular ideas, etc.

In spite of the reactionary elements contained in his humorous poems, it would be in fairness to admit that Akbar's criticism of the Westernised Indian muslims had a point in its favour in that a vast majority of the educated young men coming out of the M.A.O. College who were more British than the Britishers themselves, with an eye on Indian civil service and no love or respect for Indian culture. They got what they deserved at the hands of Akbar. At the fag end of his literary career, however, Akbar realised the mistake of his stand and not only admitted the glorious services rendered by Syed Ahmed Khan but also confessed the futility of his crusade against the march of times.

AKHADI (Bengali) is a form of Bengali song which is believed to have developed under the patronage of Navakrishna Deb of Calcutta at the end of the 18th century or the beginning of the 19th. Kului Chandra Sen and Ramnidhi Gupta (Nidhu Babu) are said to be its originators in its latest form. Some are also of the opinion that it originated at Santipur in the district of Nadia at the hands of the local lovers of music.

Composition of Akhdai is short but compact. It had three stanzas only. The first was devoted to the adoration of the goddess, the next described the sentiment of secular love and the last stanza invariably expressed frustration that the night had passed off without union with the beloved. The music contained four types of tempos: overture, swing, full tempo, climax. It was a form of Bengali sophisticated music with all the complications of Indian classical music–Hindustani and Carnatic.

Due to this rigidity of form, content and technique, it failed to gain popularity. By that time the songs of Kabiwalas had become highly popular among all classes of music-lovers. Therefore, an attempt was made to popularise Akhdai by introducing some elements of the songs of Kabiwala into it. Akhdai thus lost its original character and with the new popular elements incorporated, it came to be known as Half-Akhdai.

AKHEGITA (Gujarati) by Akho is a peak of the Jnanamargi or metaphysical poetry in Gujarati. 'Gita' seems to have enjoyed the status of a genre in 17th century Gujarati. Akho's senior contemporary Narahari wrote Jnanagita (1616); and Vasisthasaragita Jnanaprakasa or Gopalgita by Gopal was written in the same year as Akhegita (1649). Akho himself has also written a short, easily recitable poem of 48 lines called Kaivalyagita.

In some manuscripts Akhegita is referred to as Mahamoksadayini Brahmvidya, the great soul-liberating knowledge of the Supreme Spirit. As Akho recounts in the final chapter, it deals with 'the knowledge of the Self in every line' and a little earlier avers that 'there is in Akhegita the secret of the self merging into the Absolute'. He enumerates the topics discussed: knowledge, bhakti, renunciation, the insight into Maya, the signs of the great one who is liberated through living and divine grace.

The work deals mainly with the knowledge of the Absolute, which alone is; the world and the individual self being the creations of Maya, Illusion, 'the Inscrutable Actress'. Akho's nondualism derives mainly from Gaudapada's ajativada –doctrine of non–birth.

The way to liberate oneself is through renunciation, bhakti and knowledge. Akho gives the analogy of a fish which is thrown out of water on hot sand and 'is scorched by heat, however it may lie on belly, back or side'. Even if put into the milk of the Kamadhenu, there is no solace for the fish, to whom water is dear. Burning with this fire of separation, one renounces everything, and sees Hari (The Lord) in every one, whom one hitherto ignored. Bhakti which is born of such a sharp sense of separation and renunciation leads to visualising the Absolute in all the inanimate and animate world, to witnessing, 'a ceaseless dance of the Lord Divine', with the result that it only remains and the individual self does no more.

Of all the followers of false paths Akho's bitterest comment is reserved for Sunyavadis, nihilists,for 'they do not sufficiently follow Sunyavada. Genuine Sunyavadis are those who do not accept the world and Reality as two'.

Akho praises the man of knowledge: To him there is no world, what then could be called Sunya (void)? The spirit's fire leaps up in a shining blaze in his case, while it remains smouldering in that of the Sunyavadi, who, though taking the phenomenal world as unreal, claims that there is no Supreme Soul, from which flows grace abounding.

Akho compares the man of knowledge to an enormous fish, which lives in the open seas, appears for a while on the surface and submerges again into the vast waters. Such knowledge, far from making one blind to the life of the world sharpens the vision, as an eye-glass does.

Akho does not take kindly to a human Guru, he wants the Self to be the Guru. 'Be thou thyself thy Guru', he says. He never spares the pseudo Gurus. However, when he writes about the seven days (Satavara), he begins with Guruvara (Thursday). In Akhegita Akho hints at how divine power descends through 'Guru' or 'Santa' (saint) and not only speaks of 'Hari-guru-santa' in the same breath but repeats that formula at the end of most of the chapters. He has in mind one, who has become Brahma Parama to him, for 'he makes you like him'. Perhaps this is what he means when he urges upon making the self–which is none other than Brahma–one's guru.

Akho has benefited from the Narahari's model. For one thing, non-dualism in both works is based on Gaudapada's Ajativada. Again as to form, while in Jnangita each Kadava (chapter), except the ninth, is followed by a pada (song), and the last, the seventeenth, has an extra pada. Akhegita has ten padas in 40 kadavas, each at a regular interval of four. Akho has followed this practice in his Gurusisyasamvada but not in the Akhegita. Both works end with a hymn of spiritual ecstasy.

The Akhegita is a well-structured work, Akho does not aim at giving a philosophical treatise. His main concern is with the experience of the Supreme Self, Brahma. He sings of all that he finds relevant to this one end. Metaphor is his forte. He has an image, a simile, an illustration always handy for presenting a thing of the life of the spirit in a concrete form. Sometimes he musters more than one, as in the case of those duped by Maya and of the great one, who tastes of Brahma, has become Brahma. For illustrating the handiwork of Maya he uses the apt simile of parallel mirrors and conjures up the grand metaphor of a many-coloured mansion of glass. The graphic description of the fish's agony of separation from water and that of the true bhakta–devotee shows the poet at his best, not the least in the apt contrast in the rhythm of the two passages. For all his protestation, the poet shows craftsmanship of a high order. The spiritual fervour evinced in the rhythm and the pithiness of diction make a large number of lines memorable and quotable. On the whole Akhegita, an ambitious undertaking, is an outstanding specimen of the philosophic-poems modelled on the Bhagavadgita.

AKHO (Gujarati; b. 1600, d. 1655) mediaeval Gujarati poet, a resident of Jetalpur rear Ahmedabad, was a goldsmith by profession, Legend says that he renounced it on being doubted by a woman to have added base metal to her gold ornament and also on being charged by a mint-master with a similar offence. He was vindicated in both the cases. However, Akho, who had lost his parents and wife and was childless, turned seriously to spiritual life and visited sacred places like Varanasi to imbibe religious truth. What we gather from his own words is that he accepted Gokulnath (the grandson of Vallabhacharya) as his master (guru). However, he confesses that only when he looked beyond the guru and his two great predecessors and cogitated on the fourth one, the self, his speech was manifest.

Three of his works bear dates: Panchikarana (1645). Gurusisyasamvada (1645) and Akhegita (1649). His other works are Chittavicharasamvada, Kaivalyagita, Santonam Laksana (or Krishna-Uddhavasamvada), Anubhavabindu, Avasthanirupana, Sakhi–Duha, Pada, Chappa and miscellaneous compositions—'Kakko', 'Mahina', 'Satavara', 'Kundaliya'. He has some Hindi works to his credit like Santapriya, Brahmalila, Jakadi, Ekalaksaramani, Jhulana, Pada and Sakhi–Duna. A few Jhulanas have some Punjabi words also.

Akho began writing long after being initiated by Gokulnath who died in 1641. If he had started writing around that year and if Akhegita (1649) is his last major work, followed by some other undated work like Anubhavabindu and some of the maturer chappa, his life–span could have been 1600–1655.

Akho is a unique philosopher–poet. He began as a Vaishnava and composed some rapturous songs of devotion especially in Braja. But he seems to have been dissatisfied with the Vaishnava tradition and exposes relentlessly the rot he witnesses around. In fact, he was not cut out for any sect or tradition. His idea of devotion soon transcended dualism. He did not give up devotion, bhakti, but took care to emphasise the importance of knowledge and renunciation, which are for bhakti what wings are to a bird.

Akho, a genuine seeker, could not stand sham and hypocrisy. His voice rings true when it strikes against caste, untouchability, gurus, avataras, pedantry, dogma, cult, sect, etc. His main weapon is humour. He scoffs and laughs at incongruities. Endowed with a subtle sense of the ludicrous, he indulges in sarcasm and not infrequently in bitter satire. Chappa, the book of sestets, has become a popular classic because of this rare gift of his and projects the image of Akho as a philosopher–poet of protest.

Akho is a master of metaphor. While singing of the One, he touches the phenomenal world at innumerable points, which avers to his living interest in human life. In a sublime simile he describes Maya as a multi-coloured mansion of glass on which the Absolute shines like the sun and within which the individual self takes the spectacle to be the work of God.

The points of resemblance between Akho and the English metaphysical poets, or his contemporaries, have also been noticed. Such coincidences stem mainly from pressing language into articulating mystic experience.

All his work has a unity of tone. Though his devotional songs do not always evince felicity, they are treasured by spiritual seekers in and outside Gujarat because of their compelling wisdom. His language though sometimes archaic, is no less forceful and even achieve grandeur on occasions. His resourcefulness in the use of verbs, colloquialisms, proverbs, telling images and apt illustrations lends quotability to his utterances, which can be heard from the mouths of common folk. The rhythm varies with moods and at its best has a way of reflecting the soul's fervour.

Akho as a philosopher–poet has his place along with his great mediaeval predecessors, Kabir and Dadu and for his inimitable humour and prophetic satire has few equals in religious poetry anywhere.

AKHTAR MOHI-UD-DIN (Kashmiri; b. 1928) graduated from Kashmir University. An eminent Kashmiri short story writer, he writes also in Urdu. He won second prize in International short story contest for his Urdu short story 'Pondrich'. He has held various important positions so far, functioned as Chief Editor, Kashmiri Dictionary Project and later as Secretary, Cultural Academy for some time and edited for a couple of years Son-Adab, an annual anthology of Kashmiri language and literature, brought out by the State Academy, besides Sheeraza, (Kashmir) a bi-monthly. He also remained on the Editorial Board of the weekly Chaman (Kashmiri) published by Field Survey Organisation of which he was the Deputy Director also. He has many a publication to his credit. These include: Sat Sangar (1955) and Sonzal (1959), both short story collections. For the former, he was given the Sahitya Akademi award in 1958. Dod-Dog (Novel–1957) and Salavamier (1970) travelogue based on the tour of Soviet Russia are two of his important works. They reveal his power of observation and sensitiveness to places and people of various kinds and also his rational view of life. He also co-edited Daleelu (folk-tales) 1962 with Pushkar Bhan. His short stories have been translated in various Indian languages. Zu-Tu-Zolanu (Novel) was serialised in weekly Chaman. He was awarded Padma-Shree (1973) in recognition of his service in the field of language and literature. He has also written various stage and Radio plays. He has also translated Ibsen's Ghosts (Tshai) and M.K. Gandhi's My Experiments with Truth in Kashmiri.

Akhtar Mohi-ud-Din is genuinely the first Kashmiri short story writer, having his own unique style and diction. His short stories are full of memorable situations, suspense, dramatic effect, realistic protrayal of life and social sensibility. Both his diction and idiom are remarkable for freshness and racy piquant flavour. Bresy Vatul, Gulla Badmash and Nabir Shalla are his unforgettable characters. His short stories like 'Dand Vazun', 'Daryayi Hund', 'Yezar' and 'Tsas' remain unequalled so far. He has a rare grip over his expressions and narrations to faithfully and realistically depict his milieu in which he himself lives. 'Daryayi Hund','Yezar' is an artistic experiment of making a story out of no basic traditional plot. Its everlasting charm lies in its lucid style and minute study of human psychology. An old couple has become immortal by an artistic endeavour of Akhtar Mohi-ud-Din. 'Tsas' is an alloegorical expression of disillusionment of the writers during 50's. Early short story collections of Akhtar reflect his unshakeable belief in the social objectivity of art and literature. He was a staunch member of the progressive movement, founded in Kashmir in 1941. He was also actively associated with Cultural Front and National Cultural Congress constituted to attain the lofty ideals of freedom, equality and social justice. Akhtar has since switched over to new techniques thus leaving behind his own rare individual style which could prove more effective in depicting the inherent absurdities of life.

AKHTAR ORAINVI (Urdu, b. 1910, d. 1977), a teacher (Professor of Urdu, Patna University) by profession, was author of some 20 books including a drama, a novel, a collection of poetry and six collections of short stories, which deal with a wide range of subjects. There are also some collections of literary essays (criticism) and a maqala (thesis) Bihar mein Urdu Adab ka Irtya (Development and Growth of Urdu literature in Bihar) for which he was awarded D. Litt. by Patna University. Besides there are several unpublished manuscripts which have yet to see the light of day. Akhtar married Shekila Bano who herself was an accomplished fiction writer. Belonging to a deeply religious family Akhtar himself was also a devoted 'Qadiani' and remained so through out his life except for his brief association with the Progressive writers, Movement and Communism.

Abdul Mughni observes in his Akhtar Orainvi ki Afsana-nagari (1976) that he (Akhtar Orainvi) was a poet by nature, a scholar by training and a philosopher by habit'. His short stories like 'Cement', 'Sapanon ke Desh Mein' (In a Dreamland) and 'Kalian aur Kante' (Buds and Thorns) are generally regarded as his best and aesthetically most satisfying works of fiction.

AKHTAR SHERANI (Urdu; b. 1905, d. 1948), was a romantic lyricist and the only son of the noted scholar Hafiz Mehmood Sherani. After his early schooling at home, he did his Munshi Fazil from Oriental College, Lahore in 1922 and acquired a working knowledge of English and Arabic. He edited literary magazines including Humayun, Khialistan, Rooman and Shahkar, assisted in annotating Majmaul Behrin, Matlaul Syyeden and translated Urfi's Jawamaul Hikayat (abridged). His works, published from Lahore, include Zuhak, Dharktey Dil, Aaina Khana (prose) and Subh-e-Bahar, Akhtaristan, Lala-e-Tur. Tayur-e-Awara, Naghma-e-Haram and Shairistan (verse). His lyrics convey the aroma of anguish and thrill of his love for Salma with almost Keatsian sensuousness.

AKHTAR-UL-IMAN (Urdu; b. 1915) was born in Qila, Najibabad, Bijnor District of Uttar Pradesh. After his graduation from Delhi University, he worked for sometimes in Civil Supplies Department and, in All India Radio, Delhi. Later he moved to Bombay, and since 1945 has been working in films as dialogue writer and director. A major poet of Urdu, he has so far published seven collections of poems. Gardaab (1943), Tareek Sayyara (1946), Aabjoo (1959), Yaden (1961), Bint-e-Lamhaat (1969), Naya Ahang (1977), Sar-o-Samaan (1983), and one verse play, Sabrang (1948). His fourth collection Yaden received Sahitya Akademi Award in 1962. He has also been recipient of numerous other literary awards.

Although neither Akhtar-ul-Iman's themes nor his formal innovations have been dominant sources of his influence on others, Akhtar-ul-Iman has made important contributions to the development of the modern nazm (verse) in both these aspects of his poetry. Thematically, most of his poems strive to express both an understanding of external life and a sense of the complexity of the individual's inner life. Many of his poems focus on a kind of philosophical quest for serious themes such as oblivion and eternal life, the decline of civilization, the unavoidability of time, the opposition of good and evil, the conflict between light and darkness, the tension between outer and inner life, and the struggle between dream and reality. In many of his poems, the poet has chosen a symbolic style instead of direct or indirect narrative discourse, allowing the characters and scenes he describes to become metaphors for wider realities. In yet others an interrogative style predominates, which strives to divine the secrets and mysteries of creation.

A profound humanism characterizes most of Akhtar-ul-Iman's poetry. Even in such early poems as "Tarik Saiyyarah" and 'Khak o Khun' (Dust and Blood), the dialogues of the characters suggest "the promise of a new humanity. This humanism is even more characteristic of his later poems, especially those of what be called Akhtar ul Iman's Kulliyat, (collected works), his Yaden (Memories), published in 1961. The main character of his poem "Ek larka" (A Boy), for example, is a metaphor for human consciousness, while the poem 'Yaden' might be the universal story of the contemporary age. Similarly, the poem 'Mufahamat' (Compromise) which many regard as one of his best, clearly deals with the fundamental relationship between human sorrow and joy, pleasure and pain. Moreover, Akhtar-ul-Iman's humanism is a lifestyle; and his poetry clearly reflects his own suffering as a human being and his own discovery of the realities of life and the cosmos. Because of this, in the lyrics a sense of tranquility and mellowness have replaced the tension and intensity of the earlier poems. Having divined the riddle of life, the poet displays a sense of balance, softness and peace.

Akhtar-ul-Iman's poetry also reveals that he has been influenced by Miraji's conscious attempt to create a poetic language different from that of the ghazal and to express a peculiarly Indian sensibility through that language. Despite a few classical touches here and there, Akhtar-ul-Iman's language is strikingly different from that of the ghazal. He has used a conversational language in most of his poems, especially later ones. The language is at once deceptively simple and capable of providing considerble semantic depth. The language and style of "Ahd-e-Wafa" (Time of Promise) in the collection Yaden, for example, approach those of prose. However, the symbolic meaning of this poem and its use of traditional meters allow the simple story it narrates to become a metaphor for contemporary anxiety. Occasionally, Akhtar-ul-Iman's language is almost coarse and unpoetic in its simplicity. Rather than detracting from the beauty of his poetry, however, this coarseness usually serves to illuminate his poetic quality at a new level.

Akhtar-ul-Iman has thus bequeathed a substantial legacy to the next generation of nazm (verse) writers. Along with the acceptance of his poetry by critics and readers, acceptance has also been extended to modern poetic trends and modern literature as a whole. Moreover, Akhtar-ul-Iman has set the thematic direction of the contemporary nazm with his emphasis on philosophical humanism. In addition, he has influenced others with the suggestion of monologue that continues to characterise his work and with his oblique expression. Finally, he has consciously used symbols to enhance the meanings of his poems. However, unlike those of many other modern poets, his symbols have not been so private and ambiguous as to obscure his meanings. For all these reasons, Akhtar-ul-Iman may be acknowledged by the succeeding generation as a leading modern poet.

AKHYANA (Gujarati) was the most popular and vital genre in the mediaeval Gujarati poetry. It used to be recited before the audience by Manabhattas or professional religious story tellers. They used to set the poems to various musical tunes and do mono-acting. The reciter used to sound the beats on an overturned copper pot with a ring worn in his index finger. The pot was known in Gujarati as Gagar and therefore, the reciter was known as Gagariabhat. The word 'Mana' also meant the pot.

The stories recited before the audience were often mythological ones from the Ramayana, the Mahabharata or the Shrimad Bhagavata. They also recited episodes from the life of great devotees like Narsingh Mehta who were held in reverence by the audience. The episodes recited by Manabhatta eulogised the qualities of different deities and inspired the people to discard worldly pleasures and concentrate on God.

The word 'Akhyana' means to tell or narrate. Acharya Hemchandra (12th century) while defining the Akhyana in Kavyanushasana (a work on poetics) says, 'If any Granthika (Professional story teller) recited the side stories like Nalopakhyana for instructing the audience accompanied by singing and acting it is Akhyana. This definition fits well with the Akhyanas recited by Manabhatta, because the episodes were selected from the Puranas which he sang and acted. This definition does not cover the Akhyanas which narrate the episodes from the lives of popular devotees like Narsingh Mehta and others. In order to include Akhyanas pertaining to such devotees in the category of Hemchandra's definition of the genre, we shall have to enlarge the scope of the definition and say that episodes narrated with the purposes of giving religious instruction to the audience can be termed as Akhyana because the other requirements of Akhyana like singing and acting while reciting the episode are fulfilled by the reciter of such non-mythological Akhyanas.

While discussing the Akhyana form in his Gujarati Kavya Prakaro (Gujarati Forms of Poetry), Dolarrai Mankad says, 'Its first essential requirement is that its poetry should be musical, there should be enough scope for acting in it. The narrator must possess the art of acting. It may be said that in the recitation of the story the Akhyankar (the reciter) himself plays the roles of different characters without changing dresses. Hence there should be full scope for a dramatic presentation of the story. The dialogue in it is in colloquial speech'. Besides these characteristics of Akhyana, another characteristic is that it is divided into several stanzas known as 'Kadavun'. The word 'Kadavun' is derived from the Sanskrit word 'Kadavak' which means 'derived from the conglomeration of lines in different musical tunes and metres'. 'Kadavun' consisted of three parts. The first part consisted of two lines which introduced the incident to be described, it was known as the Mukhbandh, and was like the preamble. The second part, in which the main incident was narrated in detail was known as Dhal, and the last two lines, in which the first line was a summing up of the incident and the succeeding line contained suggestion about the incident to be narrated was known as Valan. All these three parts combined is Kadavun, only the stories recited with Kadava is called Akhyana. Even mythological stories, if recited in any other form, cannot be termed as Akhyana. In between the narrative and descriptive portion of Akhyana, consisting of Dhal, when the emotion was intense, 'Pada' form was used.

Being a form of religious poetry, Akhyana begins with obeisance to Ganapati, the deity who removes all obstacles and Sarasvati, the Goddess of learning. After obeisance to these deities the reciter posted the audience with the necessary background, which was a kind of preamble, and then the main story was recited. The stories were taken from the Puranas (mythologies) or biographies of well known devotees. At the end of the Akhyana came the colophon where the author stated his name, the date of the composition, and some autobiographical details such as his place of residence, the name of his father or preceptor and some details regarding his family. The poem ended with Falashruti (talk about the material benefit of hearing the recital). It was done with the object of attracting audience. Sometimes in a poem more than one Falashrutis are found. The material benefit which the audience was promised also had abundant variety such as eradication of all sins, emancipation from the cycle of birth and death, getting rid of all bodily ailments, birth of a son, reunion with near and dear ones from whom one is separated etc. The audience was also informed of the original source of the story and some times besides the name of the story the details about the cantos were also mentioned, which gave authenticity to the work. Though the stories were taken from mythology, each presentation was different because it depended on the creative power of the reciter, who made changes in the original story which he thought essential for making the story more popular and making the audience feel that they do not hear the story of a remote past, but of a contemporary period. For instance, when there was a description of wedding ceremony of the mythological characters the poet described the wedding ceremony of contemporary period, making the characters behave as if they belonged to the age of the poet. Thus in the mythological Akhyanas we find all pervading Gujarati atmosphere, and hence the audience fully enjoyed the recitation. In doing so, the author sometimes made the characters lose their mythological identity. For instance, in the Sudama Charita by Premanand, Sudama a devotee of Krishna, does not go to Dwarka (the capital of Krishna) on his own accord. On his way to the doorsteps of Krishna's palace, he thinks: 'This was the person who was my co-student, and who used to play with monkeys at the Ashram of my preceptor; today because the fate smiles on him he has became the emperor while in my house there is no food to eat'. The sentiments thus expressed make Sudama an ordinary human being. Such things were done to please the audience. There was another reason for making additions and alterations in the original stories. The stories which were retold in Akhyanas were side stories, or illustrative stories. While in Akhyana those stories became fullfledged independent stories and hence the author had to invent new episodes which were quite in consonance with his times. The authors who were imaginative and understood the mood of the audience became popular. The Akhyana form reached its peak in Premanand (1636–1734), because he treated his theme in an exquisite manner by dint of his creative genius, power of observation, his understanding of the working of the human mind and his art of story telling. He became popular among all sections of the society. Premanand has painted Gujarat in its true colours; the customs and manners of the people of Gujarat, their psycho-cultural orientation and their attitude towards life have been faithfully depicted.

In Premanand we also find a happy blending of various sentiments such as love, heroism, wonder, and humour. He shifts from one sentiment to other very easily and carries the audience with him.

Mandodari the wife of Ravana asks her husband to go and apologise to Rama for his misdeeds. Ravana says, 'I know that Rama is the incarnation of Parabrahma (Absolute) who has descended on the earth to kill me. I want him to kill me so that my way to heaven will be clear'.

Changes were made in the original story by the reciters to pamper the audience by glorifying the divine being who was acclaimed as one who could lift human being from the mortal world to heaven. Sometimes when the poet thought that poetic justice demanded certain changes, he amended the story accordingly. The author followed the Sanskrit tradition of a happy ending. The Akhyana stories were of various dimensions. Some Akhyanas, like Sudamacharita were like the short stories which when recited lasted for three to four hours, while Akhyanas such as Nalakhyana were like novels which were recited for several days.

Akhyanas were recited by Manabhattas who were Brahmins. So, if any person other than a Brahmin composed Akhyana then he had to give it for recital to a professional Manabhatta. In mediaeval Gujarati literature one Nakar who was a Bama wrote Akhyanas, but as he was a non-Brahmin, he had to give his works to Manabhattas who presented those works to the audience.

Thus the Akhyana used to be one of the most vital genres with which the reciters used to entertain and educate the masses.

AKHYANA (Sanskrit). Etymologically the word 'akhyana' is derived from the root Khya-with prefix 'a' and suffix lyut an. According to Sanskrit lexicons it has different semantic connotations in different contexts, such as (1) telling, speaking, communication, declaration, making known; (2) a reply (3) differentiating property (4) communication of some previous events in a drama as in Venisamhara (III. 31) (5) a tale, story, legend, as in the Brahmavaivarta. There are two more terms, viz., Akhyanaka and Upakhyana which mean a tale, a short legendary narrative, oral episode. But in fact, there was no essential difference between Akhyana, Akhyanaka and Upakhyana. Sometimes these were even equated with Katha, Itihasa or Purana. Ordinarily all these meant 'an old tale, story, legend or incident, and were almost interchangeable. Vyasa himself calls his epic composition the Mahabharata, Jaya Samhita, Akhyana, Upakhyana, Katha, Itihasa, Kavya, etc. Even the whole Mahabharata has been termed as Akhyana. Broadly Akhyana can be equated with legend.

Tribhirvarshaih sadotthaya Krishnadvaipayano munih. Mahabharatamakhyanam kritvanidamuttamam. (Mahabharata I. 62, 52).

The constituents of the greater portions of the Mahabharata, that we have today, are the numerous Akhyanas and Upakhyanas that were interpolated later on. Shorn of the these Akhyanas the Mahabharata was called the Bharata (Mahabharata 1.1.102).

In fact, it is full of Akhyanas. Some of the well known Akhyanas of it are: Ramopakhyana, Nalopakhyana, Shakuntalopakhyana, etc. Accordingly various chapters of it have been named after these Akhyanas as has been confirmed by Vishvanatha as well.

Similarly the Ramayana is also called Akhyana and Samhita (Ramayana VI. 122. 124. 131).

The essential character of Akhyana or Upakhyana is the narration of stories of great kings or Gods in the past. In the Mahabharata we hear of Dyumatsena solaced by tales of former kings (Mahabharata 1.40. 74, III. 298. 7).

Rigvedic hymns of narrative character, and short legends in prose and verses called Gathas, Narasamsis sometimes called Itihasa and Akhyana as well, occurring in the Brahmanas are the first specimens of Akhyanas. In the Rigveda itself there are 15 dialogues (Samvada suktas) of this nature. The most famous of these are about the legends of Pururava and Urvashi (X. 95), Sarama and Pani (X, 108), Yama and Yami (X 10), Indra and Indrani and Vrishakapi (X. 86). Akhyana is supposed to cover the areas of all types of legends (historical as well as mythological) and is put in a narrative form. Most of the early Vedic Akhyanas which were developed into Puranic lore have symbolic significance. They provide the source material for later mahakavyas and dramas. In short, poems, dramas and other works have grown from these Akhyanas. The Akhyanas provide a popular imaginative frame for projecting a world view or a moral code or a deeper spiritual truth.

D.D.S.

AKHYANA KAVYA (Rajasthani), historical or puranic story is known as 'Akhyana.' The 'Akhyana' is meant to be sung and listened to, rather than be read. It is, therefore, easier to be committed to memory. It is because of these specialities that it leaves a lasting impression on the listener.

The 'Akhyana Kavyas' are a special contribution to Indian literature by Rajasthani and Gujarati languages. The important 'Akhyana Kavyas' were composed in Rajasthani during the first half of the 16th century of the 'Vikram' era-Katha Ahamani by Delhaji and Krishna Rukmini Mangalar (or Haraji ro vyavalo) were published by Rajasthani Sahitya Samiti. The first contains the story of Abhimanu, while the second relates the incident of marriage of Rukmini with Krishna. In the second half of this century Mehoji's Ramayana was published.

Rukmini Mangala and Ramayana both are much popular works. A number of Akhyana works of poetry were composed thereafter. Names of Parasudevaharya, Kesauji Godara, Surajanaji and Gordhanaji Sinawa (his Gaura Vyanvalo has been published by Bharatiya Vidya Mandir) are some of them.

AKILAN (Tamil; b. 1922) is an outstanding and popular Tamil novelist. His real name is P.V. Akhilanandam. He has received a large number of regional as well as national awards for creative writing, including the prestigious Bharatiya Jnanpith award. From the age of sixteen when he left school Akilan has been writing short stories and serial novels which have won the appreciation of Tamil readers. Distinguished as a writer of popular fiction for the masses Akilan's writings do not lack purpose. His first novel Penn (Woman) serialised in the monthly journal Kalaimagal in the year 1946 won the first prize in a competition instituted by that journal for the first time. Then in 1955 he was awarded Madras Tamil Academy Award for the novel Nenjin's Alaiikal (Heart Waves, 1953), in 1963 Sahitya Akademi Award for the novel Venkayin Mainthan (Son of Venkai Country), in 1968 Tamil Academy Award for the novel Kayal Vizhi (First Eyed Princess), in 1975 Raja Sir Annamalai Chettiar Memorial Award of Rs. 10,000 for the novel Engey Pokirom (Whither are We Going?) and the prestigious Bharatiya Jnanpith Award in 1976 for his novel Chitira Pavai (Painted Image). Akilan also has been the recipient of Soviet-Land Nehru Award for 1978 and has visited Russia twice. Most of Akilan's novels have been translated into several Indian languages. His Jnanpith Award winner Chitira Pavai has been translated into English and seven Indian languages. The unusual plot, daring in some respects, illustrates the individuality of a woman fighting for her self-respect even at the expense of breaking the bond of marriage with a cruel and despicable husband. An earlier work Pavai Vilakku (The Lady with the Lamp, 1958) one of the most widely read novels of Akilan, projected a full-time writer as an ideal hero. Venkayin Mainthan and Kayal Vizhi are historical romances in the pattern of Kalki who pioneered this type of historical fiction, taking ideas from the history of Chola and Pandya periods.

To his credit Akilan has an array of 18 full length novels, 14 volumes of short stories, 4 books for the children, 4 books of essays and one autobiography. The last one describes the hard road taken to become a full-time writer. After his high school education Akilan involved himself in the freedom movement for a short while and joined the postal service as a sorter. It was during this time he wrote tirelessly, short stories and serials for a number of magazines. Having won a few prizes and enormous readership Akilan gave up his postal sorter's job and migrated to Madras city to become a full time writer and sell his stories. In the effort he was disillusioned. It was at this time an opportunity came to him to join the All India Radio , Madras, as Spoken Word Producer.

Akilan's success as a writer of fiction is due to his easy style and narrative skills. His ability to weave romantic episodes and sentimental descriptions, and to continue the grip on his readers week after week through magazine serials is phenomenal. This has endeared him to the millions of readers spread over the Tamil speaking world. Akilan's style is quite straight forward. Gandhian idealism and rectitude in daily life are generally discernible in Akilan's writings.

AKSHARAM (Malayalam) is a collection of poems written by O.N.V. Kurup. It is a spectrum with an amazing variety of colours. One could see in it all the characteristic features of Kurup's poetic creed such as an original vision of men and things, of problems and programmes, the humanistic approach, the unusual rhythmic patterns, the run-on lines and a near defiance of the traditional conception of metres.

It is a collection of twenty poems, some dealing with topics of contemporary interest and some with scenes, events or personalities far removed in space and time, but all sparkling with the magic touch of the poet and the infusion of his imagination and interpretation and sometimes of his indignation. In the very first poem, which gives the collection its title, the poet begins by looking at the letters of the alphabet from the stand-point of an abecedarian and concludes by identifying himself with the ultimate truth and beauty which the letters lead up to. The next, entitled 'Phoenix', is more characteristic of the poet in that it symbolses his—and humanity's—instinctive, insatiable longing for immortality even when one is buried in the ashes of destruction and oblivion. 'Sopanasangitam', one of the longer poems, is a highly nostalgic recollection of the sweet sounds and picturesque sights associated with the idyllic environment of the poet's childhood days. Akin to this, yet distinctly different, is 'Chatha Verukal' (Dead roots) in which the poet kaleidoscopically traces, in a flash-back as it were, the rapturous moods and scenes that marked his 'maiden love' (i.e. his native village) until he bade farewell to it. 'Bassu Kathu' and 'Pravukal' are virtually allegorical. The former represents the poet as a dilapidated stone image waiting for the bus that would not come, even after so many others like him have left the spot, while the latter presents human life as unenviable and uncomfortable as that of the doves that live huddled together, in their cots. 'Kochu Dukkam' exposes the irksome sensitiveness of a school girl who is worried not that she will have to go without lunch but that others have seen the tapioca pieces that were strawn on the road when her lunch box fell down and burst open accidentally. 'Michaelangelo, Mappu' is an expression of the poets' indignation against the cranky young man who damaged Michaelangelo's world-famous sculpture La Pieta with a hammer. In 'Hastadanam', the poet transcends the national boundaries and appears as an internationalist.

While most of the poems in the collection are essentially lyrical there is one that strikes a different note in the poetic symphony of Kurup. It is 'Pazhayoru Pattu' (An Old Song), which is not only a narrative poem but a panorama of rural life.

Kurup is not a poet of the other world, but one living in this solid earth. 'Naranayingane' and 'Melpathur Veentum' well illustrate this trait of his poetic personality. Again, though he is not satisfied with things as they are he does not glorify death or destruction. Of course there is a strong strain of anguish and agony that is to be removed by the healing touch of love which, though a burden, is a welcome one.

AKSHARA SLOKA (Malayalam) is a literary game. The participants originally used to assemble in a royal court or on temple premises and generally sat in a circle, but now any place can serve as its venue. The game begins with a participant reciting a four line stanza, or sloka as it is called, written in any of the Sanskrit metres based on syllables and feet. Then the participant next to him recites another similar sloka beginning with the first letter or 'akshara' of the first sloka. The game goes on and those who, fail to recite or compose extempore and recite within the allotted time, are eliminated. He who continues till the very end gets the first rank, he who is eliminated last gets the second and he who is eliminated before the last gets the third. Slokas once recited by any participant are not to be repeated by any other. Before elimination, a participant is generally given three chances. Accuracy in pronunciation is also taken into consideration.

Nowadays akshara sloka contests are held in schools and colleges in Kerala as part of their festivals. They give a fillip to the memorisation of beautiful slokas and thereby pave the way for appreciation of poetry.

ALAGIRISWAMY, G. (Tamil; b. 1923, d. 1970) does not seem to have been able to receive much formal education in his boyhood days but he acquired a thorough knowledge of the traditional Tamil classics and Carnatic music and also showed skill in drawing. The town and district of Tiruneveli were then justly noted as a land of exceptional men of letters like Subrahmania Bharati, V.O. Chidam-baram Pillai, V.V.S. Aiyer, Pudumaipittan, P. Jeevanandam, T.K. Chidambaranatha Mudaliar, etc., and Alagirisamy was inspired to write both by the literary climate prevalent then and also by personal contact with some of the writers. He moved to Madras and headed the editorial department (1947-1952) of Shakti a Tamil monthly of distinction published by the doyen of Tamil publishers, the late V. Govindan. It was in 1952 that Alagirisamy's first collection of short stories was published (Alagirisamyin Kathaigal) with a perceptive foreword by 'Kalki' R. Krishnamurthy. Alagirisamy's editorial prowess and mature vision of life came into play when he went to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, to be the editor (1952-1957) of Tamil Nesan, a Tamil daily. He groomed a set of young writers of that region through special lectures and workshops and persuaded the Malayasian Government to grant equal status to Tamil in the field of education along with the local languages. He returned to India and for two years (1958–1960) was assistant editor of the Collected Works of Mahatma Gandhi, and for about six years (1960–1965) sub-editor of Nava Shakti, a Tamil daily published from Madras. Apart from writing a number of short stories, radio-plays, talks and children's stories, he also translated several books (Key to Health, Nature Cure and Ramanama, Days with Lenin, Akbar) and helped edit and publish Kamba Ramayanam in three parts and Annamalai Reddiar Kavadi Sindu. He produced the dance-dramas Mukkoodal Pallu and Villi Bharatam and wrote the stage-plays Kavichakravarthy, Vanja Magal, Vaikundatil Kamban and Vazhvil Vasantam, all of which won much acclaim. He was a dominant figure in the literary circles of Tamilnadu and his participation in several conferences and seminars was always marked by his scholarship and incisiveness. He went on a lecture tour of Sri Lanka and just when he was on the zenith of creativity with his short stories, novels, children's stories and critical essays, he died after a brief illness. He was posthumously awarded the Sahitya Akademi Award on his short story collection Anbalippu in 1970.

ALAI OSAI (Tamil), Kalki R. Krishnamurthi was the foremost among the Tamil writers who proved that they could create modern classics by depicting personal sentiments and problems. Alai Osai is a clear evidence of it. Kalki himself considered it his masterpiece. It received the Central Sahitya Akademi Award in 1956.

Alai Osai is unique in its set-up. It is not a mere historical novel, nor is it purely on a political theme. It is politico-historical. The novel has been written in such a manner that the social and religious structure of the then Indian Society is clearly brought out. The characters are not purely imaginary. They were drawn from real characters both in the remote villages and the distant cities. Satire, humour, sarcasm and imagination spring forth from the pen of Kalki to make the characters come alive to us. His style is simple and graceful.

Sundararagavan, the hero, is a young man of good education. He is a class one officer in the British Indian Government. He loves a girl by name Tarini, but that love is broken when his mother pleads with Tarini to forget him. Tarini promises to do so and in dejection goes to Bihar to work in the earthquake relief camp. Meanwhile Ragavan, unaware of his mother's part in breaking the affair, goes to a village to see a bride Lalita by name, but marries her niece Sita, a girl from Bombay. She is modest, beautiful; an average Indian girl with the usual virtues and weaknesses. They are happily settled at Delhi and they have a daughter. Meanwhile Ragavan is informed of the reported death of Tarini in Bihar. He feels for her but tries to forget.

Ragavan returns to India after an official visit to England. Sita goes to Delhi with her mother-in-law and her nephew Suriyanarayanan. There Ragavan is the same old self again; still searches for Tarini after seeing her once in a railway station, and thinks of his own personal gains in official matters. Tarini is not dead. She simply wants to keep away from him. But the incidents occur so quickly that they meet frequently. Suriya falls in love with Tarini and this Ragavan opposes violently. Sita is naturally sore with Ragavan, to see him more attached to Tarini. And their happy family begins to crack. There are heated discussions, mutual slanders, weepings and beatings. The tension mounts.

Sita is kidnapped by some servants of Rajnipur Kingdom, mistaking her for Tarini, the supposed princess of Rajnipur. Later she is released but only to fall a victim as a thief; then she goes to Calcutta but is jailed there for her alleged seditious activity and support for the revolutionists of whom she is least aware.

Ragavan loses his job on the same allegation, goes to England to plead his case. His daughter is at Madras. After her release from jail, Sita is with her niece Lalita at her village and helps Lalita's husband to win the municipal chairman's post. She is accused of having illicit intimacy with Lalita's husband. Lalita believes in the slander and drives her away. She goes to Calcutta where. Ragavan now lives after his return from England. She joins the family and a new leaf is turned in their life. They go to Punjab and live there peacefully for some time. But calamity strikes them again in the form of communal clashes, the aftermath of partition. Ragavan is in Delhi to secure his lost job. He succeeds. In Punjab his daughter is saved by Tarini and Sita by her father. In the events that follow too quickly Sita falls sick with hysteria. The long, arduous escape leads her to her death-bed. Tarini in another corner loses one hand and one eye in an attempt to save a women's camp from the attack of the fanatics. Sita dies after getting a promise from both Ragavan and Tarini that they would marry. It turned out that Tarini was none other than her own elder sister.

Ragavan shudders to look at the deformed appearance of Tarini. Suriya still sees beyond the veiled face of Tarini, the real heart and offers to marry her for her inward beauty.

But as providence would have it, Ragavan finally marries Tarini, goes to Rajnipur after resigning his high post, to serve the poor with the enormous wealth given to Tarini by the Rajnipur Queen who still believes Tarini to be the princess. Suriya marries Bama, a modern girl, and goes to village to be an ordinary farmer.

All these events are presented by the author in a dramatic manner. The freedom struggle under Gandhiji is not described directly, but the history of India from the Vedic period, through the Moghul upto independence provides the background.

This is a politico-historical novel. The theme is more or less contemporary. The description of men, matters and places is exhaustive. Rameshwaram and Benares, Peshawar and Calcutta are interlinked with what happens in the lives of the characters. The customs and habits of various people are given vividly. One can find in it the unfortunate tragedies of communalism, dedicated service in the relief and refugee camps etc.

Though Ragavan and Sita happen to be the hero and heroine of the novel, the readers are more inclined towards Suriya and Tarini. They provide a contrast to the vacillating and changing moods of Sita and Ragavan by their being constant in their purpose and action. Their devoted life, helping tendency, Gandhian outlook and simplicity evoke due respect.

Whenever the heroine Sita is in trouble she hears within, a sound of waves. Sita hears it many times and the same ringing sound envelops her at last. Thus the novel gets its name aptly and the same sound reverberates in the minds of the readers too.

ALALER GHARER DULAL (Bengali) is written by Pyarichand Mitra, better known by his pseudonym Tekchand Thakur. The book can be described as one of the precursors of Bengali novel. It orginally appeared in serial form in a monthly magazine Masik Patrika, founded by the author himself. In 1858 the first edition of the book was published. Second edition came out in 1870, containing six lithographs by Girindra Kumar Dutta. Bangiya Sahitya Parisad's edition in 1940 is still prevalent. The English translation of the book entitled The Spoilt Child, by Narendranath Mitra, was published in serial form in the Journal of the National Indian Association in London between 1882 and 83. In 1893, another English translation of the book entitled The Spoilt Child–A Tale of Hindu Domestic Life by G.D. Oswall was published. The hero of Alaler Gharer Dulal is Motilal. Motilal's father, Vaidyarambabu, belongs to one of the new-rich families which were growing up in Calcutta in the 9th century. He acquired a lot of money, mostly through undesirable means. Motilal, being brought up with much pampering, is devoid of any good qualities. He is sent to Calcutta for learning English, where he turns into a rake and lands up in jail for drunkenness. His father, however, brings him home after bribing the police. Motilal's character further deteriorates, he falls in the company of some bad characters, and always engages himself in all sorts of nefarious activities. Motilal's younger brother, Ramlal, is a well behaved young man and always seeks guidance from a deeply religious and educated man, Baradababu. Vaidyarambabu marries for the second time to get a large sum of money, and dies soon after. Motilal, now the head of the family, turns all his family members out of the house. Thereafter his condition becomes worse. He is suitably punished, and becomes reformed and repentant. Ultimately he is united with his family. This theme of Alaler Gharer Dulal is however not a new one.

The story is rather thin and loosely put together. Sometimes the incidents occurring in the course of the story seem irrelevant. The arrangement of the plot is set necessarily on rigid outlines and is marked by forethought. The story is cast in the customary allegorical mould and it ends in the redemption of the sinner. The author has a good knowledge of the prevailing social manners and customs. He watches human folly and vices and jibes at them. In the course of the narrative an amusing picture of the contemporary Bengali society is given. Alaler Gharer Dulal holds an important position in the history of Bengali literature. Though it cannot be described as a successful novel, its contribution towards the development of Bengali fiction cannot be denied. A mixture of fun and satire has given a touch of realism to his villains. Probably, the most important feature of Alaler Gharer Dulal is its language and diction. It is not written in Sanskritic or Persianised manner and mode of expression, then in vogue among most of the writers. Pyarichand has used here the colloquial language of the people, where every word or phrase having any learned appearance has been avoided. Alaler Gharer Dulal was praised by Bankim Chandra Chatterji, for its homely subject, and vigorous and natural style.

ALAM (Hindi; b. 1585, d. 1625). Tradition has it that he was born in a Brahmin family somewhere in Jaunpur (U.P.) but he was so enamoured of the wit and poetic talent of a Muslim woman (dyer) that he embraced Islam. His creative period is supposed to fall between 1585 and 1625. The following four works are attributed to him: (1) Madhavanal-Kamakandala (a love romance in Avadhi); (2) Sudama-Charitra (a narrative on the friendship of Krishna and Sudama); (3) Shyamsanehi (a poetic portrayal of Rukmini's marriage with Krishna) and (4) a collection of love-poems of Alam under various names Alamkali, Alam Ke Kavitta, Kavitta-Chatussat etc. The reputation of the poet, however, rests on the last i.e. his love poems. He is at his best in these poems which deal with erotic sentiment. Unlike the language used by many of his contemporaries, his Brajbhasha is very refined, elegant and rich in the harmony of sense and sound.

ALAMKARA (Figure of Speech—Sanskrit). The term 'alamkara' (meaning ornament) in Sanskrit stands for the principle of poetic beauty itself, in which sense of this general meaning, the entire science of criticism is so named (Alamkarashastra). Alamkara in a restricted sense also means any trope or figure of speech that adorns a literary composition (kavya). There is a detailed treatment of such figures of speech from Bharata, the author of Natyashastra (2nd century B.C. to 2nd century A.D.) to Mammata (12th century, Kashmir) regarding their definition, classification, and number; difference between the excellence (gunas) that are co-extensive with poetic beauty and figures of speech, as also the position of figures in the theories of rasa and dhvani.

Sanskrit is a highly scientific language. It is endowed with innate musical and rhythmic elements in its sound pattern. It is also possessed of diversities arising from the mono-syllabic meaning, meanings of the stem and suffix, multi-meanings of words, etc., which present its multi-dimensional meaning–pattern. All these modes and varieties of ornamentation due to sound and sense have been carefully defined and analysed by ancient rhetoricians. By about the 12th century their individual characteristics, mode of ornamentation, and their rightful place in the total concepts of poetic beauty pertaining to thematic content and emotional contexts were fixed. A summary of this vast contribution related to the figures of speech can be found in the history of Sanskrit poetics written individually by P.V. Kane and S.K. De, and in the primary alamkara texts.

The earliest work to deal with the figure is the encyclopaedic Natyashastra. In this treatise the beautiful speech-patterns come under the vachikabhinaya, one of the four abhinayas, which comprehend the entire field of ancient Sanskrit drama. In the Natyashastra only four figures Upama (simile), Rupaka (metaphor), Dipaka (illuminator) and Yamaka (rhyme) are mentioned in the 17th chapter. But there is again another category called Lakshanas, 36 of which are available in the same 17th Chapter, in two recensions. Although the Lakshanas as such gradually faded out, some of them like Hetu, Lesha, and Ashis were incorporated into the fold of figures of speech.

A classification of figures that has been accepted by all alamkarikas is of those based on sound and sense (shabda and artha). Bhoja (11th century) added a third type 'Ubhaya', comprehending both shabda and artha.

A more rational classification adopted by Ruyyaka (11th century, Kashmir) based on similarity (samya), superimposition (aropa), apprehension (adhyavasaya), difference (bheda), etc., has been followed by many later writers in the field.

A correct appreciation of the position of early theorists in regard to alamkara is necessary to understand their idea of shabda and artha which forms the starting point for all semantic investigation. Their outspoken emphasis on Vakrokti, or departure from the everyday use of language, as the underlying principle of all alamkaras points to their realisation of the fact that poetic language is fundamentally distinct from everyday speech (varta) on the one hand and the language of science (shastra) on the other; and they happened to give this distinct feature the name of alamkara whose field was theoretically as wide as to embrace all shades of felt beauty in poetry. Naturally, all the possible meanings in daily discourse and scientific writing, viz., the informative or literal, the secondary or metaphorical and, the affective or emotive, were not only included, but imaginatively coloured so as to become aesthetic, in their illustrations of arthalamkara. In their scheme, Svabhavokti or sensitive description of nature as it is, can be termed alamkara only by way of exception; and emotional states (chittavritti) become alamkara only when they are rasa, i.e., when they have undergone imaginative transfiguration.

Anandavardhana (9th century, Kashmir) made an epoch-making analysis of the functions of language on the one hand and the content of poetry on the other in his monumental work Dhvanyaloka. He formulated the theory that dhvani or suggestion is the soul of poetry, and such an expression can apply to the idiom, form, matter-content and emotional context. Under this scheme the figure of speech became a term of denotation (abhidha). The figure in a great poet is an inevitable incarnation in which ideas embody themselves.

By its very nature the figure too, like the decorations for a young girl, may be only external. Anandavardhana therefore formulates some rules for the proper employment of figures so that they enhance the intrinsic beauty of a poem: (a) alamkaras shall be intended to suggest rasa; (b) it shall be born along with the poet's delineation of rasa; (c) it shall be naturally and easily introduced; and (d) the poet shall not stop to make a fresh and extra effort to effect it.

A perusal of figures may give an impression that they are somewhat artificial, elaborate and intellectual exercises requiring some effort in turning them out precisely. But they are not so difficult of effecting for a master-poet. With him as emotion increases, expression swells and figures foam forth. Only then the figurative expressions become significant.

S.S.J.

ALAOL (Bengali) has given all relevant information about himself in his work. His father was a courtier of Majlis Qutb, the independent ruler of Fathabad (near Faridpur, Bangladesh). Once, while travelling by river, he and his father were attacked by the Portugese pirates. His father was killed, but he escaped. Then he went to Arrakan, where he got a job in the royal cavalry. Alaol's high pedigree, scholarship and musical talent made him famous within a short time. Magan Thakur, the chief noble of Arrakan, began to learn music from him. At the request of Magan, Alaol wrote Padmavati in about 1645. This work is a free translation of an Avadhi poem named Padmavat, written by Malik Muhammad Jaysi. In Alaol's Padmavati, we get a rare combination of romantic and spiritual elements. This is the best work of Alaol. In it, he has displayed his deep knowledge of Hindu mythology, Sanskrit literature and Vaishnava Padavali.

After Padmavati, Alaol began another work, Saif-ul-Mulk Badi-uz-Zamal (a translation of a Persian work of the same name) at the instance of Magan Thakur, which remained incomplete for sometime after the sudden death of Magan. Meanwhile, in 1659, at the instance of another noble, Suleman, Alaol completed Sati Mainamati, the famous unfinished poem of Daulat Qazi. Daulat's writing was of a high order. The portion written by Alaol did not reach that standard. At Suleman's request, Alaol also wrote Tohfa, which is a translation of an Arabic work of the same name and deals with Islamic rites and practices. Alaol, at the instance of another noble, Syed Muhammad, wrote another work, Sapta Paikar, which is the translation of a Persian work named Hapt Paikar.

This was the time when the sons of Shah Jehan were fighting for the throne of Delhi. Suja, the second among them, after being defeated by Aurangzeb, took shelter in Arrakan. He soon incurred the displeasure of the Arrakanese king and fled when the latter had sent his men to kill him. Soon after, Suja's followers made a conspiracy against the Arrakanese king, but failed and were all killed. Allegations were made against Alaol that he was in the conspiracy. The poet was arrested. Though he was released after fifty days, he lost all his property. In the midst of poverty and hardship, Alaol completed Saif-ul-mulk Badi-uz-Zamal, at the request of a good man named Syed Musa. After eleven years of hardship, Alaol received the patronage of a rich and influential noble, Majlis Nabaraj, who, after removing the distress of the poet, requested him to write a poem which would bear his name. Alaol, though very old and weak at that time, complied with the request of his patron and wrote Sekundernama, which is a Bengali rendering of a Persian work of the same name,. written by Nazami. Alaol also wrote a treatise on music, which is entitled Raganama. Besides these, Alaol wrote poems on the theme of the love between Radha and Krishna.

The position of Alaol as a poet is very high. Amongst the Muslim writers of Bengali literature in the mediaeval period, Alaol is second to none except Daulat Qazi. But his later works suffer in comparison with the earlier ones, especially Padmavati. The autobiographical fragments of Alaol are very important from the point of view of history, because they give us a lot of information not only about the poet but also about the political condition of India and Arrakan during that period.

ALHA (Hindi) also called Savaiya or Vira metre consists of four feet and 31 'matras' (syllabic instances) in each foot with the pause at the 16th and then 15th 'matra'. The last two letters should be long and short respectively viz.:

'Adi sarasvati tumaka dhyavaun, Mata kanth virajau aya.

In Hindi literature, Jaganika's famous work Paramal-raso (11th century), was composed in this metre, hence it was popularly known as Alha-khand. Paramanand Das (16th century) one of the poets of the 'Ashtachhap', wrote many of his verses in this metre. The wide popularity of this metre rests mainly on the 'Alha-khand' which created a mass base in the countryside because of its amazing capability to arouse heroic sentiment amongst people at large. The heroic deeds of Alha and Udal are a source of perpetual inspiration to the average North Indian in the countryside.

ALI ABBAS HUSAINI (Urdu; b. 1897, d. 1969) was born in village Para, district Ghazipur (U.P.) and died in Lucknow. He matriculated in 1915, did his B.A. in 1919, L.T. (Licentiate in Teaching) in 1921 and M.A. (History) in 1924. He joined the U.P. Government service as teacher on 18th July, 1921 and retired as Principal on 30th June, 1954. He taught History and English, but wrote in Urdu.

Husaini's first short story 'Pazmurda Kaliyan' (Withered Buds) was written in 1917–18. His first published work, however, was a novel Sir Syed Ahmad Pasha (1919). His first published story Jazb-e-Kamil (Fascination) appeared in the Zamana Kanpur in September 1925, to be followed by 'Pazmurda Kaliyan'. Both were urban-based love stories.

On the other hand, Rafiq-e-Tanhai (Companion of Loneliness), the first collection of stories, published by Husaini himself in 1931, contained ten short stories with rural background. It won him an award of Rs. 500/- from the 'Hindustani Academy', Allahabad in 1933. It was followed by I.C.s.; Kuch Hansi Nahin Hai (Not a Laughing Matter), Basi Phool (Flowers not fresh), Mela Ghoomni (Camp Follower), Uljhe Dhage (Tangled Skein), Hamara Gaon (Our Village) and Ek Aurat Hazar Jalwe (Woman's Thousand Faces).

Husaini wrote four novels: Sir Syed Ahmad Pasha, Shaid Ke Bahar Aai (Perhaps It's Spring Again), Hakim Bana and Nadia Kinare (Riverside). He published a collection of nine one-act plays, viz. Nav-Ratan (Nine Gems) and one full length play, Amir Khusrau. He has three books in Hindi to his credit: Komal Nagri (The Sweet Township—Hindi version of Shaid Ke Bahar Aai), Phoolan Ki Chharie (Wand of Flowers stories) and Gai Amman (Mother Cow). Husaini also wrote a number of text books in Urdu. He translated Henry David Thoreau's Walden from English into Urdu for the Sahitya Akademi.

In criticism, Husaini's magnum opus was Urdu Novel Ki Tarikh aur Tanquid (History and Criticism of Novel in Urdu) published in 1946. In 1967, he was honoured by Uttar Pradesh Government for his services to Urdu Literature and given a cash award of Rs. 5,000/-.

When Husaini started writing, Urdu short story was in its infancy, though three distinct groups had already emerged. The first group wrote under the influence of Tagore, Oscar Wilde and Walter Pater and wrote stories in a style which was nearer to poetry. This school was a votary of art for art's sake. It abounded in words and academic virtuosity. The next school was romantic, and wrote mostly about the privileged or the upper middle class. The third school was represented by Prem Chand who wrote about the poor and the oppressed in a direct unadorned style. Husaini preferred to write about the rural masses and the middle class of which he had direct knowledge, being a member of a Zamindar family, and could therefore, take an unbiased view of the exploitation of poor ryots. In his stories, as in his life, his sympathies were always with the underprivileged, the exploited and the oppressed. At the same time, he clung to the middle class values of honesty, nobility, dignity and self-sacrifice exemplified by Saratchandra Chatterji in Bengali. When the Progressive Writer's Movement started, Husaini welcomed it and attended the first conference held under the presidentship of Prem Chand in 1936.

Husaini, however, believed that while literature could propagate a point of view, it could never become propaganda. Hence, while the Progressive Writers Movement became rigid in its attitudes, he continued on his path of moderation and reasonableness. His approach was almost Gandhian (Sans Ahimsa) for he believed in the innate goodness of human beings. Thus, instead of revolution, he advocated change of the heart through persuasion.

Persuasion depends on knowledge as well as skill in the use of words. Husaini was one of the most well-read writers of his generation. He had also a wide range of other interests, like music, sports and films.

Husaini's most powerful weapon was his command of the language. He could give just the right shade to suit the occasion, ranging and varying from the rustic Bhojpuri to the idiomatic Urdu spoken by the Nawabs and Begums of Lucknow. Viqar Azeem, the famous critic of Urdu literature observes:

"Ali Abbas Husaini adopted this (Premchand's) tradition of realism, romance and idealism and his felicity of expression invested it with a lustre surpassing even that of Premchand".

He writes both in English and Urdu with equal felicity. His novels include Twilight in Delhi first published by Hogarth Press, London (1941) and second time by Oxford University Press, London and New York (1966) and Ocean of Light by Peter Owen, London (1964). Its Urdu translation by his talented wife Balquis Jehan has also been published. It depicts life of two generations during the first two decades of the twentieth century going back to 1857.

His short stories in Urdu comprise five collections namely: Angaray (Lucknow, 1932), Sholay (Lahore, 1934), Hamari Gali (Delhi, 1940) Qaid Khana (Delhi, 1942) and Maut se Pehle (Delhi, 1945). The last three collections were published by (Akrash Press, Delhi).

His translation of the Falcon and the Hunted Bird into Urdu verse (Kitab Mahal, 1950) shows that his fame would not have been less if he had remained attached to poetry (his first love) alone. He started writing poetry at the tender age of sixteen. The poems were replete with the anguish of adoloscence.

His first short-story collection Angaray (Burning Coal) was a shocking experience in Urdu fiction and gave a new turn to the concept of story telling. The book was banned for its ultra revolutionary content.

A product of old Delhi's composite culture, Ahmad Ali is a man of wide interests. Tall, handsome and robust he is endowed with almost a tender heart. Suave and quite effective as a speaker he can converse brilliantly on any subject with confidence and authority of one who knows, be it poetry or fiction, science or art, museum or architecture, woman or nature, religion or politics. A great admirer of the ancient classical arts and poetry, his love for the poetry of Kabir and Mira Bai is one of his life's great passions.

His is indeed a many-faceted personality. The Ahmed Ali of Angaray is a person different from the writer of Twilight in Delhi. Similarly Ahmad Ali, the University Professor is a class apart from Ahmad Ali the Diplomat, or Ahmad Ali, the businessmen, householder, husband and father.

Speaking of his great gifts as a writer of fiction, the late Professor Kalim-ud-Din Ahmad is reported to have once said "we discover the sources of life in the stories of Ahmad Ali. Even with a comparatively brief contribution (to Urdu Fiction) he has acquired a literary distinction which is unique and entirely personal."

ALI HAIDER (Punjabi ; b. 1690. d. 1785) was a Gilani Sayyad and a disciple of Shah Mohi-ud-Din Gilani. His verses reveal his devotion to Farid Shakarganj also. He was a great scholar of Persian and Arabic, a noted saint and a poet though he lived mostly in his village. His available works are five Siharfis, one Baramaha and an incomplete Kissa of Hir-Ranjha. These works were collectively published in 1907 for the first time under the title Mukammal Majmua Abiat Ali Haider (complete collections of the verses of Ali Haider). Mian Hidayat-Ul-lah and Mian Muhammad Bakhsh have all the praise for his mystic verses. Since Ali Haider was born and brought up in Multan district, his language is mostly western Punjabi. Being a scholar of Persian, he has drawn profusely on Persian diction, similes and metaphors. At times he quotes from the Quran as well. About the contents of his Siharfis, he considers them as the treasures of divine knowledge, giving an insight into the mystic experience.

ALI, SYED MUJTABA (Bengali; b. 1904, d. 1974). Mujtaba had his early education in the Sylhet Govt. High School, which he left in protest against the wanton behaviour of the local authorities towards his fellow students. He next came to Santiniketan in 1921 and opted for the Visva-Bharati course of study, just propounded by Rabindranath Tagore. On completion of the programme, Mujtaba, for a while, moved to Aligarh, and later to Kabul on a teaching assignment. After some two years, he went to Germany for further studies, and was finally admitted to the Ph.D degree of the Bonn University. For some time he had been at Al Azher University, Cairo on a post-doctoral enterprise.

Mujtaba's diverse academic interest ranged from Philosophy and Religion to Sociology and Linguistics. He had a flair for languages, and acquired easy mastery over quite a number of them including English, French, German, Italian, Arabic, Persian, Sanskrit, Gujarati and Marathi.

Mujtaba started his career in India at the Baroda College, where he taught for some eight years. Then commenced a period of various shifts. For some years, he was associated with the All India Radio, and for a time, he worked even for his alma mater Santiniketan as a teacher of Islamic Studies and German language. However, a major part of his later life was devoted mainly to writing.

He was connected with a number of daily news papers as a columnist and wielded his pen both in Bengali and English under various pseudonyms. Mohammadi, a literary journal, published his informative essay 'Misarer Sikshayatan' in 1935-36. But Mujtaba Ali's emergence to the forefront of popularity in Bengali literature was spontaneously augmented as soon as the first series of his belles lettres, Deshe Bideshe saw the light of print in 1948 in the famous Bengali weekly Desh. These were later collected and published in the book form in 1949 Thenceforth he moved from strength to strength as a writer.

A scholar of wide experience and varied erudition, Mujtaba Ali could forge a rare blending between a somewhat trivial mirthfulness with an innate adoration for life. Thus was paved a distinctive track midway between serious disposition and witty entertainment—a dissertation fused into belles lettres—'ramyarachana' as they are called in Bengali.

Mujtaba Ali was certainly not the pioneer in the line; nonetheless, he brought a new cadence to the genre. And apart from his personal temperament, the very texture, a distinctive style of the author, gave a special character to his writings, and accounted for their final appeal. And in that, Mujtaba's unconventional, at times even unusual, free play with the vocabulary had a very important role.

A master of many languages and animated by his exceptionally intimate association with the heterogeneous strands of life, Mujtaba had rather a fascination for making all sorts of queer, even awkward combination of words; mingling the Sanskrit with the Persi-Arabic, the undignified slang with the most sophisticated tatsama. It was as if a game of stimulating the reader, inquisitive or unmindful, with an innocent jolt. The pun and fun of Mujtaba Ali's style had made his writing really 'ramya', pleasant and entertaining.

The theme of his concern ranged diversely from translation of creative literature to the informative, delightful delineations of men and events at once couched with serious thought and witty exposition. At a later stage, Mujtaba took to the art of fiction, all in his own individual way.

Mujtaba Ali primarily wrote for literary journals, later these writings appeared in book form. Apart from Deshe Bideshe his other publications are:–

Anthologies: Pancha-Tantra Vols I & II (1952, 1959), Mayur-kanthi (1952), Dvandva Madhur (a collaborative venture—1958), Dhup-Chaya (1958), Chaturanga (1960), Bhavaghure O Anyanya (1962), Tuni Mem (1964), Bara Babu (1966), Kata Na Asrujal (1966) Musafir, Duhara (1966), Parivartane Aparivartaniya (posthumous publication, 1975).

Novels–Abisvasya (1953), Sabnam (1960), Shahriar (1969), Tulanahina (1974), Prem (Translation from Russian–1965).

For children–Jale Dangay (1956).

All his works have recently been brought under the title Syed Mujtaba Ali Rachanavali, and published in 8 volumes from Mitra O Ghosh, Calcutta.

ALI, SAYED WAZED (Bengali; b. 1890, d. 1951), B.A. (Cambridge) and Bar-at-Law (England) was a renowned Bengali story writer and essayist. He was one of the highly educated Muslims of his time. He was employed as Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta and worked with reputation till he retired in 1945. He was an energetic participant in the current literary movements of Bengal and was elected President of Bangiya Musalman Sahitya Samiti. He wrote novels, short-stories, travelogues, belles lettres and serious thought-provoking essays. Out of his twenty published books, a list of the most important works is given here: Fiction: Guldasta (The garden full of flowers, 1927), Mashuker Darbar (The court of the lovers, 1930) Bhanga Banshi (The broken flute), Darbesher Doya (The blessing of the monk, 1938), Galper Majlish (The assembly full of stories, 1944. Essay: Bhabishyater Bangali (The Bengalee of the future, 1943). This work includes essays entitled 'Rashtrer Rup' (The nature of the state), 'Rashtra O Nagarik' (The State and the citizen), 'Hindu Musalman', 'Bhabishyater Bangla Sahitya' (Bengali literature of the future), 'Premer Dharma' (The religion of love), etc. Wazed Ali was a liberal democrat in his socio-political attitude and through his writings he always preached Hindu-Muslim unity. Even in his short-stories (better be called story sketches) he spoke highly of the Indian heritage, common to all the religious communities of the country.

ALIBABA (Bengali) is a play written by Kshirodprasad Vidya-binod. It has been described by the author as a rangyanatya (entertainment drama) ; it will be more appropriate to describe it as a musical opera as the play is full of songs and dances. Alibaba is based on the popular story of Arabian Nights, entitled 'Alibaba and Forty Thieves'. The gist of the story is as follows. Kasem, a very rich man, spends his time in luxury and comfort, and does not have any sympathy for his younger brother Ali, who is leading his life as a mere wood cutter. Once Ali discovers just by chance a cave full of precious jewels and gold coins belonging to a gang of robbers. Ali is not greedy and brings home only as many gold coins as are enough to end his poverty. Kasem, however, comes to know of this and persuades him to tell him the whereabouts of the cave. In his almost insane desire to bring home the entire riches he forgets the password and is consequently killed by the robbers. The robbers, now bent upon taking revenge on Ali, make several attempts to kill him and his entire family. But all of them get killed by the ingenuity of Margina, a slave-girl in the household of Kasem.

The story of Alibaba was not original ; characterisation and plot-construction do not show any refinement. It is sometimes difficult to find any logical consistency in the sequence of the play. Margina's intelligence and her power of contrivings have been stretched a bit too far, yet she is the most lively character in the whole play, and has the key-role. Her vivacity and laughter contrasted with her hidden pangs of being a slave have made her all the more interesting.

In spite of all these defects, Alibaba was a very popular play of its time and still retains some of its former glory. The playwright probably wanted to write a play just full of fun and frolic which can be very attractive to the common people, and he has been successful in his aim. The diction of Alibaba shows a fusion of Arabic, Persian and Urdu words along with Bengali.

ALIDA MELE (Kannada), is a novel by Shivaram Karanth (1960). If in Karanth's career as a novelist Marali Mannige marks the beginning of a new phase of development, Alida Mele marks another. In between he had written seventeen other novels. The human experience he had depicted in them had gradually led him to ask questions about what made life worthwhile or meaningful. This quest for meaning, implied in novels like Jaruva-Dariyalli and Samikse become a positive search in Alida Mele. The search determines the structure of the novel. It does not tell a story as such. It discovers the making of a story in the author-narrator's attempt to understand the life of a dead friend. What he comes across is desperate and even contradictory fragments which are held together by the fact that they pertain to the dead individual and that they are expressive of the man's basic beliefs and attitudes in his dealings with the world when he was alive.

The man had relationships with women other than his wife. He had dealings with relatives and others of whom some are well-disposed towards him and some not. He had made bequests and intriguing stipulations in his will. All these add up to a complete pattern which can be deciphered only through inference regarding the man behind his actions and appearances. The novel depicts this process of discovery leading to inferences. The reader is left with a body of evidence which he along with the author-narrator is called upon to interpret and evaluate.

The narrative thus becomes a post-mortem investigation by a trusted friend (who is the author narrating the story in his own person) into certain aspects of the life of a self-exiled elderly gentleman, Yasawant. Inheriting the responsibility of fulfilling what the deceased considered his obligations, the author, as much for the trust reposed in him as for his own curiosity, proceeds to unravel not only the circumstances of that man's life but also his attitude to men and matters, in fact his whole outlook on life. It is the reconstruction of the biography of a mind which, when alive, had acted and reacted variously and had left behind records in the form of different memories in different persons, letters, a journal and some symbolic paintings. The author-narrator builds up an account of the deceased's life through his meetings with the men and women who had come into the latter's life. The letters, the entries in the journal and the symbolic paintings either guide or confirm the author's findings. Glimpses of the personality are thus obtained from different and sometimes opposite angles and the picture that emerges is of a person of very large and generous impulses, a mind sensitive and introspective, totally uncommitted yet inquisitive, full of grateful appreciation for all those who were kind to him and an unembittered indifference to others who were not. His self–imposed exile is in itself a comment on his outlook inasmuch as it gave him an opportunity to contemplate and understand the ways of the world.

In thus bringing to life a complex character Karanth as a participant in the narrative brings out also the complexities and contradictions of life. But Karanth the novelist is here less concerned with constructing a fictive biography of a dead character than with attempting to discover what of human worth survived its demise. The novel tries to answer the question : what remains after death ? All that was good in the life of a man like Yasawant is the implied answer. The good that men do is not interred with their bones. All those qualities of tolerance and charity of heart, patience and understanding sympathy, a spontaneous readiness to give back to life more than what one received from it and, above all, detachment, the qualities that made him what he was abide as cherished to the good. That the author continues the good works of the man he set out to understand underlines the power and worth and therefore the influence which the man could exercise even after death. The story starts with the death of a man and ends with the assurance that he lives for ever in the grateful memories of men. That in itself is evidence of the worthwhileness of the life lived. The narrative moves with remarkable ease and naturalness and proves the dictum that fiction most succeeds when it least shows itself as fiction.

ALIKBABU (Bengali) is a Bengali farce by Jyotirindranath Tagore, the elder brother of Rabindranath Tagore. The farce was at first entitled Emon Karmo ar Karbo na (I will not do such a thing again, 1877). It was performed successfully on the stage, both public and private. The main character of this farcical play is a man called Alik (False). He is a fool, and a cheat, and wants to marry a rich man's daughter Hemangini. For this purpose he weaves a network of lies in order to prove himself a wealthy and eligible bachelor. Alik goes on narrating one impossible story after another and they stand on such flimsy grounds that the audience expects that at any moment the edifice of lies will be shattered to the ground, and he will be exposed to Satyasindhubabu, the father of Hemangini. But at the nick of the moment Gadadhar, another character, appears dressed as a Hindustani, Chinaman or an aristocrat Bengali and gives an impression of authenticity to Alik's stories, and saves him from exposure. The situation becomes all the more ludicrous, because Alik himself does not know that he has an accomplice, and he is also as much surprised as the audience at the appearance of Gadadhar. Hemangini, the heroine of the play provides another element of the comedy. She has been brought upon love-lorn heroines of Bankim Chandra Chatterji's novels, and thus behaves almost hysterically in declaring her love for Alik. The story now reaches its climax. When Alik is almost on the verge of success, Gadadhar suddenly exposes him. Though a certain amount of exaggeration is ingrained in the very structure of a farce, Alikbabu may be said to suffer from a sense of unreality from the beginning till the end. The characters and incidents do not have any logical existence. It is unbelievable how the same man namely Gadadhar can deceive an experienced person like Satyasindhu, not once but a number of times. The story does not have any curves. It consists mainly of situations which are full of long speeches delivered to the point of boredom by the characters. Alikbabu also is not able to keep the feeling of suspense which is an essential element for any kind of drama to be successful.

ALL ABOUT H. HATTERR (English; 1948, revised edition with Introduction by Anthony Burgess, 1970). The only novel of G.V. Desani, and often compared with Joyce's Ulysses, All About H. Hatterr is unique in Indian English fiction as much for the audacious originality and experimental exuberance of its prose style (rising very occasionally to sheer poetic heights as, for example, in the rhapsody on the Ganga) as for its singular thematic appeal. The protagonist-narrator, H. (Hindustaniwalla) Hatterr, born of a European seaman father and a non-Christian Malaysian mother, sets the tone of the book and comprehends a mini-universe in his experience. A half-caste and a colonial, Hatterr moves from innocence to experience, registering a zig-zag growth, gathering on the way a diversity of lessons in life's department. The style is the man, and H. Hatterr and the quirks of his sensibility and the vicissitudes of his life, determine his fantastic manner of writing. "That's why", says Desani (or Hatterr), "this book isn't English as she is wrote and spoke. No mere verbal contortionism, I assure you." Certainly, the first effect produced by the book on the flabbergasted reader is that of "a sort of creative chaos that grumbles at the restraining banks" (Anthony Burgess). In the wide spaces of the novel, Hatterr meets the Sages of Calcutta, Rangoon, Madras, Bombay, Delhi, Mogalsarai, receives "instructions", formulates "presumptions", and slowly works towards something like a philosophy of living which is the force of 'contrast' that holds the cosmos together: " 'Life is contrast. That is my crux-statement ... 'Life' is ups and downs, light and shade ... Take anything, and you will find the opposite. ... If cannot leave anything to posterity, I should like to leave them this self— realised medico-philosophical conclusion as to Life. Life is contrast".

This is like the philosophy of 'snakes and ladders' in which the hero of Salman Rushdie's Midnight's Children (1981) finds the clue to existence. While the novel is peopled by a host of characters, typical as well as individual, comprising a whole hierarchy from the dog, Jenkins, through Beliram and Banerji, to Hatterr himself at the top, there is a mystic relationship between Banerji and Hatterr, recalling that between Stephen Dedalus and Leopold Bloom in Ulysses. M.K. Naik finds in All About H. Hatterr "probably the most complete exploration of the colonial experience in Indian English fiction", but D.V.K. Raghavacharyulu compares Hatterr with V.S. Naipaul's Ralph Singh in The Mimic Men (1967) and remarks that both achieve, "by laughing themselves out of court, a certain degree of fictional catharsis", and ultimately both achieve "a greater self-comprehension". A tour-de-force, certainly; and one should perhaps add: but once is enough.

ALLAMAPRABHU (Kannada). The life of Allumaprabhu, a contemporary of Basavanna, is a shining example of how a common man can transcend the limitations of his worldly life. Allamaprabhu was believed to have been born in Ballegavi, a village in Shikharipur Taluka of Shimoga district. His father was egoless, mother an intellectual, and when Allamprabhu came of age, he married Kamalata. Suddenly his wife succumbed to some serious illness and her death caused a stir in his life. Allamaprabhu, who had once taken to lascivious life, now abjured it and turned to be an ascetic. There is an interesting legend connected with this stage of his life. One day while suffering from the fever and anguish due to the death of his wife, he fell in a reverie and dug a patch of ground unconsciously, from inside which suddenly a temple was revealed. None dared to enter the temple but Allamprabhu did and found Animisha Shivayogi, his hand coiled by his Ista-Linga. Allamaprabhu wrested the Ista-Linga from the palm of Animisha-Shivayogi and kept it on his own palm and went out roaming aimlessly entering even the deep forests; but wherever he went he found Ista-Linga emitting radiance all around. Allamaprabhu went on worshipping the Ista-Linga and gradually attained "Shivayoga Shiddhi".

Harihara praised Allamaprabhu as the one who attained 'Siddhi' through practice, while some others think of Allamaprabhu as a miracle man who had attained profundity, divine revelation, Siddhi, etc. In his childhood he became an incarnation of renunciation. However, some people doubt whether it was possible to attain perfection without any practice of Shivatathva doctrines. The only answer can be that Allamaprabhu attained his perfection from within and it manifested itself in the form of Siddhi-realisation. Whatever it may be, it is a fact that Allamaprabhu is the one who attained the spiritual height and profundity in a very short period.

Poet Chamarase has extolled Allama as the replica of the Supreme Siva, as Siva in visual form. His contemporaries who were amazed at his devotional fervour, praised him profusely as the one with supernatural powers. He was the one outstanding ascetic of all the Saranas. In one of his own sayings, he tells about himself and the various roles he played in Satya, Treta, and Dwapara yugas and claims that in Kaliyuga, he was born as Allamaprabhu 'Jangama'. Those who study his Vachanas find him born as one, endowed with super-mental power—a totality of the illuminated and uplifted being.

Human body is quite essential for achieving eternal bliss. One of the main desires for Allamaprabhu was to come to this world as a child. He surpassed other Saranas in overcoming human limitations. From his own experience he understood that illusion—Maya—was hidden in the way one looked at a thing; it was hidden in the forefront of mind's desire and not inside anything. Woman, money and land according to him were not illusions—Maya—but the mind's avarice. Through practice he attained the secrets of yoga and proclaimed that 'Shivayoga' was the the best of all the yogas. He experienced within himself the ever-illuminating inspiration which was beyond the reach of mind, knowledge, senses, sounds, words, etc. Emptying himself of the worldly feelings and integrating himself with the Linga in mind and body, dissolving his ego and effecting a complete union with Siva—he became the Light of the Bigger Light. Though not a writer himself, Allamaprabhu inspired many writers with his life and spiritual vision of truth.

After attaining Siddhi, Allamaprabhu took to random wandering in the country to awaken the Sadhakas. He used to advise those who were frustrated and were struggling to attain self realisation through self knowledge.

The very wanderings of Allamaprabhu influenced aspirants of spiritual life and awakened them of the spritual truth. In one of his sojourns, Allamaprabhu happened to meet learned Muktayakka. She was very much grief-stricken due to the separation by death of her brother Ajaganna, who was her spiritual teacher also. Allamaprabhu who syampathised with her, enquired about the cause of the grief, told her that the stage of one's realisation could only be reached by one's own efforts and practices. But being not satisfied Muktayakka told Allama that one required a teacher to guide the correct practices, that now she could not have the guidance of her brother who had become one with the Absolute. Allama then told her that the need of the Guru for elevation of one's life was not necessary when the Sadhaka reached a particular stage in the practice of spirituality. The relationship of the Guru and the Shishya dwindles at a certain stage and self-knowledge becomes the guiding light for further achievement of spiritual order. Though present here, one should be able to be non-present at the same time and that is real Samadhi (Union).

Allamaprabhu met Siddharameshara on the way to Kalyan and an interesting episode is reputed to have taken place when the two met. Sidharama was a Karma Yogi doing his work with all seriousness. He was engaged in the construction works of tanks, canals, temples and such other public utility works. Allama wanted to awaken Siddharama further and so purposely coaxed him by asking, "You mason Ramaiah, have you not yet finished with your construction of tank-work and stone cutting?" Sidaharama was filled with rage on hearing but kept quiet for the moment. But Allama further continued to coax him by saying "though you are a great yogi, you still do not have the quality of doing a job with no ties or attachments. Though you think you have escaped from the worldly desires and aspirations, the worldly life has not left you. Beware Ramaiah, you should better learn to live like a lotus which is born out of muddy water". Siddharama did not tolerate any further the chiding of Allamaprabhu, and being a three-eyed person, opened the fiery eye from which the all-powerful, all-consuming flames were emitting. But Allamaprabhu did not even falter, he just rubbed the flames under his feet and extinguished the fire. Realising the real greatness of Allamaprabhu, Siddharama begged forgiveness. He requested Allama to explain how one could satiate hunger without eating if one went on working throughout the day? Should one not work, for the upliftment of others in this world?" Allama then explained to him by putting a counter questions "O Ramaiah if one goes on working the whole day, when is he going to eat? Where is the time to eat? Of what avail is it if one goes on working throughout own's life till one dies? Our body is a Temple and the life in it is the Linga and whence comes the necessity of another temple being built? The body emptied of its earthly qualities ceases to be a body, and the life in it when it is emptied of its earthly qualities, ceases to be a life, at which stage, devotion, turns into "Self-knowledge"—a knowledge which is the highest of all knowledge of this world. What you do now is only of regional nature and yet what you do is useful and applicable to the whole universe. It is, therefore, necessary that your Karma yoga should merge with the Shiva-yoga to achieve perfection. You better meet Basavanna who is doing such important work and let us go together to Kalyan and see him". Thus Allamaprabhu persuaded Sidharama to accompany him to Kalyan.

Allamaprabhu and Siddharama found all-around development in Kalyan—being helped by Basavanna, who was, however, anxiously waiting for the arrival of a great personality with dynamic force. Allama accompanied by Siddharama came to Kalyan at that moment. When they came to the doors of Mahamane, Basavanna was busy with the worship of the Linga, and Hadapad Appana informed Basavanna of their arrival. At the moment Basavanna said "Linga is not different from Jangama; this house is the house of Jangama. Hence, what prevents them from entering Mahamane, their own house?" Allama was annoyed at the behaviour of Basavanna and chided him saying, "Whence comes the obligation of Linga when a Jangama is at the door step?" At this Basavanna realised his mistake and rushed to the door to welcome them.

Enthronement of Allama was done in Basavanna's Mahamane with all the grandeur and pomp, but he was not satisfied. The food prepared was almost exhausted and Basavanna was perplexed. Noticing the mood of Basavanna, Allamaprabhu told him that on account of that egoistic pride hidden in him, he was not able to satisfy "Jangama", like Allama. Basavanna admitted again his fault and bowed down to Allam-saying "The egoism in me has betrayed me and henceforth if ever I think in terms of that let the Shiva's drum torture me and make me awake, O! Allama". Basavanna thus prepared himself to serve Allama personally and to his satisfaction.

It was Allamaprabhu who brought to the light the importance of 'Anubhava-marga' (physical feeling–experience). As long as he stayed in Kalyan, he improvised the 'Satsthala' system of Virashaivism, by holding discussions with various Saranas, and at the same time correcting wherever they needed correction. It was he who satisfied one and all by saying that in Virashaivism, much importance and stress was given on actions, thoughts and character in life. As per the wish of Basavanna, Allama became the first president of Anubhava–Manatap. Even those who had some suspicion about Virashaivism recognised his leadership. He deserved all the credit and honour for carrying out the Virashaiva philosophy to its perfection and thus inspired all great literature on Virashaivism.

ALLEGORY (Hindi). Being a symbolic narrative, allegory (called 'Kathatmak Kavya-rupak' or 'Rupak Katha-Kavya) in Hindi is a particularly difficult form of literary composition because its author seeks to communicate on two levels–one, the direct or the concrete, which embodies a romantic or a heroic tale or both rolled into one, and the second, a more abstruse or abstract plane whereupon he aspires to concentrate on a deeper and subtler message reflecting his view of life, his weltanschauung. It resembles a tight rope-walk because the slightest lapse in organisation of the various ingredients, in its meaningfulness on the twin planes, shatters the whole fabric of the composition and renders the narrative lame and incapacitated. It is, therefore, only such authors as have a deeply spiritual experience to reveal or a philosophical view of life to convey that venture to adopt this risky form of communication. Allegories in any literature are, therefore, few and far between. Allegorists have generally adapted the medium of poetry for their self-expression but the dramatic and fictional forms are also equally powerful and valid.

We come across four different patterns of allegories in Hindi and they may be enumerated as under:-

Where the characters are personifications of abstract ideas, emotions, ideals, values, etc. Prasad's Kamna is an example of this category. An essential drawback of this kind of allegory is that the characters so delineated smack of unreality and do, generally, create a credibility gap.

Where the characters, though not personifications, are yet symbolic in their essence. They may have any kind of names, but they essentially symbolize definite trends, characteristics, passions, etc. The episodes, or the action of the plot are also more symbolic rather than materially significant. Where the characters are non-human entities or inanimate objects. This category of allegories has its origin in the ancient Sanskrit works like the Panchtantra. It seeks to extend moral or practical counsels or communicate lessons of mundane experiences for betterment of the human lot. Prasad's Ek Ghunt and Pant's Jyosana belong to this category.

The fourth and last category is the most significant and effective because the characters in this type of allegory are real in nature and the action, too, is materially significant. Its overall impact is profound, symbolic and abstruse. The entire plot is interwoven with incidents and circumstances of real life to conjure a psychological and realistic portrayal but the effort is to convey a subtler and universal truth of human life. In Hindi, the epic tales of romance by the mediaeval 'Premmargi' poets headed by Jayasi (with his classic Padmavat) belong to this category. Even Prem Chand's epic novel Rangbhumi is an allegorical work of this category because the conflict represented therein between John Sewak and Surdas is, in fact, a confrontation of the spiritual Indian values and the materialistic western values. Prasad's Kamayani, too, represents the inner conflict of a modern man torn between Shraddha (emotion) and Ida (reason) and his efforts to achieve complete internal harmony to reach the acme of human attainment– – eternal bliss.

ALLEGORY (Marathi) The heritage of Marathi being the Sanskrit lore, allegories are not unknown to Marathi literature. In the Panchatantra or later on in the Hitopadesha ideas take the form of animals and birds. Even the epic heroes like Yudhishthira Dharamaraj, Vrikodara, Duryodhana and Dusshasana of the Mahabharata and Charudatta, Maitreya and Vasantasena of the play 'Mricchakatika' are allegorical in essence. These Sanskrit literary masterpieces were rendered in Marathi. Gadkari's plays, as seen from their titles, seem to be allegorical; for instance Punyaprabhav or Bhavabandhan, wherein the good and the virtuous emotions prevail respectively. The popular play of Khadilkar, called Manapamana and its characters are seemingly allegorical. The hero is Dhairyadhar, the very embodiment of courage and endeavour; the heroine is Bhamini (i.e. Bhama, the angry, volatile Sanskrit or classical Nayika). Some other dramatic works of Khadilkar, like Vidyaharana are allegorical, but his Kichakavadha became very popular wherein Kichaka came to be identified by the spectators with the tyrant British, and Bhima, the hero, with the restless revolutionary activities. In another play Bhaubandki the judge Ramashastri became the embodiment of the great Lokamanya Tilak. Incidentally, the actor enacting that role used to wear the dress, similar to that of Lokamanya Tilak. Many more such allegorical touches could be easily found; many times they are symbolically suggestive as in Veer Savarkar's Sanyasta Khadga. The earlier playlet by Gadkari called Garvanirvan being allegorical is obviously didactic as the aim is the ultimate salvation from or rejection of pride. Banyan's Pilgrims Progress was brought to the notice of the Marathi people by Hari Keshavji, a catholic christian, by translating it in 1841 as Yatrika-kraman. So many other so-called novels or longer tales appeared during the Missionary domination, of which, some are didactic, but not necessarily allegorical. The novels Muktamala (Laxmanshastri Halabe, 1865) and Manjughosha (N.S. Risbud, 1865) are definitely didactic, but Muktamala is more allegorically didactic, while Manjughosha is a didactic fantasy, allegorical to a certain extent.

The Sanskrit drama Prabodhachandrodaya (by a Bengali Pandit Shrikrishna Misra) translated into Marathi by Amrapurkar and Bapat is allegorical. The different characters in it are named after the human sentiments and passions and virtues and vices such as Krodha, Ahankara, Viveka etc., the ultimate aim being to establish the Vedanta principles of Shankaracharaya's philosophy.

The beginnings of allegory go back to first writings i. Marathi language. Many Dristantas used by Chakradha. have the seeds of allegory in them. But the Kutagitas and Bharuds of the Varakari saint poets abound in allegorical imageries, thus Jnaneshvara's song of the three villages and the three potters or the Bharuds of Eknath are allegorical. The Hansa-kakiya Akyana, a narrative episode in Moropant's rendering of the Mahabharata, is an example of a longer verse allegory in which the Swan takes away the pearl necklace, while the arrogant and ignorant crows are left back crowing to their hearts' content. Thus allegory as a genre of writing was developed in Marathi and still continues, but it now takes an analogical and metaphorical turn.

ALLEGORY (Sanskrit). There are some allegorical works in Sanskrit literature, though Indian literary critics or writers on dramaturgy do not treat allegory as a separate class of literature, because allegorical mode of expression is somewhat alien to the Indian mind. The fragments of a work discovered from Turfan along with those of Asvaghosha's works contain some allegorical material, though the details are not clear.

The Agamadambara of Jayantabhatta (Mithila Institute, Darbhanga) is a philosophical play in four acts, containing some allegorical theme. The most important allegorical drama in Sanskrit is Krishnamishra's Prabodha Chandrodaya (11th century) in six acts, an allegorical piece of theologico-philosophical purport, in which abstract notions and symbolical figures appear as characters; it is Advaitic in theme. On the same model is Vedanta desika's Sankalpasuryodaya which is aimed at glorifying the Vishishtadvaita system of philosophy. Another allegorical drama is the Jivanandam, where the characters are taken from the medical field. The Upamitabhavaprapan chakatha (436) A.D. of Siddharshi is a great allegorical novel of transmigration from the Jaina point of view. From the tyranny of King Action and Queen Time, the only escape possible is Release. The hero struggles upwards from life to life against evil passions.

ALLEGORY (Sindhi). In Sindh, the saints and the Sufi poets have also drawn upon the allegory ('Tamsil' Sindhi) as a means of communication to carry their point of view as also to convey their otherwise inexplicable experiences to the people. The earliest traces of the use of allegory are discernible in the poetry of Shah Abdul Karim of Bulri (1536-1622), the great-great grandfather of the premier poet of Sindh, Shah Abdul Latif, who took a cue from the folk-tales of Sasui-Punhu, Suhini Mehar, Mumal-Rano, Umar-Marui, Lila Chanesar and Moriro, and composed a few 'byats' to allegorise them in his own way.

Obviously these folk-tales had existed long before these were put into verse. The written record thereof is, however, not available. As was the practice then prevalent, these might have been sung by the bards or narrated by story tellers.

These folk-tales have an under-current of love story of the 'seeker' and the 'sought'. God kindles his love in a human heart which then treads on the path of the seeker. Let there be mighty mountains, dense jungles or devastating deserts, Sasui (the seeker) would not rest until she has found her' Punhu' (the sought). Similarly the swirling waters of the swollen river, its whirlpools, rolling fathoms deep, and the aweful creatures would not deter 'Suhini' to plunge into the river at the dead of night to arrive at the rendezvous on the opposite bank, to see Mehar (her lover). On the other hand Rano (God) tries to remove the cobwebs of illusion woven by Mumal around herself. And when he does that, Mumal is out to get at him at all costs. Marui (the seeker), though kidnapped by Umar (Raja of Sindh symbolising sensual desires) and kept captive in his fort (this world), pines for Malir (her village–God's abode). As a lotus having its roots under water, keeps itself above the surface similarly Marui keeps herself away from all temptations of a comfortable life offered by Umar and she is ultimatley united to her beloved in Malir. However, love for costly and glittering necklace (material things) costs Lila the displeasure of and separation from her dear Lord (Chanesar). Only true repentance was the panacea for re-union. Moriro (Fisherman–the Seeker) kills the devouring whale (self) living in the sea (world) to get the spiritual jewels.

Shah Abdul Karim was followed by Shah Inayat Ullah, popularly known as Shah Inat who titled some of the chapters (Suruds) of his verse after the names of the heroines of these folk-tales like 'Surud Marui,' 'Surud Lila,' 'Surud Sorath.' Other Suruds relating to these folk-tales are Surud Mumal-Rano, Surud Deshi (Sasui-Punhu), Surud Kamod (Nuri-Jam Tamachi) and Surud Todi (Suhini Mehar). There is, however, no reference to Moriro.

It was Shah Abdul Latif (1690-1751) who put them in a dramatic way with extensive clarity. He versified only some of the portions from these seven tales along with those of Moriro which suited his spiritual attainment. He too, titled some chapters (Surs) of his magnum opus Shah Jo Rasalo after these tales.

Abdul Wahab, better known as Sachal Sarmast (1739-1829) has also composed poems on these folk-tales. He has, however, added one more tale to the existing stock, the tale being that of Hir Ranjha.

It is not only Sufi poets who brought in the verse the folk-tales, but even famous Vedantic poet, Chainrai Bachomal Ditaramani (Lund) 'Sami' also composed a sloka or two on Sasui Punhu, Lila Chanesar and Hir Ranjha. Most of the other poets, prominent among them being Lekhraj 'Aziz', have made good use of these allegories.

S.M.J.

ALLEGORY (Tamil). In ancient times Tamil poets had not designed their literary pieces clearly as allegories. But in a few of them, there ware only allegorical tendencies. The poets adopted certain literary techniques like Ullurai Uvamam, Iracchi, Siledai etc. which may be closer to allegory but not exactly so. They used symbols which are suggestive but not allegorical.

During the twentieth century there have been a few literary works which are structurally constructed as allegories. Subramania Bharathi in his Kuyil Pattu symbolises the nature of love by using a cuckoo as its main character. Bharathi's Panchali Sabatham and Swaminatha Sarma's Abhimanu may be considered as allegories of political situations that prevailed in India during their time. Both of them used puranic materials and infused suggestive political ideas. Structurally they serve the purpose of an allegory.

S.D. Sundaram's Kaviyin Kanavu and Swaminatha Sarma's Panapurattu Veeran are created out of imagination with clear reference to the prevailing political problems of the times. So they may be considered as allegorical.

Sundaram Pillai's Manonmaniam and A.N. Perumal's Paalmati are verse plays carrying with them philosophical thoughts in a suggestive way. Human actions and divine actions interact and deliverance is possible with complete submission to the will of God. Actually this is personified with slight variations in these two plays.

In 'Sivakamiyin Charitam' an ancedote added in Manonmariam Sundaram Pillai suggestively instructs the philosophical idea of man's final salvation at the feet of God after self-realisation. The very structure of the story clearly denotes its allegorical significance.

Certain characters in some of the plays are created as personifications of some of the human qualities. They seem to be ideal. Satyavati in Iru Nanbarkal (Sambanda Mudaliar) and Panimozhi in Panimozhi (A.N. Perumal) are moulded out of ideal love which is rare in reality. Kudilan in Manonmaniam (Sundaram Pillai) is shaped as an arch villain. Such characterisations may serve as allegorical representations.

ALLEGORY (Telugu) has not attained any significant place in Telugu. As in other fields, here also Kandukuri Veeresalingam pioneered the art of allegory and wrote a book giving its true definition. Prior to Kandukuri Veeresalingam, there had not been any allegorical poems.

Around 1480, Nandi Mallayya and Ghanta Singana–the twin poets—wrote a long narrative poem Prabodhachandrodayam basing on the Sanskrit drama of Krishnamisra. Through this epic, philosophy was taught by introducing characters like illusion, mind, nature and concentration. Similarly, during the time of Sri Krishna Devaraya, Pingali Surana kavi's Kalapurnodayam also bore shades of allegory. Again these characteristics found place in Rama Raja Bhushana's Vasu Charitra which was written by ascribing human qualities to nature.

Kandukuri Veeresalingam's work Satya Raja Purva Desa Yatralu based on Swift's Gulliver's Travels can be cited as the first allegorical work. It is an excellent work satirising the miserable condition of women in 1891 and also the bad traditions and customs. His creation Lanka Dwipam, earned him great name and fame and it displays his creative faculties. Kandukuri also translated Aesop's allegorical fables. Chinnaya Suri's Niti Chandrika like George Orwell's Animal Farm is another great allegorical work conveying a fitting and purposeful message to the society.

Boyi Bhimanna wrote a fine work entitled Dipa Sabha, wherein he introduced several lights (lamps) as characters and stressed that all the lamps were the inner core of 'Param Jyoti'. Again Palla Durgayya in his poetic work Gangireddu represented the plight of this universe. Vidwan Viswam produced the well-known work entitled Na Hridayam and depicted allegorically the conflicts between the good and the bad that arise in human minds. We rarely come across such allegorical works like Viswanatha's Kinnerasani patalu (Songs); Undela Mala Kondareddi's Kanti Chakralu, Arudra's Tvamevaham. Allegorical characteristics are also present in the modern prose poems.

Describing natural sciences as the torch bearers for all matters pertaining to human life, Tekumalla Raja Gopala Rao wrote a novel Vihanga Yanamu. Allegorical technique is not, however popular in any form in Telugu Literature.

ALLI ARASANI MALAI (Tamil). The Mahabharata, more than the Ramayana, had the greatest fascination for the folk-mind and we find in the Tamil language a score of very popular folk tales in long continuous verse in ballad form composed on imaginary incidents with the Mahabharata characters. The first such ballad is Alli Arasani Malai, written in the first decade of the 17th century by a poet named Puhalendi the 'Bearer of Fame', who was the third poet of that name.

Alli is a Pandiya princess. the counterpart of Chitra, in Tamil fiction and the poem narrates in 5000 lines in the typical ballad metre the love episode of Arjuna and Alli. Alli is born as the only child of the Pandiya King at Madurai and is brought up as a martial warrior. In time she defeats Nilmukha who was given the administration of the kingdom and crowns herself as the sovereign. She had made the state an Amazonian state, where no male was allowed. Arjuna in his wanderings in the south during the Pandavas' exile in the forests reaches Madurai and, learning of the beauty and might of Alli, falls in love with her.

Krishna assumes the form of a 'kuratti' and reads the hand of Arjuna and her words encourage him. The song of the 'kuratti' is the only part where the metre changes in the long poem. This song is very popular among all balladry. Arjuna however. contrives to get into the city and makes advances towards Alli in many guises. She is infuriated and tries to do away with him. Through the machinations of Krishna, Arjuna comes to no harm. Krishna in the guise of a snake charmer leaves Arjuna as a charming snake with Alli for the night; when assuming his natural form, Arjuna succeeds in tying a magical 'tiru mangalya' round her neck, which she is unable to tear off. Her parents fail to pacify her. Knowing that the culprit is one of the Pandavas, she declares war on them. Every one including Krishna is defeated by her but Sahadeva very cunningly traps her in a cage. Finally Kunti, Arjuna's mother, and Arjun's other wives, Draupadi and Subhadra give her the proper advice and she consents to be married to Arjuna. In time a young boy is born to her, whose love escapades form the subject of other ballads.

The earliest ballad poem in the language, it is replete with references to the customs and beliefs of the day which we do not know from any other source. Drinking a cup of turmeric water at the adoption of a child, standing on a mortar for the 'simanda kalyanam', applying the earth as a protective mark on the central forehead of the child to ward off evil are some of these.

Pancapandavar Vanavasa, Eniyevram, Pavalakkodi malai and Abhimannan Sundari malai are some of the more popular ballads (ammanaip-padal) out of the score of such poems written on the model of Alli. All these are said to be by the same Puhalendi III. Kovilan kathai is a ballad on a literary story, Desingurajan kathai a historical ballad, and Nallatangal kathai a tragic ballad on a social theme, all going after Alli's name in the next century. More than 200 such ballads are found in the language.

ALLMIM (Konkani) by Chandrakant Keni is a collection of thirteen short stories published in 1975. Keni is believed to have ushered in the era of modern short story in Konkani, and rightly so, with his first collection Dhartari Azun Jiyetali (The Earth was still living, 1964). Since then he had already published two more collections namely, Eklo Eksuro (The Lonely, 1973) and Ashadh Pavlli (Rains in Ashadh, 1973). One finds Keni at his most mature and the best in the Allmim (Mushrooms). He is a journalist by profession but the story writer in him is in no way affected. This is amply substantiated by this book. Unlike most others, the author is more interested in loading his pieces with universality without caring much for the local colour or flavour. Depicting feminine emotions and women characters has always been Keni's speciality. Stories like 'Chembu', 'Rukminn', 'Kashmirantli Kalli' (The Kashmir Bud), 'Bandini', 'Mughda', etc., are good illustrations. Some stories like 'Amle Tor' (Tender Mango) border on personal essay rather than short story. The author has the gift of conveying all that he wants to with precision and economy of words. He is not averse to either pathos or humour. Keni's insight and ability to fathom human mind is evident in stories 'Fatari Pondci Ankri' (The sapling under the stone) or 'Ratichya Dha Varamcher (AT 10 p.m.). He is equally unhesitating while depicting sex or delicate emotions of love. One can easly discern the cultured sensibility of the author behind most of the stories. The author's objectivity is amazing. The volume has an erudite foreward by Ravindra Kelekar.

ALMAST, DINANATH WALI (Kashmiri; 1908), is a lyrical poet and artist. He was born into a family stricken by poverty and helplessness. After doing his Matriculation he opted for painting. He paints the landscape of Kashmir with faithfulness, sympathy and devotion. The first collection of his poetry, Balayapari, (This side of the Mountains, 1955) is in the traditional verse form; however, he is quite successful in sensuous descriptions. His second collection, Sahravik posh (The flowers of sands, 1981) is remarkable for its picture-squences and variety of themes which are often progressive and romantic. His poetry is a spontaneous expression of emotions knowing no restraint and economy.

ALMAST, PARMANAND (Dogri, b. 1901, d. 1978) was a prominent poet of the romantic school of Dogri poetry. His ancestors hailed from Samba and he was also born there. They were later settled in Jammu where Parmanand spent his childhood. He had hardly passed his vernacular final (8th class) when family responsibilities and financial diffculties forced him to take up a job and he joined as a dispenser only.

Although he had started composing verses in 1931 when he wrote a panegyric on the birth of Yuvaraj Karan Singh (The group who sang the verse composition on the occasion, got rewarded by Maharaja Hari Singh) his talent really blossomed a few years later in the picturesque hills of Dudu Banantgarh in Ramnagar. Here it burst like a mountain spring and started flowing with the speed and vigour and freshness of a mountain stream. The poetic talent lying dormant in him, found a congenial environment here which helped him to develop into a fine poet. Here was a region replete with Dogri folksongs and full of the splendour of natural beauty and the poet awakened to his potential, drank deep in them, drew inspiration from them and wove the sentiments of folksongs and beauties of human form and nature in his lyrics.

In addition to the lyrics and songs of sringara rasa he wrote a number of poems, which embody his ideas on matters like religion, spiritulism, politics and social inequities and evils. He had spiritual inclination but he was not orthodox. He had intellectual affinities with Gandhivad and values of socialism and secularism. He condemned communalism and casteism, false religious dogma and orthodoxy.

In these poems of socio-religious content, he mounted a crusade for social change. Love of nature was ingrained in him and it shines through his poems and lyrics in the pictures drawn from her rich repertoire. There is an undercurrent of deep humanism through his poems and a love of beauty enlivening and illumining his love lyrics.

Some of his compositions first appeared in selections of Dogri poetry, Jogo Guggar published in 1949 and Arunima published 1959. Jhunak is a collection of his poems and lyrics published in 1961. It is in Persian script in which the poet usually wrote. It got an award of the J and K Academy of Arts, Culture and Language. Ik Boondai gi tarasai Painchhi is an edited version in Devanagari script of its poems and lyrics published in Jhunak.

ALMEIDA, MIGUEL DE, S.J. (Konkani; b. 1607, d. 1683) was a lexicographer. He was successively a missionary at Salcete, Jesuit Provincial, Vicar of Chicalim, Rector at St. Paul's Catherdral, Goa. His Onvllancho Mallo (Garland of flowers, 1658) a five volume publication in prose is a rare specimen of 17th century Konkani. The first volume has 557 pages, the second and the third also have like number of pages. Volumes four and five are lost. The volume is preceded by seven unnumbered pages containing permission and no objection certificate from the then religious censors. It is followed by an eight-page prologue dedicated to the readers in Konkani and Portuguese. The prologue speaks of the triple Garden of Heaven, Eden and the Catholic Church. The main treatise, an elaborate explanation of the Christian doctrine, a series of Sermons on Our Lady and Saints, contains innumerable Portuguese and Marathi words. Most of Miguel's work has complimentary letters from contemporary writers like Manuel Baptista, Ignatius Arcamon and others. Cinco Praticas sobre as palavras exurgena Maria (Five Homilies on the words of Mary's setting out) and Sermoes de Santos e do Tempo Quaresmal (Sermons on saints and Lenton season) are two undated and missing manuscripts by Almeida which are believed to be fine specimens of modern oratory. Vocabulario da Lingua Canarina em versam Purtuguese (Vocabulary of Canarin Language in Portuguese version) Published in photo-copied edition in 1973 by Board of Overseas investigation, Lisbon is regarded as a joint venture by Almeida and Antonio Saldanha, both contemporaries working on vocabularies already compiled by earlier Jesuits.

A.P.S.J.

ALPHABET (Dogri) Dogri alphabet has passed through three distinct phases-(I) Ganamat which is a form of Takari letters current in the entire region of the Punjab, Duggar and Kashmir from around the tenth century onwards, (2) New Dogri or Dogri Akkhar, a modified form of Ganamat promulgated by Maharaja Ranbir Singh of Jammu in the later half of the 19th century and (3) Devanagari adopted by Dogri Sanstha as a regular measure in 1944.

The exact date when Ganamat began to be used is not known. It was used in title deeds, lette, and inscriptions, on water spouts and step-wells (baolies). A printed copy of the Ganamat Varnamala is reported to be available in the J K State Government's Research Department Library at Srinagar; it begins with an invocation to Lord Ganapati in the words Ganamat Om Swasti Siddham. Sir George Grierson who conducted the first linguistic survey of India has said that "Dogri has an alphabet of its own which is allied to Takari current in the Punjab Himalayas." Sanskrit scholars of Jammu, however, termed Dogri language as Durgart Bhasha and Dogri alphabet as Dwigart Akshar. This is borne out by the preface of the Dogri work Lilawati printed at Vidya Vilas Press, Jammu in 1873.

Maharaja Ranbir Singh who ascended the throne of Jammu and Kashmir in 1857 got reforms made in 'Ganamat' and introduced New Dogri Letters evolved on scientific and phonetic principles from the old letters. Mr. (Later Sir) Frederic Drew termed this alphabet as 'New Dogri' which soon became popular with the backing of the State Government. In his book The Jammu and Kashmir Territories published in 1875, Drew records "The New Dogri is used for the petitions that are read before the Maharaja and for this purpose it has replaced persian in which petitions were written when I first came to Jamoo". The third edition of this Dogri Varnamala printed at the Vidya Vilas Press, Jammu, in 1871 has a preface which contains an order of Maharaja Ranbir Singh, printed in both Devanagari and Dogri characters which gives legal sanction to the use of this alphabet. It says: "This alphabet has been approved by His Highness the Maharaja. Any person changing the approved form of letters or using a different set of letters (for writing Dogri) shall be liable to punishment."

Type for printing of Dogri books, using this alphabet was got prepared in various sizes and the publication of Dogri books began in the Vidya Vilas Press and Sri Raghunathji Press, Jammu. A number of books thus printed are extant. This new Dogri alphabet was also used in official publications, on the state P and T stamps, and on Judicial and non-judicial stamp papers. The alphabet assumed great importance as it was used for teaching Sanskrit, Persian and Urdu and Primers for the purpose were printed in Dogri alphabet.

There had been intermittent use of Devanagari alphabet in writing Dogri in the 18th and 19th centuries, for example by the poet Dattu, by Tehaldas who wrote Rajayali and by the Christian missionaries who translated the Bible and published it under the title Dharma Granth in 1818. In 1944, Dogri Sanstha Jammu, the pioneer of Dogri Literary movement, decided to adopt Devanagari letters for Dogri. In 1953, the J and K State Government appointed a Dogri language committee, to report, interalia, whether its old script should be retained for the printing of text books in Dogri. The Committee recommended both Devanagari and Persian alphabets for Dogri. In recommending the Devanagari script, the Committee was guided by an appeal made by Jawaharlal Nehru commending Devanagari as a common medium for all regional languages in the country. Persian script was recommended in view of the local needs. The recommendation was accepted by the State Government and at present both the scripts are officially recognised. But Dogri literature is being written mostly in Devanagari script. Dogri has recently been introduced as a subject for Higher Secondary classes and at the post-graduate level. The first text book for Higher Secondary Marwe Diyan Minjaran and books for M.A. classes are in Devanagari letters.

B.P.S.

ALPHABET (Kannada). Kannada alphabet has its origin in the Brahmi-script, particularly the southern type of Asokan inscriptions of the third century B.C. It is well known now that ten inscriptions of Asoka have been discovered from the present area of Karnataka state, viz. Raichur District-3 (Maski-1, Koppal-2), Ballary District-4 (Nittur-2, Udegollam-2), and Chitradurga District-3 (Siddapur-1, Jatinigaramesvara-1 and Brahmagiri-1). This well developed Brahmi script used for Prakrit writing was also adopted by other dynasties, like Satavahana Vakataka, Chutu, Pallavas, Kadambas and others too, which ruled this tract of land after Mauryas, for both Prakrit and Sanskrit records. It is curious to note that even the Kannada language has been called as Prakrit in an inscription of Badami Chalukyas dated 696 A.D. (K.I., Vol. I, No. 1), and as such, leaves no doubt regarding its origin. Alphabet, when, strictly defined, indicates by written symbols of a set of speech sounds. Therefore it has to be dealt from two aspects: with audible sounds and visual figure.

From the angle of visuality it is seen that all the letters that are used in writing the Brahmi have been adopted in toto with two more letters: ra (-Sakata repha) and la (-rala) in the ancient Kannada language. Ra and la are very peculiar in sound and shape. The great poet of Ragale, Harihara (1220 A.D.) discarded the usage of la. Yet these letters are found written almost up to 19th century either in the MSS or in the inscriptions.

The visual symbols are studied after dividing them into four categories: Svaras (Vowels), Vargiya Vyanjanas, Avargiya Vyanjanas (Consonants of two types) and Yogavahas. Svaras are: a, a, i, i, u, u, ri, ri, e, ai, o, and au = 12. But in Kannada and other sister languages like Telugu there are two more vowels, viz. hrisvae (w) and hrisvae O (ṇ) which are audible and do not have visual symbols. They are written with their respective dirgha symbols in the ancient Kannada script. They came into visual existence only after the advent of printing in the modern Kannada. The symbol (the sign of dirgha) is used in respect of i, e and o in the right side of the bound forms (ki, ki, ke, ke and ko, ko) in the modern Kannada. As such it should be remembered well that there was a confusion while pronouncing them, i.e. their audibility is deceptived. These svaras when they conjoin with a consonant have specific shapes and are known as 'medials'; which shall have their place at the top side or at the bottom of the letter–'siromatrike' 'parsva-matrike', and 'prishtha-matrike'. Vargiya Vyanjanas are 25.

(ka, kha, Ga, Gha, Na)
(Cha, Chha, Ja, Jha, Na)
(Ta, Tha, Da, Dha, Na)
(Ta, Tha, Da, Dha, Na)
(Ṗa, Pha, Ḃa, Ḃha, Ma)

Avargiya vyanjanas are eleven (ya), (Ra), (ra), (La), (Va), (Sa), (Sha), (Sa), (Ha), (La) and (Rala).

Yogavahas are four in number: O (Bi̇ndu) : (Visarga), X (Jivhamuliya) and (Upadhamaniya). These actually form parts of Sanskrit Varnamala. But the above has been used extensively in Kannada, which is used in place of all the nasals (anunasikas) in modern Kannada. In the ancient Kannada language, particularly upto 10th century A.D. nasals were used in their proper places in conjoined places like Kantha, Anjana, etc.

The first Kannada record, Halmidi inscription, is of the 5th century A.D. and pertains to the Kadamba period; which shows full development of both the script and the language. In the field of visuality when one stands and gazes back from the modern period to the horizon, the Asokan Brahmi Characters, the galaxy of the 52 letters, it is seen, have undergone many changes through the ages during the reign of Kadambas, Chalukyas of Badami, Gangas, Rashtrakutas, Chalukyas of Kalyani, Seunas, Hoysalas, the Vijayanagara Kings and the chieftains of small kingdoms, who ruled at different places after the downfall of the Vijayanagara empire.

From the angle of audibility these alphabets may be divided into eight divisions on the basis of their origin in the mouth-cavity from where they take their birth i.e. the point and manner of the articulation viz Gutturals, Palatals, Nasals, Dentals, Labials, Gutturo-palatal, Guttaro-labial, Dento-labial etc.

All this has been explained by Kesiraya in his 'Sabdamanidarpana' in one sutra (I-13).

ALPHABET (Maithili). Maithili alphabet is known as Tirhuta. Earlier it was called as Mithilakshara, Maithilakshara, Vaidehi or even Magadhi. The growth and development of Tirhuta has been discussed by Umesha Mishra in his essays published in 1911 in Mithilamoda (No. 167) (a monthly published from Varanasi) and in recent years by Rajeshwar Jha in Mithilaksharak Udbhava O Vikasa (1971).

The Maithili alphabet is derived from an Eastern alphabet current in what is now Eastern Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Bihar, Orissa, Bengal and Assam, from the 6th century onwards. This Eastern alphabet was the immediate origin of Bengali, Assamese, Maithili and Oriya alphabets. Bengali-Assamese-Maithili are almost identical. Assamese and Maithili alphabets do not differ from each other even in those features in which they differ from Bengali alphabet.

In subsequent years a form of Devanagari, known as Kaithi, spread to Mithila as well by way of the Bhojpuri area, and among the less educated, it was popular owing perhaps to the monopoly of the Kayasthas in maintaining village records and teaching the illiterate the three r's as private tutors in the villages.

ALPHABET (Malayalam). Almost all linguistic sounds in Malayalam are represented on the alphabet by separate letters. The number of letters vary with the number of sounds recognised by different scholars. A.R. Rajaraja Varma posits 53 sounds and hence 53 letters. Bnt George Matten has 48 sound and 48 letters, Seshagiri Prabhu has 54 sounds and 54 letters, and Kovunni Nedungadi has 55 sounds and 55 letters.

The Alphabet as recognised by A.R. Rajaraja Varma is given below.

Vowels

	short	a	i	u	r	l
	long	a	i	u	r	l
dipthongs	short	e	o
	long	e	o	ai	au

Consonants

	Voiceless stop	aspirated stop	Voiced stop	aspirated stop	Nasal glottal	K	Kh	g	gh	n
palatal	C	Ch	j	jh	n
cerebral	t	th	d	dh	n
dental	t	th	d	dh	n
labial	p	ṗh	ḃ	ḃh	ṁ
Glides	y	V
alveolar stops	r	l
fricatives	s	s	s	h
trill	R
alveolar nasal	n

Though the alphabet is representation of the sound system there are some peculiarities to be noted.

Malayalam does not have the sounds represented by r, l, l, except l in the word klptam (limited). And although A.R. Rajaraja Varma has posited a letter for alveolar nasal, the language does not use it on the alphabet. Instead the dental n is used. Dental n occurs in the initial position of a word and alveolar n elsewhere. So also the voiced stops and a, y, r, l in the initial position of a word take e in pronunciation, but not in writing.

Thus Malayalam has practical use of only 49 letters, 36 consonants, 13 vowels. Malayalam language began using this alphabet from the 13th century onwards.

ALPHABET (Manipuri). Manipuris have a distinct alphabet of their own preserved in the old texts of various kinds and the existence of which had been known to the outside world through Damant's writings. Although Bengali-Assamese alphabet replaced the original Manipuri alphabet for writing modern Manipuri in the year 1925, the study of Manipuri alphabet is still a must for those researchers who want to make an incursion in the field of old Manipuri literature, history, language, genealogy, astrology, numismatics, etc. However, the old Manipuri alphabet is still used by the royal bards and pundits in the palace of Manipur.

There is only one vowel letter in old Manipuri alphabet and the other vowels are written by using different matras with the vowel letter as is done in the Tibetan system of writing, except for the letters u and i in which case the u-matra and i-matra are added to consonant letters W and y respectively.

There were fifteen consonants-six stop sounds (p, t, k, ph, th, kh), three nasals (m, n, ng), three fricatives (c, s, h), one labial (1) and two semi-vowels (w, y) only at the beginning. Then five more sounds (b, d, g, j, & r) had developed. Through the contact with Bengali and Sanskrit four more sounds (bh, dh, gh and jh) had been in active use. Besides, there are ten more consonant letters (chh, n, t, th, d, dh, n, s, sh, ksh) which are in the old Manipuri alphabet purely for writing loan words.

Emergence of the alphabet: Who introduced the old Manipuri alphabet or when it was introduced is not known. The local belief is that it is very old and has been there before the Christian era. But the presence of Anji, the symbol of Tantric divinity, has rendered the belief untenable as the earliest evidence of this symbol is recorded as 405 A.D. in Nowgong Copper plate.

Yumjao (1935) remarked that the old Manipuri alphabet might have been introduced during the reign of Khongtekcha (763—773), but it is not accepted on linguistic ground. The coins of Urakonthauba (568—653) and Ayangba (821—910) in the Mutua Museum, Imphal bear evidence of early existence of old Manipuri alphabet.

The earliest stone inscription at Khoibu (now in Government Museum, Imphal) is believed to be of Urakonthauba's time. But no one can prove the authenticity.

Damant (1877) opined that the old Manipuri alphabet was introduced from Bengal by some wandering Sanyasis during the reign of Charairongba (1697—1709), Cheitharol kumbaba (1967: 24), the royal chronicle, records that Khagemba (1597—1652) caused mass production of books in the year 1616. This shows that the existence of old Manipuri alphabet is much earlier than 1700.

ALPHABET (Punjabi) Punjabi Alphabet is known as Gurmukhi. Since its characters were used for writing and transcribing the biography and hymns of Guru Nanak, it was given this name by the second Sikh Guru, Guru Angad Dev. It is a misnomer to call the Guru as the inventor of its characters, because before the advent of Guru Nanak, their usage had been prevalent according to in a tablet found at Athur in Ludhiana district. Even Guru Nanak himself based one of his poems entitled "patti" on its characters. This Alphabet is also called "Paintis Akhri" because it contains thirty-five letters. The first three characters Ura, Aira and Iri are vowels. Sassa is sibilant, Haha is aspirate. There are twenty-five mutes, which include five Gutturals (kakka, Khakkha, gagga, ghaggha and ngannga, five Palatals : chachcha, chhachchha, jajja, jhajjha and nyanya, five Cerebrals : tainka, thattha, dadda, chaddha and nana, five Dentals : tatta, thattha, dadda, dhaddha and nanna and five Labials : pappa, phappha, babba, bhabbha and mamma. The last five letters are consonants like mutes, but they are also called semi-vowels. They are : yayya, rara, lalla, wawa and rara. The vowels, that is, the first three letters are made to represent ten vowel sounds with the aid of additional signs, which are known as laghan matran. These are the short a inherent in each consonant, aa, i, ee, u, oo, ey, ai, o and au. These 'laghan matran' : are mukta, kanna, siari, biari, uankar, dulainkare, lan, dulaian, hora and kanaura respectively. When used with consonants, these signs represent the three vowels. There are three additional signs, viz., tippi, bindi and adhik. Tippi is a nasal sound and is joined with mukta, siari, uankar and dulainkare. Bindi is also nasal and is joined with kanna, biari, lan, dulaian, hora and kanaura. Adhik is placed between two letters, indicating the reduplication of the second. The sha sound of Sanskrit and Persian are represented by putting a dot under khakkha, gagga, jajja and phappha respectively. Compound letters are avoided in Gurmukhi, with the exception of haha and rara, which are joined with consonants at their foot with the signs.

Gurmukhi script is an evolute from the old Brahmi script like Devanagari and other scripts of the area like Sharda, Takri, Mahajani etc. Gurmukhi characters are even older than Devanagari.

ALPHABET (Sanskrit) The Sanskrit alphabet is fairly phonemic; all the basic sounds of the alphabet have well arranged signs. According to the normal, traditional arrangement first come the simple vowels with their short and long forms to be followed by diphthongs. Then follow the gutturals, palatals, cerebrals (retroflex sounds), dentals and labials, divided into five groups of stop-non-aspirate, aspirate, voiced-non-aspirate, voiced-aspirates and nasal. Then there are four semi-vowels, three sibilants and one aspirate.

Now the Devanagari script is considered as the main alphabet for Sanskrit; but Brahmi, the most ancient script of India (found during Asokan times) served as the national script for long. Brahmi can be considered as the mother of Indian scripts and also the scripts of Nepal, Tibet, Pakistan, Ceylon and Burma—all derived through a process of evolution. The Brahmi developed into Sungan-Brahmi in the 2nd century B.C. and Kusana-Brahmi in the first century. The Gupta script came into being during the 4th and 5th centuries; and the Siddha-matrika script during the 6th and 7th centuries. The earliest manuscript of the Siddham script is found in Japan in the 6th century, and was also called Kutila. The Nagari style of writing came into being from the 7th century onwards—Devanagari in the north and Nandinagari in the Deccan. The Gupta script developed into two forms—eastern giving rise to Bengali and western giving rise to Sarada, Gurumukhi, etc. In South India Brahmi developed into the Pallava script in the 6th century from which arose the Telugu and Kannada scripts, as well as the Grantha and Malayalam scripts. Sanskrit is used in all these scripts in the respective regions, but now Devanagari is the accredited script for Sanskrit. Western Indologists use the Roman script with necessary diacritical marks for Sanskrit. In Nepal Newari was used to write Sanskrit.

ALPHABET (Sindhi) An alphabet is an arrangement of letters representing the sounds used in a particular language. The word owes its origin to the Greek system of writing in which alpha (A) and beta (B) are the first two letters. Significantly in a large number of oriental language including Arabic, Persian, Urdu and Sindhi 'alifs' and 'be' form the beginning of their alphabets.

The reason why this Sanskrit based language came to acquire Perso-Arabic script is not far to seek. Long and continuous spells of Arab, Persian and Afghan rule shook the very foundation of the state and its culture. Apart from the influence that the language of the rulers weilded, a large population of the province embraced Islam. As a result of these changes people started writing in a number of scripts. Muslims and Hindu scholars wrote in Arabic or Persian. The Hindu merchants used Hindu-Sindhi or Vanika characters. The Brahmins, on the other hand, preferred Devanagari script. Later on, under the influence of Sikhs, some religious-minded men and women took to Gurumukhi letters for writing Sindhi. After the conquest of Sindh by the British in 1843, Bartle Frere, who was appointed as Commissioner of Sindh in 1851, desired to give Sindhi writing a definite shape. Consequently, a committee of eight persons, eminent in the field was appointed under the charge of Assistant Commissioner, Ellis. The Committee decided (1853) in favour of the present alphabet consisting of 52 letters.

It may be pointed out that Sindhi in Perso-Arabic characters is written from right to left.

It is interesting to note that in the first half of the present century, attempts were made by some Muslims, especially in poetry, to add one more letter (zh) of Persian character to Sindhi alphabet. Certain Hindus also followed suit. However, the latter did not gain popular support and could not find its way to Sindhi dictionary. When the Sindhi language is written in Devanagari script, it follows almost the same alphabetic pattern as in Hindi.

ALPHABET (Telugu) Though the influence of Sanskrit and Prakrit is obvious on it, Telugu language has its own special alphabet—thirty six (36) in all, divided into the categories: vowels and consonants.

1. Vowels: They are fourteen: a, a, i, i, u, u, e, e, ai, o, o, au, am, ah ('a' followed by a half zero 'c', this is unique and peculiar to Telugu; no other Dravidian language has this).

i. Among these a, i, u, e and o are the basic vowels which have their corresponding long forms and o. From e and o we get ai and au. These are nothing but diphthongs, a combination of 'i' and 'u' with 'a'.

a+ i= ai and a+ u= au. In the modern times these diphthongs have given place to two separate syllables 'a', 'i' and 'a', 'u'.

ii. In usage one vowel becomes another vowel: Vacchina vadu—Vacchinodu; manchivadu—manchodu. We see here o displacing 'va'.

iii. It is not for nothing that Telugu is called the Italian of the East; 'u' comes both at the beginning and at the end of a word. This is a speciality of the Telugu language, namely vowel ending of words (ey) Voor-Vooru; neer-neeru; Vaaral-Varalu.

iv. Nasal sound: The half zero, besides the zero, is a speciality of Telugu. After a long vowel a zero melts and becomes a half zero. (eg) Vandu-Va c du; thonta-tho c ta.

But this half zero has slipped out of the words even where a difference in meaning exists. (eg) Vandu—va c du—Vadu that fellow; vadu=use; wither, wilt.

Vindu–vi c du= vidu=this fellow; Vidu=go away; house; town.

e ndu–e cdu–=year; edu=cry; etc.

2. Consonants: Consonants in Telugu are twenty two: ka, ga, cha, cha, ja, ja, ta, da, na, tha, da, na, pa, ba, ma, ya, ra, la, va, sa, ha, la.

i. ga, ja, da, da, ba frequently displace ka, cha, ta, tha, pa. At times 'ja' and 'ba' are displaced by 'sa' and 'va'.

ii. The sounds cha and ja are dentalised only in Telugu. This is suggested by keeping the mark–',' on the letter. Of course today it has completely vanished in writing, though obsessed in pronunciation. 'Cha' and 'Ja' are affricates in the singular but turn dental in the plural–a peculiarity unique in Telugu language.

(eg) sanchi+lu= Samchulu (plu)
(sing)
Jail+lu–jajulu (plu)
This has an influence even on Sanskrit words.

(eg) vaji+(horse) lu–vajulu (Houses) raji (row)+lu–rajulu (rows)
Raju (King) is the single exception, it appears to have a dental sound in the singular.

iii. Ya, ra, la, va: Among these 'ya' and 'va' have a second form, only heard, not visible. When two words are joined, we get 'ya' necessarily and 'va' at times.

(eg) Hari athadu–hariyathadu raka+pokalu–rakapokalu/rakavokalu. Words ending in ra, da, la get la (at times) in the plural form. (eg). thadu (rope)+thandulu/thallu (ropes), simi-larly niru+lu–mirulu/mullu; palu+lu–pallu (parts).

Of course we have la originally in the word in Telugu (eg) thalam, gubalinchu, aluku, virali.

In the same way ra (different from ra) comes at times in the place of 'da' and 'la' in the plural.

(eg) Chelikadu+lu–chelikaru.
Cheyuvu+lu–cheyuvuru

The two ra's bring difference in meaning.

niru=water niru=ash
aru=dry up aru=six (6)

The 'sa' sound comes both initially and medially in the place of 'cha' (eg) chagu/sagu; athadu chaniye–athadu saniye.

The sound 'ha' often comes in the middle of a word in the place of another letter. (eg) Okati–ohati; Sagamu–Sahamu. It can also come at the end of a word (eg) ika–iha; poga–poha. (our) (half) (now) (smoke) respectively.

In words depicting numerals, when a vowel follows the word (ten) 'padi' we get 'ha' sound.

(eg) padi+yenu–padihenu
padi+aidu–padahaidu+padi aru–padaharu: padi+edu–padihedu

When an adjective is followed by a vowel too, we get 'ha' sound.

(eg) puli+o (gi) ra (mu)–pulihora (lemon rice)/ pulihara.
(sour) (food)

3. Apart from these vowels and consonants (36 in all) in Telugu, we have nineteen more sounds imported from Sanskrit. They are: four vowels, ten consonants: kha, cha, tha, tha, pha, gha, jha, dha, dha, bha; two nasals two sibilants–sa, sha and one 'visarga' ':'.

4. Telugu does not have certain characters to suggest the sound–

i. Certain words in conjunction get a third vowel different from the two. (eg) thati+aku–thataku. But this 'a' is not the normal a, it is ae, somewhere between 'a' and 'e'. Certain original words too have such sounds (eg) meka, chipa (ae). Certain verbs have the same problem. (eg) Vacchadu, thecchadu, poyadu, chesadu (ae).

5. Another peculiarity of the Telugu language is double sounds written one below the other. (mma), (nna), (lka), etc.

Such a variety of sounds and characters lend beauty to Telugu. And especially vowel-ending gives a tilt and charm to the words, making the language deserve the description, the 'Italian of the east'. One last and most unique feature of the language is that it is the only syllable language in India, and perhaps in the world.

ALUR VENKATA RAO (Kannada; b. 1880, d. 1964 is acclaimed as the Karnataka Kula Purohita (High-priest of Karnataka) by the people for his pioneering the Karnataka-unification movement. Born in an orthodox Madhwa Brahmin household, he graduated in Philosophy-Hons. (1903) and in Law (1905) from the Bombay University. An active journalist, he contributed articles to some Kannada weeklies of the time (1907–1911) and during the Non-co-operation movement, he was an officiating editor of some weeklies (1921). He edited Vagbhusana a journal of Karnataka Vidyavardhaka Sangha, Dharwad (1906) and for several years the research journal Prachina Karnataka, a half-yearly of the Karnataka Itihasa Samsodhana Mandala (1914) initiated by him. He ran the famous Jayakarnataka, a monthly, for eight years (1922-1929). These three journals ushered in the dawn of the cultural and literary revival of Karnataka. His books on Karnataka history had a deep impact on the Kannada people. His booklet Vidyaranya Charitre (1907) and Kannadigara Bhrama Nirasana (1915) were the forerunners of his celebrated work Karnataka Gata Vaibhava (1917). His Karnatakada Viraratnagalu (1930), a collection of pen-pictures of the heroes of ancient Karnataka was a literary feat for its powerful Kannada prose style after the heroic language of inscriptions. His Karnatakatwada Sutragalu (Aphorisms of Karnatakatwa-1950) and Karnatakatwada Vikasa (evolution of Karnatakatwa-1957) were written to clarify his concept of Karnatakatawa. Amongst his translated works the Gita-Rahasya (1918), a Kannada rendering of the Marathi classic by Tilak, was an event in the field of Kannada Publications. The five books on the Gita (1934-1938) and the six on the Madhwa philosophy (1946-1960) are his own contributions. While reinterpreting the latter he differs from the traditional stand-point, stating that Madhwa philosophy is Purna Brahmawada and not Dwaitawada. Venkata Rao pioneered several cultural and literary institutions. He was elected the 16th President of All Karnataka Annual Literary Conference in Mysore (1930). On his 60th birthday at Dharwad, his autobiography, Nanna Jivana Smritigalu (Reminiscences of my life, 1941) came out. The work is a virtual history of modern Karnataka. He was honoured on the 8th State Formation Day (1963) in Bangalore, a few months before his death which closed an era in the history of modern Karnataka.

ALVAR' KULASEKHARA (Tamil) was born in Tiruvenchikkulam in 767 A.D. as a prince of Kerala. He was remarkable for his devotion to Vishnu. In course of time he retired, leaving the throne to his son. He came to Srirangam and engaged himself in the construction of same portions of the Ranganatha temple. He was called Kolli Kavalan (The Kind of Kolli), Kolikkon (The Lord of Uraiyur) and Kutal Nayakan (The Lord of Madurai). Though this Alwar has sung about Tiruvenkatam, Tiruvarankam, Tirukkannapuram, Alinakar and Tillaichitrakutam in the Chola country, he has not mentioned any sacred shrine in the Chera country, which belonged to him.

The Alvar has written only one poem namely Perumal Tirumoli consisting of 105 verses in six metres. This poem has been divided into ten decades. Since the Ramayana is his favourite theme, he narrates the story of Rama in three decades. And in the last (tenth) decade of the poem, he gives in a nutshell the story of the Ramayana by mentioning such important episodes which appealed to him very much. It is to be mentioned that the verses on Krishna make for a also delightful reading.

ALVARES JOAQUIM SANTAN (Konkani; b. 1915) is a novelist and journalist. Educated upto intermediate at St. Aloysius College, Mangalore, he proceeded to Bombay to join the Railways where he worked until 1965. He started writing during his college days. Angel (Angela, 1950) a novel depicting the social life of Christian community residing in coastal Karnataka was his first venture. Agnes Mausi (Aunt Agnes, 1952), Abolem (Scarlet Flower, 1954), Ritacem Karbar (Rita's Adventures, 1955) Avilacem Zait (Avelina's Triumph, 1956), Basilacem Sopon (Basil's Dream, 1958), Alsacem Daiz (Alexander's Bequest, 1959), Chedum Tem Chedumch (A Girl is a Girl, 1961) are some of his popular novels. They narrate the lives of ordinary men and women of Mangalore Christian community and highlight the social evils with a view to reforming. Some of his novels in romantic vein include; Kavi Ani Rosemary (The poet and Rosemary, 1965), Bombay Mary (Bombay Mary, 1967), Motlibai Monica (Motlibai The Shrew, 1968), Nouro Zai (Wanted A Bridegroom, 1970), Jose Ani Severin (Jose And Severin, 1970), Hildachi Katha (Hilda's story, 1972), Teech Sodunk Aili (She Came Searching, 1973), Evak Teravi Soirik (Thirteenth Proposal To Eva, 1973). His detective novels are 'Novya Gharantli Khun' (Murder in The New House, 1974), Theresa, Chotrai (Beware Theresa, 1976), 'Hanv Apayant Asam' (I am in Danger, 1976), Lipoilelem Dirvem (The Hidden Treasure, 1976), Ghatant Konaco Hat (Who is Responsible For the Crime, 1976), Tum Falyam Asconai (You Will Not See The Tomorrow, 1976).

ALWARU SWAMI VATTIKOTA (Telugu; b. 1915, d. 1961) was a novelist and freedom fighter of Andhra. Coming of a poor Vaishnava family which has no pretensions whatsoever to distinction, Alwaru Swamy is like his hero Kanthirava 'a man of the masses' (Prajala Manisi). Though he did not have the advantage of formal education, he developed the habit of reading quite early in his life. He turned a new leaf when he arrived in Hyderabad in search of a job and joined as proof reader in the prestigious newspaper of the day Golaconda Patrika, founded and edited by the veteran leader Suravarapu Pratapareddi. Hyderabad was to Alwaru Swamy what London was to George Bernard Shaw. He had ample opportunities to meet and mix with the mighty minds of the day, to read and widen his horizon of knowledge. His marriage with Yasoda Devi, a Vaishnavite girl fostered by a rich Vaisya family, gave him necessary economic freedom and unleashed his creative energy. His native genius flourished and flowered amidst the stresses and strains of the peoples' movement for the liberation of Telangana on the one hand and the National Movement on the other. The stormy sessions of Andhra Mahasabha stirred his spirit. He participated with great éclat in the eighth Conference of Andhra Mahasabha in 1937 and 1938 along with Kaloji and Kodati. Plunging into the Quit India Movement of Mahatama Gandhi, he went to jail. On his release, he threw himself headlong into Andhra Movement in which communists played a leading role and won the hearts of the people. During these days, he came into intimate contact with some dedicated communists and ultimately embraced communism. In 1946, he courted arrest on behalf of the communist party of India and served a term of imprisonment in the jails of Sangareddi, Gulbarga, Warangal and Hyderabad. He resigned from the party after his return from the jail, but on second thoughts he rejoined the party which he served. Whatever his political stance, he stuck to the constructive programme of Mahatama Gandhi. His services to the library movement are memorable. Out of his respect for Desoddharaka Kasinathuni Nageswara Rao, he founded a library named after him and made it the hub of all his activities. Under the banner of Desoddharaka Granthamala, he published some fifty books of immense value. He opened a reference section too in the library for the sake of research scholars. His fame rests mainly on his two novels, Prajala Manisi (1964) and Gangu (1965). His short stories collected under the title Jailulopala (1950) are memorable. Mostly autobiographical, his novels hold a faithful mirror to contemporary reality. In his writings a graphic, account of the horrible life in Telangana under the tyrannous rule of the Nizam is given. The atrocities of the time-serving, bootlicking Desmukhs; the miseries of the helpless bonded slaves, the forced conversions of Harijans to Islam, the spine—chilling conditions of prison life, the heroic fight of rustic men and women for their land, and the gradual growth of political consciousness among the unlettered people resulting in an irresistable mass movement are etched in great detail and sombre colours in his writings. He will be remembered as a great pioneer in the field of political novel in Telugu. A socialist realist, he has drawn typical characters like Rambhupala Rao, Komarayya, Annamma, Prajala Manisi, Venkata Rao, Viswanatham, Sujata, Nagabhusanam and Gargu in his novels. They are also sufficiently individualised. He caught the very rhythm of the people's language as spoken in the region of Telangana. His descriptive and narrative passages too are interspersed with dialectal words of Telangana origin, which lends a peculiar colour to his style. Simple plots, racy and homespun language, life—size characters and faithful description of historical events make his novels documents of social and political life in Telangana during the dark days of the struggle for liberation. Prajala Manisi is a perfect political novel while Gangu is an unfinished saga of the same heroic struggle. Telugu knows no better chronicler of the people's movement in Telangana than Alwaru Swamy.

ALWARS (Tamil) The Alwars, twelve in number, were great minstrel-saints who sang the praise of Lord Narayana in Tamil and launched the Vaishnava Bhakti movement in the first seven centuries of the Christian era in the Tamil land. Before their advent, the people were practitioners of the Karma or Mimamsa school or feebly trying to comprehend the subtle philosophies: at another end of the spectrum were barbarous sects which enjoined human sacrifices and other terrible rites upon their votaries. There were also, in practice, religions like Buddhism and Jainism. The Vaishnavism preached by the Alwars furnished an attractive, practicable method of worshipping a personal God who is the repository of all good qualities, enshrined in the numerous temples in the country: the language of their hymns was Tamil and their musical quality was a major attraction. The Alwars taught people to love and set a wonderful personal example of a selfless, ecstatic devotion which was another major factor which attracted the masses to the movement, despite the fact that few miracles were associated with the lives of these saints.

The hymns of the Alwars unfortunately, did not receive the attention they deserved and on account of the indifference of the people, they were not recited and recorded and they were lost to the world. Nathamuni, the first of the acharyas who came after the Alwars chronologically, accidentally came across a decade of these and was struck by their beauty and devotional content. It is said that he performed penance and as a reward thereof was able to collect all the four thousand hymns sung by the twelve Alwars. He arranged to have them taught to hundreds of devotees who began to recite them at home and in temples and their popularity grew steadily thereafter. Today these hymns are recited on all important occasions in Vishnu temples, lectures are delivered explaining their inner meanings to eager audiences and books are written discussing their import for the devotee and for the academician.

The greatest of the Alwars is Nammalwar who showed distinct signs of special grace even at birth. He stayed all his life under the shade of a tamarind tree in Kurukur and it is said that the Lord in the forms enshrined in the 108 sacred places appeared before him so that he could sing of them. The poetry contained in his four works is marked by a fervant all-pervasive love of God and is wholly sincere and authentic and of a high literary quality.

Tirumangai Mannan who was a warrior earlier, composed six works whose literary quality is of the highest order in this class of works. He was a born poet, at home in all the verbal tricks and could plumb the depth of devotion and sing deeply emotional quatrains. King Kulasekhara and Andal also composed hymns of a very high literary quality. Andal's poetry has the authentic stamp of a privileged lady who rules the Lord's household and His consort.

Perialwar composed simple hymns in which he assumed the role of Krishna's mother and expressed his devotion in the form of a mother's love for her child. In this respect he differs from the four Alwars mentioned above who preferred to assume the role of a beloved of God. Tiruppan Alwar, the Harijan, sang only ten verses but they are of the deepest devotional quality. The hymns of the rest, though high in their devotional content, are not marked by high literary excellence.

AMANAT, AGHA HASAN (Urdu; b. 1815, d. 1859) was born into an Iranian family of Muslim divines which migrated to Lucknow. He received education for twenty years, when suddenly, due to some illness, he lost speech. He visited Iraq on a pilgrimage after which although speech was restored, but some organic defects continued. He had started writing poetry at the age of 15 and had become a pupil of the famous marsiya-writer, Dilbir.

His writings include his Diwan, Khazain-ul-Fasahat (1868), his 117-stanza Wasokht Whatt was later expanded to 307 stanzas was read publicly in 1846, but published in 1859. Another poetic collection Guldasta-i-Amanat was published in 1853. Amanat's magnum opus Inder Sabha pioneered Urdu Drama tradition and inspired the Parsi Theatre a great deal. An amalgam of classical songs, ghazals, dances and literary anecdotes, this great play offered a cultural synthesis of Indian and Iranian traditions and introduced a new area of entertainment and aesthetic delight. Although Amanat as a writer is highly ornate and full of artificiality, his Inder Sabha (Allahabad, 1914) combined various classical and popular folk art forms into an enjoyable spectacle.

AMAR DASS GURU(Punjabi; b. 1479, d. 1547) was born in the village of Basarke near Amritsar. It was at quite an advanced age that he became a Sikh of Guru Angad Dev, the first successor of Guru Nanak, and then succeeded him as Guru. Influenced by the practice of his predecessors, he started composing his own hymns of which 5122 stanzas are found in the Guru Granth. But the style of his hymnology is markedly different from that of Guru Nanak. Guru Amar Dass is less critical of the Hindu tradition and more devotional in the way of bhakti. His poetry partakes more of the style and spirit of folk songs of the country west of Lahore so that some of his lines trail more rythmic units behind than others. His diction also is more markedly Punjabi. Of his longer compositions the most famous is Anand which occupies a special place in Sikh ritual and is recited or sung at the end of every sacrament.

He has condemned many prevalent Hindu customs like idol worship, fasting and the burning of widows on their husbands' funeral pyres. He has used mostly the same imagery as used by Guru Nanak, that is, the imagery of wedded life in singing of man's relation with God, of peasant and petty traders in relation to the moral and social duties of life, and of the commonly noted events in nature, the onset of the rainy season and the advent of spring in framing his emotions.

He lays great stress on the institution of the Guru whose word has, according to him, divine inspiration behind it. The worship of the Guru is looked upon as service for which the devotee is promised all worldly comfort and spiritual wealth.

AMAR JIBAN (Bengali) is the autobiography of the Bengali poet Nabinchandra Sen (1847-1909). Although we find quite a number of autobiographical writings by the Bengali men of letters in the nineteenth century, Nabinchandra is the first among the Bengali poets to write a comprehensive autobiography in prose. The first part was published in February 1908, the only part to get published during the author's lifetime. The subsequent parts—the second part in August 1909, the third part in December 1910, the fourth part in April, 1912 and the fifth and final part in September-October 1913—were all published by his son after the poet's death. Dedicated to the memory of his grandmother, this autobiography is more than two thousand pages long. But despite its length it is quite readable.

It contains several pages of charming description of natural beauty and some vignettes embodying poetic sensibility. But although the autobiography of a poet, in Amar Jiban, unlike in Rabindranath's Jiban-Smriti, the emphasis is more on the activities of the civilian and public man and less on the evolution of the poetic self and on the interpretation of life. As a civilian he worked in the districts of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa. We find vivid descriptions of the writer's personal experience of the social customs and religious practices as he had noticed them in the course of his official duties. We thus get a vivid idea about the nineteenth century officialdom. Many facts regarding the ferment of the larger social life of Bengal find its place in this book. Many famous Bengali men of letters make their appearance in these pages—Iswarchandra Vidyasagar, Krishnadas Pal, Bankimchandra, Rabindranath, Hemchandra Bandyopadhyay, Isanchandra Bandyopadhyay, Chandranath Basu and others. And the author, without inhibition, gives expression to his strong views about many of his contemporaries.

However, despite the myriad variety of its subject matter and its readability Amar Jiban cannot be assigned a superior position among the Bengali autobiographies. It fails to achieve artistic excellence mainly on two counts. An autobiography as a piece of art can succeed when the author knows not only what to include, but also what to exclude. That rigorous artistic conscience apparently was not in operation while the author was engaged in writing Amar Jiban. Moreover, Nabinchandra never misses an opportunity to publicise himself—his personality and his achievements. Readers can only be amused when faced with such unabashed, far from sublime, egotism.

AMAR KATHA (Punjabi) by Gulzar Singh Sandhu is a collection of twenty-one short stories. It bagged him the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1982.

The locales selected for these stories are beyond the boundaries of Punjab, connected with Kashmir, Andaman Island, Kerala, Maharashtra, etc. But the characters mentioned in these stories are mostly Punjabis—a reality of life which demonstrates their adventurous spirit for achieving their economic prosperity and cultural integration. Thus these stories present a widened canvas of life.

Sandhu is not a slave of any ism for his artistic expression. His stress is mainly on the human behaviour of his characters. The title story—Amar Katha—is the best story of this collection. The author lauds the secular and constructive approach of the hero Natha Singh by christening his progressive gesture as an eternal tale. Natha Singh corrects his earlier blunder of keeping mum over the communal killings that abruptly took place in his own village at the time of the partitioning of the country in 1947, by saving the honour of a muslim girl and helping in the butchering of her kidnappers, inspite of the fact that they belonged to Natha Singh's own community.

In some of these stories, children play a prominent role by exhibiting their natural habits and sporting spirit. They are capable of deducing pleasure out of the most critical and trying moments of life.

Generally he selects psychological themes for his stories and also treats these problems psychologically. These relate to rural as well as urban characters engrossed with complexities of modern sensibility.

Subtlety, found in some of these stories, adds to their effectiveness.

All the stories of this collection are not of the same standard. Some of these are very weak with no climax and undeveloped plots. These can hardly be termed as short stories.

AMARAKOSHA (Sanskrit) also called Namalinganushasana by Amarasimha, a Buddhist writer, is the most popular and one of the earliest lexicographies in Sanskrit. It is metrical and mostly arranged synonymously, and also arranged into semantic areas, under three Kandas with an appendix on homonyms, indeclinables and genders. Amarasimha is held by tradition to have been one of the nine gems of Vikramaditya, and is, therefore, not later than the 6th century. There are commentaries by Kshirasvamin (11th century) and Sarvananda (1159) and an important supplement to the kosha is Trikandashesha of Purushottamadeva (1300).

It may be noted that Rogets' English Thesauras was inspired by Amarakosha.

Different editions of the book are:—

Poona Oriental Series (1943), with Kshirasvamin's commentary, with Vyakhyasudha commentary by Bhanuji Dikshita, N.S. Press, Bombay, 1915, with commentary by Sarvananda, Trivandrum, Sanskrit Series.

AMARKANT (Hindi; b. 1925) whose real name is Shriram Verma, as a young lad was deeply influenced by the writings of Saratchandra and by the fervour of the nationalistic independence movement which had gained unprecedented momentum by that time. His membership of the Congress Socialist Party introduced him to the works of authors, like Premchand and Rahul Sankrityayan and the autobiographies of Nehru and Gandhi, and opened up his vision of the Indian Society at large.

Amarkant's fictional characters have a curious presence, which is exclusively Indian. They are members of a society where the economic class is often in conflict with the traditional social class system. This makes the oppressed, often ironically, an oppressor, and vice-versa. Stories like 'Zindagi Aur Jonk' show the human tenacity for survival in the face of extreme squalor, and have a dual ethical structure, beneath their surface simplicity.

Perhaps as a reaction against the sentimentalism of the preceding generation, Amarkant ends his stories on a note of pathos. The mixed tone of mockery and awe, which the author uses, suits this structure. In Sukha Patta, a novel about teenage love, Amarkant deals with the characters with the same mixture of ironical indulgence and pity. Though not overtly political, all these novels and short stories make clear, by inference and subtle hints, the forces that shape lives and ideologies and the destinies of men in our times.

Collected short stories: Desh Ke Log, Maut Ka Nagar.
Novels: Gram Sevika, Kantili Rah Ke Phul, Akash Pakshi, Kale Ujle Din, Parai Dal Ka Panchi, Diwar Aur Angan.

AMARUKA (Sanskrit) is the author of the fascinating love lyric named Amarukashataka (Hundred stanzas by Amaruka). His name is recorded differently in different places. For instance, Amaru (Aufrecht, Z.D.M.G. XXVII. 7), Amaraka (Kshemendra, Kavikanthabharana, II), Amaruka, Amraka, Amara, etc. Ravichandra, the commentator of the eastern or Bengali recension gives the name Amaru while Arjunavarmadeva (Introductory verse of the Commentary— Rasikasanjivani), Rudramadevakumara (Colophon to his commentary) and Vemabhupala (Introductory verse to his Commentary—Shringaradipika) name him Amaruka, which is made out of the former. Vamana quotes from Amarushataka. Anandavardhana praises Amaruka's stray verses. Dhananjaya, the Dasharupakakara (last quarter of the 10th century) cites numerous verses from what he calls the Amarushataka and since then the tradition is uniform among rhetoricians of referring to the poems of Amaru as Amarushataka.

We know nothing about the date or life or personality of king Amaruka, except that he is earlier than the 9th century, since he is quoted by Vamana and Anandavardhana. Tradition says that he was a king of Kashmir. There is a legend connecting him with Shankara.

The story is that Shankara entered into the dead king's body and experienced different aspects of love and later was able to discuss on Kamasutra also. He was definitely a past-master in the art of lively depiction of various emotional states of lovers in bliss and dejection, anger and devotion. The various stages of estrangement and reconciliation depicted by him stand unsurpassed by any poet in Sanskrit literature. The world depicted by him is a world of natural impulses in which there is not the slightest trace of misgivings or morbidity. His style is marked for its chastity, brevity and economy in the use of figures of speech.

AMERIKADALLI GORURU (Kannada), which literally means Gorur in America, is the travelogue by Gorur Ramaswami Iyengar which won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1980. Popularly known as Gorur, he is famous for his stories and sketches from rural life as well as novels, essays, translations and other Gandhian writings. His most characteristic writing is to be found in his sketches from rural life which are noted for their insight, observation and humour. His recent visit to America provided ample opportunities for his inquisitive outlook, his detached observation of men and matters, his friendly disposition and sense of humour and his capacity for vivid portrayal, all of which combined to produce one of the finest travelogues to be written in recent times.

Factual details of places visited or things seen are a necessary part of any travelogue but by themselves they would make dreary reading unless the descriptions are informed by a personal point of view or enlivened by the human touch. Gorur excels in both. He visualises whatever is to be described as a situation and makes himself a part of it so that the factual details get naturally interwoven in the personal narrative. The situation generally is viewed with amused detachment and the account becomes vivid and holds the reader in continuous thrall. Particularly engaging become the episodes describing the embarrassing situations as when in New York the automatic lift landed him in the basement car park where he remained confined until rescued by the accidental arrival of a lady for her vehicle; or when automatically timed oven in the apartment started whistling and not knowing what it meant or how to stop it he rushed out for help to a school in the neighbourhood where his dress and deportment scared the children away. Such things make the narrative vivid, entertaining and intimate and the reader gets into a feeling that he too is travelling in the company of the author.

There is no aspect of modern American life that escapes his observant eye and nothing fails to attract his curiosity even while his essentially Indian background ever remains awake to provoke comparisons and contrasts. The vertical growth of large cities, the comforts and conveniences of transport and travel, the innumerable gadgets, the rat race of living, the work ethic, the civic virtues and sense of self-reliance, the zest for living and attitudes subservient to living and enjoyment, the natural beauties, the parks, lakes and mountains and, more than all these, the men and women themselves with all their strengths and weaknesses, their affluence and their affections and afflictions, all engage Gorur's attention and spread out before the reader the varied panorama of modern American living. His ever friendly disposition drew him to men as much as they were drawn to him. Continual contacts with them and his inquisitiveness about their lives, pleasures and their problems, provided the human grist for his narrative which remains entertaining and informative from beginning to end. The author's interest in men and matters, his personal approach to both and his ever entertaining manner of narration endow it with the literary charm of an individual character's response to the experience of the new world which fascinates him as much as it sets him thinking. One finds in these pages the entire complex of contemporary American living or as much of it as is available to a visitor faithfully and delightfully described. Gorur never fails to entertain and this he does in the present book as well.

AMIQ HANFI (Urdu b. 1928), is a well-known writer, critic and poet of Urdu. Though he started composing poetry in 1952, Amiq Hanfi made his mark as a poet with his controversial long poem, Sindbad (1964), a poem in which he uses the legendry figure of Sindbad in the modern perspective and portrays him wandering in search of a new faith which leads him to Greek and Hindu mythology, thus symbolising the existence of the past in our beings, howsoever, we may desire to be liberated from it.

Born at Mhow Cantt. (M.P.) Abdul Aziz Khan Amiq Hanfi received his primary education at Indore and then studied at Dewas (M.P.) from where he passed his High School (1946) and Intermediate (1948) Examinations. Then, again, he went to Indore for higher education and took his M.A. Degree in Politics (1950) and History (1952). He began his career as a teacher. Later on, in 1956 he got employed as a Hindi script writer at All India Radio, Bhopal. He gradually rose to the position of Station Director, which post he has held since 1977.

Amiq Hanfi started his literary career by writing in Urdu and Hindi simultaneously. His work which first came to be published in book form was a collection of Hindi poems, entitled Sanson Ka Sangit (1955). Apart from Sindbad, Amiq wrote another long poem, Salsala-tul-Jaras (1974), which is a unique experiment of employing Urdu free verse for rendering Nat (a poetic form written to eulogise the Prophet) and expressing the relevance of the Quran and Hadith (the sayings of the Prophet) in the context of the modern complex world. Amiq Hanfi's other works are Sang Payrahan (Poetry)–1958, Shab Gasht (Poetry)–1969, Shajar-i-Sada (Collection of Nazms)–1975 in Urdu and Aine Ka Chorus (Plays)–1979, and Ustad Rajab Ali Khan (Biography)–1982 in Hindi.

AMIR KHUSRAU (Urdu; b. 1253, d. 1325). Abdul Hasan Yamin-ud-Din, better known as 'Amir Khusrau' whose ancestors hailed from Transoxiana, a Central Asian Turkish tribe of Hazara Lachin, was born in 1253 at Patiali, (district Etah) in Uttar Pradesh. His father, Safi-ud-Din Muhammad (Amir Saif-ul-Din Mehmud) came from the Kush city of Turkey and was the chief of his tribe. He was forced to migrate to India due to the onslaughts of Chengez Khan, and held a place of honour in the court of Sultan Muhammad Tughlaq. Khusrau's mother was the daughter of Umad-ud-Malik (Amir

Khusrau was a great Persian poet and a creative writer. He composed verses in an amazing style with new idioms and metaphors. He influenced many generations of writers with his mysticism, romanticism and psychic realism. The pathos in his Ghazals are relevant even today, so are his Masnavis, which for their epic elements and themes, have influenced generations that followed him. A great Indo-Aryan mystic, he was deeply influenced by Khwaja Nizam-ud-Din Aulia and remained attached to him till his death. When Khwaja Nizam-ud-Din Aulia died, Khusrau was away. Learning about what had happened Khusrau almost turned mad and lived thereafter for only six months.

A Sufi of high order, Khusrau is held in esteem throughout Central Asia. Most of his Masnavis have been edited and published by the Academy of Sciences of USSR.

Besides being a celebrated poet, prose writer and a Linguist, Khusrau was a peerless musician and possessed intimate knowledge of the musical traditions of the Indian, the Arab and the Persian systems. He revived the Indian Ragas, was a great vocal singer-superb both at high and low pitches. His Ghazals are still in vogue at the various Dargahs of India. Many of the top most musicians of his time looked to him for instructions. His writings on music alone comprise three volumes.

Khusrau, almost throughout his life, was connected with the various royal courts of India and his life style was always plain and simple. He was a prolific writer and, according to Jami, wrote ninety nine books, the more important of which are : Dewani Tufat-ul-Asgar; Dewani Wast-ul-Hayat, Gaurat-ul-Kamal, Bukia Nohia, Nihayut-ul-Kamal, Qaran-ul-Sadin, Mutla-e-ul-Anwar, Sharin Khusrau, Ain-e-Sikandari, Laila Mujnu, Hashat Bihesht, Taj-ul-Fatih, No Sepaher, Dawal Rani, Afzal-ul-Qawaid, Aizaz-e-Khusraui, Tughlaq Nama, Khazian-ul-Fatuh, Manaqibi Hind and Tarikh-e-Delhi.

His couplets are estimated between four and five lacs in number.

AMIR MINAI (Urdu; b.1829, d.1900), also Amir Ahmad, was a noted Urdu poet and scholar. His father Sheikh Karam Muhammad Minai was a direct decendant of Shah Makhdoom Minai, the renowned Muslim Saint of 15th century. Orphaned at the age of seven, Amir was educated at Farangi Mahal, Lucknow. Beside being a scholar of Urdu and Persian, he had a thorough grounding in Arabic, Sanskrit theology and mediaeval logic. At fourteen, he became a pupil of Aisr Lucknawi and started participating in the Mushairas. He entered the service of Nawab Wajid Ali Shah in 1853. During the 1857 Revolt, the poet, alongwith his family had to proceed to Kakori. By that time, his reputation as a prominent poet had been well established. On an invitation from Nawab Yusuf Ali Khan, he went to the Princely State of Rampur and was appointed as 'Mufti' (magistrate). His association with the Rampur State (1859 to 1887) was the most fruitful period of his life both from the point of view of employment as well as his literary output. After the death of the Nawab, he left Rampur and paid several visits to Bhopal and Patna in search of patronage. Incidentally he could meet Mir Mehbub Ali Khan, the VIth Nizam of Hyderabad, at Banaras in early 1900. The Nizam appreciated his 'Qasida' and invited him to visit Hyderabad, where he was warmly received by a large number of court officials, friends and admirers and stayed with Dagh Dehlavi. His health had been indifferent since 1880, and further deteriorated. He died in October, 1900.

A prolific poet, writing several pieces a day, he is believed to have written more than forty books, many of which have remained unpublished. His manuscripts are mostly preserved in the Reza Library, Rampur (U.P.). Though, he was a mystic by temperament, training and family background, his poetry reveals a sharp awareness and enjoyment of the physical world as well. The main works that depicts his religious fervour and mystical approach are Mahamid-e-Khatimunnabieen (The Virtues of the Last Prophet, 1872), Subh-e-Azal (The Dawn of Eternity, 1872), Sham-e-Abad (The Evening of Eternity, 1872) and Lailaltul Qadr (The Holy Night-describing the Prophet's ascension to God-1876). Even though he kept a firm hand on various genres of poetry, his fame rightly depends upon his ghazals included in Mirat-ul-Ghaib (The Divine Mirror, 1868), Gauhar-e-Itekhab (The Chosen gems, 1896), and Sanam-khana-e-Ishq (The Temple of Love, 1896). His Iyrical poetry proves beyond doubt his mastery over the language and confirms the romantic affection and affirmation of the classical traditions. It is simple appealing and accomplished but some couplets obsessed as they are with sex, often become somewhat pornographic. He was no doubt, a very prominent literary figure during the last forty years of the 19th century. His most ambitious prose work Amri-ul-Lughat (A Urdu Dictionary, Vol.I, 1891, Vol. II, 1893) to which he was committed since 1884, remained unfinished till his death.

AMIYANIMAI CHARIT (Bengali) is a modern biography of Sri Chaitanyadev, the great Vaishnava saint (regarded as an incarnation of God) written in Bengali prose by Sisir Kumar Ghosh. This work consists of six volumes of which the first three were published in 1885-86 and the rest in 1896. Since then these volumes had undergone many editions.

In the preface to these volumes, the writer has written about the source of the work from which it appears that finding no easy appeal in Jnanamarga, the path of knowledge, he had chosen the path of Bhakti, the path of devotion. And he got this devotional inspiration from his second elder brother who himself was a worshipper of Sri Chaitanya. His faith in Vaishnavism was so deep that he started studying Vaishnava literature as well as Vaishnava philosophy with great earnestness. In fact, Sisir Kumar Ghosh had dedictated his life at the altar of Sri Chaitanya who inspired him to write this biography.

Amiyanimai Charit is a life-sketch of Nimai or Sri Chaitanya, which aims at the exposition of Vaishnava faith in the modern age. And to justify this mission, the author, with the help of a well-knit theme, has divided the whole life-story into six stages. All the six volumes deal with the different stages of the life of Sri Chaitanya.

After narrating the historical background of the age of Sri Chaitanya in the introduction, in nineteen chapters of the first volume, the writer depicts the incidents starting from the birth of Nimai upto the redemption of Jagai and Madhai. The second part in twenty-one chapters along with an appendix, deals with Sri Chaitanya's Sannyas and his journey towards Vrindavan. The third part ends with the episode of Sri Chaitanya's life in the Deccan and Nilachal, in eight chapters. The fourth book starts with the follow-up of the former episodes and ends with the departure from his wife Vishnupriya. This volume has ten chapters. In the fifth, the writer covers the incidents relating to Sri Chaitanya's journey towards Vrindavan on the one hand and his return to Navadwip on the other. The sixth part of eighteen chapters, describes the last period of Sri Chaitanya's life at Puri.

Although this book is in prose, a few verses have also been incorporated in it. As for the prose-style of this book, it is written in an elegant style. The author has quoted many passages here and there from the Medieval Vaishnava literature in support of his narration.

Sri Chaitanya, during his age, deeply influenced Bengali literature by his remarkable personality. Even after his death, the entire Vaishnava literature sang the glory of his noble life. It gave birth to a new form of lyric on the one hand and biographies on the other. Above all, as an incarnation of Sri Krishna, Sri Chaitanya gave new impetus to the Vaishnava cult. And this was evident from the biographies written on him. The present work, Amiyanimai Chairt, is also a remarkable example of it. That Vaishnavism has its deep root in life and society, is perhaps evident from the biographies of which Amiyanimaicharit is one of the best.

AMMAN MIR DEHLVI (Urdu) was an eminent Urdu scholar. Although details regarding the dates of his birth and death are not known he belonged to an affluent family of Delhi. His ancestors had provided him well and had also left behind sufficient landed property. An honoured member of the intellectual community of the metropolis, he was leading a fairly carefree and contended life till the pilage of Delhi by Ahmad Shah Abdali and his property was usurped by the forces of Surajmal Jat. Rendered penniless he was forced to leave Delhi to seek fortune elsewhere. He first went to Patna, but finding no suitable opening migrated to Calcutta. Here he got employment as a tutor of Nawab Zada Mir Muhammad Kazim Khan. While he was thus engaged, he was introduced to John Borthwick Gilchrist, the Principal of the Fort William College by Mir Bahadur Ali Husaini. The Fort William College was then hardly a year old (it was established in 1800). This institution was created with the sole object of training the British Civil Servants of the East India Company in the lanugages, laws, history and customs of the people of India. It was a busy centre of literary activity and had several scholars of the Orient on its pay roll. While the College made no original contribution to literature it did produce a number of good translations and adaptations of many an important writings. Since the primary purpose was to impart working knowledge of Urdu and other Indian languages to the employees of the Company, the emphasis was on the preparation of translations and adaptations in simple and straightforward style.

Gilchrist who had enough experience of the Indian scholars took no time to recognise the merits of Mir Amman and entrusted to him almost at once the job of preparing a simple prose translation of the great Persian classic Qissa Chahar Darvesh (Tale of the four mendicants). The book Bagh-o-Bahar which resulted was considered by far the best production of the College. This task was originally assigned to Mir Ata Husain Khan

Tehsin who produced 'Nau Tarz-e-Murassa' which on accounts of its old conventional and rather difficult style was not approved by the authorities. Mir Amman thus had both the original and the translation (of Tehsin) before him and to produced a better work. His style was pure, direct, smooth and interesting. The author of this book, according to Syed Ahmad Khan, enjoyed a status in prose similar to that enjoyed by Mir Taqi 'Mir' in Nazm (poetry).

The book caught the imagination of its British readers and soon became the first amongst the most popular ones produced by the Fort William College. Its historical significance lies in the fact that it enables the contemporary scholar to determine the changes in the grammar and usage the Urdu language has undergone since it was written.

Bagh-o-Bahar contains five stories written in a single framework and is structurally akin to the Arabian Nights and numerous other books similarly conceived and designed. The four darveshes who relate their experiences had once been men of high standing but had to renounce the world on account of misfortune befalling them. Their encounter with the good king, himself a disappointed man, restores to them all that was lost and forgotten including their beloveds. It is its mediaeval optimism that makes the reader believe in the ultimate justice of Providence.

Mir Amman was rewarded not only by the College authorities, but by his own countrymen also. It is, however, noticeable that while he has acknowledged gratitude to Gilchrist in the preface of Bagh-o-Bahar he has made absolutely no reference to the groundwork done by Tehsin.

AMMAN SONGS (Malayalam). 'Ammanayattam' is a game in which a person, a girl or woman as a rule, throws up into the air, one after another, the three light painted wooden balls called ammana fruits, one from one hand and two from the other, and catches them when they come down. The processes are repeated so dexterously that all the balls appear to be bobbing all the time. Sometimes the game is played with a pot full of water placed on the head. The songs sung by the player and often by the onlookers while the game is in progress are called ammana songs. The themes of the stories are taken from the puranas. In certain songs there is end-rhyme while in others the first syllable in a line rhymes with that in the next. Sitaswayamvaram song, supposed to have been composed by Kannasa Rama Panikker, is a typical example of this type of song.

AMPASAYYA (Telugu) is an experimental novel by Navin, opening new vistas in Telugu literature. Navin portrayed the life of a student in a University hostel. He described the events of one day in the life of a student, Ravi in a University hostel in the technique of 'Stream of consciousness'. This technique was successfully introduced in the novels of James Joyce and Virgina Woolf. This technique is not entirely new to Telugu literatue. For Srirangam Srinivasa Rao, Britichi Babu and Racha Konda Viswantatha Sastri had already experimented with this technique in their writings. But there is no novel completely written in this vein. Navin made a successful attempt of the stream of consciousness techinque in Ampasayya.

Navin did his post-graduate course in Economics at the Osmania University, Hyderabad, during 1963-64. He observed the living conditions in the University hostel. He has a knack of observing men and their minds through their behaviour. He believes in social justice. So he described the Univeristy hostel life in a realistic manner and suggested the way to achieve social justice.

The rich, the middle-class and the poor boys coexist in a hostel as the wild and gentle animals live in a zoo.

Ravi, the hero in Ampasayya, has a mother fixation. He thinks about his mother in his distress, sorrow and happiness. He has self-respect. He is a poor boy. But he does not like to beg or borrow from other students. Owing to this self-respect he suffers a lot. He does not like to share his sorrow with other students. He opens his wounds in his dreams.

He comes across various types of students in his hostel life. A homo-sexual boy is one among them. This boy tried to take advantage of Ravi's poverty and exploit him sexually, but fails because of Ravi's resistance.

Ampasayya describes the way of the world through the narrow life of a University hostel. This novel is a unique and interesting experiment in Telugu literature.

AMRIT RAI (Hindi; b. 1921). Amrit Rai's literary personality has many facets as he has been a prolific writer, translator, dramatist and editor with thirty five published works to his credit. He has received the Education Ministry's Government of India Award. Sahitya Akademi's translation Award in 1963, the Soviet Land Nehru Award in 1971 and the Nehru fellowship from August 1977-1979 to work on sociolinguistic research enquiring into the earliest origins of Hindi, and its subsequent division into modern Urdu and modern Hindi. His command over English, Bengali and Urdu apart from his mother tongue Hindi, naturally enriches his expression and his grasp of different shades of meaning.

Like his celebrated father Premchand, Amrit Rai is primarily a novelist and short story writer (though he has received awards for translation and biography). Amrit Rai belongs, by conviction, to the out and out idealist group of Marxist ideology. His work generally seeks to bring out the social and economic tensions as revealed in class struggles and he believes that the very structure of the family and its economic and emotional equations need a drastic change in order to stop exploitation at the very basic roots of social structure. Old phobias and fears along with time-honoured tradition which might actually be regressive are exposed skillfully, as in Sukh-Dukh. Other problems reveal satirically the clash between the modern and old idealism as in the play Chindiyon Ki Jhalar. In Beej his marxist ideology is clearly discernible as he presents it as a panacea for all evils inherent in the socio-economic exploitation-oriented structure and their reflections in the family squabbles and generation gap. Here again his satirical humour scores. An excellent writer of memoirs and of a biography, based on memoirs as well as recorded evidence deserves special mentions. Entitled Kalam Ka Sipahi this authentic and readable biography of his father Premchand won for the author the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1963. An undertone of humour and satire lends credibility to his assertions. The best of his satirical self can be sampled in his essay collection Meri Shreshtha Vyang Rachanayen. The author has a number of translations to his credit including Adividrohi (Spartacus-1957), Hamlet (1963) and Samargatha (1973). His major published works are: Sahitya Mein Sanyukta morcha (1950), Subah Ka Rang (1950), Lal Dharti (1952), Nayee Samiksha (1952), Nagphani Ka Desh (1953), Hathi Ke Dant (1956), Agnishikha (1954), Phansi Ke Takhte Se (1951), Kasbe Ka Ek Din (1953), Gili Mitti (1955), Katghare (1954), Jungle (1969), Sahchintan (1967), Bhatiali (1969), Adhunik Bhavbodh Ki Sangya (1972), Batras (1973) Chaturang (1973) Sarang (1977), Dhuan (1977). Hans (1942-52), Nai Kahaniyan (1967-71), Premchand's hitherto lost and unpublished works-Two volumes of short stroies, one of his early novels, two volumes of letters and a translation of Maeterlinck's play.

AMRITHAM KURISINA RATRI (Telugu) is a collection of Balgangadhara Tilak's poetic prose works. It is his master-piece. In his hands prose-poetry has been shaped and moulded into a powerful form of poetic or literary expression. He has touched the pinnacle of his poetic excellence in the Amritham Kurisina Ratri (That Night when it raised Nectar).

He writes: 'my words are the divine elephants of victory bearing the power of the people; my words are beautiful maidens playing in moon–lit meadows'.

This book contains pieces like 'Na Kavithvam' (my poetry), 'Arti gitam' (Song of Yearning), 'Nidalu' (Shadows), 'Musalivaru' (Old Men), 'Prarthana' (Prayer), 'Nava Kavita' (Modern poetry) and others.

We see the poet's progressive ideas couched in beautiful style. His works like 'C.I.D. Report and Gongali Purugulu' (caterpillars) portraying the miserable life of an average clerk in India, can be cited as examples. His poetic sensitivity blossomed into pieces of beauty. In 'Arti Gitam' he says:

> I have seen a good old man die of hunger under the bunyan tree;
> I have seen a little boy, an orphan without a father or a mother, without a morsel to eat, wiping his streaming eyes with his clenched fists, sleeping by the way-side gutter;
> I have seen the old peon Viranna, who has bought a little rice and cooked gruel and offered the same to his only child and come to attend duty in the office with hunger in his maws, tears in his eyes and fire in his heart.

Thus in his work Amritham Kurisina Ratri Balagangadhara Tilak has achieved a happy blending of modern and romantic poetry.

AMRITANUBHAVA (Marathi). This philosophic treatise is better known as Anubhavamrita, and it is likely that this title Anubhavamrita is taken from Yoga-Vasistha. While Jnaneshvari is considered to be the epitome of Marathi poetic expression, Amritanubhava on the other hand is considered to be the epitome of Marathi philosophic discourse.

A popular legend holds that Jnandeva offered his Jnaneshvari at the feet of Nivritti his elder brother and, Guru, and anxiously awaited his comment. Nivritti, it seems, did not much appreciate this work on the ground that it was merely a commentary on a Sanskrit work and so he advised his disciple to write something original on the lines of Mukundraj's original composition Paramamrita. Amritanubhava was the result of that significant advice. This legendary story may be based on hearsay or an after thought, but the truth remains that Jnaneshvari is after all a commentary on the Gita, while Amritanubhava is original in its conception, design and execution.

While Jnaneshvari like the Gita consists of 18 Adhyayas and about 9,000 Ovi stanzas, Amritanubhava is a much more concise treatise containing 10 short Adhyayas and about 800 Ovi stanzas. The related work, Changdeva Pashasti, as its title denotes, is still more concise, consisting, as it does, of 65 Ovi stanzas only. The Changdeva Pashasti sums up the entire Adwaita philosophy of Vedanta. Jnanadeva himself has asserted in Amritanubhava that he has never transgressed the limit laid down by the 10 Upanishads, suggesting thereby that he is merely being an exponent of the traditional Vedanta and hence has nothing new to add to it.

This modest attitude of Jnanadeva is however challenged and defied by numerous critics, who strive to expound various coflicting theories about the contents of Amritanubhava. So Amritanubhava has turned out to be a controversial thesis, and there are as many interpretations of Amritanubhava as there are interpretative critics.

The reason for the conflicting attitudes of the critics towards Amritanubhava are obvious. What is called Vedanta itself has so many divergent theories about creation and the relationship of the creator with what is created, and each sect is vehement in the expression of its doctorine. Amritanubhava offers a fine opportunity for all these learned Pundits to thrash out each other's credentials.

It is equally true that Amritanubhava differs from Jnaneshvari in many respects. It is said that Jnanadeva, while composing his critique of the Gita was by the very nature of his task guided by fidelity to the Gita-text, and that he had to take into consideration the various implications and interpretations of the Gita offered by the revered Acharyas. Moreover, the Gita was said to be a scripture wholly consistent with the concepts of the Vaishnava philosophy, Lord Krishna being its exponent; while Amritanubhava at the very outset appears to define the Shaiva philosophy in its opening invocation.

The very first and perhaps the most significant Adhyaya of Amritanubhava is entitled Shivashakti Samaveshana. The Gita uses the Sankhya terms Purusha-Prakriti and then, Brahma-Maya. Gita, as is well-known, is not only philosophy; it is ethics also and a guide to the conduct of life; and this ethical aspect of the Gita is emphasized by Lokamanya Tilak in his famous Gita-Rahasya. So the Gita has to deal with human relationships as expressed by the terms Chaturvarna, Karma-Yajna, Punarjanma, Sthitaprajna-Laksana and such other allied topics. Amritanubhava being Sidhanuvada deals with the very essence of philosophic concepts, and its distinction lies in that it attempts the ultimate expression of the supreme realization or Sakshatkar. So the terms used carry with them a certain semantic complexity. The couple Shiva-Shakti in Amritanubhava is unlike the couple Brahma-Maya. Shakti does not represent Maya. The author equates Shiva-Shakti with Devadevi, which is again different from Purusha-Prakriti in the sense that Shiva and Shakti are Samavishta, allied together so absolutely that the two are one.

The Gita lays great stress on Jnana, the knowledge of the self and its utter identification with God. As opposed to this Ajnana, the Ajnana concept is not only the antithesis of Jnana, but is a distinctive and separate entity. Jnana is the condition-precedent of Moksa. Amritanubhava maintains that self-realization is beyond the concept of Ajnana and Jnana for Jnana itself is a kind of Ajnana. Moreover, Jnana breeds Ahamkar, which is the sworn enemy of the things that lead towards self-realization. Amritanubhava lays down with special emphasis the principle of Chitvilasa, which means that the creator and the creation are not two distinct entities, but that the creation is identified with the creator, and hence the creation need not be despised. The creation itself is the expression of the playful mood of Chit, Chaitanya, the life-force.

Thus according to some eminent critics the Gita and hence Jnaneshvari–is the expression of the Vaishnava ideology, while Amritanubhava is the expression of the Shaiva ideology. It is well-known that Nivritti, the elder brother of Jnanadeva was also his preceptor. Nivritti himself was a disciple of Gahininath and as such was visibly influenced by the philosophy of the Nath Panth, which is devoted to Shiva and the Shaiva ideology. Jnanadeva himself has attested to this in so may words, when he says that Amritanubhava is the expression of whatever was narrated by Shiva. Amritanubhava is Shivanuvada first and Sidhanuvada afterwards.

One particular distinction of Amritanubhava is the author's stress on the meaning of some relative terms in Vedanta, which had always confused the seekers of truth. Amritanubhava says that the concept of Sat does mean the absence of A-sat and that the concept of Ananda does not mean the absence of Dukkha. The same is the case with Jnana which is not merely the absence of Ajnana; and moreover the acquision of Jnana is likely to make one boastful of his knowledge and consequently ruin all his chances of salvation. Hence if Avidya khandana is necessary, Jnanakhandana is also equally necessary, if one has to have complete understanding or self-realization. This is the reason why Amritanubhava has devoted so many separate chapters to Jnana Abheda, Sabda Khandan, Ajnana Khandan, Jnana khandan and Satchidananda-padtraya-vivarana. Ultimately Amritanubhava goes on to define the Jivanmuktadasha, a condition of mind, which alone can enjoy the experience of supreme bliss.

The philosophical content of Amritanubhava appears to be at variance with that of Jnaneshvari mainly on two counts: Jnaneshvari is, according to its author, the Bhavartha Dipika (commentary) of Gita, but in his interpretation of the Gita, Jnanadeva has generally followed the outline of his great predecessor Shankara's famous Gita Bhashya. Both these Gita commentaries acknowledge the Vedanta doctrine of Advaita, but the Advaita of Amritanubhava is more exclusive and absolute. Shankara has to resort to Maya to expound the genesis of creation, while Amritanubhava has totally discarded Maya. Shankara explains the Brahma-Maya relationship with the help of the oft-quoted metaphor of sarparajju (The serpent and the rope) or jal-mrigjala (the water and mirage). Such metaphors take for granted at least the existence of two separate entities, while Amritanubhava emphasizes the complete unity and identification of Shiva-Shakti. The doctrine of Advaita cannot be explained with reference to Dvaita, for Advaita is not merely the simple negation of Dvaita. There is not the slightest sensation of Dvaita, where absolute Advaita is concerned. Jnaneshvari has to follow the original Gita, which underlines unity in diversity, while Amritanubhava has no diversity to negate and only Advaita to advocate. Amritanubhava thus seeks to expound the Sambhavi-Vidya of Advayananda, the Bliss of the knowledge of the Unity as imparted by God Shiva.

While discussing Amritanubhava one has to take into account the philosophical approach and attitude expressed in this great thesis, for Amritanubhava is the distilled essence of a certain philosophical doctrine. Jnaneshvari is more poetry than philosophy while Amritanubhava has always remained an esoteric philosophical treatise, which has attracted the thoughful attention of a few scholars interested in philosophy. But at the same time it is equally true that if Jnaneshvari is sought for its poetry, Amritanubhava is sought for its phiolosoply.

AMRITARA SANTANA (Oriya; 1949) is a novel which presents a passionate panorama of tribal existence on an epic scale. The story is subordinate to the description of the tribal life with all its fun, frolic, festivals, dance and drink. It depicts the story of a couple, Diudu and Puyu, for whom the successive marital years bring only increasing unhappiness when Puyu loses her earlier charm and Diudu's enchantment is broken. Diudu is captivated by the beauty of Piuti, a girl of another village and this leads to the final estrangement between Diudu and Puyu. Woven into this main plot are innumerable episodes presenting the tribal life in its elemental innocence. Their innocence is exploited by the landlords, the forest officials and the petty businessmen. In their small universe a hundred gods reign. Numerous beliefs, age-old customs and a strong community spirit nourish their existence. Life is supreme to them and this belief sustains them against heavy odds. Amritara Santana is the saga of the eternal throb of life, which Gopinatha Mahanti so intensely presents by means of a faithful adherence to the tribal vocabulary and a vivid rendering of the scene. The novel won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1957.

AMRITARAYA (Marathi; 17th-18th century) was the most eminent among the medieval Kirtanakaras. He was veritably the doyen of them all. Born in 1698, Amritraya soon became a brilliant versifier and conversationalist. But he also became a wayward youth, passing cynical and blasphemous remarks against the pious and the respectable. Madhwamuni, then an established saintpoet of the Vaishnava cult, was one of the victims of his jibes and shafts. But the patient sage exhorted him to be humble in the name of God and to start employing his indisputable poetic talents in the service of the Almighty! The young poet was deeply impressed by the sincerity and earnestness of Madhwamuni and became his disciple. Then he started his career as an earnest exponent of Vedanta and devotion to Krishna. In his fifties, Amritraya renounced the world and ended his life by immersing himself in the holy waters of a river near Pimpaleshwar.

A writer with inimitable lyrical strain, Amritaraya soon became a very favourite poet of the myriad Kirtanakaras of Maharashtra and was fondly called 'Rayji' by all of them. Scores of the songs he composed on various occasions became hit-songs and are still popular with the middle class Marathi readers. His name will be cherished by the Marathi-speaking people as a pioneer of certain new trends and verse-forms. The most famous of them was the appearance of the 'Katava' compositions. They were essays in rhymed running-on verse, with basic beats of Padakulaka metre, which is akin to the 'chaupai' of the Vraja Bhasha compositions. There are no stanzas as such in the Katava but only long-drawn verse paragraphs called 'Katavas'. There were two variations of this newly introduced form of composition. The origin of this new verse-form is difficult to trace, but it might have been suggested by the traditional long-drawn 'Savais', or 'Savaiyas' as they were called in medieval Vraja prosody. Katavas were also termed 'Kadaka' compositions. 'Katava' is also called 'Katibandha', but it is only a Sanskritization of Marathi, 'Katava'. Another type of verse-form introduced by Amritaraya into Marathi was the Ghazal. The oldest extent Ghazal in Marathi is the one in which Amritaraya emphasizes the existence of the all-pervading spirit of the Creator. This Ghazal was a direct outcome of Amritaraya's deep acquaintance with the Multani dialect. He had travelled widely in the northern part of India and had stayed at Multan, where he picked up this sweet dialect. He was very proud of this achievement. He has actually composed some pieces in this Multani tongue. He also introduced some North Indian forms of poetic composition, like Baramasi and others.

Amritaraya is said to have penned a caricature of his shrewish wife who was a dissatisfied soul, always demanding more and more of worldly things. Perhaps this portrayal of a shrewish and hankering woman was an objective and ironical piece of writing, just 'tour de force', full of catchy, rhymed words and phrases, intended to be a diversionary episode. It must have added a pinch of salt to an otherwise tiring discourse on Kevala Advaita with a song like "Aji Mya Brahma Pahile"–(Oh, I have had today a glimpse of Almighty Brahma, the Ultimate Reality). Whether, in reality that caricature was an expression of his deep resentment that ultimately led him to renounce the world is the moot point.

Two other Prakaranas are recorded as the creations of one Amriteshwara, but he was most probably another (and a later) author bearing the same name.

N.G.J.

AMUKTAMALYADA (Telugu) is a prabandha written by Sri Krishna Devarya, the greatest of the Vijayangara Emperors. It is named after the heroine, Godadevi who is otherwise called Amuktamalyada, which name means a girl who offers to god a garland of flowers first worn by her. Krishna Devaraya narrate in the introduction of the poem, the circumstances in which he wrote this prabandha. While going to conquer the Kalinga country, he stayed for some days at Vijayawada and went to Srikakulam in the Krishna District to worship Andhra Vishnu whose temple was constructed there. God appeared before him in a dream on one Ekadashi night and, describing the poems that he had written in Sanskrit, asked him to write one in Telugu also. He himself suggested that the theme of the poem should be the marriage of Srirangeswara and Godadevi. The emperor told the story of the dream to the scholars and poets who followed him in the morning and they encouraged him to write the poem as suggested by God. He wrote the poem and dedicated it to God Venkataeswara. Some ciritcs are of the opinion that the poem was written by either Allasani Peddana or some other Vaishnava poet in the name of Krishnadevaraya. But this view is not accepted by many who have proved by internal and external evidence that the poem was written by the emperor himself who was a scholarly poet. The poem is also called Vishnuchittiyamu as it narrates the story of Vishnuchitta (Periyalwar in Tamil), the father of the heroine. The verses describing the genealogy of Krishnadevaraya written by Peddana in Manucharitra are reproduced in Amuktamalyada also as it will not be proper on the part of the emperor to describe the greatness of his ancestors himself. The emperor wrote a verse at the end of each Aswasa (canto) saying that he has written that Aswasa and described his conquests in it. This is helpful in knowing the historical details of his various conquests.

The Prabandha contains six cantos but the late Vedam Venkatarayasastri who wrote an exhaustive commentary on it divided it into seven. It beings with the description of Sri Villuputturu where Vishnuchitta worships God Mannaru Swami daily offering garlands of flowers to Him. The second and third cantos deal with the victory of Vishnuchitta over other scholars belonging to different religions. He establishes the supremacy of Vishnu over other gods to his cousin brothers Khandidya and Kesidhwaja, to indicate the greatness of Visistadwaita. The fourth canto describes the story of Yamunacharya, a young scholar, who defeats other scholars as Vishnuchitta did and converts the Pandya king who is a staunch Saivite into a Vaishnavite. The king gives him his youngest sister in marriage along with half the kingdom and advises him to conquer the enemies. He completes the conquest of all the quarters and forgets devotion of Lord Vishnu, having been attracted by wordly pleasures. Sriramamisra reminds him of his previous state and initiates him into Visistadwaita. He realises his faults, becomes a Sannyasi, gives away the kingdom to his son and explains to him the important principles of Rajaniti.

People wish good for the king who heartily desires the good of the people. One should not say "What is the benefit from this". The unanimous desire of the four castes of the people, Brahmins etc. will certainly be granted by the supreme being who dwells in their souls".

In the fifth and sixth cantos, is described the marriage of Godadevi with Srirangeswara, which is the main theme of the poem. Incidentally the stories of Maladasari and Somasarma, a Brahmin who became a brahmarakshas, are also narrated. Vishnuchitta was childless. One day he saw a baby girl in the Tulsi garden and thinking that God was pleased to give her to him took her and gave her to his wife who was overwhelmed with joy. After attaining age, the girl used to wear the garlands prepared by her father for offering to God, see her reflection in the waters of the well and put them again in the basket. The father used to offer them to god without knowing that his daughter had already worn them. God was extremely pleased with those garlands worn by Godadevi who was an incarnation of goddess Laksmi herself. (She was stated to be Bhudevi at some place and Satyabhama at some other place). Along with her were born on the earth Nagakanyas also in the houses of other Vaishnava devotees. While playing with idols they used to sing songs relating to the marriage of Laksmi and Narayana. On hearing them Godavdevi used to remember her previous birth, feel pangs of separation from her lord and censure him saying that he made them suffer from pangs of separation. She experienced all stages of separation and became very much emaciated. Her maiden friends were afraid that she might die and told her father about it. He was too innocent to know the seriousness of the suffering of Viyoga. One day when he went to the temple of God to offer garlands to Him, he explained to Him the state of his daughter and prayed to Him to protect her. God told him that what was required was a kind of penance in the form of Sankirtan bhakti and asked him to take her to Srirangam and everything would be all right. In this connection He told him the story of Maladasari to impress upon him the efficacy of Sankirtana. The Brahmaraksasa, who became a Vaishnava when he touched the feet of Maladasari, narrated to him the autobiography of his previous birth when he lived a sinful life with the name of Somasarma. Vishnuchitta took his daughter to Srirangam as advised by God and when the palanquin was placed before the temple, God Sriranges-wara took her in His arms, and placed false Godadevi in it. Vishnuchitta could not see his daughter in the palanquin after going home and cried out aloud that God deceived him by taking away his daughter. Then God consoled him and asked him to search for her carefully in the house, putting her there without being seen by anybody. Vishunchitta was surprised to find her in the house and was living happily. As God Srirangeswara wanted to marry Godadevi, he sent Brahma, Rudra and their wives to Vishnuchitta as mediators to request him to give his daughter to Him. Vishnuchitta was pleased to see them and told that he would give his daughter to Srirangeswara if he would come to his town and marry her. They went and informed Srirangeswara accordingly. God went to Srivillurutturu along with Brahma and other Gods. The marriage was performed with pomp and Srirangeswara took Godadevi to Sriranga.

Krishnadevaraya took the stories of Godadevi and Yamunacharya from Guruparampara Prabhava, the story of Khaindidya and Kesidhwaja from Vishnupurana, and the story of Maladasari form Varahapurana, made some changes here and there and knit them together into a prabandha. He was a staunch Vaishnavite and his main aim in writing this poem was to establish the supremacy of Vishnu and the greatness of Visistadwaita. He collected such stories as would fulfil his aim and introduced them here and there. The stories which he wrote in the first four cantos have no close connection with the main story except that Vishnuchitta is there in the first three cantos. That is why the prabandha appears to be a small Vishnupurana lacking unity of plot. Moreover, he is fond of descriptions and introduced descriptions of grishma, varsha, sarat and vasanta which occupy 200 verses, Rajaniti which occupies 100 verses and upakhyanas which occupy 200 verses. The main story does not occupy even one third of the poem. Though the descriptions and the upakhyanas are excellent when separately taken, they interrupt the continuity of the story and spoil the unity of the plot.

In spite of the these drawbacks there are many merits in Amuktamalyada that give it a high place in prabandha literature. The viraha of Godadevi described by Krishna Devaraya in it differs greatly from that found in other contemporary prabandhas. It does not display physical passion which is of a low standard but expresses pure and hearty affection mingled with madhurabhakti. It is surprising to note that when poets of the age described lustful sringara, Krishnadevaraya gave expression to chaste and exalted sringara. He has described in his poem four ritus or seasons which are too long for the poem. But they contain all the details and the phenomena of the various seasons and make the readers feel, as if they are experiencing them. They display the emperor's power of observation of nature, which appears to be extraordinary. His description of rajaniti appears to be very natural as it is not taken merely from old Sanskrit books but written from long experience.

Krishnadevaraya displayed great skill in narrating the story of Khandikya and Kesidhwaja, and the story of Maladasari speaks much of the art of story telling of the author. His skill in characterisation and writing dialogues, can be described as excellent. The main rasa in Amuktamalyāda is santa in which bhakti is also included. Though he was an emperor, he could portray the domestic life, the joys and sorrows of the common people and the psychologies of the human beings and various other living being in nature. Amuktamalyada is a mirror of the contemporary life. This is why some critics doubt the authorship because it is not generally possible for great emperors like Krishnadevaraya to go so deeply into the life of the common people.

Amukamalyada displays the acquaintance of the emperor with Vedic literature, upanishads, Brahma Sutras sciences like astrology and astronomy and the various puranas. It seems that he made a thorough study not only of the Prasthana Traya but also of the divya prabandhas in Tamil.

The style of Amuktamlyada is grand and very high sounding. The emperor not only made use of long and complicated Sanskrit compounds but adopted Sanskritic syntax also here and there. A few Tamil and Kannada words are also found in the poem. There are many places where he tried to express complex ideas in small compounds and sentences. That is why his poem is unintelligible even to scholars. Scholars describe his style as narikelapaka.

ANAMIKA (Hindi) is the first collection of poems by the renowned Hindi poet, Suryakant Tripathi 'Nirala'. It was a slim volume comprising forty pages when first published in 1923 in Calcutta. The poems of this volume reveal the budding genius of the poet and indicate the various directions his thought was taking. The philosophy of 'Chhayavad'. in its different facets is clearly reflected in Anamika. 'In Juhi Ki Kali', for example, the poet reveals a complete break from traditional form and content of Hindi poetry. It was written in blank verse and through delicate and sophisticated imagery, it presented a picture of love which was at once earthy and ethereal. The mystic tone of 'Chhayavad' surfaces in 'Tum aur Main', which has overtones of Vedantic philosophy and expresses the relation between Brahma and Maya through a string of exquisite metaphors. The sheer music of words and flow of language carry the profundity of thought and with felicity. The poet's humanistic ideology asserts itself forcefully in 'Adhivas'. Panchavati-Prasanga' is a lyrical drama based on an episode in Rama's life. Rather weak as a drama, this work impresses by its poètic content.

The so-called second edition of Anamika (Allahabad, 1938) was an entirely different work with different poems. The 'Chhayavad' era has reached its fag-end and a quarter century has passed since the first volume of Anamika appeared. The poems of this later volume show greater maturity and depth, wider vision and better command over language. This volume contains 56 poems including six translations–three from Tagore and three from Swami Vivekananda. The poems in Anamika (1938) cover a wide spectrum of ideas and emotions. There are romantic poems depicting divine love and ecstatic visions of beauty ('Preyasi' and 'Rekha'); poems revelling in the beauty of nature ('Vasant Ki Pari Ke Prati', 'Utsaha', and 'Varida-Vandana') as well as poems dealing dispassionately with the hard realities of life and the plight of the oppressed sections of society ('Vah Torati Patthar'). Sometimes this callousness and injustice invokes bitter irony and pungent sarcasm from the poet ('Dan', 'Vana-Bala'). 'Saroj Smriti', 'Hindi Ke Sumanon Ke Prati', 'Jeevan Chira-Kalika-Krandan', 'Anutapa' and 'Sach Hai' are essentially autobiographical in content. While touching on the cruel injustice the poet had to suffer at the hands of the society, these poems do not recede into self-pity. There is a note of calm sadness in 'Saroj Smriti' written in the memory of the poet's daughter. Through this sadness flashes of the indomitable spirit of the poet are closely discernible. 'Ram ki Shakti-Pooja' is also a document of the untiring and indomitable spirit of man. The theme of this 'Khand-Kavya' is taken from an episode in the life of Rama but his defeat, his despair and the courage to fight again find their echo in the poet's own life. Sublime theme and characters, classic imagery and dignified treatment lift this poem to the heights of an epic. The poet's feelings for the glorious past of the Indian culture surface also in the poems like 'Khandahar Ke Prati' and 'Dilli'. In 'Dilli' he traces the history of Delhi from the Mahabharata era to the times of the British as a backdrop for small but illuminating pictures of Indian culture. The mystic-philosophical mood of 'Chhayavad' lingers in poems like 'Preyasi', 'Rekha', 'Pyala', 'Nargis', 'Marana-Drishya' and 'Aparajita'. The poet's humainism finds expression in hailing Vivekananda's mission to serve humanity ('Seva-Prarambha'). Nirala's humanistic attitude is also revealed in 'Vah Torati Patthar'. Without slogan-mongering or principle-peddling, this poem set the scene for progressive writing in Hindi.

The variety of content in Anamika is matched by variety in form and treatment. It contains poems in different metric forms, both rhymed and unrhymed. Nirala has remarkable mastery over the medium. He has a natural feeling for the nuances of words and the knack of always choosing the right word for a given situation. The sounds of words also fascinate him and by the use of a particular sound in a given context he builds up a living picture. 'Ram ki Shakti Pooja' is a supreme example of the power of words and their sound. Nirala's poems are rich in audio-visual imagery and simile, metaphor and personification, alliteration and onomatopoeia are his favourite figures of speech. in general, Nirala's language is soft, Sanskritized and sophisticated in this volume.

Anamika (1938) is a representative poetic volume of Nirala. Various facts of the poet's personality and the different levels of his experience are unfolded in this volume. It was a period of transition from the romantic to the realistic—mainly 'progressive' thought in Hindi literature. This volume, thus, marks the end of an epoch and is a turning point in the career of the poet.

ANAMIKACHI CHINTANIKA (Marathi) was written by P.Y. Deshpande, a novelist of early forties. The first six chapters of this book were written from July, 1953 to May 1954. Then a lull of six years and the last seventh chapter was written between 9.2.61 and 23.3.61.

This 'Anamik' is not the real 'self' of Deshpande, but an imaginary 'self'–though there is a deep resemblance between his meditative personality and the personality of 'Anamik.' It is imagined that 'Anamik' was suffering from serious backache and his spine was under plaster for four years during which he was facing the agonies of death every moment. Basically an athetist and a strong believer in communist doctrines, 'Anamik' though a materialist, started thinking about the inner life. This suffering inspired him to meditate on self and ponder about the significance of life. Gradually he realises that the modern sciences, in spite of their miraculous development and progress are unable to discover the real significance of 'existence'—on the contrary, their new inventions are bringing this existence on the threshold of total destruction. 'Anamik' no more has faith in materialistic world and realises the basic truth of the teachings of 'Sankhya' and Ishavasyopanishad'.

The duality of the soul and the universe can be removed when one experiences life with consciousness, choiceless awareness and passive alertness. This experience is nothing but the experience of time and the timelessness.

'Anamikachi Chintanika' is a book which will help the reader who wishes to know himself through meditation and introspection. Deshpande received the Sahitya Akademi Award on this book in 1962.

ANAND KAUSHALYAYAN, BHADANT (Hindi; b. 1905) was born at Sohna, Distt. Ambala. (Haryana). He became a Buddhist monk and studied Pali intensively in Srilanka. He devoted a great part of his life to the propagation of Hindi. He was associated with Hindi Sahitya Sammelan Allahabad (U.P.) and its offshoot Rashtra Bhasha Prachar Samiti Wardha (Maharashtra) for a long time. He travelled extensively all over India. This gave him a deep insight into the life of the people. In all his writings, his wide experience of travel and profound knowledge of people and places is discernible. Eventually, he took up teaching job in Srilanka for a while.

Two of his famous reminiscential works are Jo Bhool Na Saka (1945) and Rail Ka Tikat. His other works are Hindi translations of the Jatak (Six volumes) and Mahavansha and collection of essays Sach Sang Na Ho, Kahan Kya Dekha, Dharma Ke Nam Par, Tulsi Ke Teen Patra Buddha Vachan, Pachiswan Granth and Bhikshu Ke Patra.

ANAND, MULK RAJ (English, 1905) is a distinguished novelist in English and art critic. He graduated with Honours from Panjab University in 1924 and obtained the Ph.D. degree of London University in 1928. Involvement with the freedom struggle at an early age, exposure to the influence of Marxist dialectics in the 'thirties in England and participation in the anti-fascist movement during the Civil War in Spain in 1936 resulted in Anand's firm commitment to socialism and democracy. Apology for Heroism (1949) is a clear statement of his intellectual and ideological position. Though he had published five books before 1935–Persian Painting (1930), Curries and Other Indian Dishes (1932), The Hindu View of Art (1933), The Golden Breath (1933) and The Lost Child and Other Stories (1933)–it was with Untouchable (1935), his first novel which carried a preface by E.M. Forster, that Anand won world-wide recognition. This novel, translated into many languages and by now acknowledged a classic, broke new ground in Indian fiction by presenting an archetypal tension between individual and society from the point of view of a protagonist drawn from the down-trodden classes. Bakha, the 'Hero' of the novel, is a prototype of the protagonists of several novels which Anand published before 1945–Coolie (1936), Two Leaves and a Bud (1937), The Village (1939), Across the Black Waters (1940) The Sword and the Sickle (1942), and The Big Heart (1945). Not all these novels possess the high artistic integrity of Untouchable, but they reveal a remarkable understanding of social exploitation inherent in the class and caste structure of colonial India and the growing conflict between the forces of tradition and modernity in Indian society. They also present an accurate graph of the struggle of the outcast and the oppressed to find an identity for themselves in a hostile society, from Munoo's in Coolie to Lalu's commitment in The Sword and the Sickle. Anand's novels of the sixties, The Old Women and the Cow (1960), The Road (1961) and Death of a Hero (1963)–are novels of affirmation. The protagonists of these novels, who show an awareness of new directions and are able to achieve a certain degree of fulfilment, illustrate Anand's humanistic faith in man's ability to reconstitute himself. Private life of an Indian Prince (1953) highly rated by some critics, is an unusual work. It choose its background material from recent Indian history and its protagonist is drawn from the privileged class of Indian princes. Seven Summers (1951) is the first part of a projected seven volume autobiographical novel to be called Seven Ages of Man. Morning Face (1969), which won Sahitya Akademi Award in 1972, and Confession of a Lover (1976), are the other two parts published so far. Anand's ambition in writing this novel of epic proportions is to demonstrate, by using his own autobiographical insights, man's capacity to be truly human. Krishan Chunder, the hero, is a fictional image of the author himself. Anand is also an accomplished practioner of the short story and has published eight collections: The Lost Child and Other Stories (1934), The Barber's Trade Union and Other Stories (1944). The Tractor and the Corn Goddess and Other Stories (1947), Reflections on the Golden Bed and Other Stories (1954), The power of Darkness and other Stories (1959), Lajwanti and other Stories (1966), Lament on the Death of a Master of Arts (1968) and Between Tears and Laughter (1973). Anand's stories illustrate a variety of mood, theme and character but they are integral parts of his humanistic vision and spring from the same vital concerns which charaterise the novels. Anand has made valuable contributions to the study of Indian art. He has been the editor of the influential art-journal Marg from its inception in 1946. He was the President of Lalit Kala Akademi from 1966 to 1971 and held the Tagore chair of Art and Literature at Punjab University in 1973-74.

ANANDAMATH (Bengali) is a novel, written by Bankimchandra Chatterjee, published in 1882. It was serialised first in the journal Bangadarshan edited by Sanjibchandra Chatterjee in 1880-82. The book had five editions during the life-time of its author and the last edition was published in 1892.

The story of the book is about a group of young men dedicated to the cause of the liberation of their motherland from the tyranny of the foreign rule. They call themselves Santans (children) of Mother and the Mother is none but the motherland. The Santans are members of a secret organisation. Anandamath (the Abbey of Bliss) is their secret headquarter hidden in the heart of a forest. and Satyananda, a spirited and patriotic Sanyasi is their leader. Although the novel derives some of its background materials from the Sanyasi insurrection of Bengal in 1773, it is not a historical novel. The Sanyasis in the novel are creations of Bankimchandra's imagination. The novel presents a vivid and realistic description of the great famine in Bengal in the late 18th century and analyses the causes and conditions which led to the armed revolt of the Santans against the English as well as the inefficient Muslim government of the day.

Like most of the novels of Bankimchandra, Anandamath too, is exciting to read and full of thrilling incidents and dramatic situations. It is a story of human love and passion interwoven with a story of sacrifice and patriotism. At the end of the novel, Bankim pleads through a character the importance and necessity of British rule in India as an instrument of social change and regeneration. But its theme is intensely patriotic. The famous song 'Vandemataram' is in the novel. The phrase 'Vandemataram' (I salute the mother) became the war-cry of the whole of India in her struggle against a foreign power and the song 'Vandemataram' became the most popular patriotic song in the country and now has been accorded equal status with the national anthem of India.

Because of certain references to the eighteenth century Muslim rule in Bengal and because of certain changes in the text in its subsequent editions, a section of the Muslim community was offended by the tone and spirit of the book and at one time the Muslim community reacted very strongly against this novel. As a literary work this novel cannot be rated very high. It has many loose ends, its characters are flat and flamboyant, situations often unconvincing and unrealistic, and its execution is far from logical. But it is a great work of patriotism, notwithstanding its artistic limitations, and it inspired thousands of people during the Indian freedom movement. It is a peculiar mixture of history and romance on the one hand, and of brilliant realism and obscure idealism on the other. There is a glaring contradiction between the ideals of patriotism and the apology for the British rule in India. Inspite of its inconsistencies and abrupt end the novel has a powerful message and a powerful narration which made it so popular and so inspiring.

Important English Translations of the book are: Anandamath, tr. by Aurobindo and Barindrakumar Ghosh, Basumati Sahitya Mandir, Calcutta 1910; The Abbey of Bliss, tr. by Nareshchandra Sengupta, Calcutta, 1910.

modern Assamese prose by Gunabhiram Barua (1837-94), published in 1880. The Second edition of the book, published in 1915 was reprinted by the Publication Board, Assam in 1971. The biographer who wrote a famous history of Assam entitled Asam Buranji (1884) made the introductory chapter of the biography exhaustive with the historical facts of the time interspersed with the family history of a great man of Assam. Besides historical the biography has some other very important aspects such as linguistic and autobiographical. The prose of the book testifies to the fact that it was born of the old Assamese Vaishnvite and Chromicle prose styles. There are some phrases and idioms in the biography that have the echo of the old styles. The biographer, only eight years junior in age, was a near relation of Anandaram Dhekial Phukan who was his guardian in life and education. So, while writing about the life of Anandaram, Gunabhiram had to write about himself in most cases, and the biography appears to be partly autobiographical. As the writing was done from a close angle of vision, the narrative is extremely factual, very accurate in details and replete with minute observations of the person described. In the history of Assamese literature this biographical work is, therefore, compared with Boswell's Life of Samuel Johnson.

Besides the Introductory chapter there are eight chapters and an addendum. The Introductory chapter may be taken as a page of the socio-political history of Assam made lively with the story-like descriptions of the origin of the family of Anandaram Dhekial Phukan. Through the eight chapters the eventful life of a great Assamese who was born of noble parents–Haliram Dhekial Phukan and Prasuti Devi on the 24th September, 1829 is narrated till he died a premature death on the 16th June, 1859.

The first and foremost characteristic of Anandaram's greatness was his love for his mother tongue Assamese, the traditional Assamese culture and Hinduism, without the least disrespect or hatred for English or Bengali speaking people or for people having other faiths like Islam or Christianity. As a matter of fact, his guides who made him acquire higher education in Calcutta of that time, were two English gentlemen–Messrs Mathei and Jenkins. And without the insistently persuasive efforts of these two Englishmen, it would have been simply impossible for the brilliant Anandaram to go to Calcutta and to have his education in the newly established Hindu College there (1841-1844). He acquired the method and the content of Western education through English and Bengali. But his learning of these two languages, instead of diminishing his love and respect for Assamese ways and culture, made him seriously feel, think and work for their preservation.

Coming back from Calcutta and entering into the service career of law, Anandaram started writing a series of articles in the first Assamese monthly Orunodoy published from Sibsagar (1846).

Anandaram also wrote a book in English, explaining the status of the Assamese language and advocating its learning for the Assamese people. He showed in this book the difference between the two languages–Assamese and Bengali. He also showed how in Assamese there were books of literature, drama, arithmetic, medicine and history. He also wrote a book of law in Assamese entitled Sadar Adalatar Nispati.

It is also stated in the biography that Anandaram used to write letters in Assamese in reply to letters written in English or Bengali. He also put on Assamese costumes–a silken dhoti, a long shirt and a turban even when he attended the law court as the Sub-Assistant Commissioner. He was a god-fearing man and faithful to the social and religious traditions. He was a lover of education. He encouraged students for higher education and wanted that women should also be educated. He taught his wife Mahindri Phukanani at home. He never indulged in corrupt practices like taking bribes. As a superior officer he did not have any vanity. He was the saviour of many orphans including the biographer Gunabhiram himself. Besides these, the biography contains minute details of the daily routine and personal habits of Anandaram.

The biography gives us an idea about the sufferings of the people of the time. As there were no rail, road or steamer communication, the people had to travel on foot or by boat, and Assam was practically cut off from other parts of India. As most of the epidemic diseases were incurable, the mortality rate was very high. Even he died of choleric dysentery while serving in Nowgong under quite pathetic circumstances. In chapter VII the death of Anandaram is described in details. And in the last one (chapter VIII) all the ideal qualities of the great man are beautifully depicted. In the Addendum the biographer writes about the condition of Phukan's family after his death.

ANANDAVARDHANA (Sanskrit), a contemporary of king Avantivarman (855-883) of Kashmir and possibly of Shankaravarman (883-902), was a great literary critic and author, enjoying the coveted title Rajanaka. Although he is most famous for his Dhvanyaloka, a treatise that virtually revolutionised the main stream of Sanskrit literary criticism, several other works are also ascribed to him. Vishamabanalila, a poem in Prakrit and Arjunacharita, an epic, both known from references, in Dhvanyaloka and Devishataka, also known as Devistotra (published in Kavyamala with the commentary by Kaiyata) were among his literary works. His commentary on Dharmottara's Dharmottama or Dharmottari and on Dharmakirti's Pramanavinishchaya and an independent treatise Tattvaloka focussing his attention on the Absolute are some of his other important contributions. He did compose certain other works as several verses from them are available in quotation. It is very strange that Anandavardhana's poetic compositions in Prakrit and Sanskrit fall short of his own model of excellent poetry.

His most important work Dhvanyaloka is variously styled as Sahridayaloka and Kavyaloka. The view that Anandavardhana is just a commentator, i.e. vrittikara on the Karika text named Dhvani probably written by an earlier author (probably by some Sahridaya) does not seem to be correct, since Abhinavagupta himself quotes some Karikas as those of Anandavardhana.

The oldest commentary Chandrika on Dhavanyaloka was written by an unknown writer who was an ancestor of Abhinavagupta. Abhinavagupta's Lochana the celebrated commentary is available in several editions.

ANANDGHAN (Gujarati b. 1604; d. 1674) was an eminent mediaeval poet. His original name was Labhanand. He was a Jain sadhu belonging to Tapagaccha but mostly stayed in Rajasthan and Gujarat. Many myths are prevalent about his life. He died in Medata. Upadhyayashri Yashovijayji has written a 'Shatapadi' in his praise.

Anandghanchovisi is supposed to contain twenty four (chovisi) verses by Anandghan. but actually twenty-two verses by the poet are available, whereas two verses have been added by others. Probably these verses were written during the later years of his life. Instead of going for conventional poetic modes he created outstanding trends through the philosophical content of his verses.

Anandghanbahoteri is a collection of seventy-two verses by Anandghan though different manuscripts show different numbers of verses. The works of Kabir, Surdas, Banarasidas, or Bhaktakavi Anandghan are sometimes shown under Anandghan's name. His spontaneously formed saintly verses match with the verses of Kabir, Narsinh and Mira. Though largely influenced by Gujarati the style and the format of diction adheres to Rajasthani.

He wrote the verses (stavana) at Ghyanavimalsuri (Vikram Sanvat : 1769) and Ghyansar (Vikram Sanvat, 1866). He preferred to be a guide to the knowledge-seeker, rather than remain confined to a particular religious sect. His verses offer a deeply philosophic content in the guise of Jainism.

ANANDIBAI JOSHI YANCHE CHARITRA VA PATRE (Marathi), published in 1889, is the first Marathi biography written by a woman, Kashibai Kanitkar. The subject of the biography is Anandibai Joshi, the first Indian woman to get her M.D. degree from America. Her premature death at the age of 22 shocked the Marathi speaking people: for her name had become a household word on account of her letters from America.

The biography begins on a heavily didactic, moralistic note. The narrative in the third person is cluttered with the biographer's obiter dicta, over-weighed with her moral homilies on subjects like man's cruelty to women, sorrow at the birth of a daughter in Hindu homes, superstitious beliefs of Hindus etc. She is also unduly sentimental and liberally intersperses the narrative with her ejaculations and exclamations. And yet so great is her love of the subject that she succeeds in giving a loving portrait of a tomboyish, healthy girl, who plays truant from schools, gets a severe thrashing from her mother. Her father is poor and she is now 10 and looks even older. She is at last married to Gopalrao Joshi, a postal clerk, who was several years her senior, and who later achieved notoriety for his eccentricity and his trait of practising jokes on the celebrities of the day in order to expose the contradictions in their characters.

Gopalrao, after delaying the wedding ceremony for a long time at last submits and immediately after marriage decides to educate his wife inspite of opposition from relatives. He gets himself transferred to Alibag, Kolhapur, Bombay and even Calcutta to give her better opportunities for education. She attends Mission Schools, putting on boots and stockings and succeeds in getting facility in English speech and writing.

Gopalrao now conceives the idea of going with his wife to America but later decides to send her alone. He corresponds with missionaries and succeeds in his object.

At this stage, the biographer makes a welcome shift in her narrative technique. She stands aloof from the narrative for the most part and lets and story reveal itself through letters written by Anandibai to her husband. This is very refreshing and adds dramatic value and authenticity to the narration since the heroine herself speaks her mind. Through her letters, Anandibai comes out with her accomplishments and virtues. Extremely sensitive, good natured, cultured and keenly observant of the social scene she appears to be astonishingly mature for her 18 years. Every letter displays her love and devotion for her husband, and yet she has occasions to rebuke him, gently but firmly for his frequent bouts of jealousy. Gopalrao, explains the biographer, revelled in ironic taunts and once actually accused her of being unfaithful to him. Her reply shows the agony of her heart and her firm conviction of the justness of her case.

Apart from this personal note, her letters are on diverse topics. She describes the places she visits in America–New Jersy, Boston, Philadelphia, where she reads for her medical degree and later Pennsylvania. She has wide interests and her thirst for knowledge is insatiable. She refers to the American presidential election, has words of praise for American courtsey and consideration for woman. She also notes with delight the passing of Ilbert bill in India. She is indignant at the uncalled for overtures of an Indian student, who intrudes on her privacy. She gives a likeable picture of the household of her hostess Mrs. Carpenter, whom she calls Mavashi (Aunt). She endears herself to young and old alike on accout of her playful, affectionate nature.

As a diversion, she dresses her American friends in Maharashtrian garb and gives them a feast where typically Maharashtrian dishes are served. All this is narrated by Mrs. Carpenter with great appreciation. The biographer devotes a special chapter to Anandibai's religious views. She is a devout though liberal Hindu and finds fault with Pandita Ramabai for her conversion to Christianity. She disagrees with the Christian faith in its insistence that only those who follow Christ would be saved, although she has great reverence for Christ and his teachings.

After successfully completing her medical education at Pennsylvania, Anandibai returns to India and immediately falls dangerously ill and succumbs to T.B. within a few months. The biographer cannot refrain from adding her comments on the cruelty of fate and the helplessness of the individual before it. The biography is followed by specimens of Anandibai's verse which is of poor quality, and some poetic tributes to her by contemporary women.

A.K.B.

ANANDI GOPAL (Marathi) is a biographical novel on the lives of Anandibai Joshi, the first Indian woman to get her M.D. from America and her husband Gopalrao Joshi, a noted eccentric, whose pranks to expose the contradictions of his contemporaries–Reformers, Orthodox people, and Missionaries–made him a celebrity. It was first published in 1968.

Kashibai Kanitkar's biography of Anandibai Joshi is the main source of the novel. The tragic story of Anandibai's heroic efforts to educate herself in medicine first in India and then in America and her premature death when barely 22, touched a sympathetic chord in Mararshtrian society . Her life became symbolic of suffering womanhood. S.J. Joshi's novel is a significant contribution to the newly awakened interest to analyse interaction of society and individual in a given time-frame.

The novel moves on several planes, the personal-psychological, the domestic and the socio-cultural. The biographer could have perhaps concentrated on Anandibai alone for better effect with Gopalrao in the background, though he plays a dominant part in moulding her character and intellect. The novel, however, with interest divided between both the characters is more diffused and loosely knit. Gopalrao usurps all interest, being the stronger character. Anandibai remains a passive sufferer. Interest is centred in the first part of the novel on the tensions in mutual relationship of the couple. These arise from differences in their ages, educational and cultural gaps between them, his sexual aggression after she attains puberty, the fear complex that she develops as a result, strange bouts of cruelty and compassion between them. Like most husbands of the day he is a wife-beater. He conceives the strange idea of giving her English education and later plans to send her to America with the help of American missionaries. Though an ordinary postal clerk, Gopalrao has reserve of secret, inner pride of his, which makes him defy those who are superior to him in economic and social status. Anandibai too achieves this self-confidence in America.

The emphasis of the story that occurs in India is on the personal, domestic, and psychological aspects related to the couple. The strange way in which he, like a ghost, possesses her projecting her suppressed self adds to the charm of the novel. Here it is the husband who plays the dominant role.

During her four years' stay in America, with the Carpenter family, Anandibai becomes the central figure and she blossoms to full maturity. She shows a keen sense of observation, her intellectual interests widen, she shows a capacity for theological analysis particularly when she assails Pandita Ramabai's conversion to Christianity. Again, she is able to analyse objectively, although sympathetically, the strange streaks of Gopalrao's jealousy on her success and her deep sense of anguish at his suspicion of her fidelity. Gopalrao's arrival in America and his disapproval of her liberal ways distress her and her state is appropriately described as that of a person jammed between two cultures–Eastern and Western. However, the novelist appears to be less concerned with socio-cultural aspect of their relationship. The mutual love and regard that arise between Anandibai and the Carpenter family, transcending all barriers of country, creed or colour is the most fascinating part of the novel as it is of the biography. Anandi Gopal is considered as one of the significant biographical novels in Marathi.

ANANGAHARSHA AMATRARAJA (Sanskrit), was a well known playwright, probably identical with Mayuraja (8th century). He was the son of king Narendravardhana and referred to by Damodaragupta as a patron of actresses. The view that Anangaharsha is only a titular name of Harsha, the playwright, is hardly acceptable. His Tapasavatsaraja, in six acts, presents a variation of the theme of Svapnavasavadatta. King Udayana, on learning of Vasavadatta's supposed demise, becomes an ascetic (hence the title), Vasavadatta also, turning incognito, becomes a parivrajika (nun). Padmavati, on seeing Vatsa's portrait sent by the ministers, becomes enamoured of him. Finally, both Vatsa and Vasavadatta, unable to bear the pangs of separation any more, reach Prayaga to commit suicide, but a happy turn of events reunites them. Rumanvan's report of victory completes the usual happy end. The play has many elegant verses portraying pathos, but hardly any dramatic action.

Another drama of his, well known through citations in dramaturgical texts but still unpublished, is the Udattar-aghava.

ANANTHA MURTHY U.R. (Kannada; b.1932) spent his first years in and around his place of birth, a village in the Malanad area of Karnataka. His first contact with city life was when he entered the University of Mysore. After obtaining a First Class M.A. in English Literature, he went to Birmingham for his Doctorate. The subject for his dissertation was the fiction writers of the thirties.

A Bhabha Fellow in Creative Writing between 1972 and 1974 he went to Iowa as a Visiting Professor at the World Writers' Meet. He is now a professor of English at the University of Mysore and edits Rujuvatu, a literary quarterly in Kannada.

His works include four collections of short stories, three novels, two volumes of critical articles, a stage play and a slim volume of poems. He has recently translated 17 poems of W.B. Yeats. One of the fine writers of prose, Anantha Murthy is a distinguished writer of short stories. He uses the medium to explore the relevance of some of the traditional values in the changed context of today. Generally, he employs the method of point and counter-point and creates characters to personify opposing value systems. Some of his stories sag under the weight of his intellectual preoccupations but even his failures are significant because of the purpose and intensity he invests into the writing. He draws heavily from the rich back-ground of his childhood and adoloscence to build his stories. 'Prakriti', 'Kartika' and 'Ghata Shraddha' are among the finest stories in the language.

Of his three novels, Samskara is easily the finest. Made into an award winning film and later translated into English by A.K. Ramanujan, it has for its starting point the problem of cremating Naranappa, a renegade Brahmin. The novel succeeds preeminently in drawing the entire village community into the vortex of the problem and portrays the spiritual struggle of the priestly Praneshacharya. The final resolution in terms of the urgency of life's demands is achieved in a masterly fashion.

The other two novels, Bharatipura and Avasthe, are good but not of the same class as Samskara. At places they are contrived and give the impression of having been written to serve as vehicles for the novelist's thinking.

Anantha Murthy's role as a critic has been of seminal importance in shaping the direction of modern Kannada criticism. He has generated a few original constructs and ably used his vast knowledge of English literature to assess the present literary output. His influence on younger critics has been considerable. Anantha Murthy believes in political action as a means of social change and has actively involved himself in politics. His political thinking is leftist. Anantha Murthy is a writer-intellectual with a genuine concern about the cultural values of our society.

ANANTHAN PILLAI P. (Malayalam; b. 1886, d. 1966) was an educationist and a writer representing the transition of the Malayalam literature from the days of traditional scholarship to the modern age. He had his higher education in Maharaja's Arts College, Trivandrum. There he became the beloved student of the renowned writer A.R. Rajaraja Varma (1863-1918). After working as a school teacher for a short period, he took his M.A. degree in Malayalam from Madras University, joined the Maharaja's College as a tutor and retired as the head of the Malayalam Department of the College.

His biography of his guru A.R. Rajaraja Varma, entitled Kerala Panini (2nd Ed. 1930) is one of the first books of its kind in Malayalam. He wrote a biography of Milton, one of Sir Walter Scott and several other short biographies, which have been collected in two volumes.

FURTHER WORKS: Vichara Vithi (1920)., Matipratima (1930)., Sahridaya (1939)., Sahitya Santanam (1942) and five other collections of essays on various topics.

ANAR DANA (Sindhi) is a collection of 28 popular essays by Naraindas Ratanmal Malkani published in 1942. The essays collected in the book have been selected from the author's books Kashmira Jo Sairu (1926), Gothani Chahira, Gujarat (1929) and Jaili Jivati (1933).

The essays are the result of his pre-partition travels to Kashmir, Gujarat and the interior of Sindh. Some of these narrate his experiences in the prison where he was sent for his participation in political movements. The beauty of Kashmir's snow-clad mountains, tall green trees, running waters and the lush green fields inspired him to write to recapture those moments at leisure (Kashmira Jo Sairu, Mughlan Ja Bagh, Agiyan Anja and Afrut Parbatu). The author's power of observation and eye for beauty are evident from his two essays 'Gujarati Nariyun' and 'Gujarati Garbo.' Maitani Ja Haka Ain Paresiriyuni Jun Javabdariyun teach both the civic sense and gentlemanliness which is found in Europe. Malkani had opportunities to remain in prison but he saw only the bright side of it enough. He compares prison with an 'Ashram' with the difference that prison rules are observed more in letter than in spirit. It is a pity that a convict is punished twice—once by the law and then by the society which considers prison as a stigma on him (Jailu kina Ashram and Rula-i-rula).

The real beauty and importance of the book lies in the essays in which he has depicted the life of the rural Sindhi folks, their pains and pleasures, their poverty and sufferings, their innocence and ignorance, their condition in floods and famines, theft of cattle and forest wood etc., besides their charming and idiomatic language which has its literary value and for which this book is a good addition not only to the genre of essay writing but also to the literature as a whole.

ANARKALI (Urdu; 1922) is by far the best known three-act play of genuine merit in Urdu literature. It does not, as Imtiaz Ali Taj the writer, says in his preface, represent history. His investigation led him to a categorical disbelief of the popular story furnished by the Archaeological Department at the tomb of Anarkali at Lahore to evoke the interest of visitors. The civil station of Lahore, known as Anarkali was named after a favourite slave girl of Mughal emperor, Akbar. From a mirror, the emperor once saw Nadira (Anarkali) responding with coquettish smiles to the amorous glances of his son, Prince Salim. She was ordered to be buried alive for her insolence. Prince Salim was much aggrieved on her death and when he succeeded his father to the throne, he brought up a magnificent tomb over her grave. To the grave, he got fixed a rare marble in a single piece, showing the following Persian couplet he wrote himself:

Ta kiyamat shukr geom kardgate khwesh ra
Aah gar man baz beenam roo-e yare khwesh ra.

I am eternally indebted to my Maker; Yet I wish I could see the face of my love once again.

The author developed his play from the legend of desperate love between a Prince and a slave girl. The play was not acceptable for many years to contemporary theatrical companies which were used to Agha Hashr Kashmiri's high sounding and alliterative devices in rhyming prose and blood curdling melo-drama. It however earned the admiration of many a successive generation of readers. The diction employed in the play is so lucid, self-contained and picturesque that a perceptive reader experiences the story actually happening before him.

The opening scene is spaciously laid at a rendezvous for slave girls, adjacent to the royal harem. One of them, Dilaram, who is at once noticed for her superior airs is also introduced here to make the story grow right from its outset. Foremost till recently, she has been demoted to the second rank amongst the girls, the first having now gone to Anarkali. Dilaram is shown frankly determined to eliminate her rival and one is filled with sympathy and apprehension for the poor girl, Anarkali, even before one sees her on the stage. The opening scene sets the story impressively and the reader marks a sensitive and discreet exposition through slave girls gossiping with long tongues.

The incidents that follow dexterously weave the story of the blinding love of Prince Salim for Anarkali and his fear of the outright disapproval of Akbar. The emperor would rather have the Prince learn to love challenges of his responsibilities as a would-be emperor than pine for slave girls. The adroit Dilaram exploits all opportunities and brings Anarkali to her doom, the Prince fidgeting and fuming helplessly.

The sequence of events towards the ending, that is, after the Festivity Episode, appears managed rather than natural. The long conversation between the Maharani and Salim at the beginning of the last act betrays patchwork of moral rhetoric in the play that had been proceeding almost amorally toward tragedy. In fact, the play manages to live on this final stage not for what is now happening but for what has already happened. In his effort to do the final accounting neatly, Taj has chosen rather to judge the situation that he should have unpretentiously presented, as in the earlier acts. A legend such as this can truly be contained only by itself.

Except for the character of Maharani, the Rajput queen of Akbar, which the playwright draws insipidly probably because he fails to feel the natural verve of the Rajput woman, Taj has conceived and delivered all characters with commendable plausibility. Mahabali (Akbar) is regally firm; Dilaram, elusively intriguing; Anarkali, constant in her love though frightened; Prince Salim naive in spite of his restiveness. Whether or not the story is historically true, these characters do live in the play and provide us with an insight into the times. Anarkali has not gone on the stage much, but it has delighted the readers, if not the spectators, for over 50 years.

'ANCHAL' RAMESHWAR SHUKLA (Hindi; b. 1915). Anchal's first poem 'Us Kshan' (That Moment) appeared in Madhavi in 1932 while he was still studying for his B.A. Before being known as a poet, he had written five short stories but later on, he almost abandoned that area and devoted himself to writing poems and novels. Initially, he was under the spell of 'Chhayavadi' poets like Jaya Shankar Prasad, Sumitranandan Pant, and also drew inspiration from Rabindranath Tagore and Sharat Chandra.

Three phases of Anchal's literary development are quite distinct. The first is the formative phase when he is attracted by the romantics, and tries to absorb their romantic attitudes into his own individualistic experience. This phase is marked by his collections of poems Madhulika (1938) and Aparajita (1939). The second phase is marked by his lucid individualistic treatment of the themes of love. These qualities raised his stature and he was ranked as high as Narendra Sharma and Shivmangal Singh 'Suman'. His inner agony and passion made him sound like a rebel. His collection Kiran Bala (1941) and Karil (1942) represent this phase. In the third phase, he widens his personal experience into the realm of social reality. His later collections Lal Chunar (1944), Varshant ke Badal (1955), Viram Chihn (1957) and Pratyush ki Bhatki Kiran Yayavari (1964) and others signify this trend. His other major works include: Tare (1937), Yah Veh Bahutere (1941) (Collections of short stories.); Charhti Dhoop (1945), Nayi Imarat (1946), Ulka (1947) (Novel), and Maru Pradeep (1951) (Novel).

ANCHALIKATA (Hindi) may be represented by the word 'regionality' in the absence of a better equivalent. For it is different in nuance from the word 'local colour and regionalism'. In the novels of Premchand, Vrindavanlal Verma and Nagarjun we also find the regions like Benaras, Bundelekhand or Mithila serving as a backdrop for the events and episodes that are interwoven into the plot. In the 'Anchalik' novel or short story, however, the author through his close and intimate observation of the soil, the people, their way of living, culture and problems gives a vivid and graphic picture of vegetation, folklore and folk-arts of a backward tribal community little known to the world outside. There is no hero in the traditional sense, the region or the community itself emerges as the focus.

The word 'anchalika' acquired a literary technical term status in Hindi after the publication of Phanishwar Nath Renu's celebrated novel Maila Anchal in 1954 in whose preface he termed it as 'anchalika'. Though Nagarjun had already written Balachanama and Varun Ke Bete focussing on the problems and culture of the people of Mithila region and they had all the characteristics of an Anchalik novel, yet the word came into vogue only after the publication of Renu's magnum opus. Among the Anchalik fiction-writers of Hindi the first to be reckoned with is Nagarjun. In his works, he tells the woeful tale of the poor, penury-stricken, exploited and the uneducated backward people of Darbhanga and Purnea regions of Bihar. Balachanama is the son of the soil and the author by his graphic descriptions of the fields, the ponds and their cultural activities dances, songs, tales, their dresses, customs, orthodox beliefs and superstitions gives a vivid close-up of the life of the region. Varun Ke Bete presents the life of the fisherman of Malahi-Gondhiari region in the midst of their varied and complicated social, economic and political problems.

Devendra Satyarthi in his two novels, Brahmanputra and Rath Ke Pahiye gives a vivid sketch of the miserable life of the people living on the banks of the river Brahmaputra in dense forests and that of the Gond Community living in the Karanjia region of Madhya Pradesh. By giving graphic pictures of the 'Karma' dance and 'Lamaseni' he has elaborately acquainted us with their cultural life.

Renu is, by far, the most celebrated among the Anchalik novelists. His two novels Maila Anchal and Parati Parikatha attract the reader not only by the social, economic and political problems that have gripped the region of Marriganj and Purnea in Bihar after independence but more so by the graphic descriptions of the soil, changing seasons along with the changes that occur in the routine-life and cultural activities of the people, their superstitions and their religious beliefs. 'Vidapad' dance, the drama of Jat-Tattin, the folk-tale of Saranga-sadabrija, the burlesque enacted at the festival of Holi, the songs sung by the farmers at the time of sowing and the reaping and the songs sung by the village-belles at the swing, on the occasion of the festival of colour or of wedding ceremony add to the charm of his works. He has used the dialect of the people and this has not only deepened the regional colour but has also opened up potential avenue for enrichment of Hindi.

Kaka and Kab Tak Pukarun by Rangeya Raghava are two other important works in this field. In the former the author has bitterly criticised the corruption, immoral activities and the sham prevalent among the religious heads presiding over holy places: the latter deals with the social and cultural life of a dancing tribe called 'Karanat' who earn their living not only by such risky acrobatics as dancing on the rope but also through sexual links of their wives and sisters with the rich and well-to-do people.

Ramdarash Misra has chosen the backward region of Gorakhpur for his novels. In his works, Pani Ke Prachir, and Jal Tutata Hua, Misra has picturised the woes of the people in the wake of floods and famines. Shailesh Matiyani's Hauldar presents the cultural life-style of the hilly people inhabiting the Kumayun region. The local dialect, folk-songs and the geography of the region have given a colour to the novel which differentiates it from other novels. Rajendra Awasthi's Jungle Ke Phul paints an authentic picture of the 'ghotul' system practised in Bastar in Madhya Pradesh by the young girls and boys through which they choose their life-partners.

Udayshankar Bhatt's Shesh Ashesh too is an 'Anchalik' novel because it deals with the life of a community- the so-called Sadhus living at places of pilgrimage. The author has not only observed their life closely but has peeped into their hearts and minds too and has successfully analysed their aspirations and disappointments, their weaknesses and their cravings for worldly charms.

A few works like Sagar Lahren aur Manushya by Uday Shankar Bhatt, and Bund aur Samudra by Amrit lal Nagar have been described as 'Anchalik' novels by some, but they are not Anchalik because the canvas, the scope and the problems discussed and analysed therein pertain to a wider segment of society and are not limited in their scope to a particular region or community.

The short-story writers, too, have written stories about the life and people of the region which they have observed at close quarters. The locale of their stories is the village or region where they were born and spent their childhood. If Renu, in his 'Thumari', has selected the waste land of Bihar for his stories, Madhukar Gangadhar in his 'Tin Terah Range' has drawn the vigorous black and white pictures of the people living there. If Shani and Rajendra Awasthi have focussed their attention on the trible people of Bastar, Shailesh Matiyani and Panu Kholiya have painted the hilly regions in their stories. If Markandeya and Shivaprasad Singh have chosen eastern Uttar Pradesh for the locale of their stories, Ramesh is drawn towards the culture and simpie life of the people residing in the backward regions of Malva. The main subjects of their stories are the life of the poor, ignorant but innocent and simple rural-folk, their attitudes of life, their way of thinking and their emotions born of superstition and orthodox beliefs, conflict between the new and old generations, impact of the import of urban values on rural people etc. The story-writers too give vivid pictures of the regional environment and cultural life of the people in their stories.

ANCIENT BALLADS AND LEGENDS OF HINDUSTAN (English) is a collection of the poems of Toru Dutt (b. 1856 d.1877). In 1878, having read Toru's papers, her father Govind Chunder issued an edition of A Sheaf Gleaned in French Fields which contained about 200 pieces of writing on about 80 French poets, and included 30 pieces from Victor Hugo. Govind Chunder, himself a keen litterateur, who had already published The Dutt Family Album (1870) in London, and read and researched Toru's pieces in Sanskrit, issued Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan. The collection published by Kegan Paul & Co. London, in 1882, carries an introductory memoir by Sir Edmund Gosse. The collection was subsequently published by Kitabistan, Allahabad in 1961 with an introductory note by Amarnath Jha. The other works of Toru Dutt include an unfinished novel Le Journal de Mademoiselle D'Arvers. Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan has a title that speaks for itself. It is in English verse, sometimes exquisite and at other times spoilt by the infringement of the rules of prosody.

Ancient Ballads and Legends of Hindustan shows that Toru is essentially a Hindu, although her family was converted to Christianity when she was six years old. She was greatly influenced by Milton's Paradise Lost, and the Indian epics–the Ramayana and the Mahabharata—live in her consciousness. Her reading of Milton is demonstrated in her poetry which abounds in fine phrases and sonority. Her ballads and legends are woven around Savitri, Lakshmana, Dhruva, Prahlada and other mythological characters. Each of these ballads, built around these characters, has a moral to convey. The heroine of the poem, "Savitri", is Savitri, a woman who by her steadfastness, was able to win back her dead husband from the God of the Nether World. The story reminds us of the rescue of Persephone from Hades by Hermes. Very cleverly and artistically, Toru brings out the moral implied in the stories taken from mythologies. She has a fine feeling for nature, and possesses in an exceptional degree the distinguishing sensibility of a poet. This seems to have come to her very early in life. She spent most of her childhood in Calcutta in her father's garden house. In 'Our Casuarina Tree' she refers to the scene of her earliest memories, the encircling wilderness of foliage, the shining tank with the round leaves of the lilies, the murmuring dusk and the vast branches of the central casuarina tree. The poem is more than a highly poetic description of a tree; it is an attempt to recapture the past and immortalise the moments of time so recaptured. The tree is both a tree and a symbol. "Lotus" is one of the finest sonnets in the section "Miscellaneous Poems". It contains an interesting piece of fancy and reveals the poet as a master of the sonnet form.

Toru's range is wide in her retelling of the story of 'Jogadhya Uma' in which she tells how a goddess appeared to a seller of shell-bracelets. It is a moving poem of devotion, and the concluding lines show the poet's determination to make poetry out of what is enduring and lively.

Absurd may be the tale I tell,
Ill suited to the marching times,
I loved the lips from which it fell,
So let it stand among my rhymes.

This is a charming ballad. Toru Dutt is indeed one of the "inheritors of unfulfilled renown". She, as also her sister, Aru, played a considerable part in the Bengali Renaissance and they gave a characteristic start to Indian creative writing in English.

ANDAL (Tamil) was a minstrel-saint of Tamil Nadu, the only lady among the twelve Alwars, the minstrel-saints who sang hymns in Tamil on Lord Narayana, the hymns numbering roughly four thousand and collectively called the Divya Prabandha. She probably flourished in the 5th or the 6th century A.D.

Andal was a foundling; she was found in a tulasi bush by Perialwar, a major minstrel-saint who, being childless, was delighted at this and brought up the child as his own. The home environs for the growing child were all in favour of deep piety: Andal developed a deep love for the Lord to whom she longed to get married. When her foster-parents were heard discussing their plans to get her married to a suitable boy, she became deeply troubled.

It was Perialwar's custom to collect flowers from his garden everyday, wreathe them into garlands and decorate the icon of the Lord in the local temple with them. Every day after the garlands had been wreathed, when Perialwar was busy attending to his duties in the house, Andal would wear them herself and study her image in the mirror anxiously, ever in doubt if her person would be pleasing to Him.

One day Perialwar happened to notice this and was horrified at the sacrilege. He wreathed fresh garlands and put them on the icon: the Lord was clearly discontented at this offering of fresh garlands as He had come to enjoy what had been worn by Andal. He communicated His feelings to the father who was astounded as much as enraptured at what he heard. Then, in obedience to His directions, Andal was taken to Srirangam where she climbed up the coils of Adisesha and became united with Him, with the Lord.

During her very short life Andal composed two poetical works. In one, the Tiruppavai consisting of 30 stanzas, she imagines herself to be one of the cowherdesses of Nandagokula and describes the way they observed the 'pavai vrata', their objective being to marry Lord Krishna. The work has justifiably become one of the most popular hymns in all devotional literature: there are many commentaries on it and during the Tamil month of Margazhi lectures on this work are arranged in every city of Tamil Nadu, one stanza being taken up for exposition everyday. Just as its devotional value is very high so is its literary value: the daily life of the cowherds is portrayed in the most vivid colours through very evocative diction.

Andal's other work is called Nachiar Tirumozhi and is larger, consisting of 143 stanzas. Here she sings not as a cowherdess but in her own capacity, though the cowherd element is seldom absent from her poems. Andal sings of the love she bears to the Lord who is not, according to her, very responsive, making her pine away, lose weight, get emaciated and display every one of the signs of a virahini (a girl in separation from her lover) listed in classical literature. In these poems, she shows herself as the privileged bride of the Lord, not with the humility of a servant of God which is the role assumed by many minstrels but with the assertive confidence of the lady of the Lord's house. It is great poetry, as it is exalted prayer, throbbing with the imperious love of God that cannot be ignored or denied.

A.V.S

ANDAYYA (Kannada; 12th-13th century) occupies a unique place in Kannada literature on account of his work Kabbigara Kava. He is a Jain by birth and his grand-father too was called Andayya, who was an accountant by profession. While paying his tributes to earlier Kannada poets, he refers to the well-known Kannada poet Janna who happens to be the latest, and whose date is 1230. Hence, the scholars are of the opinion that Andayya must have lived later than 1230. There are certain indications in the work that the poet seems to have made an attempt to identify his hero Kama (Cupid) with the Kadamba king Kamadeva (1130-1217) who was his contemporary. On the basis of this evidence, it is supposed that the date of this work is 1217.

The work Kabbigara Kava is important from several points of view. In the first instance, it is a 'Champu' work containing 272 poems with prose passages interpersed here and there. It is not divided into chapters. It deals with the victory of Kama (Cupid) over the God Iswara. It is well-known that Iswara became furious when Kama tried to disturb his penance and subsequently Kama was burnt to ashes. Andayya's narration is unlike the usual story. Here, Kama himself wages war against Iswara because he had stolen the moon which is a part of Kama's army. Kama came to know about this through Vasanta (Spring). When Kama went to the Himalayas to get the moon freed from the clutches of Iswara, he found him engaged in a great penance. Subsequently, there was a fierce battle between Kama and Iswara and ultimately Kama was triumphant. He regained the moon. Iswara not only lost the battle but he became Ardhanariswara. Kama too had to pay the penalty in a different way. He incurred the curse of Iswara and thereby he was separated from his beloved wife Rati. The cursed Kama was born as a human being known as Naneyamba in Poovina Polalu. After he underwent this separation for a long time Kama came across an apsara (Damsel of heaven) and he was reminded of his previous birth and its glory. The damsel narrated the whole story most graphically and when Kama was overpowered by grief, she consoled him that his curse was over and that he would regain the past glory and grandeur. Accordingly, Kama was welcomed by his own people and he was happy.

Andayya's preference for this unusual theme is interpreted in several ways. It is argued that the Jains give an important place to Manmatha in their works. Andayya too might have thought of proclaiming the supremacy of Kama (Cupid) over Iswara. Some of the veteran scholars of Kannada are of the opinion that Andayya is bent upon immortalising the victory of Kamdeva of Banavasi over the Hoysal king Veera Ballala who had captured Hanugala. The historical events coincide exactly with the episodes described in the work. It is not yet known whether Andayya had received any patronage from Kamadeva. But this practice of equating a historical event with a mythological story is not new to Kannada. Pampa and Ranna had already set an example. The only difference between those classical poets and Andayya is that in the earlier poets this fact is explicit whereas in Andayya, it is implicit. Although the work is familiarly known as Kabbigara Kava, there is an alternative name as Kavana gella in the colophon. Here again the name of Kama is upheld. Therefore, one can find some truth in associating the whole theme with the historical events.

As a work, Kabbigara Kava has an individuality. The poet has written the whole work in chaste Kannada, comprising the native words and the derived form of Sanskrit words known as "tadbhavas" He took this as a challenge to those who advocated that it is impossible to write a work in Kannada without the use of Sanskrit words. Andayya has succeeded in his goal.

This may also be considered as a reflection of the spirit of the age since there was already a move among the poets like Nayasenas not to burden the Kannada language with unnecessary Sanskrit words. Nayasena himself has written his Champu work Dharmamruta with such Sanskrit words which fit in with the idiomatic Kannada. Andayya's attempt is thus a great achievement and he has even gone a step further in avoiding Sanskrit words entirely.

Lastly, the scholars have expressed different opinions about the exact title of the work since it is called either Kabbigara Kava or Kavana gella. As Andayya has disproved the idea of the scholars of his time that Sanskrit is inevitable, the work may be a defence of poets against such statements. In other words, Andayya may be considered as a protector of Kannada poets who were ridiculed by the advocates of Sanskrit. Considering the theme of the work as well as its historical implication, Kavana gella seems to be most appropriate and a meaningful title. When one goes through the whole work, the poet's capacity to describe the different facts of Nature is commendable. The dialogues between Kama and Iswara and other characters are lively. The narration is impressive and it keeps the reader in suspense throughout. The poet's capacity to select the native words as well as to coin new words if need be, is astonishing. In a word, Kabbigara Kava is a good piece of art although it cannot be classified as a masterpiece in the realm of Kannada classics.

ANDHA MAHUMACHHI (Oriya) is the fourth collection of poems of Saubhagya Misra who is an influential poet in contemporary Orissa. The collection contains forty four poems.

The poems in the Andha Mahumachhi (Blind Bee) show the full flowering of the poet's mature mind and critical sensibility. The central theme of Saubhagya's poems is love and death. He deals with these themes in all their varieties and complexities. His expression is so powerful that it makes us see these so called common experiences in a new light with a new depth.

The striking feature of his poems is their economy of expression. This economy raises his poetry to the level of incantation where meaning is completely inseparable from its form. In this collection are the poems of a sensible man who seeks truth passionately, preoccupied with the images presented to him by life. 'The Blind Bee' is a living symbol of this attitude. Besides it is the symbol of the poet's hunger for the quintessence of life. The collection is not without speculation of his metaphysical mind, where emotion and thought are fused in a unique manner. The poet very skilfully suggests this delicate amalgam of intimate feelings. He never describes them. 'Sukadei Kanda' (The Weeping of Sukadei) is an example of this type of narration whose directness of expression helps the oblique suggestiveness.

Clear syntax, common language and a natural movement do away with the obscurity other than that which may come from the complexity of images and symbols or from the intense passion attached to it A tender musical sense prevents the naturalness from becoming loose and above all a delicate sensuous apprehension of beauty prevents discipline from becoming austerity.

The poems are examples of achievement of a poetic form where experience and expression are one.

ANDHA YUG (Hindi) is a poetic drama by Dharma Vira 'Bharati'. It was composed and published in 1954. No verse play preceding the Andha Yug, could claim both to be 'good theatre' and 'good poetry'. The popular war-story of the Mahabharata provided the play-wright with ample opportunity for tense dramatic action and condensed poetic images, which could symbolically express contemporary scepticism pertaining to the threat of nuclear warfare.

The story of the most disatrous war of the ancient times between the Kauravas and the Pandavas, leading to the annihilation of the former and to the moral destitution of the latter, has been divided into five acts alongwith a prologue, a curtain-raiser and an epilogue. The playwright has introduced obliquely the horrifying results of the war in the prologue. The first act presents the gloomy atmosphere in the city of the Kauravas, waiting impatiently for the outcome of war. Sanjaya, the messenger, is caught up in a jungle of utter confusion at the beginning of the second act. He escapes the brutal clutches of Aswatthama, blinded by the intense passion of revenge after the treacherous murder of his father. Aswatthama strangles the astrologer,who wrongly prophesied the victory of Duryodhana. The third act depicts the alienation of Yuyutsu from his own brother and the discovery of a plan by Aswatthama, who was appointed the commander in place of his father, for the destruction of the rejoicing enemy.

The ghost of the astrologer, after presenting dehumanized Yuyutsu, Sanjaya and Vidura in the curtain-raiser, informs the audience of the impending struggle between the devilish force of Aswatthama and the divine power of Krishna. Aswatthama succeeds in the slaughter some of the sleeping Pandavas in their own camp, according to fourth act, but Krishna revives to life the progeny of Uttara, who was murdered by Aswatthama's powerful missile. The disappointed Gandhari curses Lord Krishna that his divine person would perish like an animal and his entire clan would be destroyed. The fifth act begins with the scene of suicide by tormented Yuyutsu. Infected by this suicidal tendency, Gandhari and Dhritarashtra are consumed in a jungle-fire. After the news of Krishna's imminent exit, bad omens are sensed by the citizens. Anguished Yuddhishthira expresses a desire for the renunciation of the world. Death of Lord Krishna and subsequent conversion of Ashwatthama are depicted in the epilogue. Vyadha, a new name for the ghost of the astrologer whose arrow causes the death of Lord Krishna, reproduces his dying declaration:

But all others
Shall share my responsibility....
My responsibility, rooted firm,
In the centre of every human heart,
Will help them
In transcending all situations
And in reconstructing the devastated world.
In regulated acts, in new creations,
In moments of fearlessness, adventure,
love and pleasure
And I shall re-live actively time and again.

Numerous productions of this verse play during the last decades by professionals as well as amateurs are a proof of its excellence in dramatic technique and poetic quality.

ANDHER NAGARI (Hindi) A one-act-play divided into six scenes by Bharatendu Harishchandra is a farce.

The first is an outdoor scene, probably a street-scene where a 'Mahant' (a religious head) makes an entry with his two disciples. The Mahant briefs his two disciples to go to the township ahead and collect alms so that they could have their meal. He warns them not to be too greedy for they may, in that case, come to grief.

The second scene is a market place where every vendor is blatantly advertising his wares. They present a cross section of society ranging from a Kababwala (meat-vendor) to a Brahmin. The vendor's dialogues are in the form of rhymed verse with a biting sarcasm on the contemporary society. One of the disciples arrives at the market place and finds to his bewilderment that everything, ranging from vegetables to sweets, is sold at the same rate.

In the third scene, the disciple returns with a lot of sweets and informs his mentor that this was the ideal place to live in on the earth. The Mahant cautions him saying that one should not stay long in a place where there was no discrimination between good and bad. But the disciple is adamant. The Mahant blesses him and leaves with the other disciple.

The fourth scene presents the whimsical king who is always under the influence of opium and rules, not according to any logic or law, but by whims and fancies. When a commoner complains that his goat had been killed by the collapse of a neighbour's wall, the king wants to hang the wall. He is led on, one by one, to the mason, the waterman, etc. and ultimately, in his curious logic, he decides to hang the Kotwal.

While the disciple of the Mahant is happy about the state of affairs, he is suddenly arrested by the constables who have to find some fat man for hanging as the Kotwal proved too thin and the noose did not fit into his thin neck. The disciple remembers his mentor's warning but is forcibly dragged away.

The last scene is the burning ghat and the disciple is brought for execution. He prays and the Mahant arrives with his other disciple. When the situation is explained, the Mahant wants himself to be hanged because, as he avers, whosoever died at that auspicious moment would go straight off to the heavens. While the disciple and the Mahant are enacting this drama, the king arrives with his retinue. Now, with stupidity rampant in every mind, every one of those present wants to be hanged so that he could have a direct access to heaven. The king silences them all and decides that it was the privilege of the king himself to be hanged if the moment was so auspicious.

From the note of the publisher of the first edition, it appears to be based on a folk tale from Maharashtra or Karnataka.

ANDHI MEIN CHIRAG (Urdu) an Indian Academy publication of 1962, which won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1963, is a collection of essays written at different periods of his life by Khwaja Ghulam Saiyidain (1904-1971), an educationist, orator and scholar of distinction.

The book is divided into 3 chapters. In chapter I, the writer has dealt with the teachings of great masters, like Mahatma Buddha, Prophet Muhammad, Imam Husain and Guru Nanak, from an angle that is entirely secular. He is struck with the similarity of the teachings of the Prophet and Guru Nanak or the Buddha and discovers that the substance of reality, the essence of truth and the basis of spirituality underlying all great faiths are one and the same. They have all practised and preached the same eternal truth, the same ancient wisdom and the same unflinching belief in God that was taught by other Godmen before them since the beginning of time. The writer emphasises the oneness of God and the brotherhood of man with reasons and arguments which are both cogent and convincing. The biographical elements in these essays have been kept to the minimum necessary. The thoughts and the values preached by these masters comprise the primary elements of these essays. How these values have stood the test of time and how are they relevant even today and will remain relevant for ever is what he aims to bring out in his narrative, which is both fascinating and effective. Their message alone, he thinks, can eradicate the evils of falsehood, ignorance, cowardice and cruelty from the minds of men and kindle therein the flame that can face all storms.

In chapter II, the writer deals with some of the contemporaries who influenced or fascinated him. There are national leaders like, Mahatma Gandhi, Maulana Azad, Jawaharlal Nehru and Zakir Husain; a poet like Iqbal; an administrator like Syed Raas Masud; his own father Khwaja Ghulam Alsqain and close female relatives, like Saiyida Khatun (his younger sister) and Mujtabai Khatun, a cousin. In these essays, like those in Chapter I, the writer without being biographical, deals with these men and women of sterling qualities as noble specimen of goodness and human warmth. They are all different people and yet the most distinguished representatives of India's composite culture.

The writer, in trying to understand these unique personalities, appears to have lived with them observing as though through his own eyes and ears, their joys and sorrows, their victories and defeats, their loves and passions and the compulsions of human warmth and spiritual generosity which they so generously dispersed to others.

The third and the last chapter contains four well conceived and competently drawn essays on Man, Future of India, Destiny of Nations and Preservation of Civilisation. Here also, like in the earlier two chapters, the writer has discussed those eternal values that lend meaning and dignity to human life. He has also warned his contemporaries against the forces of evil that are constantly trying to destory and disrupt the family of man, his freedom, his culture and his very civilisation. He has in addition drawn attention in this chapter to men and movements that are of vital importance today and have the capacity to influence human life for both good and evil.

ANDHRA MAHABHAGAVATAM, (Telugu) as the name indicates, is a Telugu rendering of Srimad Bhagavatam in Sanskrit, The authorship of this work is attributed mainly to Bannera Potana even though some portions of this voluminous work were composed by three other poets, Singana, Gangana and Naraya, who were very close to Potana, According to some critics, the entire work Andhra Mahabhagavatam was originally written by Potana, but due to some reasons some portions of the work were later destroyed and had to be re-written by his friends, relatives and pupils. Whatever be the reason, the text available today is a rsult of the combined efforts of four poets of whom Potana is the most prominent and predominant. An average Telugu reader however considers Potana as the sole author of the entire work. The internal evidence reveals that the fifth part or Skandha of Andhra Mahabhagatam was written by Gangana, the sixth part by Singana and the last two parts by Naraya. Recent researches reveal that the last two portions were also written by Potana and not by Naraya. This is yet to be established.

ANDHRA MAHABHARATAM (Telugu) a free rendering of the Sanskrit epic Mahabharata in Telugu is incidentally the first poetic composition in classical diction in Telugu literature. This dates back to the middle of the eleventh century when the first classical poet of Telugu literature Nannaya Bhatt by name started the composition at the instance of his patron king Raja Narendra of Chalukyan dynasty who ruled from Rajahmundry in the eleventh century. The king was fond of Telugu literature and a great admirer of the Sanskrit epic Mahabharata. He wanted that the message of this great epic should reach the masses of Telugu land in their own language and idiom. He found Nannaya Bhatt, his poet-laureate, most competent to accomplish this task as he was not only a great scholar well versed in the Vedas, Puranas and Itihasas but was also a practical philosopher translating the ideals of our ancient sages into day to day life. Nannaya too readily accepted the invitation as the assignment was very much to his taste and he thought he could utilise this opportunity to give a classical turn to Telugu literature which till then was popular only as a folk literature providing entertainment more to the common man than to the learned scholars.

Thus Nannaya Bhatt started the composition of Mahabharatam on strong foundations which bear testimony to his foresight and poetic vision. Telugu had no grammar or a standard form of poetic expression at the time of Nannaya. It was he who prescribed a grammar and a diction to facilitate classical writing. On the lines of Sanskrit grammar he wrote Andhra Shabda Chintamani and evolved a pattern of expression taking the best from Sanskrit vocabulary and native idiom.

The metres he employed in his composition of Andhra Mahabharatam are partly borrowed from Sanskrit and partly developed from folk literature. He had also to establish a characteristic tradition for classical poetry in Telugu as distinct from the Mahakavya tradition in Sanskrit. Even though the Sanskrit original of the Mahabharata is an Itihasa following a puranic style, Nannaya gave it the form of a Prabandha Kavya which paved the way for future Prabandha poets almost till the end of the eighteenth century. Classification of Parvas into Ashwasas (and not Sargas) and frequent change of metres in the same Ashwasa to suit the content and the context, incorporating prose passages (both brief and elaborate) in between the metrical composition and appropriating the descriptions and deliberations of the original text to accomodate the native audience are some of the major characteristics of the classical tradition established by Nannaya in his composition of Andhra Mahabharatam.

The beginning made on such strong foundations did not see the end. Nannaya could complete only the first two Parvas (Adi and Sabha) and a part of the third one (Aranya) before his life came abruptly and unfortunately to an end. The poet was perhaps apprehensive about this in his sub-conscience or the super-conscience, as in his invocation verse in the beginning of Andhra Mahabharatam, he pays homage to the trinity, Brahma, Vishnu and Maheswara, and invokes their blessings for the sustenance of this world, perhaps the world of letters. As visualised by the poet, two more poets of equal eminence Tikkana and Errapragada of thirteenth and fourteenth centuries respectively contributed to the completion of this monumental work. Tikkana left the incomplete Aranya Parva as it was and completed the remaining fifteen Parvas from 'Virat' to 'Swargarohana' while Errapragada completed the unfinished Aranya Parva and gave it a final shape. Thus the composition of Andhra Mahabharatam is a result of the combined efforts of three eminent poets—Nannaya, Tikkana and Errana and took nearly three centuries to take a final shape. Inspite of the diverse handling by three poets of different tastes and temperaments and each having a style of his own, there is a basic uniformity through out the work as the method of translation and the broad ideals of classical composition established by Nannaya were closely and faithfully followed by the other two poets–Tikkana and Errana. These three poets are usually referred to as 'Kavitrayam'.

Though Nannaya devoted most of his attention to the establishment of a tradition, he handled the theme taken up by him with high level of excellence. In his own words he exhibited this excellence broadly in two ways–firstly in evolving a pleasant style of narrating events to convey the purport in a palatable way which he calls 'Prasanna Katha Kalitartha Yukti' and secondly in the impressive use of appropriate vocabulary or Akshara Ramyata' as he puts it. With these two broad ideals he covered several episodes falling under Adi, Sabha and Aranya Parvas with remarkable success. In dealing with some major episodes like the story of Shakuntala, the humiliation of Draupadi in the open court of Duryodhana, Nannaya exercised his discretion and added original and living touch to the incidents and characters.

The subsequent episodes in Aranya Parva were handled by Errana with equal ability, elegance and balance. It is significant to note that the last verse of Nannaya ends with the description of the pleasant nights of 'Sharad' while Errana starts with the exposition of the dawn inspiring the celestial scene with radiant vermilion rays. What a natural transition from the moon-lit-night to the dazzling day-break!

The contribution of Errana, though not much in volume, has a special significance inasmuch as it provided a link between the two celebrated personalities—Nannaya and Tikkana—and Errana managed it with marvellous mastery over word and thought.

Tikkana's share was not only voluminous covering fifteen out of the eighteen Parvas but was of great value from the literary point of view. It should be remembered that Tikkana renewed the work started by Nannaya nearly after three centuries and there had been a lot of change in Telugu literature during this period. The Vira Shaiva literature of the twelfth century tried to dominate the scene at the cost of the pedantic style of vedic literature. Their language and style being simple and homely they had a greater appeal to the common man. Therefore, Tikkana had to evolve a formula for his literary expression which can compete with these rival trends and please the people. As in language, so also in religious field he practised and preached a synthetic form of worship with Harihara Natha as the presiding deity. He performed a Yajna to advocate this and was therefore called Somayaji. His friendly approach to Telugu and Sanskrit won him the title Ubhaya Kavi Mitra.

The content of the fifteen Parvas handled by Tikkana is full of polity, philosophy, ethics and psychology. Tikkana being an administrator handled the theme with competence and confidence. The diplomatic relations described in Udyoga Parva could not have found a better hand than Tikkana's. Similarly the ethical code advocated in Shanti Parva was managed with unique combination of poetic and philosophical approach. The speciality about Tikkana is the dramatic form of expression, unassuming yet appropriate language, proper and perfect development of characters to their full length, and lastly the high degree of suggestivity implied even in his casual observation.

Thus the first specimen of classical poetry in Telugu, Andhra Mahabharatam, is perhaps the best one till date and the credit goes to the coordinated efforts of the three eminent poets Nannaya, Tikkana and Errana.

ANDHRA PURANAM (Telugu) is a unique literary form in Telugu presenting the history of the Andhras in verse, written by Satyanarayana Sastri Madhunapantula, a scholar-poet of great repute and published by M. Surayya Sastri in 1954 at Pallipalam. The title constitutes a claim that the Puranas of old were designed to the significant events in the history of the race in a poetic and popular form. The Andhra Puranam consists of a series of poems, each particularly dealing with a significant event or crisis in the history of the Andhras, taking the word 'history' in a wide sense to include authoritative tradition as well as authentic history. Of the poetic merits and literary excellence of the composition, Viswanatha Satyanarayana expresses enthusiastic appreciation in his foreward to the book. Of the faithfulness of the presentation to the facts of history as ascertained and accepted by modern historians, the approving review in the introduction by the renowned scholar in South Indian History Mallampalli Somasekhara Sharma constitutes an equally authoritative encomium.

Satyanarayana Sastri attempts in this great work to popularise the history of the Andhras. The first volume brings the history down to the Kakatiya Period. It is a picturesque description of the glory that was Andhra when the Telugu kings built mighty kingdoms and cities which contributed in abundance to the architectural, musical and literary wealth of the country. It is a work of art and beauty executed with a great skill in the 'prabhanda' style. Its strength is in its original descriptions, chaste idioms and flawless grammar. His imagery is concrete, observation shrewed, historical sense continuous, metre symmetrical and sensibility unified. Andhra Puranam won the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968. Some parts of the work have also been translated into Hindi under the title Motinat. Since its publication not only the work has acquired a status, but its author has also gained an image and in 1975, as the poet of the Andhra Puranam Maddhunapantula Satyanarayana Sastri was honoured at Rajahmundry and the two coveted titles 'Sahitya Samrat' and 'Andhra Kalhana' were conferred on him. Again in 1981 the Telugu literatures celebrated the silver jubilee of the Andhra Puranam at Rajahmundry befittingly.

In language it excels the perfection of Nannaya, the Father of Telugu Poetry. The Avatarika (Preface) has thirty six poems, the first part has four Parvas (Cantos) and the second part five. Udaya Parva has one hundred and sixteen poems, Satavahana Parva has two hundred seventy-four, Chalukya Parva has one hundred and sixty four and the Kakatiya Parva four hundred and eightyone poems. In the Udaya Parva, the story of Harischandra, in the Satavahana Parva, the story of Gunadhya and in the Kakatiya Parva the story of Pratapa Rudra are written with great eclat. The Chalukya Parva describes an extraordinary scene of the beginnings of the Mahabharata in Telugu. It is the pivot on which the whole grandeur of the Andhra Puranam pirouettes. It starts with offering prayers to Sri Saila Vibhudu (The Lord of Sri Saila, the dear God of the Telugus), explains who the Andhras are and through various anecdotes establishes that they are the first empire builders of India.

Sastri has many stories to narrate in different cantos. They include the story of Dipa Karni, the incident of the Kavya Homa, sensuousness of Hala, the Rule of the Telugu Rani and the decline and fall of the Kakatiya Empire. Nowhere in the entire work Satyanarayana Sastri dilutes his narrative. It has become his magnum opus because it is the conscious product of an epic intention to absorb, transform and reveal the whole heritage of the Andhras. The glory and the complexity of the Telugu life is revealed in all its contrarieties and strong points and the poet achieves this uniqueness through employment of traditional verse forms and nontraditional poetic images. Thus the book is both a historical document and a poetic composition.

ANEKASANDHANAKAVYA (Sanskrit). Among the unique features of the Sanskrit language, the prominent ones are richness and multiplicity of word meanings (even single syllables connoting various senses) and the long compound formation that could be split in many ways. When a great poet gave full vent to the emotional flow and depth of feelings, the expressions and ideas blended uniquely to reverberate his intention. The middling poet with a rich knowledge of the language, however, made his compositions more as intellectual exercises, employing the varied richness of Sanskrit to the best possible extent. In this manner the style of course becomes strained. A genre of composition which arose in the wake of this desire of the poet is the Anekasandhanakavya or a composition, which fuses more than one story in its structural pattern. The minimal stories narrated in this way are two and hence this type was called Dvisandhanakavya. Acharya Dandin (7th century) from South India is the earliest writer known to have composed a Dvisandhana, but unfortunately the work is known only through references. The Raghavapandaviya recounting the stories of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata through the same word-collocation is by Kaviraja (Kavyamala, 62). Poets with rich vocabulary and diction exhibited their skill by specially composing such full works, narrating three (e.g. Raghavayadava pandaviya by Anantacharya and Rajachudamani Dikshita), five (Panchasandhana by Shantiraja kavi), seven (by Hemachandra and Meghavijaya) and even twenty-five (by Jagannatha) stories. The most difficult feat of fusing even 100 stories has been exhibited by two Jaina writers, Somaprabhacharya and Udayadharmagani.

ANGAN KE PAR DWAR (Hindi) is a collection of poems, written during the period 1959-61 by Agyeya and published in 1961. The poems of the collection have been divided into three parts, viz. (1) Antah Salila (2) Chakrant Shila (3) Asadhya Vina.

'Antah Salila' comprises eighteen poems, the first of them being the 'Saraswati Putra'. None but the poet himself is the 'Saraswati Putra', who finds his experience rooted in the tradition that originates from the Vedic Rishis, thus giving it a new significance. The poet here composes poetry giving identity to each word. Poetry, for him, does not have only meaning but the meaning of speech (vagarth). That the poem 'Bana de Chitere' is suggestive of the principal sentiment (Mahabhava) of the poet is clearly reflected from the symbols' 'Sagar' (ocean) and 'Machhali' (fish), both extremely favourite with the poet. Here the poet requests the painter to paint for him first the 'Ocean' and then the 'fish.' The 'fish' is the symbol of the instinct, the desire for life, for existence, and entity. The ocean symbolizes immensity of depth and width. Basically, this poem manifests the poet's attitude towards life. The third poem 'Bhitar Jaga Deta' also has the symbol 'Ocean' in wider contexts of life. Here the donor says 'Lo Yah Sagar Mainne Tumhen Diya'. Then he is ready to give all greenery, valley, green trees, colorful spout, sky, mustard fields, flowers, colours, the cow with the calf, smiling face of the infants, love, faith, etc. The poems like 'Andhakar Mein Deep', 'Pas aur Door', 'Pahachan', 'Jhil Ka Kinara', 'Antarang Chehre', 'Parai Rahen', 'Palakon Ka Kanpuma', 'Ek Udas Sanjh', 'Akela Andhere Ghar Mein', 'Chiriya Ne he kaha', 'Antah Salila' and 'Sans Ka Putala' depict the poet's search for 'Antah-salila' (Inner current) in life. This stream is symbolic of the inner consciousness of the human being and the 'sand' (Ret) is symbolic of the phases of mundane experiences.

The next part of the collection 'Chakrant Shila' has twenty seven poems. These poems have the predominance of neo-mystical stream; 'Chakrant Shila' is symbolic of' Time (Kal) which moves steadily. On this revolving rock of time is kept an idol of eternal man. In the messianic philosophy there is mention of a very old rock which was regarded sacred even before the origin of Christianity. This rock is regarded as a wonder of nature. The poet has used the mystical legend here giving it a new meaning. Agyeya dauntlessly uses indigenous and foreign myth if it is suitable to communicate his feelings. This universal outlook raises him up the boundaries and walls of race, religion or class. That is why his poems became the poems of the search of the freedom of human being. In the moments of elaboration of his spiritual thinking, he sings the songs of the supreme, bondless, Almighty Power (Brahma) which cannot be interpreted or explained (Neti). It is in this Brahma, that the river of great silence flows unfettered. The poet creates the metaphor that the innocent maiden is married to Maha Shoonya (Shiva or Brahma). The light of heart burns silently in the temple of Supreme Being.

The last part of the collection 'Asadhya Vina' contains a long poem of the same title. The poem starts with the story of a huge 'Kirit' tree. The tree was so enormous that snowy peaks used to describe their mysteries to it. Its roots went deep into the 'Patal Lok' (nethermost world). Thus the tree is here extended to the whole world. Vajrakirti made a Vina (lyre) from the essential part of this tree. This 'Vina' united in itself the 'Vina' of the whole universe. But after the death of Vijrakirti none was able to play the 'Vina' for a long time. So it began to be called 'Asadhya Vina' (The unplayable lyre). The music players of the king failed repeatedly in playing the 'Vina'. One day when 'Keshkambali' (long-haired) Priyamvad, who lived in the cave, devoted himself to it with a disciple's faith, he succeeded in tuning it up. It harmonized different types of universal melodies. All took their meanings in their own different ways.

Thus the long poem explains the poetic process in a new perspective. Poetic experience is not enough to create poetry. Complete identification with and devotion to the subject or content is essential. The poet himself is present here in the character of Priyamvad, in whose hand the 'Asadhya Vina' of tradition and history was properly and melodiously tuned. Inspite of being a narrative 'Asadhya Vina' is a lyrical poem. New poetic diction, new imagery, new symbolization and new tone have created a poetic grandeur all its own. The poem is indicative of the fact that in modern Hindi poetic writing not only the traditional epic structure has been broken but the world of content and form has also been transformed in a profound manner.

An important characteristic of the collection is that the poet shuns the traditional 'Tatsam' (Sanskritized) terminology and presents his experiences through 'Tadbhav' expressions. The collection has played a historical role in bringing to light the creative possibilities of the 'Tadbhav' vocabulary.

The collection was given the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1964.

ANGURIO BINIMOY (Bengali), a historical prose narrative by Bhudeb Mukhopadhyay was published along with another prose narrative Safal Swapna (successful dream), under the name Aitihasik Upanyas (Historical novel). The story of Angurio Binimoy centres round the love episode of Shivaji and Rosenara, daughter of Aurangzeb. The time depicted in the narrative is approximately between 1657-1665. Aurangzeb was repeatedly violating the conditions of treaty with Shivaji. So in order to teach him a lesson, Shivaji kidnapped Aurangzeb's daughter Rosenara who was on her way to Madurai through Paschimghat Hills. Rosenara was kept prisoner in an inaccessible fort surrounded by hills and mountains. She however was given all the care and attention due to a princess and Shivaji used to come to her personally in the disguise of the fort-keeper to enquire about her well-being. The romantic atmosphere of the mountainous region brought Rosenara and Shivaji close to each other. Even after knowing his true identity Rosenara remained true to Shivaji. Shortly after this, the Mughals attacked the fort ; knowing Rosenara will be safe with them, Shivaji escaped. Rosenara returned to her father. After this Aurangzeb and Shivaji were continuously at war. Once Shivaji was taken prisoner by Aurangzeb, but Rosenara helped him to escape. Shivaji then sent a dancing girl with the message that Rosenara must join him as his wife. Rosenara sent him her ring and a letter stating that by marrying Rosenara Shivaji will lose the chance of realising his life-long dream to free his country from the Mughals and establish a Hindu rule. Therefore, Rosenara would not marry Shivaji though at heart she would always regard him as her husband.

Angurio Binimoy has been described as the first historical novel in Bengali by many critics, though the claim is highly controversial. Bhudeb has said in the preface of Aitihasik Upanyas, that he has taken the stories of both the narratives from Romance of History (Indian Vol. I) by J.H. Caunter. The last story of this book: The Mahratta Chief, has served as the basis of Angurio Binimoy. But this story is imaginary and to some extent improbable. The author in Romance of History has described the marriage of Shivaji and Rosenara, and at the end of the story Shivaji is united with Rosenara and had his son of this marriage. On that account Bhudeb's story is an improvement on the source story. The character of Rosenara also poses a problem. From the evidence of history we know that none of Aurangzeb's four daughters was called Rosenara. Rosenara was in fact the name of one of his sisters. In the course of the narrative we find a very tender and affectionate relationship between Shahjahan and his grand-daughter Rosenara. Shahjahan fully supports Rosenara's love for Shivaji and insists that she should join Shivaji when the latter comes to Agra. Here again a fact of history has been changed, for Shivaji came to Agra in May, 1666; Shahjahan had died in January, 1666. Bhudeb's portrayal of characters also leaves a lot to be desired. The love of Shivaji and Rosenara has been protrayed only through descriptions. The author has not put any dialogue between the two characters. They cannot, therefore, touch the readers' heart. Angurio Binimoy suffers from the lack of a plot or design. It is a romantic episode written in a summary form in twelve chapters. It has rather the form of a historical essay. Bhudeb's genius lay in the line of an essayist and the treatment of the Shivaji-Rosenara episode betrays the hand of an essayist. Still, the narrative is an innovation in more than one sense. This was for the first time that a prose narrative depicting country's past history has been written. Shivaji has been presented for the first time as a fictional character in Bengali literature. A penchant for national literature and culture can be traced in the character of this national hero. Patriotism, sense of self-respect and longing for freedom have given greater dimension to Shivaji's character. Bhudeb has purposefully avoided certain incidents in Shivaji's life which show him to be a cunning and shrewd opportunist. Angurio Binimoy has influenced all the later Bengali novelists, notable among them is Rameshandra Dutta (1848-1909). Even Bankimchandra Chatterji (1838-1894), the greatest novelist of nineteenth century Bengal, was said to have been influenced by this work.

ANIK BISTHAR (Punjabi) by Pritam Singh 'Safir' is a collection of fortyeight poems. Safir is a major modern Punjabi poet who has eleven books of poetry to his credit.

Safir is a romantic as well as a mystic poet. With romantic wings the lover-poet wants to fly to spiritual and mystic heights. His main source of inspiration is Gurbani and Guru-history. Even the title of this book has been chosen from Sukhmani by Guru Arjan Dev. The influence of Guru Gobind Singh's personality on his poetic sensibility is very deep.

The artistic admixture of romanticism and mysticism has made him a philosopher poet by bringing depth in his thought and pithiness in his expression. According to Coleridge a sense of philosophy is a pre-requisite for a good poet and Safir fully lives up to this dictum.

Safir is also a patriotic and revolutionary poet. He exhibits national pride for the Indian soldiers who sacrificed their lives at Chhamb (Punjab) in Indo-Pak war, for defending the freedom and dignity of the country. His international outlook also inspires him to express deep respect for those countries (Palestine and Tashkent, U.S.S.R.) which have been, at times, the victims of injustice and barbarity and have stood firmly like a rock, for their high ideals. Safir has his sincere sympathy for the labourer and the tiller of the soil. He is a poet of revolt and valour. He has all the praise at his command for those dignified personalities of high spirits, who have aspired to usher in new revolutions in this world, because it is the blood's unwithering colour alone, with which the golden history of a nation can be properly written. He dreams of a socialistic pattern of society for conferring equality to all, as the only solution to the vexed and complex problems of the present day world.

He selects appropriate and varied symbols to properly convey his thought and fully expresses his attitude to the objects for which these have been chosen. For him the brave soldiers are like hawks who have the guts to fly high over the border of their country. These martyrs are like musical instruments, from whom the music of sacrifice comforts their countrymen by bringing solace to them. They are flowers whose fragrance of sacrifice soothes the remaining population of their country. The tears have been symbolised as candle-drops and human beings as playing cards with different fortunes embossed on them. His imagery is fresh, natural and befitting. Universe is described as flowing out of the unseen almighty, as water-fall gushes out of the mountain.

In short, Anik Bisthar (1980) fully represents his rich poetic sensibility and specialised poetic diction. Even in this book he has been able to maintain consistency in his intensity of emotion, and lyricism. This book got the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1983.

ANIL (Marathi; b. 1901, d. 1982) alias Atmaram Raoji Deshpande was a renowned Marathi poet. Anil had a distinguished career in Government service as Addl. Dist. Judge (1948-52), Deputy Director Public Instruction, Govt. of Old M.P. (1948-52), Special Officer, Social Education, Govt. of India (1952-57), Director, National Fundamental Education Centre, New Delhi (1957-60) and Hon. Advisor on Social Education, Govt. of India (1961-66).

In his equally distinguished literary career of forty years Anil saw Marathi poetry pass into various stages from Keshavsut's progressive school through the romantic, and the adolescently sentimental school of poetry represented by the Ravi Kiran Mandal and the mellifluous poetry of the Tambe school of the thirties to modern poetry which developed after second world war. But he was too individualist a poet to be claimed by any particular school.

In a conscious reaction against Ravi Kiran Mandal and Tambe School, Anil brought a precise and purposeful newness in his early love lyrics (Phulwat, 1932) which were subjective, delicate and touched the fine edge of feeling. But he soon emerged as a humanist and socially conscious poet in the Bhagnamurti (1940), a cultural homily on the mindless destruction of India's ancient cultural heritage. Nirvasit Chini Mulas (To a Chinese Child Refugee, 1941) and 'Pertevha' (1947) are poems with social content. As a founder and exponent of Muktachhand (free verse) he gave new freedom to poetry. Always an experimenter, he innovated a new form of sonnet, Dashapadi (a ten line poem). Dashapadi (1976), a Sahitya Akademi Award winning book, contains his best poems, mostly personal and intimate in style. Some of them reveal strains of mysticism and a rare sensitivity. Though Anil is not a nature poet, Nature often fuses itself into his experience. Though an innovator, and much talked of poet, Anil has no following or school, he is a loner, difficult to imitate. We see in him confluence of a variety of poets like Keshavsut, Tukaram and mediaeval Sanskrit poets, yet Anil's poetry has remained characteristically his own, and it has a place of pride in Marathi literature.

His long introductions to his own anthologies, written as expositions on his own experiments are virtually essays on poetry and reveal his deep understanding of poetry, ancient and modern, western as well as Indian.

Kusumanil (1976), a collection of letters written to each other by Anil and his wife Kusumavati mostly during their courtship, sheds light on their personalities, mutual relations, and also the atmosphere of the twenties when intercaste marriages and love affairs were taboos.

Anil has won several honours and awards, He was twice the President of the Vidarbha Sahitya Sangh, President of Marathi Sahitya Mahamandal, elected President of Marathi Sahitya Sammelan. He won international honours too as a member of the committee of literacy experts of UNESCO, leader of the Indian delegation of literary experts to USSR. He won the UNESCO fellowship for studying social education schemes in various countries, was a member of Sahitya Akademi and later elected its fellow, and was also a member of the National Book Trust. He won the Nehru Literary Award in 1977, and also the Sahitya Akademi Award for his Dashapadi the same year. He was also honoured as a first broadcaster of All India Radio at its Golden Jubilee Celebrations of 'Broadcasting in India'. His rich and multi-faceted personality has left its mark on Marathi literature.

ANIRUDDHADEV (Assamese; b. 1553, d. 1626) was an eminent Vaishnava saint and writer of Assam. His ancestor's name was Mahipala. He was a local Kayastha chief at Narayanpur on the north of the Brahmaputra river. Mahipala had three sons of whom Ganganavagiri was the youngest. Ganganavagiri's son married Ajali, a niece of Shankardev (1449-1569) and had by her five sons of whom Harakanta was one. Being conversant with the scriptures, Harakanta went to Kaljar Satra (Vaishnavite monastery) of Gopala Ata (1541-1611) and became his disciple. After his initiation, Harakanta came to be known as Aniruddha. At the behest of his Guru, Aniruddha devoted himself to the propagation of Vaishnava religion in 1601. He was the founder of Mayamara (alias Moamaria) sect. At first he established a Satra at Vishnubalikuchi near Narayanpur in North Lakhimpur and a muslim tailor Dheli became his disciple. Aniruddha had to leave that place due to the inroads of the Daflas, a warrior-tribe. He then established another Satra known as Naharati Satra in 1606. Basing his materials on a spurious book called Adicharita, Nagendranath Basu says that Aniruddhadev's 'descendants were separated from the Samaj of their ancestors' and 'came to be known as Kolitas' (vide Social History of Kamrup: part II, pages 149-152). Aniruddhadev and his descendants are Kayasthas. Gopala Ata gave him a 'Shastra' called 'Kalpataru Shastra' for propagating Vaishnava dharma.

Aniruddha has some works to his credit. He translated Book V of the Bhagavata-Purana into mellifluous verse. His lucid explanation of chapter XIII containing an allegorical description of the world (Bhavatarivarnana) bears ample proof to his scholarship. He has at length dealt with the story of Jada-Bharata describing it in the minutest detail, but summarised the latter part of the Book "wherein the various regions and positions and movements of the planets and stars" are described. Puranjana-Upakhyana is a skilful rendering into verse of the allegorical story of king Puranjana and the ten Pracetas from Bhagavata-Purana Book IV (chapters 25 to 31). Aniruddhadev composed another book of religious songs which includes six bhatimas (Vaishnava hymns) and 182 songs on the model of Baragitas (holy songs). There are 805 choral verses in his Bhaktimangalghosa. He composed another book in prose and verse on religious topics. Aniruddhadev was a poet of high order and his poetry was marked by a deep religious fervour. His songs testify to his scholarship, poetic talent and knowledge of music. His rendering of the Bhagavata-Purana is simple, lucid and evocative.

ANIS MIR BABER ALI (Urdu; b. 1803, d. 1874) was the son of Mir Musta-Hasan Khaliq, a prominent poet of his times. His predecessors were original inhabitants of Iran. One of them Mir Imami had migrated to India during the period of Shahjahan and was conferred the command of three thousand soldiers. All members of his family, his father, uncles and grandfather were poets of repute in their times. Anis always prided upon his heritage which had contributed a great deal towards the development and growth of his own poetic talent.

He was a well educated man and had an almost complete command of both the Persian and the Arabic languages besides religion and all prevalent subjects of the time. This is evident from the contents of his poetry. He had studied the Quran and the Hadis with much care and devotion. The frequent use of Quranic teachings and that of Hadis in his poetry bear testimony to this fact.

A man of refined tastes and sophistication, Anis had a tender heart, which often swayed him while reciting his Marsia on a dias. His simmering voice would often dive deep into the minds and hearts of his listeners with the same throb and thrill that he himself experienced. He was a man of great contentment and compassion.

A great poet and promoter of Urdu Marsia, he was dedicated to the memory of the great sacrifice in the battle of Karbala by Imam Husain and his seventy two ardent followers. In his hands, Marsia broke the shackles of Ghazal. He introduced the flavour of a epic and gave it many a new dimension.

His diction on was quite rich and he had an unusual command of the language. It was mainly due to his tireless efforts that Marsia became a powerful vehicle of expression of thought-provoking pathos. He was indeed a versatile author, surpassing a good many writers of Marsia in his depiction of Islamic sentiments.

ANJANEYULU KUNDURTI (Telugu; b. 1922, d. 1982) was born in Kotavaripalem of Narsaraopeta Taluq of Guntur district in a middle class family. He graduated from A.C. College, Guntur. He wrote traditional poetry in the beginning and was thoroughly influenced by Devulapalli and Viswanatha. The latter he considered as his 'Guru'. Later, he was very much attracted by Sri Sri.

Kundurti dedicated himself to the concept of progress in literature and he decidedly took to 'Vachanakavita'. Though his associates in the movement of progressive poetry and 'Nayagara' poets of whom he was one of the outstanding, described emotion and emotion alone as poetry, Kundurti stressed that emotion with restraint is poetry. His Telangana was a solid reflection of the people's revolution against the tyrannical regime of the Nizam. Assa, Goda Meedi, Bommalu, Yuga Yuge, and volumes of Vachana kavitha (verse livres) and many dramas were published and they earned him the admiration and appreciation of the poets and readers alike. Kundurti krutulu was published with the support of C.V.N. Dhan, for which the author received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1977.

Kundurti received Soviet Land Award in 1969 and Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademy Award in 1970. Kundurti started the 'free verse front' and enthused and inspired many young poets in 'Vachanakavitha'. He instituted prizes for young poets in 'Vachanakavitha' and established the movement.

He was a literary critic too and his Kundurti Peethikalu proves his great skill in literary criticism. He published an anthology in which free verses of hundred poets were included. He worked in the Public Relations Department, Government of Andhra Pradesh until retirement. He never sacrificed his faith and commitment to poetry.

ANJARIA BHRUGURAI DURLABHRAI (Gujarati; b. 1913, d. 1980) was born at Rajkot. He obtained primary education at Jamnagar and secondary education upto matriculation at Rajkot. He passed his B.A. Examination in 1935, from Shamaldas College, Bhavnagar and M.A. Examination from Bombay. During the initial stage of his career he gave tuitions to high school students. Later on he served in Poddar High School from 1937 to 1942 and in the Children's Academi from 1943 to 1945. Thereafter he stayed in Saurashtra from 1947 to 1952 and participated in many constructive programmes. From 1950 to 1952 he took active part in politics along with Dhebarbhai. He stayed at Ahmedabad from 1957 to 1960 for Ph.D. research on Kant. He worked at Bombay as a Lecturer in English, Mithibai College, from 1961 to 1965, and as a Secretary, Forbes Gujarati Sabha from 1966 to 1970. He also worked as Editor of the Qurterly Forbes. In 1971 he joined Mithibai College again as a Lecturer in English, and retired from service in 1977.

A bunch of his articles on Kavishri Kant was published posthumously in 1981, under the title Kant Vishe edited by his wife, Sudhaben, and Jayant Kothari. His articles pertaining to the literary output of Kavishri Kant have enabled him to secure a prominent place as one of the top ranking critics of Kant. The most significant aspect of his critical essays is his erudition which is reflected in all his writings.

His compilation Kusumraj in collaboration was published in 1982, on the eve of Kavishri Kant Centenary celebrations. His other works include his commentary on Aradhana, an anthology of poems by Mansukhlal Zaveri and his Preface (titled 'Sarvani-na Vahen) to Saevani, an anthology of poems by Prahlad Parekh. His article 'Kant-ni-Kavita', published in Parab is a detailed discussion of editiorial and textual aspects of Kant-Kavi edited by Umashankar Joshi. His article on interpretative value of Akha-na Chhappa; and his volume titled Kavita Vichar in which he had edited the essay on poetry by Narsinhrao Divatia show his critical ability.

Anjaria is known in Gujarti literature as a strict reviewer and a critic of the first rank by virtue of his sense of investigation, precise interpretation and correct judgement.

ANKA (Sanskrit). An Act of a Sanskrit play is known as anka—'Delimiter of the plot'. Such matter of the plot as considered appropriate for presentation is presented in Acts. Bharata has laid down certain norms regarding the arrangement of ankas in a play. Accordingly, the first Act should complete the element of bija, and, like every other Act, show some extension of bindu. Incidents presented in Act should always be connected with the main story and develop the plot effectively. Incidents of a single Act should not cover more than a day, whereas actual performance of an Act should not last for less than two ghatikas (48 minutes) and more than thirty ghatikas (12 hours). Various characters may be shown in a variety of situations, to create a variety of aesthetic experience. The hero (or the heroine, or at least, the villain) should appear in every Act. Simplicity and clarity of diction are desirable. An Act must not have too many verses or actions. A long list of things prohibited on the stage is given. An Act ends simply with exeunt omnes. Acts of a play should be arranged in the manner of a 'cow's tail' 'go-puchcha', i.e. progressively shorter in duration so as to speed up the denouement.

ANKA (2) is also a tragic one-Act Sanskrit play, also called an Utsritikanka to distinguish it from the Act in a longer drama. Etymologically, its meaning is 'the world in it is coming to an end', one-Act meaning action may last at the most, for a day. The theme is well-known (rarely invented) but elaborated by the poet's imagination. The theme must arise out of war, i.e., containing post-war wailing of women, dejected speeches, pathetic activities, but good fortune in the end. Or, war, victory and defeat may be presented by speech only. The plot should have two junctures—first and last. The characters are non-divine. The sentiment is predominantly tragic. It must have prominence of speeches.

ANKITAM (Telugu) or dedication is a literary convention which has been in vogue from the beginning of Telugu literature. The first poet Nannaya offered his Telugu translation of the early cantos of the Mahabharata to Raja Raja Narendra who regarded him as a sagacious adviser and preceptor. Tikkana, who completed the bulk of the grand epic by rendering it into Telugu, dedicated his work to Lord Hariharanatha, whom he saw in a vision.

Tikkana also established the tradition of representing the poetic composition as a bride who is offered to the royal patron who is described as the worthy husband. Tikkana dedicated his earlier work Nirvachanottara Ramayanam to Manumasiddhi, his royal patron. This convention has taken deep root in Telugu literature. It has become customary to depict the poem as a bride and celebrate the event of dedication as a marriage. The patron is requested by the poet to treat the new bride with affection and tenderness protecting her from the jealous eyes of his other consorts. This convention had become so stale that it was discarded by the Romantic poets during the first half of this century. Poetic compositions were offered as gifts of love and tokens of affection to friends, well-wishers and dignitaries.

Even during Tikkana's time his disciple Ketana deviated from the convention of representing the poetic composition as a bride. He made an offering of his Telugu rendering of Dasakumara Charita, as a token of the devotion of a student towards his revered master. This tradition is revived by the poets, Pingali and Katuri who dedicated their masterpiece Saundaranadam to their master Chellapilla Venkata Sastry on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday. They regarded their poetic composition as a very humble means of expressing their deep gratitude to the renowned poet who reigned supreme in the literary world during the first half of this century.

Another prevailing convention was to represent the poetic composition as a darling daughter and offer her to a parton. The poetic composition was represented as an adoptive child and the poet would request his patron to treat the work as a beloved daughter.

Ankitam (dedication) forms one of the literary conventions with a long history. In modern times the old convention of representing the composition as a bride is on the wane. The dedication has become an offering of cordial greeting and token of abiding friendship. At times Ankitam expresses kinship as in the case of Sri Sri's dedication of his famous poem 'Mahaprasthanam' to a close literary associate who died a premature death.

During the Prabandha period the poets were recipients of generous royal patronage. They expressed their sense of thankfulness to the ruler by offering their masterpieces as flowers of gratitude. After the advent of independence, poets and authors dedicated their works to eminent persons occupying exalted positions of power.

The most significant dedication is that of Andhra Mahabhagavatam by Potana, one of the greatest Telugu poets. Though the poem deals with episodes connected with Krishna, the poem is offered as a dedication to Sri Rama. Potana revolted against the degrading tradition of dedicating poetical works to unworthy rulers and patrons in the hope of receiving grants and favours from them. He upheld the honour and independence of the poet's calling and affirmed that it would be better to remain poor and contented than aspire for the life of luxury and ostentation by dedicating poems to undeserving and corrupt rulers. This bold and revolutionary attitude continues to inspire modern poets and authors.

ANNADAMANGAL (Bengali) is one of the best poetical works of medieval Bengal. It was written by Rayagunakar Bharatchandra Ray, the court-poet of Raja Krishnachandra of Nadia.

In 1742-43, Alivardi Khan, the then Nawab of Bengal, troubled by the raid of Maratha Bargis, asked Krishnachandra to pay a tribute of twelve lakh rupees, which Krishnachandra failed to do. For this, he was imprisoned by Alivardi. In the prison, the goddess Annada or Annapurna appeared before him in a dream and asked him to order Bharatchandra to write a poem eulogising her. After getting freedom, Krishnachandra obeyed her orders. In the meanwhile, Bharatchandra also received an order from Annanda in a dream. He began to write the poem, which was completed in 1752-53. It is a long poem, divided into three parts. Annadamangal is the name of the first part, in which the history of the writing of this poem and the Puranic tales of Shiva and Annada have been told. The part ends with the legendary tale of Annada's advent to the earth and finally, her entry into the house of Bhabananda, the ancestor of Krishnachandra. In this part, we get a description of the court of Krishnachandra, which is important both from the point of view of history and literature. The tale of Shiva, the establishment of Annada in Kasi and the debacle of Vyasa have been told excellently in a lighter vain. The characters of all the gods are quite human. Isvari Patuni is a very live character.

The second part is known as Vidya-Sundara. This is an old story and has been dealt with by many writers of the Kalikamangala poems. Bharatchandra's poetic talent has added a new dimension to the theme. His Vidyasundara is a magnificent poem. It is full of beautiful descriptions and wonderful examples of euphemisms, most of which have become proverbs among the Bengalis. The character of Hira Malini, the old flower-maid of loose morals, is exceptionally alive. There are, however, some portions of this poem which shock puritanic readers who denounce these as obscene.

The third part of Bharatchandra's poem is titled Manasimha. It deals with the war (probably not historical) between Man Singh, the commander of the Mughal army and Pratapaditya, the king of Jessore, emphasising Bhavananda's role in the war and the recognition of Annada by everybody, including the Mughal emperor, Jehangir. Though some of its characters are historical, it however cannot be called a historical poem, because it lacks the historical atmosphere and the major portion of its story is unhistorical. Though cleverly written, this part is inferior to the earlier parts. The description of the war is however brilliant.

The language of Annadamangala is crisp, easy and clear. At the same time, it reveals the scholarship of the author. The poem, almost from the beginning to the end, is full of humour, which is one of the special features of Bharatchandra. In the field of metre also, the poet has shown exceptional skill in this poem. In it he has written many verses in imitation of the metres of Sanskrit poetry.

Though a great poem, Annadamangala is not without its faults. In it the poet has sometimes depicted erotic themes with unnecessary vividness.

Some scholars hold that Bharatchandra's Annadamangala, though a first-rate poem, lacks depth. This accusation cannot be wholly denied so far as the main text of the poem is concerned. But there are many songs embodied in it which are full of lyrical beauty. Some of these songs reveal that Bharatchandra was a devout Vaishnava, though he has depicted a Shakta theme in his poem. It is curious that in one of these songs, he has prayed to Annada, the Shakti Devi, to give him Hari-bhakti (devotion towards Krishna).

Annadamangala became extremely popular in Bengal. For about a century it was believed that this poem could not possibly be surpassed.

ANNADURAI, C.N. (Tamil; b. 1909, d. 1969) was an eminent Tamil writer, orator, social reformer who became Chief Minister of Tamil Nadu. Born in an ordinary family of backward community Annadurai had a brilliant educational career getting his M.A. degree, both in Economics and Politics, from Madras University. While he was a student of Pachayappa's College, an institution noted for Tamil scholarship Annadurai developed his skill in public-speaking as well as writing in Tamil. Thus in later years he grew into a brilliant speaker, lucid writer, excellent journalist and fine playwright. All these attributes went to build him up as a man of the masses and eventually a politician and a chief minister.

In his early days he was associated with Dravida Kazhagam movement started by the great social reformer E.V. Ramaswamy. popularly known as Periyar (The Elder), At this stage Annadurai made use of the Tamil language in its various aspects; he wrote stage plays, published journals and books and pamphlets and above all took to public platform as an unrivalled speaker. Later he broke away from E.V.R's Dravida Kazhagam and founded the Dravida Munnetra Kazakam in the early fifties and built it up as a powerful organisation which radically changed the socio-cultural milieu of the Tamil people. The main tool applied was the word—the use of the Tamil language. Annadurai developed a special style in public speaking, used attractive similes and metaphors and pleasing alliterations in his spoken and written language. So much so that most of his followers, ordinary men as well as scholars began to imbibe the style of Annadurai. In the course of barely thirty years, the language of Tamil Nadu has undergone a radical change.

Annadurai's literary output is considerable—novels, short stories, essays, poetry and plays. He had touched every genre as tool for the communication of his ideas to the common people. Under his influence many who did not have even a high school education came up as brilliant writers of fiction, poetry and drama. Annadurai's creations add up to more than 35 publications, majority of them being attractive essays on the glory of the Tamils or their decadence due to the Aryan invasion. Kamba Rasam (The Essence of Kamban) is a critique on the Ramayana of Kamban. Although it is an iconoclastic effort to debunk the religious aspects of the epic, it nevertheless shines as a literary masterpiece. Novels and short stories of Annadurai show, in spite of his pet convictions, a laudable sense of literary awareness and sincerity. Kapothipura Kathal (Love in the city of the Blind), Parvaty B.A., Kalinga Rani, Pavayin Payanam (Travels of the Young lady) and Kumari Kottam are some of his works of fiction which, though literary critics would class them as propaganda stuff, stand out as examples of brilliant writing.

Like the Abbey Theatre of Ireland it was the medium of the stage that brought about the capture of political power by Dravida Munnetra Kazakam in Tamil Nadu, and the genius behind this was Annadurai who utilized the medium of drama. His numerous plays written and staged attracted the common people. Kumasthavin Pen (The Clerk's Daughter, 1970) and Or Iravu (One Night, 1978, 3rd Ed.) are outstanding examples. There are more than dozen works written on the life and writings of Annadurai, both by laymen as well as by scholars. In-depth studies have also been made by research students: Annavin Nadakangal (Plays of Anna) is a Ph.D. thesis by R. Janardanam, and another thesis for Ph.D. by R. Sethu is on the collective works of novels and short stories of Annadurai.

ANNAMALAI REDDIYAR (Tamil; b. 1861, d. 1891). The Kavadic Chintu, a sub-type of Chintu, non-traditional mass-oriented popular literature of the 17th-19th centuries, is meant for recitation while taking out parade-march of Kavadi, a decorated pole of wood with an arch draped in cotton or silk and with offerings (milk, flowers, sandalwood paste, sacred ash or fish) to temples dedicated to Murugan, a Hindu deity. Annamalai is the most well-known poet of this genre. Since childhood, Annamalai Reddiyar had the ability to compose and sing. He met Subrahmaniya Desikar of the Tiruvavaduturai Adhinam and had his education at the Saivite Math. Annamalai Reddiyar's Kavadic Chintu, simple in diction, catchy in music, is included in highbrow South Indian music concerts. Annamalai Reddiyar was patronized by Sundaradas Pandit Tevar, Chieftain of Cherrur. He was the poet-laureate of Urrumalai Zamin. A primary school named after him is fuctioning at his birth place. His other important works are Virai antadi, Virai Navanitakirusnan pillaittamil, Sankaranarayanar Koyil tiripantadi, Karuvai mummanikkovai (all verse works) and Urrumalait tirattu (verses in praise of Hirudayalaya Marudappa Tevar of Urrumalai).

ANNAMAYYA (Telugu; b. 1424, d. 1503). Tallapaka Annamacharya was popularly known as Annamacharya or Annamayya. His father was Narayana Suri and mother Akkalamba. Even as a child Annamayya was gifted with music and used to sing songs of devotion. He started composing devotional songs in his sixteenth year. Soon he became popular in the field of lyrical composition and now there is an established school of lyricists founded by Annamacharya. Almost all the members of Tallapaka family happened to be gifted poets. Annamacharya's grandson Chinnanna recorded the major events in the life of Annamacharya in a Dwipada kavya. While describing the musical excellence of his grandfather, Chinnanna, he says that every word that came out of his mouth took the form of an immortal epic and that every tune that he sang, became the highest form of music.

Annamacharya was a strong devotee of Lord Venkateswara of Tirupati. When he was going to Tirupati for the first time he had a strange experience. He was climbing the mountain on foot; at one stage he felt like taking rest and was fast asleep. In the sleep he saw the Divine spouse of Lord Venkateswara, popularly known as Allamelu Mangamma. Inspired by the vision, he composed one hundred verses and then proceeded to Tirupati. He was so happy in the holy place that he never thought of returning home. His mother, anxious to get her son back, reached the holy place and somehow managed to convince him to return home. To divert his attention from the holy environment to the worldly atmosphere, he was married to two girls Tirumalamma and Akkalamma. The marriages only enabled the saintly composer to sublimate the passionate love and elevate it to the level of divine love. Love and devotion are the two major aspects of all Annamacharya's compositions. The saint spent most of his time in Tirupati and Ahobalam. He learnt philosophy at the feet of a great scholar called Adivan Shathakopa Yatindra with whom he came into contact in Ahobalam. He rendered the whole of Valmiki Ramayana into songs.

His reputation as composer of devotional songs soon attracted the attention of a magistrate in Tangutur. The magistrate was so much fascinated by the young saint's talent that he invited him to Penugonda when he became the Emperor of Vijayanagar empire. Rayalu had an idea of using the poet for projecting his own image. He requested Annamayya to compose songs praising him. But the conscientious saint bluntly refused. He made it clear that the voice devoted to Lord Venkateswara could not be used for any earthly purpose.

It is said that Annamacharya composed as many as thirty two thousand songs in his lifetime. When he was in his old age, Purandardas of Karnataka who was just then becoming popular as a composer of devotional songs met him. It is amusing to note that Purandardas observed the grace of Lord Venkateswara in Annamacharya while the latter admired Purandardas as an incarnation of Lord Panduranga.

The songs composed by Annamacharya are generally known as Sankirtanas because they are sung collectively. In a way, Annamacharya was the pioneer of this school of literature called Sanskirtana Sahityam. He also wrote a treateise entitled Sankirtana Lakshanam in Sanskrit laying down the essential characteristics of this particular branch of literature. In Sanskrit he wrote another work Venkatachala Mahatmyam bringing out the glory and significance of the holy place Tirupati. This is based on Varaha Puranam. In Telugu he is said to have composed 12 Shatakas, a shataka being a collection of one hundred verses. But today there is only one such work called Venkateswara Shataka. His Dwipada Ramayana and Sringara Manjari are also valuable contributions to Telugu literature. All his compositions are now preserved in copper plates in a separate apartment set apart for Talapaka poets. Tallapaka Annamacharya is acclaimed as Pada Kavita Pitamaha and Sankirtanacharya, being the originator of devotional lyricism and an authority of Sanskirtana Sahityam. At the time of Annamacharya, the word Padam was used in the sense of a devotional song and it was almost synonymous with Sankirtanam. But later on, only songs of love based on devotion were called Padams, while devotional songs were referred to as Sankirtanam, Kirtanam, Kriti or Divyanama.

Annamacharya was not only a saint singer but also a great scholar in rhetorics. He studied all lyrical compositions that were in vogue during his time and earlier and prepared a codified treatise on various form of lyrical composition providing examples to almost all varieties. This is a contribution to the field of rhetorics.

The language used by Annamacharya in his songs is very simple, chaste, refined and dignified to suit the theme he chooses. Philosophy and love went hand in hand in his devotion. In one of his lullabies, he describes the Lord as a child lured by its mother, where the whole universe becomes a cradle in which the child enjoys rest and sports as well. The four Vedas become the four strings that support the cradle and the soft bed is provided by the great serpent Sheshendra. Being a Vaishnavite by nature, temperament and culture, he approaches the Lord in various ways–some time as a servant, at times as a friend and very often as a beloved. But whatever be the vein in which he sings, he maintains a high sense of dignity coupled with devotion. Words approach his ideas automatically.

ANNAPURANANAND (Hindi; b. 1895, d. 1962) is counted among the few authors of cultured humour, a rather rare breed in Hindi. He was primarily a writer of short stories wherein humour is interwoven with situational ironies and anomalies at the linguistic level. In most of his stories, the local colour of Varanasi is too evident to be missed, both at the level of the content as well as the linguistic texture. Mahakavi Chachcha is a verse composition which was quite popular once upon a time. He is ruthless and detached in his onslaughts against social evils, inequities, hypocrisy and inconsequential rant.

ANNARAMA SUDAMA (Rajasthani; b. 1923) is a retired teacher and resident of the village Udayaramasara, Bikaner (Rajasthan). He is a prominent fiction writer and has published two books of poetry also. He started his literary career as a novelist in 1966 with the publication of his first novel Maikati kaya Mulakati Dharati (The sweet Smelling Body and the Smiling Land). The story of this novel has been narrated in an autobiographical style by the characters themselves. The description of the natural phenomena and the professions and psychology of the people have lent a rich local colour to the story. The author seems to be too fond of some idioms and proverbs which have been used rather extravagantly. Next in chronological order is his collection of poems in free verse, Pirola min Kutti byai (A Bitch Gave Births to Pups on the Door Steps, 1969). A deep satire on the irrelevancies of modern life, the factual depiction of the frustrations of city-based people and the helplessness of the human mind, and the exposition of the hypocrisy and fraud of modernism are some of its recurrent features. Vyatha, Katha are Duji Kavitavan is his second collection of poems published in the eighties. It is also in free verse. He has also written more books such as (1) Andhi are Astha, novel.(1974); (2) Dankijata Manavi. (3) Mewai ra Runkha (1977) and (4) Ghar Sansar Pt. I. No. 1 is the story of a poor Brahamana family which holds its own despite repeated odds. No. 2 tells of the tactics that the money lending class (a widow in this case) used in exploitation of the innocent masses. No. 3 is again on the same subject with political sidetalks and depiction of the excesses committed during the emergency (1977). No. 4 is an attempt to highlight the plight of the scheduled caste (the scavengers in this case), and also to suggest ways and means of improvement of their lot. Ill-treatment of women is another important problem dealt with in the book. Andhai nain Ankhyan (1971) is a collection of his five short stories which take up the same social issues as in his novels, but show no further novelty in approach. His philosophic bent of mind, deep faith in God, love of nature and simple life, aversion to over-modernism, etc. may be seen in all his writings, and so also his use of set idioms and proverbs. Dura Disawara (1975) is an exercise in travelogue in the lighter vein. He seems to be more suited to such writings, as he has an instinct to narrate events and actions in such a tone as may please the listeners or readers. Sudama certainly occupies the front row of modern literature. He is a prolific writer and has made a considerable contribution to Rajasthani literature.

ANONYMOUS LITERATURE (Kannada) forms an integral part of Kannada literature. Many works without the names of authors have been found. Historians of Kannada literature have called them 'ajnata-kartrika rachane'. Some such works are found in the three big volumes of R. Narsimhachar's Karnataka Kavicharite. He has listed many such works under the title, 'Kavigalu gottillade kelavu granthagalu'. According to the edited versions, it is found that the number of anonymous works in the first volume is 23, in the second 137, and the third contains 53 works. Ankitas or characteristic phrases of fifty Vachana writers whose names are not known, and some Vachanas are identified in the first volume. Moreover, at the end of the work, that is, at the end of the third volume, about 950 anonymous works are listed. This list contains works belonging to different types and metres, of different periods, from writers belonging to different faiths and religions. There are a few more works mentioned in the three volumes (by R. Narsimhachar) whose authors are guessed in terms of peculiarities of the writings or in terms of the mentor's name. Still these are technically anonymous.

Recent researches suggest some probable reasons for the existence of so many anonymous works. Firstly, for writers of that period, the publicizing of the authorship was not as important as the works themselves. Their motivation was not fame, but the fulfilment of the aim set during writing. There may be other reasons for a work to remain anonymous. The portion of the text bearing the name of the writer might have been lost, because a pseudonym might have come in the way of knowing the real name. These works cannot be said to be of anonymous origin, as there is a distinct possibility of finding out the real name of the author.

Said to be the first work in the prose literature of the Old Kannada, Vaddaradhane is a controversial book from many points of view. So long, its author was understood to be Shivakoti Acharya. But now it is being said that this name is that of the writer of a Prakrit work, Bhagavati Aradhana, and that, in reality, Vaddaradhane remains anonymous. The importance of this work regarding the prose style of old Kannada is well known. The authorship of Udyogasara (c. 1200) containing 429 pieces of prose and verse, is uncertain. For the present, this has considered to be anonymous. The work deals with how to achieve the aim of salvation after having freed oneself from worldly desires. In the literature after this work, some small Jaina works from about 1300 to about 1450, are found to be anonymous. There are still many such works in the literature cultivated in recent periods by the persons of other faiths like Saiva and Vaishnava, following the religious movements of Karnataka.

Some scholarly works, sacred or profane, and some works on fine arts have remained anonymous. Professions dealt with in such works include medicine, the science of elephants, the science of horses, health, therapy, mathematics, cooking, jewellery, architecture, astrology, weaving, music, georgaphy, hydrology, rain and palmistry. The names of authors of some of the commentaries on Sanskrit religious works have not been known.

The same is the case with regard to the eulogies of gods, narrations of miracles, legends about places, ritualistic literature of faiths and handbooks of philosophies. Oral literature is usually anonymous. Most such works are the ones belonging to the mediaeval period, the size of the works being medium and small. Anonymous works on such interesting topics like interpretation of dreams, description of coins, folk medicine, and description of alphabet also represent the breadth of scholarship and the philanthropic outlook of Kannada writers.

Few of the anonymous works mentioned here have been published. It seems that some anonymous works have been lost during the recent decades.

ANONYMOUS LITERATURE (Manipuri). The entire Manipuri literature right from its beginning to the middle of the 18th century is anonymous in nature, because no writer would ever put his name in a piece he composed during this period. If the claim of the copper plate of Khongtakcha who was the king of Manipur during 763-773 is accepted as the first and earliest specimen of Manipuri language, Manipuri literature could reasonably claim to have existed from the 12th century with the practice of singing 'Gugri', a hymn to the king sung by royal musicians. However, the anonymous character of the literature continued for yet another five centuries more, though a few scholars here and there used to put their names in their compositions. Leiron (Of flowers) composed by Charairongba (1697-1709) is considered to be an early title in Manipuri literature which bears the name of the writer.

The bulk of literature in Manipuri during the periods up to the middle of the nineteenth century is mythological, legendary, sometimes historical; often these may be termed as 'Puya' literature or literature based on 'Puya' because of the nature of the subject matter and the treatment. Creative literature was rather scanty during the period. While generally the writers were deeply rooted in the local settings, there were a few who had imbibed the Pan-Indian outlook in their compositions and themes. They were sometimes influenced by Pan-Indian themes and incidents but they would unhesitatingly and skilfully add local colours and settings, customs and beliefs to these themes, thereby transforming them sometimes beyond recognition.

One of the reasons why the writers during the period did not put their names in their compositions could be that they considered themselves completely under the control of the kings to whom they owed unlimited allegiance and whatever they did was part of the duty they derived from the kings. They may be said literally to exist for the king. So, they might have considered it too bold and individualistic on their part to put their names in their own compositions. Almost all writers during the period belonged or were attached to the royal pandit 'loishang' or court of royal pandits who were looked after and maintained by kings. They were asked to pursue their studies, to read and interpret texts and perform pujas for the welfare of the king and the state. They were a community of scholars assembled together at a place in the royal palace and they could express their findings, ideas and thoughts not individually but through the medium of the pandit 'loishang'. This institution had several members and hierarchy also and the members were given specific assisgnments which they should carry out in the name of the king. An instance of this community of scholars' collective assignment is Cheitharol Kumbaba (Royal Chronicle) of Manipur, the entries in which start from the time of the ascension of Pakhangba to the throne of Manipur in 33 A.D. Cheitharol Kumbaba contains entries of important anecdotes and incidents, natural or man-made, royal campaigns to conquer some territory, important measures and steps taken up by a king for the welfare of the people, etc. The book which runs to more than 1000 printed pages was written in ancient Meitei Script on indigenous paper with locally prepared ink by pandits of the royal court during the reign of each king. The entries were to be made at the royal court only and the pandits had no right to do the same at home. This way, the entries continued from king to king by the pandits, who, from one generation to another, kept the tradition alive. They did not put their names in the entries at all, maintaining the anonymity religiously all through.

The royal palace, at one time in Manipur, played a significant role towards the promotion of arts, culture and letters. Besides composition of the Cheitharol Kumbaba, the pandits of the king's palace also composed another book known as Sangai Phammang (The Front Chamber of the Royal Palace) which contains details of the genealogy of the kings, their queens and consorts, their sons and daughters, etc. This book which is an important source material of the history and antecedents of the kings of Manipur was also composed at the royal court only by pandits who had been assigned this specific duty. Moirang Ningthourol Lambuba (History of the Kings of Moirang) is also another important composition of this type. Like the Cheitharol Kumbaba it also contains accounts of incidents, anecdotes, exploits, casualties that occurred during the reign of the kings of Moirang which was an independent principality at certain period of time. The entries in this book were also made by royal pandits but they did not put their names in the composition. Several such examples are there in ancient and mediaeval Manipuri literature.

ANONYMOUS LITERATURE (Sanskrit) Anonymity is one of the unique features that is generally found in the early Indian literature and artistic traditions. This trait is a natural corollary of the spiritual and religions background, origin and development of all branches of ancient classical studies. Through the etymological derivation of both the words Rishi and Kavi, a poet is considered the same as a divine seer endowed with mystic vision and superior revealing eternal truths. In fact Bhatta Tota (10th century A.D.), Abhinavagupta's teacher, equates a Rishi and a Kavi on these grounds. Under these circumstances it is no wonder that the ancient compositions either bear no name, or even if they did, it was that of a remote sage, or some pseudonyms like Kalidasa, Dandin and Bharavi rather than a personal name. The concern of those poets was to present and project the eternal aspects and principles of life and nature charmingly clothed in a poetic garb so that the work so depicted will stand the test of time and space; and through such a work, incidentally the poet may be remembered.

ANONYMOUS LITERATURE (Tamil) Sangam Literature is a collection of poems compiled into eight anthologies. Those who compiled the work had tried their best to find out the names of the authors. Even then some poems are left without the names of authors. Instead they supplied them by forming names out of the impressive terms taken from the poems. They have to be considered anonymous.

In Kuruntokai, Aniladu Muntilar (Poem No. 41), Orilpiccaiyar (Poem No. 277), Orerulavar (Poem No. 131), Sankulavellattar (Poem No. 387), Kalporucirunuraiyar (Poem No. 267), Kavaimakan (Poem No. 342), Kalerikadikaiyar (Poem No. 267), Kuppaikoliyar (Poem No. 305), Kuriyiraiyar (Poem No. 394), Kuvanmaintan (Poem No. 224), Kovenkaiperunkatananar (poem No. 134), Chempulappeyaneerar (Poem No. 40), Tumpicerkeeranar (Poem No. 393), Neduven Nilavinar (Poem No. 47), Patadivaikalar (Poem No. 323), Meeneri Thundilar (Poem No. 74), Viddakutiraiyar (Poem No. 74), and Villaka Viralinar (Poem No. 370) have been given such names by the compilers.

In Akananuru also two unknown poets were christened by the attractive terms used by them. They are Immenkiranar (Poem No. 398) and Uttiyar (Poem Nos. 68 and 388). In Purananuru a few poets like Irumpidar Talaiyar (Poem No. 3), Orelulavar (Poem No. 193), Kukaikoliyar (Poem No. 364) and Todittalai Vizhu Tandinar (Poem No. 243) had received their names by their impressive expressions.

In the same way poets like Kottampalavanar (Poem No. 95), Tanimakanar (Poem No. 153), Tumpicerkeeranar (Poem No. 277), Teipurip Palamkayiranar (Poem No. 284) and Vilikat Petaip Perunkannanar (Poem No. 242) were called so in Narrinai representing their attractive words. All these poems can well be considered anonymous.

Apart from these the name Kayamanar is also considered by some scholars as one coined by the compilers. If so two poems in Kuruntokai (Nos. 9 and 378), six in Narrinai (Nos. 12, 198, 279, 293, 305 and 324), twelve in Akananuru (Nos. 7, 17, 145, 189, 195, 219, 221, 259, 275, 321, 383 and 397) and one in Purananuru (No. 254) may be considered anonymous. It is said that this poet asquired this name from the term 'Kayam' used by him in his Kuruntokai, Poem No. 9. If so, how the compilers were able to find out his other poems is a big question. The authenticity of the authorship of certain Sangam poems still remains doubtful. Anyway there are many poems to be called anonymous in Sangam Literature.

As far as folk-literature is concerned there are a number of songs and ballads left anonymous. Most of them have lived in memories and have passed down to generations by heresay only. They are really anonymous.

A.N.P.

ANONYMOUS LITERATURE (Telugu). Many of the folk–songs that have survived the test of time are of unknown authorship. The poets' identity has perhaps been lost in the mists of antiquity. Perhaps the poet was concerned more with the expression of thoughts and emotions that gripped his mind and stirred his heart than with the perpetuation of his memory. This remarkable unconcern for fame is a trait which we do not find in sophisticated poets who incorporated their names, names of their parents, names of their teachers and a boastful reference to their attainments.

Listen my child to the music of pipes
Look at the beautiful palanquin
In the palanquin rides goddess Parvati
Fold your hands and bow your head says a poet in a lilting refrain with the warmth of a loving devotee. The song survived though the name of the writer is forgotten.

"Chat Mohana ranga", the famous love–song which inspired many lyrical poets, is of unknown authorship though it ranks among the finest lyrics.

You and I have come together
You have none to call your own
I have none to claim as mine
Let us go and build a palace
On the banks of a river
If it is in flood we shall go somewhere says the lady to her lover who praises her graceful figure, dark eyes, and the pot of water which she carries from the lake. This simple love-lyric has left an indelible stamp on the minds of laymen as well as scholars. It is sweet, simple, delicate and decent, free from any touch of vulgarity or obscenity which is often noticed in folk-songs of an anonymous nature. The theme of love is treated with provoking erotic expressions which shock people with bad taste. Anonymous verses and songs abound in Telugu literature and they belong to different periods and phases of Andhra life. They depict rural life with all its fascinating variety and portray emotions and feelings which animate the human hearts at all times. They display simplicity and directness of expression whose force we may often miss in classical literature. "The sun is over the horns of the bull" says an anonymous folk-poet when he refers to the moon. "O your face is covered with pearls of sweat" says a village maiden to her husband who has just returned from the field after hard work. Such expressions come from direct exprience but not from observation however careful it may be. We find that white heat of emotion in some of the anonymous songs which are on the lips of the people. Some of the anonymous songs cheer up people at work and refresh the tired spirits. Some of them console in moments of distress. Some propound philosophical and spiritual truths through beautiful symbols. "Where has the parrot flown? The cage looks forlorn" says the poet in a song which is anonymous.

ANSARI HAYAT-UL-LAH (Urdu; b. 1911) is a Urdu fiction writer. He was educated in Lucknow and Aligarh. He obtained highest education in Arabic and Madrasah tradition. He joined All India Congress Committee and was appointed editor of their Lucknow Urdu Weekly Hindustan. Later he became the founder-editor of their Urdu Daily Qaumi Aawaz (Lucknow). He wrote the Urdu Primer Das Din Mein Urdu (which is still in use).

Deeply influenced by Gandhi and his teachings, he wrote several short stories with the Gandhian philosophy as their background. He served as Member of the Rajya Sabha and Deputy Chairman of the Bureau for the promotion of Urdu set up by the Govt. of India.

His publications include Anokhi Musibat, Bhare Bazar Min, Shikasta Kangure (collections of short stories), a five volumes novel Lahu ke Phul and a recently published novellette Madar (1981).

Hayat-ul-Lah is a noted fiction writer in Urdu. His most celebrated short story, Aakhri Koshish, depicts the return of an urban destitute to his native village where he shares and uses his invalid and senile mother with his brother for collecting alms in the city. Finally, the two brothers fall apart and kill the mother, throwing to winds all their hopes to get rich some day.

His five volumes novel, Lahu Ke Phul is a tale of India's, struggle for independence from 1911 till the completion of the first Five-Year Plan of Free India. In this monumental work various layers of the Indian society, the Princely order, the feudal society and other fragmented cultural entities have been depicted with an eye on documentation and narration than on their aesthetic blending into a literary masterpiece.

Among his better known stories are Shikasta-Kangure, Mozon Ka Karkhana, Akhor and Chacha Jan.

He is also the author of the short story on which a feature film 'Nicha Nagar' was made in 1947. The film was awarded a prize at the Cannes Film Festival. He also wrote a booklet on N.M. Rashid. (Literary criticism).

ANTAPPAYI, C. (Malayalam; b. 1862, d. 1936), after taking his B.A. degree from Madras University, joined Kochi Government service. While working as Registrar of Co-operative Societies, he complained that Christians were being neglected by the Government. He was therefore compulsorily retired. He is one of the early prose writers in Malayalam. His greatest achievement is the completion of Chandu Menon's incomplete novel Sarada. Chandu Menon died in 1889, leaving Sarada, the heroine of the novel, a young girl. Antappayi wrote the second part of Sarada and saw to it that the young girl grew up and was duly married to a decent young advocate. Sumargaprakasika, Dharmopadesika, Sarada (Second Part), Bhashanatakaparisodhana, Anantasneham and Naluperiloruttan are his chief works.

ANTHOLOGIES (Dogri) The first anthology in Dogri is one of poems called Jago Duggar, containing poems of 12 Dogri poets. It was published by Dogri Sanstha, Jammu in 1949. This was followed in 1959, by five anthologies of Dogri poetry, each containing selected poems and songs of 3 poets. These were published by the J & K Cultural Academy. They were entitled Niharika, Arunima, Prat Kiran, Madhukana and Magadhuli. Then came two anthologies of patriotic songs called Des Pyar De Geet (1964) and Dhann Sarha Des (1966) and an anthology of mystic and devotional poems called Jot Jagai Din Ratin (1967). All the three were published by the J & K Cultural Academy. Other anthologies of Dogri verse published so far are (1) Kavita Kyari and Dhupp Chhan both published by Dogri Sanstha Jammu in connection with Dogri examinations and used as text books, (3) Dogri Kavya Sushma (1972) edited by Shyamlal Sharma, Kunj Kataran (1973) edited by Shiv Ram Deep and Jitendra Udhampuri and Gunjar (1974) edited by Shiv Ram Deep. These last mentioned three anthologies contain selections from works of 37, 30 and 49 poets respectively. Dharen De Ale is an anthology of poems of poets from a particular region of Duggar i.e. Ramnagar and was published in 1973 by Bandhrahlta Sahitya Mandal. Chandi Marhoiyan Aunsiyan, Sunne Marhoe Bol is an anthology of Dogri ghazals brought out by the J & K Cultural Academy and edited by Om Goswami. Divided in three parts, it collects at one place selected ghazals of all the Dogri poets who have composed ghazals. Besides these the Education Department of Himachal Pradesh Government published four anthologies of Dogri Pahari poetry in 1971, 1972, 1973 and 1975.

Eleven anthologies of Dogri short stories have been published so far. They are volumes (I & II) of Shreshtha Dogri Kahaniyan edited by K.S. Madhukar and published by the J & K Cultural Academy in 1965 and 1970 respectively. (3) Katha Kayari edited by Jaitendra Sharma and Bandhu Sharma and published by Dogri Sanstha Jammu in 1968 (4) Bharati Kahaniyan containing fourteen stories translated into Dogri and published by the J & K Cultural Academy (5) Nau Kahaniyan edited by Narendra Khajuria, (6) Sansar Prasiddh Kahaniyan containing nine world famous short stories translated into Dogri and published by the J & K Cultural Academy (7) Chonamiyan Dogri Kahaniyan containing nine stories and edited by Madan Mohan Sharma (8) Sach Te Sach containing six Dogri (and four Hindi) short stories compiled and edited by Lalit Magotra, published in 1974. (9) Dogri Kahaniyan containing thirteen short stories selected and edited by Madan Mohan Sharma and published by the Sahitya Akademi (10 and 11) Barasa Re Phul and Losara Re Phul published by the Education Department of Himachal Pradesh Government.

There are five anthologies of Dogri play, i.e. Satt Dogri Natak edited by Narendra Khajuria and published in 1966. (2) Panj Rang edited by Jitendra Sharma and published by Dogri Sanstha Jammu in 1968 (3) Dogri Ekanki (Dogri Ekanki (One–act plays) edited by K.S. Madhukar and published in 1970 (4) Prekhan published by the Language Department of Himachal Pradesh Government in 1971 and (5) Sola Singi brought out in 2 volumes by the Academy of Arts, Culture and Languages, Himachal Pradesh in 1972.

There are ten anthologies of essays written by different authors. The first one to come out was Lakh Lehri a collection of nine essays translated from English into Dogri and edited by Jitendra Sharma and Madan Mohan and published in 1967. Then there is Pravin Lekh, an anthology of four essays by Dogri authors edited by K.S. Madhukar. Dogri Sahitya Darpan is an anthology of five essays on Dogri language and literature. Rajat Jayant Granth published by the Dogri Sanstha Jammu on the occasion of its Silver Jubilee celebrations contains 32 essays on cultural, historical, linguistic and literary aspects of Duggar and Dogri. It was published in 1970. Lekhmala edited by Lakshmi Narayan and Ved Pal Deep, and Name Nibandh edited by Baldev Singh was both published in 1972, one by the J & K Cultural Academy and the other by Dogri Sanstha Jammu.

Chubban Te Hasse is an anthology of Dogri pieces of humour and satire in Dogri. It was published by the J & K Cultural Academy in 1974. Din Din Jot Saaye edited by Om Goswami and published by the J & K Academy of Arts, Culture and Languages in 1980 contains 31 prose essays on different subjects. Two anthologies are from Himachal Pradesh: Pahari Lekh Mala (1975) and an anthology of essays on Pahari language and folk literature.

In addition to the above, there are twenty anthologies of Dogri folksongs and nineteen of Dogri folktales including fifteen of songs and twelve of tales published by the J & K Cultural Academy. The Academy has been bringing out every year since 1962, an anthology of Dogri literature called Sarha Sahitya containing pieces of creative and critical Dogri writing, the last one was published for 1981. The Academy has also published six anthologies of works of individual Dogri writers, with write-ups on the life and work of each of these. The authors covered posthumously are Raghunath Singh Samyal, Shrivatsa Vikal, Charan Singh, Har Dutt, Shambhunath and Parmanand Almast.

ANTHOLOGIES (Gujarati) In 1861 Gujarat Varnacular Society published the first and in 1865 the second volume of the Kavya Dohan, an anthology of mediaeval Gujarati poetry edited by Dalpat Ram. From 1887 to 1919 Ichharam Desai published eight volumes of Brihad Kavya Dohan, covering a wider range of mediaeval Gujarati poetry. In 1913 Sagar collected Gujarati Ghazals and published the collection under the caption Gujarati Ghazalistan. Chhaganlal Raval's anthology of mediaeval poetry Prachinkavyasudha was published in 1922. Mohanlal Desai in his Jain Kavya Pravesh (1912) gives selected mediaeval Jain poetry. Jivanchand Jhaveri collected Jain Rasa poems (longer narrative poems) in ten volumes of Anand Kavya Mahodadhi from the year 1920 to 1927. Himatlal Anjaria, prepared six anthologies of modern Gujarati poetry: Kavya Madhurya (1920), Kavita Pravesh (1922), Padya Sangraha (1923), Kavita Vinod (1926), Kavya Saurabh (1949). In the last one he has covered poetry published upto the time of publication of anthology. Sangit Manjari is an anthology of Gujarati songs and lyrics. In 1923 Narhari Vakil in his Sahityaratna collected poetry and prose passages for teaching in the schools. Ramnarayan Pathak and Nagindas Parekh prepared his anthologies of Gujarati poetry Kavya Samuchhaya (1923) and Kavya Parichaya (1924) for teaching in Gujarat Vidyapith. Balwantrai Thakore in Apni Kavita Samrudhhi has included selected poems of modern period with notes and comments. In 1937 Umashankar Joshi and Jinabhai Desai in their Gandhi Kavya Sangraha have published poems on Gandhi. Several anthologies for school children were published in post independence period, amongst them Sahitya Pallav by Umashankar Joshi & Jinabhai Desai is noteworthy. Najarun Lagi (1965) is an anthology of musical songs from mediaeval to modern period. It was edited by Suresh Dalal and Bhal Mulji. Mansukhlal Jhaveri in Apno Kavita Vaibhav, Part one and two (1973-74) has presented an anthology of Gujarati poetry from 1850 to 1973. An anthology of modernist poetry was published by Suresh Joshi in 1971 under the caption Umesh. The book gives a glimpse of the characteristics of modernist poetry. Two anthologies of post independence (post 1947) poetry Swatantryotar kavita (1971) by Yashwant Trivedi and Swatantryotar Gujarati Kavya Sangrah (1973) by Chandrakant Mehta and Yaswant Shukla gives an idea of the changing trends in poetry.

In other genres anthologies of short stories are published in large numbers. Amongst these anthologies Gujaratini Tunki Varta (1952) and Mari Shreshta Varta (1955) by Mansukhlal Jhaveri; Gujarati Nava Likao (1950) by Gulabdas Broker are valuable contributions. Navivarta (1973) by Radhesyam Sharma; and Suresh Joshithi, gives clear picture of modernist short story.

Anthologies of one-act plays are about ten in number out of which Gujaratinan Ekanki (1952) by Gulabdas Broker, Gujarati Ekanki Sangraha (1976) by Anant Rai Raval, and Shrestha Ekanki (1953) by Chunilal Madia present representative one-act plays.

Several anthologies of essays have been published out of which Viswa Nath Bhatt's Nibandhmala (1937); Vijayray Vaidya's Manpasand Nibandho (1968); and Ramanlal Shah's Shresth Nibandhikao (1960) are of representative character.

ANTHOLOGIES (Hindi) represent a fairly old translation in Hindi literature. The first endeavour of this kind was undertaken by Guru Arjun Dev of the Sikhs in 1604 when he compiled an anthology of selected poetic compositions of,Hindi of poets like Ramanand, Kabir, Raidas, Pipa and Sena etc; apart from those of Punjabi and Marathi poets, in the celebrated anthology titled Guru Granth Sahib. Although the compilation adopted Gurumukhi as its script, the predominance of Braj Bhasa verses and its deep influence on compositions in other languages is too evident to be missed. Shortly after this anthology, followed another by Sant Rajjab in Devanagari script titled Sarvangi and comprising verses of many of the poets of the Guru Granth Sahib. The Sarvangi included poetic compositions of Dadu, Rajjab, Namdev, Kabir, Raidas, Garibdas, and so on. In 1665 one Tulsi (not the celebrated poet Tulsidas) compiled an anthology Kavimala of selected poems of seventyfive poets whose creative period ranged from 1450 to 1650–that is, over a span of two centuries. Almost five decades later, another enterprising compiler Kalidas Trivedi came out with a yet bigger and more comprehensive anthology comprising about a thousand poems, aptly titled Kalidas Hazara. Shiv Singh Sengar, in his later celebrated anthology Shiv Singh Saroj, adopted the Kalidas Hazara as one of the basic sources of information. During the eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries, more than fifty anthologies were compiled by discerning scholars of poetry which bears ample evidence to the keen interest poetic activity elicited amongst the lettered people. Some of the prominent ones are mentioned hereunder chronologically.

Satkavi Chiravilas, Baldev, 1756 (A collection of poetic compositions of seventeen poets including Chintamani, Mati Ram, Bihari and others)., Vidwan Mod Tarangini, Subba Singh, 1817, (comprising poetic compositions of 45 poets). Ras Chandroday–Thakur Prasad Tripathi, 1848 (Collection of verses of 242 poets of the Bundelkhand region). Shivsingh Saroj–Shivsingh Sengar (1883, sketches and collection of poetic compositions of nearly one thousand poets. This is by far the most celebrated of the nineteenth century anthologies,)., Kaviratnamala, Deviprasad 'Munsif', 1911, (Collection of poetic compositions of 108 poets of Rajasthan)., Hafiz-ullah Khan Hazara, Hafiz-ullah Khan, 1919 (Collection of Kavittas' and Savaiyas' of numerous poets in 2 vols.).

The anthologies mentioned above were of a heterogenous nature contentwise but here were some other anthologies too which followed a set contentwise pattern to bring about an overall thematic uniformity. Some such anthologies may be noted hereunder.

Raga Sagarodbhava Raga Kalpadrum–Krishnanand Vyasdev, 1843; (Collection of compositions of over two hundred poets of the Krishna devotion cult). The compositions are predominantly in Hindi but comprise also those in Gujarati, Marathi and Bengali, etc.); Shringar Sangrah–Sardar Kavi, 1848 (Collection of excerpts of compositions of 125 poets.); Guru Stuti Sangrah–Basanji Chaturbhuj, 1871; (Collections of poetic compositions of the Kabir Cult.); Nitimala–Sadanand Misra, 1972; (Poetic compositions of didactic nature); Jain Stvanavali, Sitab Chandra Nahar, 1874 (Poetic compositions of the followers of Jainism); Prem-Ratnakar, Lala Lachhman Das, (Poetic compositions centred on the erotic sentiment)., Rasik Ranjan Ramayana, Vallabh, 1888; (Collection of compositions of the Ram-a-devotion cult); Phushtimargiya Sangrah, Nathubhai Tilak Chand, 1888; (Collection of compositions of the Krishna-devotion cult.).

A majority of these anthologies is based on the erotic sentiment which forms the pivotal idea of most of the poetic compositions of the eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries.

The anthologies that appeared during the twentieth century vary in nature and approach and reveal a much wider range than the earlier ones. Some of the more important ones may be enumerated hereunder:-

Hindi Navratna:- The Misra Brother (Misra—Bandhu) brought out an anthology of selected compositions of the 'nine gems' of Hindi poetry, viz. Chand Bardai, Kabir, Sur, Tulsi, Keshav, Bihari, Bhushan, Mati ram, Dev and Bharatendhu Harishchandra. Although the anthology is titled Nine Gems, the actual number of poets included goes upto ten which has been restricted notionally to nine by bracketing Bhushan and Matiram. The anthology marks an important step forward in the sense that it carries introductory notes on the poetic and also a critical appreciation of the poetic achievement of each one of them. It thus covers the entire span of the history of Hindi literature encompassing the early period, the mediaeval period the scholastic or the later mediaeval period (Ritikal) and the modern period.

Kavita Kaumudi:- Ramnaresh Tripathi compiled a detailed anthology of Hindi poetry under the title Kavita Kaumudi bringing out Vol. I in 1918, vol. II in 1922 and Vol. III in 1923. Later, vol. IV comprising folk songs was also published by him. Kavita Kaumudi bears ample testimony to the poetical understanding and insight of Tripathi whose thoroughness and objective made possible a representative and tasteful compilation.

Siddhant Ratnakar:- In the Krishna-devotion stream of Hindi poetry, 'Madhuropasana' (Sweet devotion) attained better renown among various brands of devotion practiced by the people in general. Many a poet-follower of the cult composed beautiful verses in Braj Bhasha. Rasikdev, Rupsekhi, Kishoridas and Sheel Sakhi stand out amongst the poets of this school Vishweshwar Sharan edited and published an anthology of the compositions of these and other contemporary poets of the like under the title Siddhant Ratnakar in 1956. It carries a lengthy and learned introduction by Govind Sharma which throws adequate light on the creative poetry of this particular tradition.

Hindi poetry encompasses within its expanse numerous poetic currents identified distinctly on the basis of content and form. A number of distinct collections of this type have appeared from time to time. Some of them are:

Hindi Virkavya Sangrah–ed. C.P. Dwivedi, (1937); Hindi Premgatha Kavyasangrah–ed. G.P. Dwivedi, (1941); Virkavya–ed. Uday Narayan Tiwari, (1948); Sufi Kavya Sangrah–ed. Parashuram Chaturvedi, 1950;Sant Kavya–ed. Parashuram Chaturvedi (1952); Riti Shringar– ed. Nagendra, (1954); Nath-Siddhon Ki Baniyan—ed. Hazariprasad Dwivedi, (1957); Riti Kavya Sangrah- ed. Jagdish Gupta, (1960); Bauddha–Siddhon Ki Baniyan–ed. Parashu Ram Chaturvedi, (1969); Niti Kavyadhara–ed. B.N. Tiwari, (1984); Raso Kavyadhara—ed. Vijay Kulshreshta, (1984).

Except for Riti Shringar almost all the other anthologies are prefaced with brief assessment of the relevant poetic stream, short introductory notes on the poet concerned and clues about the meanings of the text alongside or at the end. These compilations thus not only introduce the main poetic streams of Hindi but also present representative compositions of each for the benefit of the interested reader.

Hindi has a fairly large number of poetic works composed under the generic title of 'Ras', 'Raso' and

'Rasak'. Some scholars bracket them all in one broad category while others group them under separate categories. Dashrath Ojha and Dashrath Sharma, bracketing them under the same category, published a huge collection of the three viz Rasas, Rasos and Rasaks , in their compilation titled Rasa aur Rasanvayi Kavya in 1959. In the beginning of this anthology, there is a detailed scholarly introduction and the appendix consists of meanings of the text.

In the main body of the work, they also hint at the textual variations. This anthology makes a definite scholarly and valuable endeavour in introducing a specific poetic trend in its varied richness.

An anthology of the poetic compositions of the 'Acharyas' of the 'Sakhi Sampradaya', including Kalimalji, Bithal Bipul Devji, Biharidevji and others appeared in 1971 under the title Sarvopari Nityaviharini Rasasagar. Meanings of words, where necessary, are also given in Braj Bhasha prose. At the end, there is a concordance facilitating location of each 'pada' through the first line of each of them. In this very tradition, we have another anthology titled Raso Kavyadhara by Vijay Kulshreshtha––1984).

'Bhramargeet' represents another age-old poetic style which has its roots deeply entrenched into tradition. This style found profuse expression in Sanskirt, Prakrit and Apabhransha. Even though Bhramargit tradition continues into the modern period, mediaeval Hindi poetry is specifically rich in this respect. Snehlata Shrivastava has compiled an anthology of verses of 49 poets under this style appending a list of the Bhramargeet compositions available in folk-song style. It does not include the modern Bhramargit compositions by stalwarts like Jagannath Das Ratnakar (Uddhav-Shatak). The compositions of different poets do not figure chronologically but alphabetically herein. This anthology appeared in 1974. It neither contains any introductory note deliberating upon the development of the tradition nor does it provide any an notations to help the reader to understand the verses.

Poet Agyeya, in 1943, took a lead in presenting a group of seven emerging poets under the title Tar-Saptak which later turned out to be a starting point for more to follow. The compiler, in his introduction, had underlined the common feature of the poets grouped together in the anthology of the following words: "They do not belong to any particular school, they have not arrived at their destinations, they are yet on their course, or rather in search of their course" (p. 5). This was followed up by three more such 'Saptaks' over period of almost four decades. Representative poems of each of the poet in these anthologies were prefaced by statements of each one of them about his or her creative process.

Some good chronological anthologies of modern poetry have also appeared during the recent past, e.g. Kavitayen 1954 (Devishanker Awasthi and Ajit Kumar); Kavitayen 1963, 64, 65 (Ajit Kumar and V.N. Tripathi); Hindi Ki Pratinidhi Shreshth Kavitayen 1968-70 (Bachchan and Ajit Kumar), Athven Dashak Ki Pratinidhi Shreshtha Kavitayen 1971-80 (Bachchan and Ajit Kumar) and so on.

Another remarkable anthology of modern poetry was compiled and edited by Sumitranandan Pant, Balkrishna Rao and Nagendra under the title Kavi Bharati some two decades back. It reveals a fine selection of each poet's representative work. Another fairly comprehensive and representative anthology appeared in 1979 under the title Kavita aur Kavita compiled by Indranath Madan. Its preface explains the compiler's approach in respect of the anthology and its three sections have been divided under three significant heads, viz. 'Chhayavad ke Pahle' and 'Chhayavad' as the high water-mark of poetic creativity during the present century. He gives an assesment of the poetic process and the achievements of the age in a long introduction at the beginning of his anthology.

In the Post-Chhayavad period, lyricical compositions (Geet) were found to a certain extent but in the post-independence period its frequency has acquired an accelerated pace and there have been some good anthologies of lyrical compositions. Some of these deserve special mention: Panch Jor Bansuri (ed. by Chandradev Singh) Navgeet Dashak (Part I, and II) (ed. by Shambhu Nath Singh), Dineshayan (ed. by Dinesh Saxena and Git (I & II) (ed. by Bhupendrakumar Snehi, 1967.)

There have been some dialectal poetic compilations also which is perhaps natural in view of the fact that 'Braj' and 'Awadhi' held sway over vast tracts of this land for almost five centuries in the field of poetic composition. Viyogi Hari had compiled and edited a very useful and commendable anthology of Braj Bhasha poetry in 1923 under the title Braj-Madhuri-Sar. In 1940, Ayodhya Singh Upadhyaya 'Hariaudh' had also compiled an anthology of 'Braj Bhasha' poetry under the title Vibhutimati Braj Bhasha. Later, Ram Shukla 'Rasal' prepared and published an anthology of worthwhile modern poets writing in Braj Bhasha under the title Adhunik Braj Bhasha Kavya.

There has long been a tradition of anthologies based on the number of poetic verses included, e.g. 'Bisi', 'Pichisi' ('Pachasha', 'Shatak', 'Satsai', etc.) We find examples of two 'Satsai' (comprising Seven Hundred or so verses) anthologies. The first was brought out by Shyam Sunder Das in 1931 under the title Satsai Saptak which included seven 'Satsais'. There is a long introduction and an appendix giving clues to meanings and a concordance of the verses. Fourteen years later, Kailash Bhatnagar published an anthology titled Nav Satsai—Sar which contained the selected best of nine 'Satsais'.

ANTHOLOGIES (Kannada) The first anthology dates back to the 13th century. It is entitled Suktisudharnava and also called Kavyasara, an important landkmark in the history of Kannada literature. It was compiled by Mallikarjuna who also called himself Mall, Mallapa and Chidananda Yogi. He tells us that he was 'Yadava Katakacharya' i.e. 'a teacher to army personnel' under the Hoysala king Vira Somesvara (1233-1254). The accepted date of the work is 1245. Opinion is divided as to whether Mallikarjuna was a Jain or a follower of the Vedic faith.

Suktisudharnava or Kavyasara (Essence of Poetry) is a collection of about 2200 verses from 28 Champu Kavyas under 18 topics such as descriptions of the sea, the mountains, the six seasons, moonlight, sunrise and sunset, love, war, capital city, etc. which were considered the sine qua non of a Mahakavya (Epic) by both poets and rhetoricians. The names of poetical works from which selections have been made are not mentioned by the compiler. But scholars have identified such works, and this has been helpful in fixing the approximate dates of certain works. Among the major poets who find a place in the anthology may be mentioned Pampa, Ranna, Ponna, Nagavarma and Janna Harihara.

There have been two imitations of Suktisudharnava, one entitled Kavyasara by Abhinava Vadi Vidyananda (C 1550) and the other of the same name by Mallakavi, discovered recently and published by the Kannada Sahitya Parishat (1973). Since Kavyasara ascribed to Vadi Vidyananda bears a close resmeblance to Suktisudharnava, it is quite likely that the compiler of Kavyasarar only revised it omitting some selections and adding others from a couple of works composed after Suktisudharnava which contains 2200 verses and is divided into 18 chapters. Kavyasara contains only 1143 verses. The third anthology is certainly of a more recent origin. The editor of Kavyasara, N. Anantarangachar, ascribes the authorship to one Mallakavi and says that nothing is known about the date and other details of the author, and even doubts if this Mallakavi could be Mallikarjuna himself. It is quite likely that an anonymous compiler has based his anthology on the previous two collections and has considerably enlarged them, with more selections from other works which were either not used or not available to the previous two anthologists. This voluminous anthology contains 3,555 verses and is divided into 15 chapters. All the three anthologies have proved to be useful in determining the dates of many poets represented in them on the basis of verses quoted. They also indicate the prevalent literary taste of the anthologists and their times.

Except Vaddaradhana (9th century) and Chavundarayapuranam (10th century), two works written entirely in old Kannada prose, we have no prose works until the time of Chikkadevaraja and Mummadi Krishnaraja Wodeyar when writing in prose received great fillip. But it is only in the early decades of the 20th century that we find genuine prose coming into its own. In this straggling growth of Kannada prose, a rare literary phenomenon in the form of Vachanas appeared on the literary scene during the 12th century as an inevitable offshoot of the Virasaiva socio-religious reformist movement spearheaded by Basavesvara and his contemporaries, known as Sivasaranas. The Vachanas (sayings) are spontaneous utterances in rhythmic prose of the spiritual and religious experiences of the votaries of the new faith. These utterances seem to have been recorded on palm-leaves during the lifetime of the vachanakaras, and the result was the growth of a wealth of manuscripts containing Vachanas. When this wealth faced virtual destruction due to the vandalism of Mahomadan invasions into the south, there was a conscious effort to salvage them and there arose a band of anthologists engaged in compiling collections of Vachanas from what was left in the shape of fragments of valuable manuscripts. Among such anthologies may be mentioned Ganabhasita Ratnamale by Kallumathada Prabhudeva (1430), Visesanubhava Satsthala by Channaviracharya (16th century), Bedagina Vachanagalu by Singalada Siddha Basavaraja (1600) and others. But the most noteworthy anthologies are those which bear the appellation Sunya Sampadane–connoting spiritual attainment of Sunya or 'The Mystical Zero' symbolizing the Supreme Soul (Parasiva) which Is and Is Not.

They are the following four:

Sunya Sampadane by Sivagana Prasadi Mahadevayya (1400-30), Sunya Sampadane by Halageyadeva (1500-30) Sunya Sampadane by Gummalapurad Siddhalinga Yati Sunya Sampadane by Guluru Siddha Virannodeya.

The first is of course the pioneering effort and the subsequent ones are revised and improved versions of the first. The last one is the best of the bunch.

The noteworthy feature of this type of collection of Vachanas consists in that the Vachanas are arranged in the form of a dialogue conducted by Allama Prabhu with the other Saranas. It appears as though the anthologist is presenting us with a verbatim report of the exchange of notes and discussions carried on at the Anubhava Mandapa (Conclave of Siva Saranas). Allama Prabhu is the presiding deity guiding the deliberations. The whole work is imbued with a rare dramatic quality and is reminiscent of the Dialogues of Plato.

In the modern period we see a regular effort in preparing anthologies of verses, short stories, one-act plays and essays. Among the anthologies of verses, English Gitagalu (Bangalore, 1926) by 'Sri' (B.M. Srikantia), is an anthology of free rendering of selected lyrics by poets of the Romantic age of English poetry such as Wordsworth, Coleridge, Cowper, Blake, Shelley and others. English Gitagalu is more in the nature of a transcreation rather than a translation and heralded the navodaya or the Romantic age of modern Kannada poetry. English Gitagalu of Sri greatly influenced the younger generation of the day and a good number of his students with creative talent studying at Maharaja's College, Mysore, began writing poetry. Their maiden efforts were collected in two anthologies, Kiria Kanike (1928) and Taliru (1930) published by the Karnataka Sangha of the college. The anthologies of the Master and his students were trend-setters in the field of modern Kannada poetry.

The Romantic development in Kannada poetry did not break away from its moorings in traditional poetry; it represented all that was lost in the cultural heritage of the land and reflected the aspirations of the English-educated public and the nationalistic upsurge sweeping over the land, and exposed itself to new influences like progressivism, and the new writing which had come into vogue in the thirties and forties. These new phases of poetry influenced the course of other genres of Kannada literature also, particularly the short-story and the novel. The essay was cultivated by very few writers and it has retained its identity to this day. The one-act play, which developed after the English model, gave us a rich crop during its short-lived period of significant achievement on the 'amateur' stage. But suprisingly, anthologies of one-act plays are few and far between, Quantitatively speaking, poetry and short story have claimed the major share in modern Kannada literature and so it is natural that they are represented by a number of anthologies.

It cannot be said that the anthologies in Kannada always represent the best and all the distinguished writers in the genre. They are subject to the preferences of the editor and of course the limited publicity of all the best that is produced in the particular genre being anthologized.

Sasana-padya-manjari is a collection of inscriptional poems (from 700 to 1465, ed. R. Narasimhachar, Bangalore, 1923). In his Prefatory Note, the Editor observes, "most of the records bear testimony to the prowess, piety, generosity, patriotism and tolerance of the princes and the people." It is the intention of the Editor "to give to the Kannadigas a taste of the style and beauty of these compositions of their own countrymen, which cannot but arouse a feeling of pride in them."

Kannada Bavuta (The Kannada Flag, ed. Srikantia, B.M., Bangalore, 1938). Here the flag symbolizes all that is best and noble in the cultural heritage of the Kannada people and their love of their land and language as reflected in the compositions selected from inscriptions, ancient literature, folk songs, contemporary poetry (The selection ranges from 700 to 1938).

Padya Ratnakara (Ocean of Verse-gems, Ed. Manvi Narasinga Rao and others, Hyderabad, 1956) is modelled on the above and up-dated. It is more voluminous and contains selections from classical literature. It is also more varied than the above anthology in regard to subject-matter.

In Hosakannada Kavyasri (Wealth of Modern Kannada Poetry, eds. Bendre, B.R. and Bhat, M.M., a SIBT Publication Madras, 1957) 42 poets are represented.

Akasara-hosa Kavya is an anthology of modern poems (ed: Lankesh P. Sagar, 1970) and contains 34 poems of the second generation of poets belonging to the so-called 'Navya' school of poets, or Navya Kavis. The New Poets movement was spearheaded by Gopala Krishna Adiga, though it was originally initiated by V.K. Gokak.

Navya Dhwani (New Voices, ed. V.K. Gokak & C.S. Kanavi, Bangalore, 1956) contains selections from 20 poets.

Samkramana Kavya (Transitional Poetry, ed: Chandrasekhar Patil, Giraddi Govindaraja, Siddhalinga Pattanshetty, Dharwad, 1965) is an anthology of representative poems by 59 poets.

Suvarna Samputa (Golden Chest) was a publication sponsored by the Institute of Kannada Studies, Mysore University, 1980, to mark the Golden Jubilee of the inception of Postgraduate studies in Kannada in 1928 by B.M. Srikantia and is claimed to be a comprehensive anthology of modern Kannada poetry modelled on the Golden Treasury of English Poetry.

Samakalina Kannada Kavita is an anthology of contemporary Kannada poetry, Bangalore University Publication in two parts. Part I, 1978 & Part II, 1980. The first part contains 63 poems representing 18 poets and is divided into five sections 'motif-wise'. The second part contains 55 poems and includes poems from the (Old-Guard) poets like B.M.S. Panje, Pai and Masti not represented in the first part. The anthologies Nurondu Kavana: (One Hundred and one poems) and Kannada Kavya Sanchaya (A collection of Kannada Poems) are published by the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi.

Anthologies on famous persons like Basaveswara (Sangama, 'Confluence', Bangalore, 1969), Gandhiji (Satabdi Deepa–'Centenary Lamp', Bangalore, 1971), K.V. Puttappa (Kavigaly Kanda Kuvempu: Kuvempu as poets see him, Bangalore, 1971), Kristanjali (Tribute of poems to Christ, Christ College, Kannada Sangha, Bangalore, 1973), have appeared. A few collections of 'War-Poems' expressing patriotic fervour and the heroic sentiments (Holapu-Thalapu "The Rattle and the Flash of the Sword", Vijaya Dundubhi "Victory Drum", etc., Bangalore, 1963) at the time of the Chinese aggression (1962), demonstrates the patriotism of the contemporary poets. Jivana Prabhata (The Dawn of Life, Bangalore , 1936) is a collection of compositions on Insurance. Though propagandistic in nature, the poems have the virtue of readability and prove that the poet could rise to any occasion.

Kamana-Billu (Rainbow), Bangalore, (1932) and Navilu Gari (Peacock-feather, Dharwar, (1932) are the earliest anthologies of short stories. The former was edited by A.N. Krishna Rao, himself a well known short story writer.

Nadedu Danda Dari (The Path Traversed, Dharwar, 1960) is a representative collection of 35 stories produced Kamadhenu (The Divine Bow, Bangalore, 1958) and Diganta (Horizon, Bangalore, 1960) are ambitious projects edited by Suryanarayana Cadaga, the popular novelist. All the stories in the former, nearly a hundred, are by women writers. The latter also contains nearly 50 stories.

Hosa Kshitija (New Horizon, Ed. by G.B. Joshi, Dharwar, 1965) is a significant collection. All the stories are by 'avant-garde' writers.

Sahitya Akademi, Southern Languages Book Trust and National Book Trust deserve credit for bringing out occasionally good collections of stories.

Sahitya Akademi, Delhi, has published the anthologies Kannada Sanna Kathegalu (Kannada Short Stories, 1962), Marathi Sanna Kathegalu and Hindi Sanna Kathegalu.

The Southern Language Book Trust, Madras, has published anthologies like South Indian Short Stories (from Tamil, Telugu, Kannada and Malayalam, 1959); Nava-katha-Guccha ('Bunch of New stories, Parts I & II, 1961); Indian Kathegalu ('Present-day Stories', a collection of best stories gathered from Sudha, a popular Kannada Weekly, 1965).

One of the earliest of the very few anthologies of essays is Harate (Gossip, Dharwar, 1930) which contains essays in a lighter vein. It was followed by Sulavu-Holgvu (Appearances and Flashes, Dharwar, 1939), a fairly representative anthology. Hosakannada Prabandha Sankalana (Sahitya Akademi Publication, 1961) contains 39 essays and is an honest attempt to present the very best, representing the different aspects of the genre.

Though hundreds of one act-plays were produced when they were a rage on the amateur stage very few anthologies came out. Sahitya Akademi has brought out a couple of anthologies; one is the Kannada version of Telugu one-act plays.

Suhasa (Good Laugther, Bangalore, 1974) is a lone example of a fairly comprehensive anthology of humorous prose writing in Kannada, representing 160 modern authors, besides including 25 selections from old Kannada poetry and prose. In a stupendous endeavour of this nature quality of selections is bound to be uneven.

M.V.S.

ANTHOLOGIES (Malayalam) started with the advent of modern education through schools. Herman Gundert, a German scholar, prepared the first anthology of prose and poetry by name Pathamala during the 50's of the 19th century. Pathamala contains only a dozen pages of prose, the remaining ones all poems, selected from the classics of Malayalam literature. Then, by 1867 Kerala Varma Valiya Koyil Thampuran, who is known as the father of modern Malayalam prose, joined the Text Books Committee constituted by the Government of Travancore. For the use of students in schools, Kerala Varma compiled a graded series of anthologies of poems by name Padyapathavali which ran into seven volumes. He collected pieces of poetry from old poets like Cherusserry, Ezhuthacchan, Kunchan Nampiar and from contemporary poets like Kumaran Asan, K.C. Kesava Pillai, Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer and Vallathol Narayana Menon. These pathavalis were in use for a long time in the schools of Travancore. Kerala Varma also started compiling anthologies of prose by name Gadya Malikas. Later Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer prepared another anthology for the use in schools. Then the Universities of Madras and Kerala also made attempts to produce anthologies to suit their syllabi.

Later anthologies with a different purpose began to appear. Collections of freedom poems (Swathanthrya Gitangal–1948) and revolutionary poems (Nalukettitiyunnu–1936, Sasvatha rasmikal–1944) were brought out in book form. Individuals like P. Sankaran Nampiar and Suranad Kunjan Pillai have taken the initiative in producing anthologies of Malayalam poems. The Publications Division of the Government of India, Kavita Samiti, D.C. Books and National Book Stall have also contributed to the field of anthologies. The Kavita Samiti, Trivandrum, is publishing an anthology every year collecting the best poems of the period. A few anthologies of modern poems have also come out recently. Even then, Malayalam cannot claim to have enough anthologies.

ANTHOLOGIES (Marathi) The advent of anthologies in Marathi was at the spurring of British scholars during the 19th century. The anthology Navanit (1854) was a government sponsored enterprise prepared for the use of students and teachers of old Marathi poetry. This anthology, compiled by Pandit Parashuram Balwant alias Parashuramtatya Godbole proved to be a landmark and also model for others to follow. This anthology contained poetic or verse passages of poets from 13th to early 19th century. It was prepared by the editor, after a sort of research, for works of old or ancient poets were not readily available. A glossary of difficult words was appended to it and it remained the most popular anthology and the next two generations of scholars and students were indebted to this anthology. Many revised editions and reprints of it occured and finally a fully revised edition edited by Priyolkar, was published by the Bombay State Government, and the original authentic texts of the passages were reinstated, as the first editor had made changes in them, compatible with the taste of the rather conservative public of mid-19th century.

It was brought out in 1954.

No such anthology of old historical or other prose writing was brought out till the nationalist movement took roots in the minds of the Marathi speaking public. The British anthologists were not enthusiastic about any such undertaking for political reasons. The only medieval prose writing then known was that of the dynastic chronicles, called 'Bakhar' in Marathi. The bulk of historical correspondence, brought to light by scholars and historians was hardly meant to be literature. Yet gleanings and cuttings from this bulk were collected in a significant anthology by G.S. Sardesai. It was called Aitihasika Patrabodha comprising of letters of different Maratha rulers and Jahagirdars, including Shivaji, the founder of Maratha empire. It was published in 1939. A second edition was brought out in 1965 by Bhimrao Kulkarni with introduction and copious notes. A bigger volume of the historical correspondence called Aitihasika Patravyavahara was available in 1923 and G.S. Sardesai was one of the editors; but it was more of the nature of material for history than literature. One good collection of passages from the Bakhar was published in 1952 and edited and annotated by G.B. Gramopadhye. The anthologies or collections of very old Marathi prose and verse were the ones edited by S.G. Tulpule and were a good specimens of its kind. They were titled Prachina Marathi Gadya, Mahanubhav Gadya, & Mahanubhav Padya and were published in 1949. A noteworthy anthology of prose writings of the 19th century i.e. the prose that appeared in the post-Peshwa period right upto the beginning of the true modern Marathi prose, was compiled by Bhimrao Kulkarni in Marathi Gadyacha Purvaranga (1965) giving a fair idea of the early Marathi prose, beginning from the Bala Mitra of S.K. Chhatre (1928) upto the pre-Nibandhamala period. The first attempt was the famous book of Mahamahopadhyaya Datto Waman Potedar, named Marathi Gadyacha Ingraji Awatara, in which 28 selected passages are quoted from the varied Marathi prose works published during the early British Rule. These supplementary passages form a very important and useful anthology of the 19th century Marathi prose. A similar attempt was made by G.B. Sardar in his Arwachin Marathi Gadyachi Purvapithika–the antecedents of the modern Marathi prose, written during the Pre-Nibandhamala period of the 19th century. This volume first discusses the nature of these antecedents and ends every chapter with a selected passage of representative prose. The anthology of D.W. Potdar was published in 1922-23, Sardar's book appeared in 1937 and its second edition was brought out in 1956. Potdar was himself a renowned research scholar. A lot of time was spent by him in finding out the sources for the work. Thus it was a pioneering work in its field. Sardar's work was an outcome of both literary and social outlook; it covered a wider field and its second edition had the advantage of wider research in that field and thus it covered, more extensively, the period between 1800 and 1874.

During the last two decades of the 19th century three different series of selections–or rather collections of medieval and old Marathi poems appeared on the scene. The first to come out was Aneka Kavikrita Kavita, the first volume of which appeared in 1883 and the fourth and last was published in 1889. This was soon followed by Aneka Kavikrita Pade-Katava etc. edited by the distinguished scholar V.D.Oka. Its first volume was published in 1894 and the third and last volume in 1901. V.L. Bhave brought out Sphuta Kavya-sangraha, a compilation of shorter and stray Marathi poetic exercises that covered the long span of Marathi verse, both lyrical and narrative, and it was published in two parts, in 1905 and 1907 respectively. Abhinava Kavyamala soon followed in four parts, beginning in 1909 and ending in 1923, edited by such eminent scholars as Laxmanshastri Lele and N.C. Kelkar. A fifth volume, devoted to the poetic writings of female poets was edited by Saraswatibai Lele and published in 1925. An anthology of high order called Kavya-Madhuri was published by Vritavaibhava in 1870 and another volume of that name, edited by W.D. Oka seems to have appeared in 1884. But many series appeared in the first decades of the 20th century of which Shri Maharashtra Sharada, edited by poet Ajnatawasi alias Dinkar G. Kelkar and P.K. Atre appeared in 1923 (Vol. I) and in 1930 (Vol. II). Another extensive series Maharashtra Rasavanti edited by the poet S.B. Ranade and G.D. Khanolkar was published in three volumes from 1935-1936. Yet other two more significant attempts at bringing out anthologies of poetic and lyrical writings were made. Marathi Kavita 1920-1950 was edited by W.R. Dhavale. N.G. Joshi edited Prachina Gita Bhandara. It was a veritable Golden Treasury of poetically significant old-time compositions. It appeared in 1959 and was soon acclaimed as an authentic edition of lyrical poems and songs. About that time Nave Navanita was published by V.S. Deshpande. Quite a few other anthologies were also available. Most of them were collections of selected poems and modern lyrical writings such as Kavya-Vahini in five volumes prepared by R.S. Joag and Kusumagraja (V.V. Shirwadker). Panch Kavi edited with a critical introduction, was an anthology of selected compositions of the five representative poets of early 20th century. Kavyakaumudi (1924) and Rasatarangini (1910) were collections of old and new poems mainly meant for the use of the school and college students. A credit of preparing the anthology of contemporary Marathi writing goes to P.K. Atre. His Aruna Wachanmala and Aruna Wachanmala were noteworthy efforts. Mangal Wachanmala by V.S. Khandekar is an important landmark in school anthologies. There was a flood of such anthologies during the period from 1950 to 70. A selected collection of the Lavani songs Marathi Lavani was neatly edited by M.V.

Dhond and was published in 1958. Likewise a collection of devotional Marathi songs along with many original Sanskrit 'stotras' and 'slokas' was prepared and edited by the L.R. Pangarkar and it has run into several editions upto now. This collection was called Bhakti Marga Pradipa and was first published in 1904. Many more such collections have been published by publishing houses with a view to placate religious or romantic public by producing collections of devotional songs and romantic lavanis. The interest in the folk songs led Acworth and Shaligrama, jointly to collect the Gondhali lore. Their unique collection contains a Powada of Sinhagad, romantic-historic ballad by Agindas or Ajnandas that was probably composed during the reign of chhatrapati Shivaji, in both its smaller and expanded versions. These historical ballads were afterwards collected in three volumes by historical researcher and writer Y.N. Kelkar. They form a definitive edition of these 'Powadas', first traced and edited by Shaligrama with the inspiration and help of Acworth. Y.N. Kelkar made further additions to them and brought out this definitive edition, after great effort and expense.

ANTHOLOGIES (Punjabi), Compilation of anthologies in Punjabi began in 1604 with the preparation of Guru Granth Sahib by Guru Arjun Dev (1563-1606), containing sacred composition of some Sikh Gurus. The works of the Hindu Saints and Muslim Sufis (belonging to 12th to 17th centuries) besides the sacred scripture of the perpetual gurus of the Sikhs are also regarded as 'part of mankind's common spiritual treasure' of the Punjabi literature. The anthology was printed for the first time in 1864 at Lahore and was followed soon after by numerous selections and collections of hymns made out of it in various forms, such as Punjgranthi, Nitnem, Amrit Kirtan (compiled by Guru Harcharan Singh, 1965) ; Bhagat Bani (compiled by Bhai Jodh Singh, 1913); Baee Varan (compiled by S.S. Amol, 1944); Amar Bani (ed. by Harnam Singh Shan, 1951), Gur Deepak (ed. by Taran Singh, 1960). Anthologies of hynms composed by individual poets have also been compiled and published from time to time, e.g., Slok Sheikh Farid (ed. by Sahib Singh, 1946), Guru Nanak Bani (ed. by Rattan Singh Jaggi, 1968), Bani Bhagat Ravidas Ji Ki (ed. by Harnam Singh Shan, 1984).

Choice collections of verses composed by other Saints and Sufis, not included in that Holy Book, have also been compiled and published (e.g., Punjabi Bhagti-Kavya, ed. by Mohan Singh Uberoi, 1944; Sufi-Kavya Sangrah, ed. by Harnam Singh Shan, 1961).

Anthologies of secular literature have also been prepared and produced in various forms and genres, such as, selections from representative (1) prose and poetry, e.g., Vidya Ratnakar by Bhai, Bishan Das Puri, 1923; Dipmala by Mohan Singh Uberoi 1943; Sahityavari by Harman Singh Shan, 1953; Adbi Mehkan by Shehbaz Malik, 1980. (2) poetry, e.g., Chaunvin Punjabi Kavita by Teja Singh, 1933 ; Meri Chaunvin Kavita by Kartar Singh Duggal, 1945; Satrangi Pingh by Gopal Singh, 1953; Purana Makhion and Sanjh Swera by Harnam Singh Shan, 1956 ; Chaunvin Punjabi Kavita by Amrita Pritam, 1957. (3) prose, e.g., Soch-Vichar by Pritam Singh, 1951 ; Chaunvin Gadya by Harnam Singh Shan, 1955 ; Lehran by Faqir Mohd. Faqir, 1968; Adhunik Punjabi Vartak by Gurbachan Singh Talib, 1952; Puratan Punjabi Vartak by Surinder Singh Kohli, 1973; Punjabi Nibhandavali by Jit Singh Sital, 1970. (4) One-Act Plays, e.g., Sat Chaunvin Ikangi by Balwant Gargi, 1951; Chaunvin Ikangi by Gopal Singh, 1954; Mera Chaunvan Ikangi by Kartar Singh Duggal, 1957; Pratinidh Punjabi Ikangi by Gurdial Singh Phul, 1969; Chaunvin Punjabi Ikangi by Attar Singh, 1973. (5) Critical Essays, e.g., Parakh-Parchol by Harnam Singh Shan, 1961; Punjabi Alochnatmakh Lekh by Roshan Lal Ahuja, 1973; Punjabi Alochna, Ik Prichey by Jasbir Singh Ahluwalia, 1969; Lalan Di Pand by Iqbal Slah-ul-Din, 1973. (6) Short Stories, e.g., Meri Chaunvin Kahani by Kartar Singh Duggal, 1944; Chaunvian Kahanian, Rang-Barangian, Neehan te Mamtian by Harnam Singh Shan, 1954, 1955, 1958; Navin Kahani Sangrah by Gurbachan Singh 'Talib', 1961; Qissa Punjab by Harbhajan Singh, 1972. Kahani Punjabi by Surinder Singh Uppal (1979); Waghion Paar by Shahin Malik (Selected Punjabi short stories of Pakistan - 1982). (7) Short Biographies, e.g., Mahan Purakh by Harnam Singh Shan, 1956; Dharti De Lal by Sujan Singh, 1958.

Such anthologies containing choice selections from the writings of Punjabi writers living abroad or in other states of India have also been published from time to time, e.g., Pakistan Di Ajoki Punjabi Kahani by S. Darshan Singh Awara, 1970; Dukh Daryaon Par De by Attar Singh & Jagtar (1980); Chaunvin Punjabi Kavita (of J & K) by Amar Singh, 1973; Chauvian Dogri Kahanian by Chandan Negi, 1976; Purab Dian Kirnan (Bengal) by Baldev Singh, 1977.

Eleven such anthologies were produced in 1971-72 by Harnam Singh Shan under two separate series, called Selected Punjabi Poetry (published under seven titles, viz., Gitavali, Kvitavali, Kava-rasavali, Puranian Lihan, Navian Leehan, Vichle Pandh, Navian Sedhan; and Selected Punjabi Prose (under four titles, viz., Gaddya-arambh, Gaddya-Ussar, Gaddya-Pasar, Gaddya-Parvah)

Selections of some specific forms of Punjabi poetry and prose have also come out, such as, Punjab Dian Varan, Ganda Singh, 1947; Punjabi Varan, Punjabi Baramahe, Punjabi Majhan, Piara Singh Padam, 1951, 1959; Prachin Jangname, Shamsher Singh Ashok, 1955; Chaunvian Qafian, Surinder Singh Kohli, 1966; Punjabi Siharfian, Jit Singh Sital, 1972; and Sreshth Goshtan, Pritam Singh.

Collection and compilation of folk-songs, folk-tales and legends in the form of anthologies has also received due attention; e.g., Punjab de Git, Ram Saran, 1931; Punjab de Lok-git, Kulu-Kangre de Lok-git, Haryana de lok-git, M.S. Randhawa, 1955, 1960; Punjab dian Lok-kahanian, Punjab dian Janaur-kahanian, Schinder Singh 'Wanjara Bedi; 1953, 1955; Nain Jhanan, Harjit Singh, 1942; Bar de dhole, Sher Singh Sher, 1954; Neeli te Ravi, Kartar Singh Shamsher, 1958; Pahari Goonjan, Avtar Singh, 1950; Sade Lokgit, Avtar S. Daler; Lok Punjab, Mazhar-ul-Salam, 1978; Prit Kahanian, M.S. Randhawa, 1957.

Choice collections from the writings of single authors, in the following two forms, have also contributed to this branch of Punjabi literature: (1) chosen and edited by the authors themselves, e.g., Meri Chaunvin Kavita, by Piara Singh Sehrai, 1942, by Amrita Pritam, 1943 by Prabhjot Kaur, 1958, by Mohan Singh, 1977; Mere Chaunvin Nibandh by S.S. Amol, 1957; *Merian Chaunvian Kaha-*Shan, 1960; Kartar Singh Blaggan di Chaunvin Kavita by Gurmukh Singh Jeet (1981) (2) chosen and edited by others e.g., Safir di Chaunvin Kavita, by Kartar Singh Duggal, 1948; Puran Singh di Chaunvin Kavita by Harnam Singh Shan, 1960; Bhai Mohan Singh Vaid di Vartak-Vangi by Abnash Kaur, 1967; Teja Singh de Chaunvin Lekh (entitled Ghar da Piar) by Harnam Singh Shan, 1960; Kartar Singh Blaggan di chaunvin Kavita by Suba Singh & Mohan Singh, 1975.

Anthologies of essays/papers written by various writers/critics about the work and act of a single author have also added such to this genre, e.g. Nanak Singh Te Usdi Kala Swinder Singh Uppal, 1964; Gurbakhsh Singh Pritlari, M.S. Randhawa, 1972; Bhai Vir Singh: Jivan, Samman te Rachna, Surinder Singh Kohli & Harnam Singh Shan, 1973; Puran Singh Amarjit Singh Dhillon, 1981; Mohan Singh: Ik Vishleshan, Surinder Singh Narula, 1982.

H.S.S.

ANTHOLOGIES (Sanskrit), are collections of favourite verses and in Sanksrit there are more than a dozen such printed compilations. They were called either Sukti or Subhashita (a well spoken or turned out saying), like Suktimuktavali, Subhasitaratnakosha; or after the name of the person who compiled such a collection like the Sarngadharapaddhati. Such collections were a natural outcome of the dominance of oral tradition, a desire for poets to compose independent (technically anibaddha or muktaka) rather than a whole composition and a wish on the part of the knower of such verses to preserve them in a collection for posterity. At some point in the history of Sanskrit literature a convention developed of publishing independent self-contained verses in a collection of a hundred (Shataka) or of several hundred (Shatakas). Poets like Amaru, Bhartrhari and Bhallata have become famous in this line. Anandavardhana (8th cent. Kashmirian) refers specially to this class of literature in his epoch-making rhetorical treastise Dhvanyaloka and pays encomium to their skill in composing single self-contained verses full of picturesque description and emotional exuberance. The earliest collection of such century of verses is however in Maharashtri Prakrit, the Sattasai or Saptashati (seven hundred) ascribed to a Hala Satavahana. The content of these Prakrit lyrics relates almost exclusively to country life, the life of the villages scattered along the banks of the Godavari or in its tributary valleys running up into the Vindhya mountains.

True to the name 'Subhashita' the anthologies stand apart as essence of the whole Kavya literature. Enlightened critics and religious sects from different parts of India have made such compilations. The best Sanskrit anthology known is the Buddhist Vidyakara's Subhashitaratnakosha (12th cent.) This text and its separate English translation (by D.H.H. Ingalls) have been brought out in the Harvard Oriental series. Some other well-known Subhashitas are the Subhashitaratnasandoha (Kavyamala 82) by the Jain Amitagati (written in 993 and hence the earliest of the available specimens), Saduktikarnamrta, (printed, Calcutta 1964) of Shridharadasa from Bengal, Suktimuktavali (Gaekwad's Oriental series ed.) of Jalhana from West India, Sarngadharapaddhati (14th cent., Bombay; 1888), Subhashitavali (Bombay, 1886; Varanasi, 1974) of Valabhadeva (15th cent. Kashmir) and Subhashitanivi of Vedanta Deshika (15th cent. South Indian Vaisnavite).

The compilers of the Subhashitas were not simply interested in preserving their favourite verses for posterity. They bestowed much care in their presentation by systematically bringing them under different types-proverbial, erotic, ethical, descriptive, devotional, etc. and also under diverse topics - seasons, mountains, the gods, enjoyment of love, pangs of separation, good and bad men, etc. The reader of an anthology is thus presented with a panoramic view of one object and a gamut of feelings about the same as aroused by many poets. In many cases the names of the poets are appended, and some of these poets are not known outside the anthologies. The Subhashitas are therefore valuable not only in indicating the taste in the compilers' period in relation to the heritage of poetry then extant, but also for preserving examples of the works of poets not otherwise known at present.

ANTHOLOGIES (Sindhi). The earliest anthology of Sindhi poems which has come into light seems to be a manuscript in Persian entitled Bayan-ul-arfin va tanbihul-ghafilin (An account of holy people and advice to errants.)

It contains preachings of Shah Abdul Karim of Bulri

(1537-1622) written in the Persian language and his Sindhi verses written in Persian script. The work was compiled and prepared in 1628 by Muhammad Raza, one of the disciples of Shah Abdul Karim. Sindhi verses collected in the manuscript are those of Shah Abdul Karim numbering ninetytwo, Qazi Qadan-eight and five verses by other unknown poets. Besides, it contains three verses in Hindi and one poem in Persian. However the main purpose of the compiler was to collect preachings and poetry of a Sufi poet Shah Abdul Karim, his master. The verses of other poets included in the collection are those which were quoted by Shah Abdul Karim during his spiritual discourses.

The trend of compiling poetry of sufi Saints and devout persons was very common in medieval period. It has continued in the modern period also. Another important early anthology which has come to light is a Hindi manuscript Santon Ki Vani, the poetry of Saint poets, written in Devanagari script. It contains 112 Sindhi verses of Qazi Qadan (1463-1551), the first Sindhi poet whose large number of verses have been preserved in the written form.

The earliest anthology of Sindhi prose which has come to light in the printed form is a collection of five Sindhi folk tales given as an appendix in A grammar of the Sindhi language written by Captain George Stack and published by him from Bombay in 1849. The five folk tales are (1) The wise Kazi and two quarrelling women, (2) An old woman and two friends who deposited money with her, (3) A parcher of grain and a foolish boy, (4) The story of the Prince Amulu Maniku, and the Princess Husini, the Fairy, (5) The story of Rai Diachu. Captain George Stack has recorded the Sindhi folktales in Devanagari-Sindhi. Another collection of selected Sindhi writings was compiled by E.Trumpp, entitled Sindhi Reading Book. The collection was published in both Devanagari-Sindhi and Perso-Arabic characters by him from London in 1858.

Udharam Thanvardas Mirchandani (1833-1883) one of the early prose writers, compiled a collection of Sindhi folktales, entitled Rai Diyacha Ain Sorathi ji Akhani (The story of Rai Diyacha and Soratha). The book was published in 1861 and contains the translated version of the story of Rai Diyacha and Soratha as given by Captain George Stack.

Some of the other important anthologies brought out upto the end of the last century are Barana Shaira (Nursery rhymes, 1870) by Mirza Qalich Beg, Sindhi Gujharatun (Sindhi riddles, 1888) and Barana Gita (Songs for children, 1891) both compiled by Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani. Mufid-al-sabiyan (Moral and interesting stories for children, 1861) compiled by Mirza Muhammad Shah (First).

Since the first decade of the present century, some Sindhi scholars and educationists have tried to compile selections from Sindhi prose as well as poetry in a chronological order to show the gradual growth in language and style. In this direction, Dayaram Vasanmal Mirchandani (1880-1968) and Lilaram Premchand (1874-1959) brought out in 1907 the first ever anthology of Sindhi prose entitled, Guldasto, which contains prose writings in chronological order. The same collection in enlarged and slightly modified form was again brought out by Dayaram and Jamnadas Sadani (1890-1951) in 1935 and 1953. It has remained an ideal anthology of Sindhi prose for a study of the gradual changes in Sindhi language and style. Some other important works brought out on the same model are Bahar-e-Nasr (Spring of Sindhi Prose, 1932) by Bherumal Mahirchand Advani (1875-1950), Vichara (Thoughts, 1944) by Lalsingh, Hazarisingh Ajwani (1899-1976) which contains prose selections from D.J. Sindh College Miscellany; Baharistan (A place of spring) and Phula-Phulela (Variagated flowers) compiled by Nanikram Dharmadas Mirchandani in 1932; Jauharu-Nasru (An essence of Sindhi Prose) by Fatehchand and Mellaram Vasvani published in 1932; Sindhi Nasra ain Nazma jo Intakhab (selections from Sindhi prose and poetry) published by U.M. Dandpoto in 1940; Adabi Gulshan (Garden of Literature) selections from Sindhi prose and poetry brought out in three volumes by Naraindas Mevaram Bhambhani during 1944 to 1945; Naon Daur (New Era) a selection of Sindhi poetry from D.J. Sindh College Miscellany by Lalsingh Ajwani published in 1947; Manika, Moti, Lata (Gems, Pearls, Rubies), a chronological selection of Sindhi poetry published by Lalchand Jagtiani in 1927 and 1940.

During the forties some of the progressive writers brought out anthologies of Sindhi short stories entitled Registani Phoola (Desert Blossoms, 1944) and Piraha Phuti (Dawn, 1945) compiled by Gobind Malhi and Sindhi Kahanyun (Sindhi Short Stories, 1947) compiled by Sheikh Ayaz.

After independence a considerable number of Sindhi anthologies in prose as well as in poetry have appeared in India. Most of them contain selected writings of a single writer or a poet. For example, Kakha ain Kana (Straws and Stalks, essays) and Cheekha (A shriek, Poems) by Harumal Sadarangani; Anokha Azmuda (Extraordinary experiences) a collection of short stories by Ram Panjwani; Satu Saru (An Essence, a collection of critical essays on philosophy and literature, 1980) by Param Abichandani. Two very important anthologies entitled Chetna and Sahitya Ja Siddhant containing articles on literary criticism were edited by Anand Khemani. Anthologies containing selections from different prose writers or poets are comparatively limited in number. Among them such collections based upon historical development of a particular literary form, language and style are very few. The Sahitya Akademi has brought out some anthologies on chronological principles like Chunda Sindhi Shairu (Selections from Sindhi poetry).

Anthologies of Sindhi prose and poetry, covering different periods and literary trends and containing critical introductions as well as annotations on the peculiarities of language and style are still wanted.

ANTHOLOGIES (Tamil), are as old as the ancient and golden period of Tamil Literature viz., the Sangam Age of about two thousand years ago. Among Sangam works are several anthologies - the promiment one being Akananuru and Purananuru, each consisting of 400 poems.

There is no dearth of anthologies in the recent output of Tamil books. Purathirattu, an eighteenth century compilation in palm leaf manuscript, has been edited by S. Vaiyapuri Pillai and printed by the University of Madras.

Thanippadal Thirattu or collection of stray and unclassified songs mostly by anonymous poets has been brought out by K. Subramania Pillai (Ka Su Pillai) through Saiva Siddhantha Noorpathippuk Kazhagam. Similar publications under the same caption have been brought out by a number of enterprising editors and publishers, over a long period of time: the first one came out from Ratna Nayakar and Sons. Also worth mentioning are anthologies of the compositions of 'Siddhars' or mystic men endowed with superior faculties.

Pudhiya Attichudi compiled by S. Meyyappan of the Annamalai University is a modern version of the ancient didactic work conveying homely advice to the teen-agers. It is written by 12 scholars and it brings within its compass the entire spectrum of the modern age and current affairs.

The Sahitya Akademi has issued two anthologies, one of Tamil short stories and the other of Tamil poetry. A collection of short stories first printed in magazines is periodically selected by experts and published in book-form by 'Ilakkiaya Chintanai', a service-oriented literary forum. Vasakar Vattam has come out with an anthology of Travel literature by inviting contributions on various countries from well-known writers who have travelled abroad.

The Madurai Kamaraj University's anthology on Thiru Vi ka and the Annamalai University's handsome publication on Raja Sri Annamalai Chettiar and Subramanya Bharati are among the "centenary celebration outputs" which have become a current fashion.

Devotional literature too has its share. Mention may be made of Saiva Manjari published by Panditurai Thevar through the Madurai Tamil Sangam and Siva Neri Ceyyul Thirattu by Saiva Siddhantha Works Publishing Society in 1930.

An anthology of modern Tamil poems has been compiled by R.P. Sethu Pillai under the title Senchor Kovai. A similar publication of contemporary writers including the new-wave poets has been made available by Va Mu Seturaman.

ANTHOLOGIES (Telugu) Madiki Singana (last quarter of 14th century A.D.) who collected poems from various books and composed an anthology called Sakalaniti Sammatamu (1440) is considered to be the earliest known Telugu anthologist. He claimed this work of anthology to be a Prabandha. Nidadavolu. Venkata Rao considered Madiki Singana to be the first research scholar and his anthology to be the first research work. Anthologies in the past helped to trace the original works of forgotton poets.

The name of the second in the list of anthologists, however, in not available but a part of his anthology Udaharana padyamulu containing poems of 53 poets is available in the Andhra Sahitya Parishad's library at Kakinada. The sequence of poems is so arranged by the unknown anthologist that it gives the feeling of a Prabandha rather than of an anthology.

Arudra in his Samagra Andhra Sahityam Vol. 9 mentioned that Jaggand (14th century) the third in the list of anthologists borrowed poems of 31 poets from Udaharana Padyamulu, while compiling the anthology Prabandha Ratnakaramu which he did not acknowledge. Jaggana included poems of 60 popular poets in his anthology. The various categories under which he compiled the poems helped the systematic division of Telugu literature subsequently.

Later, Veturi Prabhakara Sastri (1888-1950) brought out an anthology Prabandha Ratnavali in 1918. He borrowed the poems from the earlier anthologies, Udaharana Padyamulu and Prabandha Ratnakaramu. It contains poems of writers starting from pre-Nannaya period to 1560. Another anthology Pranandha Mani Bhushanam edited by Manavalli Ramakrishna Kavi appeared in 1910 and comprises poems belonging to 16th and 17th century.

The other important anthologies of Telugu poetry in existence of the era of Prabandha Yugam are: Sri Krishna Lila Vilasamu by Pusapati Kumarachyutta Rama Raju: Sringara Padavali (1903) by Modi Jagannachamal; Rutuchakramu (1915) by Samardhi Rangaish Setti; Bharata Sara Muktavali and Bhagavata Sara Ratnavali by kattamanchi Symbrahmanya Reddy; Andhra Kavi Ratnakaramu (1900) by Bhattiproly Ramachandraiah, Varnana Ratnakaramu by Dasari Lakshmanaswami and Kalyana Kalpavalli (1956) by 'Karunasri' Jandhyala Papayya Sastri.

While compiling anthologies of modern Telugu poetry certain institutions and individuals have moulded them to suit their tastes and ideologies. Vythalikulu (1935) edited by Muddy Krishna consists of poems of 24 poets belonging to late 19th and 20th centuries. After Vythalikulu a variety of anthologies like Navyalokam, Kalpana, Udaya Ghantalu, Mahodayam, Adugujada Gurajadadi, Darsana, Navagara, Sri Sri Yugam, Mani Makutam, Jatiya Githalu, Pratyusha, Janasena Patalu, Mini Kavita Viplavam, etc. were published representing the various trends of progressive and revolutionery movements is Telugu poetry.

In 1965, six poets, styled themselves as "Digambara Kavulu" formed into a group and published an anthology Diklu. Since then group anthologies came out in good numbers. Tiragabadu Kavulu. Chetanavarthan Kavulu and Pygambara Kavulu have contributed much in this direction. Taram Taram, an anthology published by Verse Front, Hyderabad in 1976, claims to its credit the poetry of a generation of 100 poets.

Pushpanjali (1921) contains 'Bhava Githas' (lyrics) of 30 poets. Mahasankalpam (1975) compiled by Nanduri Ramamohana Rao and Indirakanti Srikanta Sarma is claimed to be an exclusive anthology of free verse presenting the various trends in the modern Telugu poetry. 'Yuva Bharati', a literary and cultural organisation in Hyderabad published a good number of anthologies of free verse like Mani Makutam, Krimira, Swecha Padhalu' Vichikalu (1968), Aksharalu (1971), Ushassu (1973), Sinduram (1974), Kavitalata (1976), Vedi Velugulu (1980), and Rekhalu (1981), Kavita (1975) Proddupodupu (1971), Madhura-Githalu (1962) etc. Some of the anthologies published by other literary organisations, like Navya Sahiti Samiti, Hyderabad published the anthology Navya Sahiti in which the best poems selected by the authors themselves who are none but the members of the Samiti were included. Abburi Chaya Devi's scheme to bring out the poetic collection Kavita three volumes per year could not continue for more than a year.

The Central Government and the Andhra Pradesh Government have played a very constructive role through the Akademies of the government. Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Academy, Hyderabad, published an anthology Chatu Padya Ratnavali (1978) comprising 373 Muktakas. Earlier Veturi Prabhakara Sastri and Dipala Pitchaiah Sastri had brought out separately anthologies of this type. The Southern Languages Book Trust, Madras, published Prachina Kavya Manjari in 1958 and Naveena Kavya Manjari in 1959 and Sahitya Akademy, New Delhi, published Telugu Kavya Mala in 1976. It was compiled by Katuri Venkateswara Rao. This anthology was divided into three parts, the first part with mostly pieces of translations of the epics of the old, the second part with original writings of 20 poets of the period from 16th century to 1850. and the third part comprising subjective poetry and poems on patroism and social consciousness. The National Book Trust, New Delhi, published the Anthology Telugu Kavita Samputi (1974) composed by Viswanatha Satyanarayana and Balantharapu Rajanikantha Rao with a collection of poems of 34 poets of post-independence period. The Information and Public Relations Department, Government of Andhra Pradesh published a good number of anthologies like Gitavali (1971), Archana (1971); Git-mala (1972), Vijayendira (1972), Diksha (1975) and Padandi Munduku (1975).

Andhra University under the editorship of L. Chakradhar Rao published an anthology called Kavita Sankalanam in 1977 in which we find poems from Nannaya to Viresalingam (1848-1919) in 50 pages.

Among the translations Bulgarian Kavita published by Andhra Pradesh Prakashan Writers Association, Guntur district, is noteworthy. Here Telugu translations of 40 poems of 5 prominent Bulgarian poets are included.

Another important translation This Tense Time (1981) by Vegunta Mohan Prasad (1941) is the first ever comprehensive anthology of Modern Telugu poetry rendered into English showing the wide range and diversity of style of Romantic, progressive and Revolutionery Movements.

ANUBHAVA (Kannada) is taken sometimes in the sense of mysticism or something mysterious. This is misleading but is taken in the wider connotation as the endeavour of the human mind to grasp the divine essence or the ultimate reality of things.

In this sense the word 'Anubhava' designed by the Sharanas of the 12th century may be taken as the Kannada equivalent to mysticism. "Anubhava is the gem of the inner spiritual world". "Anubhava is an abiding in the abode of the self'-thus they defined the word and impregnated it with the highest spiritual experiences, by creating a vast literature which is called Vachana Sahitya or Vachana Literature from the point of view of the form and, Anubhava Sahitya or Mystic Literature from the point of view of the content. This is, hence, a great period of Mystic Literature in Kannada.

Even before this, we had Jain Puranas in Kannada written by poets like Pampa, Ponna, Ranna, Nagachandra and others, But in those works mythological narrations of the lives of Tirthankaras get more prominence than direct mystic experience. So they are more religious than mystic, though, here and there we come across mystic experience. But they are descriptive narratives with the religious atmosphere as their background and backbone.

It was at the time of Siva Sharanas headed by Basaveswara during the 12th century that Kannada literature acquired a new dimension. Here also religion played an important part but it was not a religion of rituals and conventions, but an institutive awareness which transcended individual limitations and mental aberrations. Under his leadership thousands of Sharanas from all parts of the country rallied together. The new grounds of human knowledge and spiritual experience that have emerged from their discussion on a common platform called 'Anubhava Mandapa' and the Vachana literature that reflects them form an, unforgettable chapter.

Incidentally, in their effort to carry their message to every heart and home through the language of the common man, Kannada acquired a new vigour and vitality and enriched itself. The mystic literature of the Sharanas, in consequence, formed an outstanding landmark in the history of Kannada literature. Sharanas like Basavanna, Allamaprabhu, Akkamahadevi, Siddarama and others with their many-sided genius, mystic experiences and spiritual exercises shaped the language in its several forms. Their presentation, the manner of their expression, the similies, mataphors and other rhetoric figures they have made use of, their treatment of the theme and resultant effect all these reveal the peculiar strength of the Vachana literature.

After the Sharanas of the 12th century, we come to the Dasa Sahitya of the 15th century. It is another important period so far as mystic literature in Kannada is concerned. Purandara Dasa and Kanaka Dasa are very prominent names in this regard. Both of them belong to the 15th century, the great Vijayanagara Age. But traditionally the origin of Dasa Sahitya goes back to Madhvacharya, the originator of Dvaita philosophy. He and his pupil Naraharitirtha (13th century) started the Vaishnava Bhakti movement in Karnataka. It took a new turn and reached its culmination when it reached the common man through the simple and lucid Kannada songs composed by prominent and eminent personalities like Purandara Dasa and Kanaka Dasa.

Purandara Dasa, himself a single-minded devotee of god Purandara Vitthala, was able to see how great this life of spiritual endeavour was and how strangely man turned his face against it. He felt for the ingorance and miseries of the common man and went from house to house with the beacon light of spiritual or mystic songs. They were spontaneous and were powerfully blended with sweet music. So they could directly touch the hearts of the people. With his poetic insight and creative gift, he could transform his experience both of internal spiritual practice and of external worldly incidents and give them artisitic expression in the form of songs. They are called Kirtanas. He has written not hundreds but thousands of such songs imbued with rich and manifold experiences of life. He went from house to house singing his songs and moved about helping, counselling and consoling the distressed and the downtrodden.

Kanaka Dasa, who actually came from among the down-trodden, was even more powerful in some of his songs and nearer in his approach, to the common people. He too was a spiritual seeker and a vagrant ascetic, who carried the eternal message of religion from door to door. He was also a veritable poet who in his songs, could effectively communicate to and impress upon the people the perfect equality in society and religion, and also the experiences of his yogic practice.

Even after Kanaka Dasa and Purandara Dasa, there are some outstanding personalities in the Dasa order. Vijaya Dasa and Jagannatha Dasa may be mentioned here. The tradition came down to the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries also thus making Dasa Sahitya a significant aspect of mystic literature in Kannada.

Besides these two movements, i.e. Sharana Sahitya and 'Dasa Sahitya', we have another important aspect of mystic literature. That is a body of special type of songs introduced by Nijaguna Shivayogi, probably of the early 15th century. His Kaivalya Paddhati is a collection of songs. But these are not like the songs of the Dasas. The songs of Nijaguna are more reflective and philosophical, mainly concerned with yogic practice. That is why they are called Kaivalya Paddhati songs, i.e. songs of the pathway to Kaivalya or Moksha (final emancipation). The songs came to be known as 'Kaivalya Sahitya' or popularly called 'Tattva padagalu'.

After Nijaguna, a host of Virasaiva Saints, gurus and seekers followed the path and a number of such works were created upto the end of the 19th century. To name a few, Muppina Shadakshari (probably a contemporary of Nijaguna) whose collection of songs is called Subodhasara, Chidananda Avadhuta of the 17th century, Sarpabhushana Shivayogi of the 18th century, Balalila Mahanta Shivayogi Mailara Basavalinga Sharana Kadakolada Madivala Yogi, Kudaluresha, Nimbargi Maharaj, and even Shishunal Sharif may also be included here.

This mystic literature of 'Tattva padagalu' has become so vast that it requires a special study which is yet to be undertaken. They do not remain at the poetic level, though that is the starting point. They easily transcend it and reach the innermost depth of mystic experience.

Apart from these three mystic trends in Kannada, i.e. 'Sharana Sahitya', 'Dasa Sahitya' and 'Tattva padagalu' or 'Kaivalya Sahitya'- we can have glimpses of mysticism in some of our major poets also. As already stated, in the Jain Puranas of Pampa and others, intuitive experiences peep out here and there. We can also have touching experience in Harihara's Pampa Sataka and Raksa Sataka, as also in his Ragales - the metre in which he composed his works, and which goes along with his works like 'Basavarajadevara Ragale, etc. Poets like Raghavanka, Ratnakara, Kumaravyasa, Chamarasa, Mahalinga Ranga, and Shadakshari may also be mentioned. This shows that Kannada has a rich tradition of mystic literature.

ANUBHAVA (Sanskrit) literally means that which follows bhava (Sanskrit anu 'after' + bhava), therefore, 'consequent', 'ensuant', a mimetic change due to, or a wilful expression of a character's emotion; or that which causes one to experience (causal of Sanskrit root 'bhu' to experience with anu) so called because 'it communicates, through verbal, physical or emotional representation (acting), the basic emotion of a character to other characters present on the stage, or indicates the hero's emotion, as also makes a connoisseur experience an emotion identical to that of the hero. Such voluntary physical changes which, consequent upon the rise of an emotion, would be called its effects in actual life, are termed Anubhavas only to emphasise their peculiar function in dramatic or literary context. They are only indicative but not invariably infallible signs of the emotion. The character may skillfully show the Anubhavas of a particular emotion, but he may not actually experience it. Yet they must be studied carefully from actual life and presented or reproduced faithfully in a dramatic performance.

Anubhavas include, according to Bharata, verbal, physical and emotional representation (abhinaya 'acting'). They can be indicative of different emotions in different contexts (a tear can express both joy and sorrow); therefore, their proper signification can be determined only in the entire aesthetic context in which they occur.

Sattvika bhavas held as a sub-class of Anubhava by some and a distinct class by others (emotional acting) are slightly different in that they are involuntary expression and, therefore, infallible signs of the emotion being present in the character, for which reason Bharata includes them under bhavas; but in reality, they are only external expressions of the mental states, not the states themselves, and Hemachandra and Ramachandra and Gunachandra correctly class them as Anubhavas only.

Dhananjaya and Dhanika include under Anubhavas also the effects of an aesthetic object upon the connoisseur; but Lollata rightly points out that only those Anubhavas which (along with other factors) cause or produce the aesthetic configuration can be included in it; whereas the connoisseur's Anubhavas are not the causes, but the effects of his aesthetic experience.

The Anubhavas are nothing but the gestures, movements and poses of the various limbs and the body and are treated by Bharata minutely and in detail under various heads of abhinaya. But Bhoja tries to impose a regular system by dividing Anubhavas in 4 classes of 12 each : (1) manarambhanubhavas or Anubhavas of mental activities such as bhava, hava, hela, etc; (2) vagarambha or Anubhavas of speech activities like alapa (talk), pralapa (prattle), vilapa (lamentation), etc., (3) buddhyarambha or Anubhavas of 4 ritis (regional styles of literary compositions), 4 vrittis (moods or aspects of a composition) and 4 pravrittis (regional traditions of dress, etc. covered by Aharya type of abhinaya) (iv) shararambha or Anubhavas of physical or bodily gestures relating to various limbs such as the lower lip, cheeks, eyebrows, eye-pupils, eye-lids, eye-sights, etc. Anubhava is an important ingredient in the experience of Rasa and so it provides a plank for the Rasa theory.

ANUBHAVALU: JNAPAKALU (Telugu) is the autobiography of Sripada Subramanya Sastry, a famous short-story writer. Sripada is one of the writers who have given vitality and a distinct style to Telugu prose.

Sripada's works endure not for what is said but for how it is said.

Sripada appears uninhibited in acknowledging whatever he did not like, whatever he could not acquire in spite of persistent trial. We see a spirit of rebellion and freedom in the way the writer bluntly and openly denounces the orthodox practices of his family and his caste. He loved to choose his own path, maybe in an unorthodox way.

He loved music, but failed to learn it. He was sorry he approached only half-baked scholars and artists and wasted his time and energy to no avail. He could have penned a few lines of poetry during that time, as he grievously complained. He thought that Carnatic music was a pure form of Indian music.

He firmly belived in the theory of reincarnation.

He depicted in his work the hard life of the commoners and the power the Pithacharyas wielded. He quoted an incident in the life of Yeluripati Narsimha Yajulu of Vegeswarapuran as an example of rebellion.

Those were the times when great poets like the famed Thirupati and Venkata Kavalu and Venkata Ramakrishna Kavulu, competed with one another; those were the days when not only other castes, but even officials got down from their vehicles to greet scholars and Brahmins.

Though Sripada was skilled in versification he was encouraged by his gurus Ramakrishna Kavulu, and as he too liked it, he took to prose-writing and excelled in it. It did not mean that he did not like versification.

He makes a pertinent observation on the manners and treatment meted out by non-Andhra hoteliers in contrast to the arrogance and callousness of the Andhra hoteliers. Likewise, his appropriate comments on the Hindi movies had taken Andhra by storm.

Men who used to wear their hair long had come under English influence and their hair was cropped. The lust for jobs rushed the children of orthodox Vedic families to English studies.

Those were the days when Kavi Sammelans were held in wedding ceremonies. Sri Manthri-Preggada Bhujangarao Panthulu started the convention of honouring poets along with Vedic scholars. This used to be called Kavitwapu pallem (poetic plate).

Thus Sastry's Anubhavalu: Jnapakalu mirrors the conditions of his times—social, moral and political. A reader very clearly understands how the writer detested Western music and culture, and how he loved freedom from convention and orthodoxy, loved truth and fearlessness which are qualities to be admired and emulated.

ANUBHUTI KE KSHAN (Hindi) is a recent collection of letters addressed to a variety of people by Vijayendra Snatak from time to time. The problems talked of in the letters are so much ours as of those to whom they were actually addressed. The problems relate primarily to literary activity and are discussed with rare and disarming frankness without taking recourse to masks or principles or curtains of personal amity or hostility.

Snatak's letters throw light on the course of many a literary movement and he underlines their degeneration without adopting a rebellious stance. We may differ from his approach but we cannot, for a moment, question the meaningfulness of the views he expresses. On such an untalked of subject as 'Pustak Sankalan aur pustakon ki niyati', his letter while laying bare our intellectual bankruptcy obliges us to think how long shall books continue to be treated as a burden on the others.

Still more important are the personal letters because the agony and ordeals, trials and tolerance, patience and perseverence of the individual expressed therein transcend all narrow limits to enable each one to identify himself therewith. Snatak delves deep within himself in such letters and their reflective profoundity not only reveals the unruffled dignity of the author's personality but also opens up an avenue for the reader to think deeply and make a sincere endeavour for self-realisation. They do not confuse, but they prepare the mental base for new resolutions.

Some of the letters included in the collection are absolutely personal but this personalness too, is so comprehensive as to involve everything within its bounds. The real fulfilment of life is to sweat profusely though hard labour and yet maintain a smiling countenance. This is not mere didacaticism; this is a realisation that emerged after passing through the ordeal of blazing fires of life's real situations. The letters do not just contain clues to individual biography, they have much more to offer.

ANUKRAMANIS (Sanskrit) are the works which give the contents of the Vedas with regard to their different items. Seven indices, all belonging to the Rigveda are ascribed to Shaunaka (600 B.C.) the celebrated author of the Rigvedapratishakhya. The Arshanukramani gives a list of the Rishis or authors of the Rigveda. The Chandonukramani gives a list of the metres in which the hymns of the Rigveda are composed. It also states for each book the numbers of verses in each metre as well as the aggregate in all metres. The Anuvakanukramani states the initial words of each of the eightyfive Anuvakas or lessons into which the Rigveda is divided. Padanukramani gives a list of lines. Suktanukramani gives a list of the initial words of the hymns. Devatanukramani survives only in ten quotations given by Shadgurushishya, most probably because it was superseded by the Brihaddevata, a much more extensive work than any of the Aunkramani works. It names the deity for each verse. It is of great value as it contains a large number of legends and myths. The Rigvidhana describes the magical effects produced by the recitation of hymns or single verse of the Rigveda. Among the Anukramanis the most important is the Sarvanukramani of the Rigveda by Katyayana. It gives the first words of each hymn, the number of verses, the name and family of the authors, the names of the deities and the metres of every verse. Shadgurushishya (12th century) wrote his commentary on this work.

The Yajurveda has three Anukramanis, one for the Atreyishakha of the Tattiriya, the other for the Charayaniyashakha and the third for the Madhyandinashakha of the Vajasaneyisamhita. The Arsheyabrahmana is the oldest Anukramani of the Samaveda. Brihatsarvanukramani belongs to the Atharvaveda. Some epics and Puranas also have Anukramanis as an integral part of the whole work in the beginning.

These Anukramanis serve a double purpose. They preserve the identity of the Vedic mantra and they serve as a useful critical apparatus for the textual criticism.

ANUKRITI (Sanskrit) imitation, one of the basic concepts of Sanskrit Aesthetics. The term is employed to indicate the relation of (1) the poem and the world, (11) the actor and the character, and (III) the poem and other poems.

It is first mentioned by Bharata who employs various terms anukarana, anucharana, anukirtana, anubhavana, etc. all broadly meaning 'imitation' but their contexts reveal an inherent understanding of imitation in a special aesthetic sense. Drama, he says, is imitation of situations (or activities) from the world or seven islands. Hence the infinite thematic possibilities of an aesthetic object. 'There is no science, no art, no activity, no craft which cannot be seen in drama', while the world provides the basis of authority and authenticity for the dramatic presentation, Shastra provides a neat frame so there is a concern for regional manners of dress, behaviour etc. (pravritti), attitudes etc. (vritti), and expression-styles (Riti).

This view is substantiated by the legend about Bharata himself. When Bharata prepared the first play with the verbal (Bharati), emotional (Sattvati) and physical (Arabhati) aspects (Vritti), Lord Brahma advised him to introduce the fourth graceful (Kaishiki) aspect also. This constituted the charming, the aesthetic aspect of the dramatic imitation.

In the first play, staged by Bharata gods were shown to win over demons. At this, the demons were offended. They impeded the show. Brahma explained to them that drama is only an imitation of the real world. Therefore, they should not feel offended, implying that while witnessing a play, personal likes and dislikes must be shed. Objectivity is the prime condition of aesthetic enjoyment.

In dramatic context, the two types of dramatic imitations i.e., two modes of acting, viz. lokadharmi 'natural or realistic' and natyadharmi 'stylized or conventional' distinguished by Bharata, reveal another dimension of the concept of imitation. Under the later category are included such stage directions as svagata 'to oneself', janantikam 'aside'.

Shankuka tries to explain Bharata's standpoint closely. Drama, he explains, appears to a spectator to be imitation of worldly situations. He thus brings the spectator-connoiseur's viewpoint in his aesthetic theory. The entire dramatic performance is characterised by imitation. The causes, the effects and the accompanying mental states of the empirical world, when reproduced in drama, are called (because of their imitative nature) vibhavas, anubhavas and sancharibhavas. Though artificial and unreal, they are not believed to be so by the spectator whose willing suspension of disbelief (on 'the maxim of the painted horse', chitraturaganyaya) causes him to take them as indicators for an inferential realisation of the hero's sthayibhava. This inferential realisation of the imitative as real is called Rasa, again, because of its imitative nature. Thus, imitation of emotions is Rasa and its seat is the actor.

Tauta raises a number of objections to Shankuka's imitation theory. Imitation is possible only when the original is actually seen. To whom, then, does a play appear as imitation? To the spectator? Does he witness the play as imitation? Has he seen the original whose imitation, he may feel, the play is? Again, if he feels the Vibhavas etc. to be imitative (and therefore, artificial which, indeed, they are), can they be indicative of the real rasa? If he does not, is not his apprehension of them false? And can a falsely apprehended indicator yield a correct inference? Or even, does the actor feel he is imitating the original? Has he seen it? No. Then whom does he imitate? Some ideal character in a particular mental state? Can mental states be imitated? At the most, he can imitate only actions of some ideal person in that mental state. Again, when the spectator sees different actors playing the same role, he feels a general characterness. The Chitraturaganyaya is also inapplicable here, because the media of painting and poetry are very different. Thematically also, it is imitation in a very special sense. Bharata, too, meant 'imitation' in a very different sense as his descriptions of musical notes and dance-poses implicate. Tauta, therefore totally rejects Shankuka's imitation-theory.

Tauta's views were accepted in toto by his disciple Abhinava who, in his commentary on Bharata's Natyashastra, amplifies the concept at various places. Dramatic presentation, says Abhinava, is neither imitative, nor reflective, nor similar but is confusing, superimposed, meditative, fanciful, dreamlike, illusive, tricky, magical, repetitive or pictorial. Imitation, he points out, can only be of the apparent (i.e. dress, facial or physical movement etc.) and would end in mimicry and excite only laughter. Drama does not merely imitate nature, it reproduces it. To bring out this implication, he explains Bharata's term Anukirtana as Anuvyavasaya meaning 'working after nature'. Maritain's explanation of Aristotle's Mimesis fits here perfectly. "The 'imitation of action' is itself an action, which is analogous to the actions performed in human life and which recasts them in a newborn pattern..... And this action, analogous to the action of human life - is the action of the work itself, the action of the play". Drama, says Abhinava, reproduces nature in an aesthetic configuration of vibhavas (determinant situations), bhavanas (mimetic consequents) and sancharibhavas (transitory mental states) which is Rasa.

From the poet's point of view, this implies that he will imitate situations of the world through the medium of words and images, in order to recreate his own experience of and responses to the world. Imitation, in a dramatic context will be the technique for presenting the artist's vision of the world.

ANUTHAMA (Tamil; b. 1922), real name Rajeswari Padmanabhan, is one of the few Tamil women novelists who have achieved literary recognition from discerning critics. She was educated up to matriculation in a convent school. After having acquired a knowledge of Hindi, Telugu and French by her own effort, Anuthama started writing short stories in Tamil at the age of 25, after her marriage to an electrical engineer. She devoted her spare time at home to writing for magazines. Her first short story 'Ankayarkanni' (1947) published in the weekly journal Kalki won a second prize in a competition. Prompted by this success Anuthama entered another competition, this time writing a novel in serial form for the prestigious monthly Kalaimagal, and bagged the first prize for her Manal Vidu (House of Sand, 1949), and thus started her literary career contributing short stories and novels to various magazines. In 1956 she got another award from the Tamil Academy for her novel Prema Githam (Love lyric). Anuthama is credited with a published list of 20 novels and three volumes of short stories, while a number of serialised long fiction and short stories contributed by her to magazines are yet to be published in book form.

Anuthama specialises in depicting the pattern and nuances of family life particularly among the middle class Brahmin community to which she belongs. Her success in having built a very large readership, mainly women is due to her uncomplicated narration and characterisation. Only in one novel Thavam (Penance: 1977) does she seem to have attempted the technique of interior monologue as an experiment. Though not very successful it shows a definite sign of literary ambition. Like some of the leading characters in her novels Anuthama is very homely and unassuming in spite of her erudition. Two of her novels, Orey Oru Varthai (Only One Word, 1950) and Veppa Marathu Bangalow (The House by the Neem Tree, 1959) have been translated into Kannada, while a few of her short stories have appeared in Hindi magazines. Besides fiction, Anuthama has also written five books for children on birds and their lives, and translated from English the biography of Rajagopalachari by Monica Felton.

ANVITABHIDHANA ((Sanskrit) is one of the theories regarding the comprehension of the sentence meaning, ascribed to Prabhakara School of Mimamsa. According to this in a sentence each word gives out its own isolated individual meaning along with the syntactic relationship; thus the unified connected sentence meaning is obtained gradually from the words of the sentence on the basis of akanksa (mutual expectancy), yogyata (consistency) and asatti (juxtaposition).

ANYAPADESAM (Malayalam) is one of the arthalankaras in Sanskrit poetics. It literally means concealing the intended import in something else. In other words, the 'upameya' is not mentioned explicitly in the way the 'upamana' is described; this will suggest that the intention of the poet is something other than what is stated. As an alankara, it is a form of rhetoric but as a more extensive narrative technique it has the status of a poetic genre.

Quite a few translations and commentaries have appeared in Malayalam on the famous Sanskrit work, Anyapadeshashatakam of Nilakantha Dikshitar (17th century). There are some original works also in Malayalam on the Sanskrit model. The most famous among the translations of Dikshitar's work is the one by Kerala Varma Valiya Koyittampuran (1845-1915). The original compositions in Malayalam are the following: 1. Anyapadeshashatakam by Mavelikkara Udaya Varma Tampuran (1844-1921), 2. Anyapadeshamala by Gramathil Rama Varma Koyittampuran (1853-1916), 3. Anyapadesham by Kotungallur Kochunni Tampuran (1858-1926). Besides these, several poets have written single quartets in this style.

Although the poets themselves do not claim it, some of the Malayalam works could be considered to belong to this type of poetry. Kumaran Asan's Vina Puvu (The Fallen Flower), though apparently a lamentation on the transience of a flower, is no doubt a philosophical comment on human life in general. Simhaprasavam (1908) and Gramavrkshattile Kuyil (1918), both by the same poet, belong to this type in a general sense. This technique was not unfamiliar to the composers of folk poetry. A number of folk songs have employed this type of allusion in an unsophisticated manner. An example is the following couplet:

Karutta penne, karutta penne/ninakkoruttan kiliakkudichu (O black girl, black girl/a person for you has arisen in the east)

This narrative technique was popular among Malayalam poets only till the first quarter of the twentieth century. Later, another technique, that of the symbolic poetry which resembles anyapadesha in a broader sense, took over the field.

ANYAPADESHA (Telugu). Till the recent past 'Anyapadesha' had a place only in 'Chatu Padyams' (stray verses). In Kavya it occurred only rarely.

Srinadha, who belonged to the fourteenth century, wrote poems using Anyapadesha. In his poems he characterised superfluous writers as crows. The reason could be that in those days every poet having the barest minimum of knowledge used to pose as a Mahakavi (great poet). He compares the posing of premature poets with barking donkeys.

It is said that Anyapadesha was introduced first in Telugu poetry as Kavyas by the famous twin poets Tirupathi Venkata Kavulu. Personal differences among poets produced some Anyapadesha poetry. Tirupathi Venkata Kavulu travelled throughout the length and breadth of the country and visited many literary samsthanas (courts). They criticised those who did not honour them, using Anyapadesha. They projected an officer in Amakur Samsthanam as the planet Saturn in a special Kavya entitled Shanigraha. Bidalopakhyanam is another Anyapadesha kavya by the same authors. It was the result of the literary arguments they had with the famous twin poets, Venkata Rama Krishna Kavulu. In the book, Venkata Rama Krishna Kavulu are represented as the 'bidalas' (cats), the authors themselves as 'tigers', and the authors' master as 'lion'. The warning phrase runs thus: "Cats, don't attack the tigers. Don't go to tigers. Go and project yourselves as tigers to those who do not know the tiger."

Mahisha Shataka, a famous Anyapadesha shataka in Sanskrit, has been ably translated into Telugu by Charla Narayana Sastry. In this book the cruel kings are personified as male buffaloes. Putalapatu Sriramulu Reddy wrote another Shataka, Mandalimpu, comparing the evil- minded fellows to dogs. Another Anyapadesha Shataka was written by Ravuri Doraswamy Sarma. Kanksha (desire) is a masterpiece of Anyapadesha in Telugu written by Vedula Satyanarayana Sastry. In this Vedula describes flower as the symbol of a strong desire for independence. The flower thus, imagines—'I can not tolerate mean slavery. I would rather drop at the burials of the martyrs who fought for their motherland and gave fragrance. This was the motto of every freedom fighter then. The desire for freedom was thus expressed through Anyapadesha.

As the traditional poetic style declined and free verse became popular, the Anyapadesha also began to decline.

However, Anyapadesha is still in vogue in all types of modern Telugu literature. It is noteworthy that the modern social and political themes are finding a place in Anyapadesha works—prose, free verse or playlet.

ANYOKTI (Sanskrit) literally means an expression which means something different from what it states. Anyokti or Anyapadesha is one of the favourite and popular devices adopted by Indian writers in general and Sanskrit writers in particular to indirectly convey their ideas and thoughts, on human personalities, events, etc. This mode of expression has its basis in the figure called Aprastutaprashmsa, in which some non-contextual object of nature is described in such a way that it may indicate the praise or censure of a related object on hand. For example a wayside tree rich with foliage but not giving any shadow to travellers will imply a rich but miserly patron.

Such verses are scattered throughout the entire range of Sanskrit literature, well known anthologies like Subhashitaratnabhandagara, there is a separate section called Anyoktiprakarana where such verses are categorised and presented like Anyoktis on Surya, Chandra, Megha, Samudra, Parvata, etc.

Gradually some poets started composing a large number of such verses, sometimes even a collection of a century of verses or more. Bhallata from Kashmir is one such early writer (9th century). He has been followed successfully by writers like Nilakantha Dikshita and Jagannatha Pandita.

APAHNUTI (Maithili). It is a form of verse ornament, mixed with riddle and eroticism and is identical with the Sanskrit Apahnuti. This is a particularly favourite form of writing with the Maithili poets. The readers are delighted by the innuendo and double meaning that it employs with great literary skill. Some of the modern poets who write Apahnuti are-Sitaram Jha, Birbhadra Jha, Upendra Thakur and Shriballabha Jha.

APARAJITA (Sindhi) is a collection of short stories by Guno Samtaney (b. 1934). The book contains six short stories written by the author during the year between 1959-1968 and published in various literary magazines like Kahani, Kunj, Prahaphuti etc. The book was picked up for Sahitya Akademi Award in 1972.

Though the stories are written in different settings, they have been written on the same theme, that is, the search for immortal love in the mortal body. Guno Samtaney is one of those writers who brought a new romantic trend in Sindhi literature. Obviously, therefore, the characters of Guno Samtaney keep wondering in search of that immortal love. Their tragedy is that they never attain their love, they remain sad; but then they enjoy their sadness. His stories, therefore, are romantic in tone and temper. However, the story 'Khandahara' (The ruins) in the collection appears to be boldly contemporary. It deals with candour and sensibility some of the most disturbuting problems of human relations.

APHORISM, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Assamese) Proverbs enshrine popular observation and wisdom. They generally are very short, aphoristic. The fourteenth-century Assamese Ramayana of Madhava Kandali has an aphorism like 'The angling Ravana has his eye on the buoy', that is, on his own interests. Proverbs often have a satirical intent. They are often on the tongues of indignant mothers and irritated mothers-in-law. Here are a few specimens of the the satirical type:

It seems the daughter is more expert than her mother, she rolls cotton with the pestle of the rice-husking dhonki!

Only twelve women went to draw water, now the noses of thirteen have been cut off!

'I am hungry, very hungry', the husband says, retorts the wife: 'For morning and evening let one meal suffice'.

A fair number of proverbs are rather hard on women. Some proverbs reflect the people's outlook on life:

Nothing can you do according to plan, for waiting on the way is blind Fate.

Rice will suffice while you live,
a pit will suffice when you die.

If God keeps who is your slayer and if God slays who is your saviour?

First the measure of rice,
then only the talk of God.

Some of the proverbs are of a prescriptive character carrying the impersonal weight of tradition. They can be called maxims. The maxims associated with the name of Dak (Danka, Ghag, in northern India) relate to astrological calculations, choice of a bride, purchase of cattle, cultivation, cooking, etc. A few of these sayings are similar to the sayings of Bengal's Khana. Dak is also rather hard on womenfolk.

Reject a cow with a hanging udder, discard a woman who too often smiles.

She is wanton who, leaving her home, loiters about,
looks behind frequently when on the way, thinks of other males and goes whereever she wills;
Dak says, of her beware!

The faithhless women is never at peace with herself, just as the pot pays no attention to the milk it contains.

Here is an excellent illustration of the strong com monsense of Dak:

Buy a piece of land which is low in the middle,
Get a girl from a family which is good,
Buy a cow whose home is within hailing distance,
Give away a girl to a place which is just a day's walk.

If is not for nothing that the Assamese villager declares: Dakar bachan Vedar vani: The sayings of Dak carry the message of the Vedas.

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Dogri) There may be a fine distinction between aphorisms and maxims on the one hand and proverbs on the other in English and Hindi usage in the sense that the former are general truths derived from experience relating to certain rules of conduct and the latter are just short pithy sayings which have acquired currency in a community or language group. But in Dogri, all the three terms are covered by the words 'Khoan' or 'Uskh' or 'Bakh' used to connote the same thing i.e. aphorism, maxim, proverb. Khoan is derived from the Sanskrit 'Upakhyan'. Probably, moral lessons drawn from short tales in the form of pithy sentences of wisdom were called 'Khoan' and in course of time the term was stretched to cover all types of pithy sayings, based mostly on the essence of experience.

The J & K Academy of Art, Culture and Languages has brought out a collection of Dogri aphorisms, maxims and proverbs collected and edited by Tara Samailpuri in a volume called Dogri Kahavat Kosa. It contains one thousand five hundred Dogri aphorisms maxims and proverbs with their meanings and explanations and several instances and equivalents in Hindi.

Dogri aphorisms, maxims and proverbs form a very important element of Dogri folklore besides being treasuries of subtle, meaningful and effective expressions of Dogri language. They contain information about Dogra life, Dogra world view, beliefs, experiences and practical wisdom of the cummunity. Like all such expressions in different languages, they have the qualities of saying much in the fewest of words, hitting the nail on the head, presenting the essence of experience in memorable words and bringing home lessons drawn from experience, effectively.

No formal classification and detailed study of Dogri aphorisms and proverbs have been made so far. Broadly speaking, they may be classified as under:
1. Those revealing close connection with religion and mythology and the daily life of the people, e.g. Khane gi Chaturbhuj, kamme gi Jagannath (for eating, the four armed God Chaturbhuj and for the work the armless God Jagannath). 2. Those revealing the philosophy of life of the Dogra People e.g. Baddha marai te Khulla Charai (in freedom there is life, in bondage lies death) or Manabhanda khachai Jaga bhanda lachai (eat what pleases you, wear what pleases the world) 3. Those enshrining certain moral lessons e.g. Siyane di sikh to amle da savd pichhuan ohetai aunda ai (Advice of the wise and the taste of 'amla' fruit one realises afterwards). 4. Those containing the essence of experience e.g. apun moe bina surga nayin labada (you cannot see heaven without dying yourself) or Jinne talle unna pala, jinna tabbar unna jala (the more clothes the colder one feels, the larger the family, the greater the woes). 5. Those aimed at bringing home a point with irony, Jindengi dangan, moyen gi bangan (attacks when alive and praises after death) or ghar nayin kutti te gava di soh (does not have a she-dog but swears by cow). 6. Those connected with cast system and characteristics of various castes, e.g. Jatta muhasal, brahman shah, bania hakam lakka phah (if a jat becomes a colletor, a brahmin a trader, and a bania an officer, they will make a mess). 7. Those connected with seasons and their effect on the life of the people e.g. Dassehra phakoa aye seet, Lohri phakoi ge seet, aya basant pale urant (winter comes with Dassehra and goes with Lohri, with the coming of Basant, cold disappears). 8. Those connected with agriculture, e.g. Kheti khasmai Seti (farming requires good husbandry). 9. Those connected with some historical or legendary event e.g. Kaja Raja Bhoj kaja Gangu Teli (referring to Raja Bhoj).

The aphorisms, maxims and proverbs collected in Kahavat Kosa are a small portion of the vast wealth of such expressions available in Dogri folk lore and there is need for much sustained and systematic work for collecting them, and studying them.

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Gujarati) Aphorism is inherited from generation to generation, and is based on experience of the wise. 'Apsaman Bal Nahi Ane Meghsaman Jal Nahi' (There is no power greater than one's own, and no water can equal the water in the cloud) is an aphorism. Here stress is put on self reliance. Samptyan Jamp (where there is unity, there is peace) is an aphorism which is equivalent to union is strength. Panch Tyan Parmeswar (voice of people is the voice of god) is yet another aphorism in Gujarati. Aphorism like Sachne Anch Nahi (truth triumphs in the end) is derived from the time of the Upanishadas.

Self evident truth is expressed in words which form maxims. 'Adhurd Ghado Chhalakay' (water spills out of half filled pot) means those who have little knowledge make much of it. Sauman Shuro te Ekeman Nahi Pooro (Jack of all is ace of none), 'Dukhnun Osad Dahada' (time is the only healing factor) are interesting Gujarati maxims. Vave Tevun Lane (as you sow so you reap) is the maxim based on Karma theory, yet it is a universal truth which is based on experience of agricultural operation. In proverbs we have variety of expression, the keynote being brevity. Symbols are freely used, and through the symbols meaning is conveyed in an indirect way. Baltaman Ghee Homvun (to add fuel to the fire) means to add to the prejudice of a person who is already prejudiced. Ghaman Mithun Bhabh Rauvon (to sprinkle salt on the wound) means to aggravate the misery of a person who is already groaning in pains. Some proverbs are based on some incidents which are well known such as 'Nachvun Nahin Tyare Angnun Vankun' (when one does not want to dance the excuse put forward is that the floor is uneven). When a king once asked a well known dancing girl to dance in his court she said that as the floor was uneven it was unfit for a dance performance. Some are based on the observation of gardening operation such as 'Utavale Amba Na Pake' (mangoes do not blossom in a hurry). The proverb says that, one has to wait for the results of good deeds, one should not be impatient. The proverb 'Vad Vagar Velo Na Chadhe' (a creeper cannot grow without the support of the hedge) conveys the idea that one cannot progress without solid backing of some body. Some proverbs indicate the social condition as 'Dikri Negay Jyan Dore Tyan Jay–'(daughter and cow go to the direction in which they are led). This means that status of a daughter was so low that she could not raise her voice against any decision. Like dumb cattle she has to go helplessly wherever they are given in marriage. Some are based on experience of daily life, such as 'Taptapthi Kam Chhe Ke Mamamthi' (are you concerned with eating the cake or with the process of its preparation) which means that one should not bother about the means but be satisfied with the ends achieved.

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Kannada). Aphorisms in Kannada literature have been like beads scattered in independent writings and traditional works. The term, sukti, seems to be the equivalent of 'aphor'. When such works are noticed the aphorisms are capable of attracting our attention and delving deep in the mind. They are worth ruminating. They are apt to remain in memory for a long time. The main reason for the attraction is the embedding of the universal truths in them. They may be called ethical values or values of life. These aphorisms may be found in large numbers in Kannada literature. Aphorisms collected in seperate works are not published in Kannada like the collections of aphorisms in Sanskrit.

One or two works of aphorisms have been composed in old Kannada literature. They are Mallikarjuna's Sukti-sudharnava, (1237) Abhinava Vadividyananda's Kavyasara (1553) and Kavimalla's Kavyasara(1500). Among these, the first two works are independent ones and the third is perhaps an expanded version of the first. All the verses collected in these works cannot be called aphorisms. They are specimens of the best parts of poetry. One can select ethical lines, and useful aphorisms from these writings. Kannada poets had taken the specimens of best poetry to be aphorisms. They differ to some extent from the modern anthologies of poetry.

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS–KANNADA

As in Sanskrit, there are many works belonging to the category of Shataka, preaching devotion, knowledge and detachment. In addition to being a good medium of elucidating the devotion of the author to God, such work is a thesis of his own ideas on Vedanta, detachment, morality, and principles. Generally knowledge and detachment complement each other. In reality, these are the main aims of a Shataka. There are many Shatakas in Kannada composed by Jaina, Virashaiva and Brahmana poets. According to the present knowledge, Chandrachudamani Shataka by a Brahmana poet named Nagavarmacharya, is Kannada's the first Shataka work in Kannada. Among the works of Virashaiva writers, Harihara's Pampashataka (1190), and Rakshashataka are important. Later Virashaiva shataka writers, namely Gummatarya (1230), Maggeya Mayideva (1430), Chandrakavi (1430) and Gurubasava (1500) have composed such works. Among them, Someshvarashataka composed by Puligere Somanatha is the most popular. Among the Jaina writers, Ratnakara Varni (1557), has become famous by composing three Shatakas, namely Triloka Shataka, Aparajiteshvara Shataka and Ratnakaradhishvara Shataka. Among them are the works by the Brahmana writers like Tirumalaya (1645-1706), Hiriyuru Ranga, (1650), Chikupadhyaya (1672), and Lakshmayya (1700). There are also many works giving priority to ethics. Chikupadhyaya's Rangadhama Nitishatakada Sangatya, Niranjanarya's Nitishastra Vemba Nanjunda Shataka, Shalyada Krishnaraja's Praneshwara Shataka, anonymous works like Nitirasayana Shataka, Nitikanda Shataka, and Nitibodhaka Shatakagalu are important in this respect.

In the late 19th and 20th centuries, many shatakas, like Nitishataka, Sumatishataka, Karnataka Sadbuddhi Shataka, Nayashataka, Shri Chalvanarayana Shataka, Sanmati Shataka, Olnedegannadiyemba Nitishataka, Mahila Suniti Shataka, Goumallikarjuna Shataka etc., were written. There are some works, which may not he called Shatakas, but they too tend towards moral statements in the form of Shataka. There are many such collections, like Siddhaniti, Nitisara Sangraha, Bhartrhari Subhashitava, Subhashita Sangraha, Nitipatha, Niti Manjari, Nitidarpana, Nitivakyamanjari, Niti Muktahara, Viduraniti, Nitiratnakara, Subhashitalahari, Nitikusumamale, Suktimanjari, Anukulasindhu, Nitichudamani, Manavanitibodhamritue, Nitisaravu, Nalnudi, Pancha Shatanite, Nitivallari mattu Kavita Manjari, Kannada Nitisaravu and Nitiruttagalu. Quite a few of these have been published. Quotations from them and details regarding authorship, are available from the three volumes of Karnataka Kavicharite and also from Kannada Mudrita Granthagala Varnanatmaka Suchi published by Mysore University.

In addition, some of the translations of Sanskrit aphorisms have been published and they have earned a measure of popularity. N.S. Anantarangarkai's Suktimala (1971), Venkataraja Puninchattaya's Subhashita Lahari (1969), S. Ramananda's Subhashita Ratnavali (1967), Subhashita Manjari (1977) published by Kannada Sahitya Parishat and H.S. Achchappa's Sabskrita Lokoktigalu (1980) are some such works. The last two among the above-mentioned contain about 2000 aphorisms. Both the original and the translation can be seen together in these two works which are bulky collections. Aphorisms have been selected here from works like the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, the Panchatantra, the Hitopadesha, Smritis, etc. M.P.L. Shastri's Subbhashita-Sangraha, B.H. Shridhar's Sanskrit Subhashita Sangraha, S.V. Parameshavar Bhat's Kavi Kaumudi and T.N. Shrikantia's Bidimuttu may be included in this group.

Maxims which are famous in Sanskrit literature are also to be found in early Kannada literature While some maxims are familiar and are often used, some others are rarely used. Some of these maxims have been collected by K. Venkatacharyar in his work Suktigalu (1956) and by H.S. Achchappa in his Granthastha-Gadegalu. Laukika Nyaya Sangraha and Laukika Nyayanjali are collections of maxims in Sanskrit. Some of these maxims are explained in Vachaspati Nighantu and in the dictionary by Apte. Following these, N. Ranganatha Sharma has explained 219 maxims in his Laukika Nyayagalu. Such works are few in Kannada.

The world of proverbs is big in Kannada. Their attraction and their popularity are naturally great. These proverbs have been current in the tradition as quintessential experience. One can notice proverbs occurring frequently in Kannada epigraphs and in early and modern literature. Proverbs are referred to by terms like Nalnudi, Nannadi Lokokti, Nudi, Padenudi, Matri, and Niti. Collecting such proverbs, H.S. Achchappa has prepared his Granthastha Gadagalu (1969), which contains over ten thousand proverbs and proverbial statements.

Collections of proverbs current among common folk have been published since the middle of the 19th century. Kannada Gadegalu, published in the cyclostyled form in Mangalore in 1852 is a collection of 3457 proverbs. This according to the present knowledge, is the oldest collection. The two volumes of Kannada Gadagala–Mahakosha, (1982) compiled recently by H.M. Ramaradhya and published through Kannada Sahitya Parishat, are the biggest collections that have appeared so far. Around 15000 proverbs are collected here.

It seems that about 40-50 independent collections of proverbs have been published. Thirtysix such collections have been identified in H.M. Nayak's Kannada Janapada Granthasuchi (1974). In them are proverbs current in the dialects of Kannada, proverbs selected from the Kannada dictionary by Kittal; there are proverbs from rural and urban areas, proverbs belonging to various places and occasions and there are also the newly composed ones. H.S. Achchappa's Kannada Gadegalu (1944), T.V. Venk-ataramanayya's Kannada Gadegala Kosha (1963), Ragou's Kittel Koshada Gadegalu (1969), J. Krishna-Shastri's Gadegala Bhandara (1959), Ragou's Namma Gadegalu (1968), Sudhakar's Namma Suttina Gadegalu (1973), S.V. Parameshwara Bhat's Nenapige Banda Gadegalu (1972) and B. Chaudegouda's Pradeshika Gadegalu (1973) may be mentioned here. M. Mariyappa Bhat's Nalnudi–Nannudi (1962) is unique as it is a collection of 467 equivalent proverbs in Kannada, Telugu, Tamil and Malayalam.

Recently some students of folk literature and others, having been interested in the origin and development of proverbs, have published some critical works. A.K. Ramanujan's Gadegalu (1955), Nam. Tapasvikumar's Kannada Gadegada Samikshe (1972) and Prahlad Kulkarni's Nannudi (1936) are of this kind.

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Kashmiri). In the Kashmiri language and literature Aphorisms, maxims and Proverbs etc. are considered the mirror of collective wisdom of the people.

The following books have been written on this topic upto this date:–

A Dictionary of Kashmiri Proverbs (1885) by John Knowls. Kosh-sri Misa Pi collected and published by the late Noor Mohd, Bookseller in Persian script. The Wit of Kashmir (1962) by Sudarshen Kashkari, published by the Research and Publication Department, J&K Govt. More than a hundred proverbs were also published by the late Anand Koul Bamzai in the Indian Antiquary, 1934.

Kashmiri sayings i.e. Aphorisms, Maxims and Proverbs are usually of the following kinds:–

1. Aphorism or axioms
2. Maxim or by-word
3. Proverbs
   i) Basic sayings ii) Wise sayings

APHORISM: It is a sentence or sentences (rhymed) keeping in it an unchangeable truth obtained from first-hand experience. For instance,

i) To do a work with an unnecessary haste spoils the good results of it, that is, Haste makes waste.

ii) 'Athi p'yovti bred: r'kh you'
A thing off one's hand is eaten by a cat. So long as a thing is in one's custody or control, it is his, otherwise it is not. Once lost for ever lost. Wisdom is an attendent to good luck or better the days, better the deeds. A single cold spell is like (the month of) Maag (chilliest month of winter in Kashmir) and a single fast is like a famine.

Point:– Inability and impatience to suffer even a single distress. One who has patience has his good reward! Patience pays dividends.

MAXIM: It is a sentence or sentences which express the idea that an attractive or advisible result is obtained by an action which makes it acceptable at once. For instance,

A pan with ghee in it is in the hands of a cat: To appoint a fox as a judge at a goose's trial.

Meaning:– A little bundle of grass for the belly of an elephant.

Sense:– An elephant needs much more to eat i.e. A person by nature having large requirements cannot be satisfied with a little: An eagle does not catch flies. Falling together of a crow and a stone.

Point:– Meeting of two things or persons (against one another) at one place. A donkey does not know what the saffron is?
A person does not take care of a good thing, the value of which is not known to him: To caste pearls before a swine.

PROVERBS: one of two kinds:– Basic Sayings and Wise Sayings. Basic Sayings: A basic saying is one which has a story at its back; for instance—A business of raddishes in partnership of a 'Khoja' (A great businessman).

Point:– To start a business for a poor man partnership with a great businessman is not fruitful for him.

Story:– There lived a great businessman at Srinagar. A milkman was his neighbour who after a long and hard labour had saved ten thousand rupees and wanted to start a business in order to became a 'Khoja' like his neighbour. When the 'Khoja' knew of his neighbour's plan, he made him ready to start a business of raddishes for military supply in which they had earned a great sum of money as profit. But in fact he wanted to teach him a moral lesson. Both stocked the raddishes and the 'Khoja' told him not to sell them on less profit but to wait for a good profit. Some days passed and the stocked raddishes got rotten and both of them lost their invested money. The milkman became bankrupt and in this way the 'Khoja' ruined his rival. The moral of the story is that it is not good for a poor man to use or spend money as a wealthy man does.

Wise sayings: A wise saying is also a complete sentence which conveys the results of deeds done by the ancestor in the past. In contains a kind of advice on or direction to the right way of action. Such sentences have sometimes rhyme and rhythm too. For instance:–

One should stretch out one's feet according to the size of the covering of one's bed! Cut your coat according to your cloth. A heart is a mirror of another's heart. The heart is a glass. Keep it or break it. Love begets love. Mother calls daughter, and the daughter is mad after her husband. People generally look to the future ignoring the past which has otherwise many great lessons for the future itself. The proverb deplores this general and narrow outlook. To live in the future forgetting that the future emerges from the past.

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Konkani) Konkani is rich in aphorisms, maxims and proverbs. (In Konkani—anem, opar, mhan). Many proverbs are rhymed and poetic. Some reflect the life of the community, its beliefs and aspirations. Many display keen power of observation and a sense of humour which can be caustic. Some refer to vital functions of life in a frankly bold manner. Some are didactic and lay down guidelines for a better living. Some are reflections on human character and some express universal truths. Rhymed proverbs: 'Fest karta ganv ani vigaracem nanv' (The village arranges the feast and the Vicar gets the credit), 'Jaka jalta taka kalta' (One who is scorched knows the pain), 'Kama purto mama' (Calling someone uncle only when the work is to be got done). Guidelines to a better living: 'Udaricem potem hatbhar ritem' (The bag in which you bring articles on credit is never quite full), 'Savai khan pot fugem' (Cheap food gives one indigestion). Humorous and satirical: 'Dhuvek dilem ani remvent mutlem' (Giving presents to a daughter is like pissing in the sand), 'Janem dekhlem na dharkal tanem dekhlem kalum khamyce tavlent ghalum' (One who had not seen spittle saw an oyster; he did not know where to keep it). On human character: 'Kam zalem, voij melo' (The patient is cured, now let the doctor die), 'Bot dilyar hat gilunk sodta' (If you offer your finger, they will swallow your hand). Universal truths: 'Rag mari aplyak, ani santos mari dusryak' (Your anger kills you while your happiness kills others). Some proverbs contain a story: 'Patrek gello vagan khalo' (The story of the foolish men who had gone to the forest and who on returning found that one of them was missing), 'Bardeskaramli vomy' (Hedge of the men from Bardez: How two brothers pretend to quarrel with each other only to fool others).

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Malayalam). Brief, pithy sayings and general principles serving as rules or guidelines in life constitute what may be called aphorisms or maxims. When a saying is convincing or when its authenticity or validity is tested by time, it is referred to as a 'proverb'. Owing to diverse professions followed by people, such as the martial art, warfare, navigation, therapy, magic, fishing, etc. and owing to the religious symbolism established through ritualistic arts and education through epics, performing arts like Kathakali, Kerala has a considerable wealth of maxims and proverbs. The rich flora and fauna of a sea-shore fondled by the monsoon have also contributed to it. Universal proverbs like 'All that glitters is not gold', 'Slow and steady wins the race', 'Who will bell the cat', 'An elephant needs no bell' and 'Barking dogs seldom bite' find their exact parallels in Malayalam, not through translation but through identical experience and deduction. Nobody may 'blow his own trumpet', but 'to make one beat a drum' is to land him in trouble. 'Necessity is the mother of invention' is available in Malayalam as a sensuous picture, i.e. 'the jack-tree will bear fruit even at its root if need be'. Similarly 'an axe to grind' is substantiated by an illustration: 'The priest's supper is by the light provided by a temple attendant'. 'A snake will not die among too many people' is Kerala's expression for too many cooks spoil the broth.

Maxims common to south Indian States, with almost identical words, indicate that they were formed when separate languages did not evolve. That is, many Kerala proverbs are older than Malayalam itself. Many of them have a ring of the original Dravidian language akin to Tamil. After the spread of Aryan culture, Indian epics and classics have had their influence. Felicitous expressions diffused from there into society as aphorisms, like 'Akshya patra', 'padma vyuha', 'Showing of Viswarupa', 'Shara-sayana' (bed of arrows), 'Urvashi's-shapa' (the curse of Urvashi cast on Arjun which ultimately turned out to be a boon), etc. Kalidasa too has contributed at least one proverb 'Sariramadyam khalu dharma sadhanam' among the many sanskrit aphorisms now prevalent even among the masses. Many expressions from the ancient work Chandrotsavam and the Malayalam epics of the 16th century poet Ezhuttacchan and the 18th century poet Kunchan Nambiar have become favourite proverbs. Here, Nambiar has the first place: (a) Wealth and woman cause a variety of quarrels. (b) If the priest steals cakes, all the temple dependants will follow suit.

Even recent poets have contributed certain aphorisms like:

If butter is in hand, why search for ghee? (Ulloor)

God will not permit a smooth flow of the tumultous river of love (Vallathol).

Kerala's special profession of the martial art sounds in many provers like a) Arrow at Kumbalam, bow at Chenkulam and Archer in a third place (meaning: there is no coordination). b) Either outside the 'Goda' or at the chest of the Guru (meaning: there is no middle-path). c) Training ground without Kurup (meaning: ship without captain). d) For the expert, even the grass is a weapon. e) When a Panicker falls, it is part of gymnastics.

Medical proverbs, as well as proverbs on kings and governments, on temple and dance and singing, sometimes with a ring of ridicule, often with fine admiration, are also there in plenty. But more proverbs pertain to the flora and fauna, and proverbs on the elephant, the pet animal of Kerala, are more numerous. They all generally illustrate keen observation and poetic invention, irony and worldly wisdom: (a) Areca nuts can be kept in one's loins; what if it is an areca nut tree? (b) Whether leaf falling on thorn, or thorn on leaf, it is the leaf that suffers. (c) Mango cannot be felled by muttering magic formulas. (d) Like a squirrel bereft of his nut. (e) If the mother-in-law breaks, it is an earthen pot; if a daughter-in-law breaks, it is a golden pot. (f) If the mother slaps call 'Mother' and weep.

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Nepali). Nepali aphorisms and proverbs have the following characteristics:

A one-line aphorism or proverb conveys a large general truth or moral lesson. For example, Magi magi chhorako biha! (son's marriage by begging alms!) that is aspiring to do something big but by disgraceful and puny ways and means.

Some are known for their brevity. They are very short. For example, Titrako mukhai bairi. (Titra's own shriek is its enemy). The partridge (Titra) by its shrill cry gives away its whereabout in the bush to be seen and killed. The proverb is relevant to men and women who speak out their mind and fall foul of their neighbours.

Some are simple. They speak of simple matters in a simple language. For instance, Ma takchhu muda, bancharo takchha ghuda (I aim at the log, the axe hits my knee.) It carries the same sense as 'Man proposes, God disposes', does.

Some are very lively and humorous and some times satirical. Baghko mukh khae pani rato, nakhae pani rato (Red is the tiger's frontal aspect, be it fed or hungry). This proverb describes or praises a person who remains great and stately in days both good and bad.

The three main varieties of the proverbs are (a) the rhyming proverbs, (b) the question proverbs and (c) the proverbs in the question and answer form.

(a) Pani khanu mulko, biha garnu kulko (for drinking water find out the source of the stream; for contracting marriage see the clan or family of the counterpart.) Here mulko and kulko rhyme and the rhyming words carry the two corresponding main ideas.

(b) Bara barsha Ramayan padya, Sita kaski joi? (for twelve years he read the Ramayana and finally asked, 'Indeed whose wife was Sita') This proverb fits one who is a bit dull-headed or one who has not followed a conversation properly.

(c) Keti kasti chha? Hernai naparne;

Keta kasto chha? Bhannai naparne. (How does the bride look? No need to see. How does the bride-groom look? No need to say). When enquiries are made, it is assumed that everything is perfectly all right. Later it turns out to be an unfounded and disastrous supposition.

Inspite of the fact that some proverbs have fallen into disuse,a great many of them have remained popular and in practice.

Nepali proverbs can be classified as follows:

Social and moral: Logne swasniko thagada paralko ago. (Quarrel between husband and wife—a fire of straws). A quarrel between a husband and a wife dies down as quickly as a fire lighted of straws.

Agricultural: Kathako khutta, sasaki dhan [Wooden legs, breathing (cattle) wealth]. One is not to depend upon wooden legs and cattle wealth as peasants have learnt the lesson the hard way.

Popular beliefs: A jingarko ahara daivale puryawnchha. (To a python heaven sends the food). And so it must do to me, you and all. worry not.

Historical: Mukunda Senle mulak marna na janeko jasto. (Like Mukunda Sen conquering countries). Mukunda Sen conquered many countries but did not know how to consolidate the conquests and ended up retaining nothing. The proverb is applicable to one who fails to consolidate one's success.

Nature observation: Kaglai bel pakera harsha na bismat. (The bel fruit ripens to no joy or sadness to the crow). The proverb describes persons who get jubilant over projects which are of no use to them.

Nepali proverbs mirror the social, economic and cultural aspects of the Nepali community. Akbari suntai kasi launu pardaina—there is no need to test an Akbari gold coin, and no need either to put to the test a person of known worth. Chariko dhan chuckeho—the beak is the only property (capital) of the bird. The arms are the only means (capital) of the poor to earn his livelihood. Chhori kuti buhari tarsaunu—Beating the daughter to frighten the daughter-in-law.

But then there are also proverbs which do not accord well with modern-day thoughts. Pani khanu mulko, biha garnu kulko is one such. Mardako dashauti! (Ten wives for a capable man!) is another. There are scores of them. No wonder that an article 'Ukelnu Parne Ukhanharu' (proverbs that have got to be uprooted) has already appeared in print.

APHORISMS–SUTRA LITERATURE (Sanskrit). Aphorisms form an interesting and important part of Sanskrit literature. An aphorism is defined as a cryptic, comprehensive and unemotional statement pregnant with meaning; but it has to be often explained by referring to other aphorisms and using special rules of interpretation. Panini's Ashtadhyayi describing the Vedic and classical Sanskrit language fully in about four thousand aphorisms is a good example of Sutra literature. The various Shrautasutras, Grihyasutras, Dharmasutras and Shulbasut ras belong to this type of literature. Panini refers to Bhikshusutras and Natasutras. Chandahsutras of Pingala, Arthashastra of Kautilya and Kamashastra of Vatsyayana contain sutras: so also Yaska's Nirukta. The various darshanas or systems of philosophy have their basic texts on sutras: Jaimini's Mimamsasutras, Badarayana's Brahmasutras, Kanada's Vaisheshikasutras, Gautama's Nyayasutras, Patanjali's Yogasutras, etc. The Samkhyasutras are later than the Samkhyakarika. Vamana's Kavyalamkara on poetics is in the form of sutra and vritti. The sutra type of literature was very popular for a long time; later this gave way to metrical karikas, which was found easier for memorizing; but the sutra literature has its own place. In the Mimamsasutras, the arrangement of the subject is in the forms of Adhikaranas—each consisting of five sections in a specific order: vishaya (topic), samshaya (doubt), purvapaksha (prima facie view), siddhanta (conclusion) and sangati (correlation).

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Sindhi). The Sindhi literature has a vast treasure of aphorisms, maxims and proverbs. Although there are about eight standard collections of Sindhi proverbs, yet there have been a few attempts to collect aphorisms and maxims from Sindhi writings of outstanding writers and poets. A few small collections of aphorisms and maxims have been brought out which generally have religious importance. They contain sayings of saints and devout people. For instance, short and pithy quotations collected from the works of Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752), Sachal (1737-1829), Sami (1743-1850), Bodhraj and T.L. Vaswani come under this category. On the other hand, there are also a few collections containing pithy sayings in prose as well as verse, culled from saint poets and writers of other languages (e.g. Kabir, Dadu, Mira Bai or Shakespeare).

The first collection of Sindhi proverbs was published by Kauromal Chandanmal Khilnani (1844-1916), one of the early prose writers of Sindhi. The book Sindhi Pahaka (Sindhi proverbs) published by him in 1888 contains about eight hundred proverbs in an alphabetical order. Another early prose writer and senior contemporary of Khilnani was Kevalram Salamatrai Advani. He prepared a hand-book of Sindhi proverbs entitled Gulushakar in 1869 containing 570 Sindhi proverbs. The work remained in the manuscript form along with two other manuscripts of the writer in the custody of the Education Department of Sindh and was published in 1905. The collection has tremendous importance in that the writer has explained in lucid and simple style each and every proverb. Besides, he has given parallel quotations from Persian, Hindi and other languages in explanatory notes on proverbs. The work is a real contribution to Sindhi prose as it presents a specimen of chaste and colloquial Sindhi prose of the last century.

A Hand Book of Sindhi Proverbs by Rochiram Gajumal is the first work of its kind. It was at first published in 1895, in Commissioners Printing Press, Karachi and was followed by its three editions. The fourth reprint was brought out in 1935.

The book is divided into two parts. The first part contains 489 Sindhi proverbs with English renderings and equivalent proverbs from that language. The second part contains 320 Sindhi proverbs with mere translation be-cause their English equivalents could not be found.

In 1925, Mirza Qalich Beg (1853-1929) brought out a small collection of proverbs entitled Pahakani ji Hikmata (Wisdom in proverbs). The book contains three main parts: Proverbs of Oriental Countries – East Asian Countries, West Asian Countries; Proverbs of Western countries; Quotations from religious scriptures. The writer has translated into Sindhi selected proverbs of other languages. He has given about six hundred selected proverbs of Sindhi in an alphabetical order.

Bherumal Mahirchand Advani (1875-1950) another well known prose writer of Sindhi brought out a collection of Sindhi idioms and proverbs in 1925, entitled Gulgandu

(A sweet mixture prepared of rose petals and sugar). It contains 912 Sindhi proverbs and 1450 Sindhi idioms with explanations. The writer has given parallel proverbs in English also at several places. This is yet another important contribution in this field.

After independence, some of the Sindhi scholars in India have paid attention to the collection and preservation of this literary treasure of Sindhi. Apart from a good many small collections of Sindhi proverbs meant for secondary school students, a collection of Sindhi proverbs was published by Tirthdas Pessumal Hathiramani in 1973. The book entitled Pahakani ji Paboha contains about 1800 Sindhi proverbs in an alphabetical order. The compiler has explained only those proverbs which need explanation.

Vishvanath Dinakar Narvane, a Maharashtrian scholar from Pune, undertook the herculean task of compiling and publishing Bharatiya Kahavata Sangraha (A collection of Indian proverbs) in three volumes, (1978-1983). It contains about eleven hundred Sindhi proverbs selected and rendered into English and Hindi by Murlidhar Jetley.

The most comprehensive collection of Sindhi proverbs which has been published so far, is a book in two volumes entitled Durani ji Dabuti (A casket of earrings, 1982) by Satramdas S. Juryasinghani 'Sail'. The work contains 2771 Sindhi proverb in both the volumes. Each proverbs has been explained in Sindhi. The collection is an authoritative work in this field and includes mostly all Sindhi proverbs published in the previous collections.

APHORISM, MAXIM AND PROVERB (Tamil). Indians as a nation love to moralise and Indian literature is replete with aphorisms, maxims and proverbs. Tamil literature is no exception and being very old, it displays this tendency to an even greater extent than others. There are whole books devoted to moral teaching like the Tirukkural and Naladiar. Besides these, great poets like Kamban insert moral aphorisms in their poetry, no doubt in the most appropriate places. An old society like the Tamil has a rich heritage of proverbs and even unlettered men and women quote them in their conversation.

In the works of the Sangam period devoted to topics other than love, maxims and moral are freely discussed. Poets sternly remind tyrannical kings of the moral law and of the consequences of transgression, running great risks in the process. There are poems in the Purananuru which advocate a balanced view of things and a catholicism that encompasses all of creation: other poems teach the wisdom of contentment pointing out how little man really needs to keep alive.

Aphorisms and maxims appear here and there even in the poems devoted to love. Thus the friend of the girl points out to the lover how the moral law and proprieties should be observed even in the pursuit of love: in another, she sternly upbraids him for his neglect of the girl, putting it down to his insolence caused by wealth: she points out very profoundly that true wealth consists in having compassion for those who suffer, it is not to be measured in terms of material things.

The tendency to moralise becomes overwhelming towards the end of the Sangam period when the library of 18 books was composed, for most of these are wholly devoted to maxims while one is a collection of proverbs. The most distinguished among them all is, of course, the Tirukkural. In extremely condensed verses, the author Tiruvalluvar presents the wisest maxims for all humanity. We often find that his maxims have been fashioned by a lifetime of rich experience. With this experience as the raw material the extraordinarily gifted teacher has turned out aphorisms that can guide many a puzzled man through the traps of life. While the maxims to Tirukkural are all practical in their applicability, we find a higher morality in them, a higher and nobler view of things than is found in the standard works of this type in other languages.

Naladiar, also belonging to this literary genre of 18 works enjoys a certain measure of popularity; the other works on morals written at the end of the Sangam era are scarcely read today.

Kamban and Villiputurar have written many wise maxims in their epics. as also Ilango and the other Jain poets: this could be done very naturally as wise teachers like Vashishtha, Vyasa and Kaundi Adigal occur as characters in them. But complete works on morals continued to be written all through the post-Sangam era with an emphasis on Hindu and Jain religions. They have however, generally proved to be a rehash of the eternal wisdom of Tirukkural to whose moral or literary level none of them can aspire.

A.V.S.

APHORISMS, MAXIMS AND PROVERBS (Telugu). Sayings (Sukthulu) reveal how old a language is and highlights the vitality and culture of the people who speak them (Su + ukthulu = Sukthulu = things well said). These are also called Subhashithamulu (Wellspoken).

The first poet in Telugu, Nannaya, described himself to be 'nana ruchiradha sukthi nidhi' (an ocean of good sayings). He used them profusely in his work Mahabharata. Many times they are seen in small stanzas like Kandam (a metrical form) and sometimes in bigger poems.

Speaking about the nature of his poetry, Srinadha said he would pour his ideas in a shower of beautiful sayings as Prabandha Parameshwara used to do. Yerrapragada is one of the trinity (Kavithrayam) responsible for Bharatam in Telugu. Some of his sayings are: 'Karavi goni verrine thala goki konaga?' (Am I a fool to scratch my head with a fire–brand?), 'Moodendla teni buddhi muppa sendla tendu' (The discretion we do not have when three years old, we cannot have when we are thirty). Examples of Srinadha's sayings are 'Ava ginjantha boodi my naladi konira veladi gummadi kayantha verri puttu' (If we smear a pinch of vibhuti i.e. sacred ash over our body, we get madness of the size of a pumpkin). Such sayings are found in abundance in his works.

All the above quoted sayings and their like reveal one eternal truth or the other. As we have a Subhashita Ratna Bhandagaram in Sanskrit, in Telugu too, we have Sukthi Sudhakaram containing sayings from great poets starting with Nannaya.

Lokokthulu (Usages) means words used by people. These can be sayings with a wider perspective in view. Certain proverbs are brought under this category. We have a figure of speech: 'Lokokti meaning that which contains a lokokti. Thus it is either a saying or a usage. A lokokti does not have a specific characteristic or a special definition.

Jat....Jathyamulu (Idioms) are indigenous and are peculiar to a race and contain the whole wisdom of a race. The dictionary meaning of 'idioms' is 'an expression whose meaning cannot be derived from its constituent elements, as "kick the bucket" means "to die," and "it is an expression peculiar to a language".

A jathiyam is also called a 'padabandham' or a 'palukubadi'. Some disappear with passage of time while others are born afresh in a tongue.

Some have their origin in the organs of the body like ' Thala to naluka; potta kottuta; cheyy; virginiatlu vunduta etc.' Some are associated with the animal world like ' dunna pothu mida jadi vana kurisinatlu; goda mida pilli, gorre thoka etc.,' Some come from customs and traditions like 'Pedda peeta veyyadam; pappanna pettadam; gunta petti ganta vayinchandam;' Some have their origin in mythology like Sugrivajna, udatha bhakthi, Salya Sardhyam etc., some are hearsay like 'isuka vesthe ralani janam; a inti kaki inti mida, valade' Some are associated with social belief like ''kallu pothayi; chachi ni kadupuna pudatha;' some originate in experience like ' krityadyavastha; jodati ki mosam; nadum kattadam ' while some are onomatopoetc like 'paka paka tadu; kila kila ladu; bhaggu manu.'

Idioms are untranslatable, at best one might convey their verbal meaning. That is why idioms are the life–spirit of a language. Two or more words are used together, the expression is charged with a new life and conveys something distinctly different. Idioms originate in a language according to its genius, thoughts and customs.

Telugu is rich in proverbs. It is said 'Sameta' (proverb) is a variant of the word 'Samata' (equality). It has many equivalents like Lokokti, Aryokti, Namudi, Jana Sriti, Sastram. The origin of any particular proverb is vague. C. Vedavaty says: 'there is nothing in life that a proverb does not touch; it analyses, crystallises criticises and compromises many things in life. A brief expression in Telugu brings out many things, the laughter and tears, the agony, emotion, excitement, humour and irony in life. A proverb is a people's wisdom spoken by the people and for the people'. What is a pickle to a meal is a proverb to speech, say the Kannadigas.

Generally Telugu proverbs have the following characteristics–they are brief; they are in currency; they say a thing effectively; they are thought–provoking; they speak universal truths ; they are usually used by the common men; they contain a peculiar figure of speech; they convey by word the wisdom of a racial experience; there may be internal rhyme in the words used.

"Entha chettuku antha gali" (the tree of every size has its correspondent wind) is a proverb in Telugu. It means every man whatever may be his status, will have a problem of corresponding nature. Not only is it brief but it has internal rhyme too (Entha–antha).

Proverbs can roughly be divided into two categories: mythological and historical; social. 'Intigutta lankaku chetu' (the secrets of a house are the bane of Lanka) and "Chakram addam visadu" (thrust the Vishnu chakra in front of one) derive their spirit from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata respectively. Mostly proverbs have a social origin which may once again be subdivided into family life, agriculture, human psychology, castes and professions, traditions and customs.

Tekumalla Rama Rao has divided proverbs into many varieties like proverbs of principle, of sound, of story; translated proverbs; proverbs belonging to Puranas, law, medicine, weather; conversational proverbs, humorous, obscene, portmanteau proverbs, etc.

Ancient poets in Telugu have a number of proverbs corresponding to the practices of their times.

Our forefathers used proverbs like currency; they were their supports in conversation, weapons in a verbal fighting. We do not any longer use any proverbs. There is a danger of this rich branch of linguistic culture vanishing altogether and becoming extinct in the near future.

Some litterature tried to preserve them. Capt. M.Sd. Carr, an Englishman, collected and printed the first book of proverbs Andhra Lokokti Chandrika (1868) in Telugu with an introduction in English. Later on others like Chilikuri Narayana Rao, Nandiraju Chalapathi Rao, and Tekumalla Kameswara Rao collected and printed them in book form. Some 20,000 Telugu Proverbs have been collected in some 25 volumes.

APNO DHARMA (Gujarati) is a collection of articles on religion and philosophy by Anandshankar Dhruv, published in 1916. Anandshankar was a great thinker. He read extensively books on religion, history, politics and sociology by Indian and Western scholars. He examined problems rationally and expressed his ideas in the terminology of the ancient books of the east. He has convincingly explained the Vedantic theory of non-dualism. He in his articles has logically argued his case and successfully tried to remove some of the misconceptions about the mythological incidents by giving new interpretations of Puranic themes. For instance about the telling of an untruth by Yudhistira in the Mahabharata to win the battle he says, 'It is not easy to decide about the action. It is not always that one has to chose between truth and untruth. Sometimes two good concepts are also at tangent. In this incident, he is apparently supposed to speak the truth; on the other side there is also duty towards innumerable friends, relatives, who have joined the war, putting full faith in him. They are to be saved. Had Yudhistira stuck to truth and allowed his army to be slaughtered, then his action would have been tentamount to selfishness or spiritual pride'. Thus he has given new meanings to Puranas, and elucidated the philosophical concepts in a convincing manner. The Apno Dharma because of its lucid presentation and sound logic has acquired the status of a classical work in Gujarati prose.

APPADURAI K. (Tamil; b. 1907) is a lexicographer, scholar translator and linguist well-versed in Latin, Greek, French, German, English, Kannada, Sanskrit, Hindi, Telugu and Malayalam. His Kazhagam English-Tamil Pocket Dictionary (published in 1952) with its felicitous, Tamil equivalents for scientific technical and administrative terms is a landmark in Tamil lexicography. K. Appadurai was the Assistant Editor of Madras University's English-Tamil Directory, in 3 vols. 1963-65, and is a full-time member of the Tamil Nadu Official Language Commission. He has written 80 works, including The mind and thought of Tiruvalluvar (1966), Indian language problem (1947), Chanka rilakkiya manpu (Criticism of the Tamil Sangam literature), Tennattup porkkalankal (Battle fields in South India, 1957), Varunkalat Tamilakam (On Tamil culture and its future possibilities, 1947), Ayirattennuru antukatku murpatta Tamilakam (Tamil Nadu, 1800 years ago, 1956) and Tamil mulakkam and Moli valam (Essays on philology). He has to his credit 75 translations and adaptations including Robert Caldwell's (1814-1891), A Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian Family of Languages (1941). He has translated some of the works of Shakespeare, Rousseau, Laski, Victor Hugo, Oliver Goldsmith, Horace Walpole, James Allen, M.N. Roy, Lord Chesterfield, Chandu Menon, Premchand and Bhavabhuti. His biographies include those of Bernard Shaw and Raja Ravi Varma. He was the President of the Tamil Writers' Association for the year 1960 and recipient of a shield in 1965 from the Association for his significant contribution to Tamil letters. A street in Madras City is named after him.

APPAKAVI (Telugu; 17th century) was an eminent prosodist. Born in a Brahmin family traditionally known for scholarship and poetry, Appakavi is the celebrated author of Andhra Shabda Chintamani alias Appakaviyam (1656). In verse 85 of his book, he says he authored seven works in Sanskrit and Telugu. Though he planned his work as a verse commentary in eight cantos on Nannaya's Sanskrit aphorisms called Andhra Shabda Chintamani (1100), only the first five cantos survived. The third canto dealing with yati and prasa represents the heart of the book. In it he identifies forty-one yatis and seventeen prasas as against twenty seven yatis and twelve prasas of earlier prosodists. These are the much discussed issues in Telugu. Appakavi may be called the Aristotle of Andhra. His authority is so great in prosody that even verses in classics like Nannaya's Mahabharata were amended to suit his theories. Modern scholarship, however, has rectified the damage done to literature by his followers and put him in a proper perspective.

APPALASWAMY PURIPANDA (Telugu, b. 1904, d. 1982) was born in Vishakhapatnam. He was very much influenced by the "Vyavaharika-Bhasha movement" started by Gidugu and Gurazada, two stalwarts in Telugu literature. He devoted his entire life to this cause. He wore Khadi and lived like Gandhi. He discovered the Adikavya in Oriya which was unknown to Oriya people till then. He wrote the history of Oriya literature in Telugu. He was good at Hindi, Bengali, Oriya besides Telugu. His volume of short stories Sowdamini was translated into English by Sri Sri. Vishwakathaveedhi, (six volumes), Veerabharatam, Pillalakathasagaram, etc. are his notable contributions. His translations from Oriya Utkalapalanam, (drama) Matti Manushulu, (novel) and Jagadguru Shankaracharya from Hindi won the admiration and applause from all quarters. His poetic collection Muralidhwani was received well. His magnum opus is Pulipanja, a poetic collection. It was published by Videsandhra Publications, London. He was invited to London along with Sri Sri and was honoured there. He was conferred 'Kalaprapurna' by Andhra University for his contribution to Telugu literature. Puripanda was a vishishta Sabhya in A.P. Sahitya Akademi. He was the president of the Andhra Pradesh Abhyudaya Rachayitala Sangam and he had the unique and proud privilege of becoming the President of Akhila Bharata Rachayitala Mahasabha in 1963. He was a staunch nationalist. Veerabharatam, Ramayanam, Bhagavatam, etc., written by him in Vaduka Bhasha won the admiration of one and all. He was a source of strength and inspiration to young progressive writers in Telugu. He encouraged hundreds of young men and women in poetry and chiselled their talent with his direction and advice.

APPAN, M.P.(Malayalam; b. 1913). was a high school teacher, headmaster and District Education Officer. Before retirement from service in 1968 he had worked for a few years as Asst. Editor of the Malayalam Encyclopaedia, of which a few volumes have already come out.

He started admiring poets and composing poems even as a school child. But he selected Mathematics, the least literary of subjects, took an honours degree in it and spent the most fruitful years of his life in teaching it. He was honoured with the membership of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi in 1957, which lasted for ten years, and with an award for his collection of poems entitled Udyanasoonam (garden-flower). His literary contributions include about sixteen collections of poems, a few prose works and two translations. As a poet he stands for equality, justice, fraternity and universal love. Felicity of expression is the hallmark of his poetry and combination of spirituality and optimism is the keynote of his poetic personality. His prose works, written mostly in a reminiscent mood, reveal an impartiality of judgement, clearness of purpose and strength of character seldom seen in those cast in the poetic mould. Some of his collections have been translated into Hindi, Sanskrit and English.

APPAN THAMPURAN (Malayalam; b. 1876, d. 1941). His full name was Rama Varma Appan Thampuran. A scion of the Royal family of Cochin, Appan Thampuran lived a life dedicated to the promotion of language, literature and the arts. He was essayist, novelist, researcher, journalist all rolled into one. He has unearthed and published, with introduction and commentary, many ancient Malayalam writings with a deep insight. An illustrious student of ancient Kerala History, he has brought out a number of monographs. His love of books is wellknown. The vast collection of rare Malayalam and Sanskrit texts acquired posthumously and preserved in the Kerala Sahitya Akademi is a memorial to him.

Thampuran was a path-finder and trend-setter in literature and culture. He wrote the first Malayalam detective novel, Bhaskara Menon. Along with some other savants he started the 'Samastha Kerala Sahitya Parishad'- a Pan-Kerala literary organization, in 1931. The trimonthly journal of the Parishad—Thraimasikam, commenced publication in 1933. Earlier he had started publication of a monthly, Rasikaranjini (1902). Its editorial board was chaired by the prominent literary figure, Kodungallur Kunhikuttan Thampuram. It ceased publication after four and half years owing to financial difficulties. He edited and published another literary monthly, Mangalodayam, from 1908 onwards, having registered a company under that name and acquired a press for the same. The 'Cochin Sahitya Samajam' was one of Mangalodayam's literary ventures and it flourished for a few years with traditional pomp and elan.

As Chairman of the Cochin Bhasha Parishakarana Committee (a board for the improvement of language by the then Cochin Government) he brought out, with critical notes and commentary, very ancient Malayalam manuscripts, the most notable among them being the Arthasastra of Kautilya, known as the first ever prose composition in Malayalam.

Appan Thampuran established the first film company in Kerala christened 'Kerala cinetone'. It started shooting a film based on his own quasi-historical novel Bhoothar-ayar; but the venture stopped half-way because of financial difficulties.

Appan Thampuran's literary output presents a picture of versatility. Though he began by writing verses, he abandoned it early and turned to prose. Besides the two novels mentioned above his works include three plays, viz., Kalaviparyayam (1930), Munnattu Veeran (1935) and Kumudam (1940). His Prasthana Panchakam (1928) is a different type of work and deals with five genres of literary creations, i.e. problem play, elocution, meditative work, devotional composition and narrative. Still another work Sanghakkali (1941) describes an ancient theatre of Kerala. Dravida Vrithangalum avayude Dasaaparinaamangalum analyses the origin and development of the Dravidian metres. But his magnum opus is, by common consent, Mangalamala embracing a variety of topics, published in five parts between 1910 and 1940. Each part deals with a particular topic or branch of history, science and culture. Besides these, Thampuran himself collected various essays written by his contemporaries and published in magazines under the title Gadya malika in three parts (1908, 1910 and 1911).

In all his works one discerns the stamp of the writer as a censor of morals, a corrector of tastes and an exponent of cultural norms. He was one of the very first masters of the Malayalam prose which is pithy and refined, grand and delectable.

APPARAO GURAJADA, VENKATA (Telugu; b. 1862, d. 1915) forerunner of the literary renaissance in Andhra, wrote the first Telugu short story 'Diddubatu' (1910) and the first Telugu prose drama Kanyasulkam (1897). He passed his B.A. in the 1st Class from Madras University, worked as teacher, head-clerk, Asst. Lecturer, inscription specialist and the adviser to the Raja of Vizainagaram. He was proficient in Telugu and English and knew Sanskrit, French, Kannada, Bengali, Oriya, Persian and Latin. He shaped both the language and the literature of Modern Telugu. He joined hands with Gidugu Rama Murty and elevated the colloquial language as against the classical, achieving a new status for the live idiom of the spoken dialect and raising the neglected lyric into a distinct literary form. These were his main contributions to the Renaissance.

Tagore's Ghare Baire is the outcome of the battle between Shudhabhasha and Chalitabhasha in Bengal. A similar tussle was there in Telugu between the written and the spoken language. In the spoken dialect Gurajada's literary work, which preceded Tagore's work by six years, is Kanyasulkam (1897). It is his magnum opus, a social satire written with the ineffable beauty and grace of the native Telugu idiom; it humorously chides immorality, superstitions, enforced widowhood and selling of virgins in marriage market. It presents living characters like Girisham and Ramappantulu who converse with sparkling words and bubbling humour. The drama was translated into Kannada (1927), Russian (1962), English (1964) and Tamil (1964).

His talent was multi-faceted. A new metrical form, Mutyalasaralu–garland of pearls–having fourteen syllables in each of the first three lines, is a new quadruped verse invented by him to be followed by many poets afterwards. He wrote Kanyaka (Virgin-1911), The Dream of Lavanaraju (1911) and a widely popular ballad Purnamma. Purnamma is the pathetic story of a maiden who prefers death to being married to an old man four times her age. In Nilagiripatalu (Songs of Blue mountains, 1909) he revolutionised both theme and treatment. Subhadra, a poem (1939), and Kondubhattiyam, a drama (1939), and a few prose works are his posthumous publications.

His patriotic song which starts with 'Country never does mean clay, but people and people alone' is famous throughout Andhra. It pulsates with the doctrine of love and humanistic philosophy. Both in life and in literature he stood for individual freedom and human fellowship. With a national outlook he wrote a letter (15-4-1912) to Saradacharan Mitra insisting on the necessity of a common script for all Indian languages. He believed in the fusion of old and new. His language is always simple and lucid. He said 'The highest function of literature is to give currency to a high standard of moral ideas'. He also said 'Art is my master and yet I have a duty to society'. He, the herald of Renaissance, is the source of inspiration to many famous modern Telugu poets like Nanduri Subbarao, Basavaraju Apparao, Adivi Bapiraju, Sri Sri, Arudra, Somasundar etc., for drawing their plots from contemporary life and powerfully presenting them in the spoken dialect. Regarded as the Father of the Telugu Short Story and champion of the colloquial language, he gave a clarion call to handle literature with a social purpose. An era is often named after him.

APPAYYA DIKSHITA(Sanskrit). There are many authors with this name. The most well-known of them is the author of Jayollasanidhi, a commentary on some selected portions of Bhagavatapurana. He belonged to the Vatsa gotra and was the son of Shrinivasadhvari. There are at least two more Appayyas in the Dikshita family itself. Appayya Dikshita II, son of Achchan, nephew of the well-known one, wrote Alamkaratilaka, Dushyantacharita and Rukminiparinaya. Appayya III (alias Atiratrayajvan alias Chinna Appayya), grandson of Achchan, son of Narayana, younger brother of Nilakantha Dikshita, wrote Chitramimamsadoshadhikkara answering Jagannatha's criticisms of Chitramimamsa of the well-known Appayya Dikshita.

The most famous and prolific of these three, Appayya Dikshita (b. 1520, d. 1593) came from the famous Dikshita family of Tamil Brahmins of Bharadvaja gotra. He was a great devotee of Shiva, a champion of southern Shaivism, and an authority on the Shrikantha branch of monistic Shaiva philosophy. Grandson of Acharya Dikshita, son of Rangarajadhvarin and Mangalambika, he was born at Adayapalam near Kanchi (Tundir Dist.). His younger brother was Achchan Dikshita who was the grandfather of Nilakantha Dikshita. He was married to Ratnakheta's daughter Mangalanayaki at his age of 20,and had three sons (eleven according to some) and two daughters. He taught Mimamsa and Vedanta to Bhattoji Dikshita and was also the teacher of Kalahastin who wrote Vasucharitra in praise of goddess Minakshi. Appayya was a protege of kings Chinna Timma Aravidu of Vijayanagar (1542-50), Chinna Bomma Nayaka of Vellore (1542-82) and Venkatapati Aravidu of Vijayanagar (1581-1614). He performed, like his ancestors, many sacrifices. He was invited by Tirumala Nayaka to settle some sectarian disputes at Madurai. He suffered direct hostilities from a Vaishnava Pandita Tatacharya and hostile criticism from Jagannatha Pandita. He passed away at the ripe age of 72 at Chidambaram.

A versatile writer in various fields like poetry, poetics, dialectics, grammar, monistic Shaivism, etc., he is credited by Nilakantha Dikshita with 104 works. Only half of them have survived the ravages of time. Of his stotras, some like Apitakuchambastava praising Durga, Atmarpanastuti praising Shiva, Hariharastuti praising Vishnu and Shiva together, Adityastuti praising the Sun-deity or that beautiful centum Varadarajastava praising Vishnu are fine devotional lyrics with melodious diction and fine turns of expression. Some other stotras are more scholarly than lyrical, e.g. Bharata and Ramayanatatparyasangraha are logical exercises attempting to prove Shiva's supremacy in the epics; Brahmatarkastava applies philosophical logic to that end, Shikharinimala presses monistic Shaiva Vedanta into service, while Shivamahimakalikastava uses Mimams amaxims for the purpose. Ratnatrayastuti advocates supremacy for the trio: Hari, Hara and Gauri. Many of these are again usefully equipped with auto-commentaries (vyakhya). Appayya Dikshita also commented upon some literary works, Vedantadeshika's epic Yadavabhyudayam, Krishanamishra's allegorical play Prabodhachandrodayam and Harivamshacharitam of Govinda Dikshita. He wrote a Prakrit grammar, and also some other grammatical works like Nakshatravadavali and Tinantasheshangraha; in Mimamsa, he wrote 4 works such as Upakramaparakrama, etc., the incomplete Vidhirasayanam and the Mayukhavali commentary on Parthasarathi Mishra's Shastradipika. In the field of poetics his contribution is noteworthy. His Lakshanaratnavali (lost) perhaps defined technical dramaturgic terms. Two chapters of the incomplete Vrittivartika deal with abhidha and lakshana only.

His analysis of the process of expression differs from the traditional view. Appaya Dikshita's Kuvalayananda modelled on Jayadeva's Chandraloka is exclusively devoted to poetic figures, increasing their number to a maximum of 115. Appaya totally discards the verbal figures, which merely please the ear but do not appeal to the heart; and he has conceived a number. of new figures like Prastutankura (establishing comprehension of two things both contextual), Mithyadhyavasiti (establishing false nature), lalita, etc., while his Gudhokti, and Vivritokti, etc., comprise the suggested sense. More genuine analysis of different poetic figures with originality and freshness of approach is to be found in the third work, Chitramimamsa which is incomplete. There is a lengthy dissertation on defining the simile itself. Jagannatha vehemently criticised Appayya for some of his observations, and wrote Chitramimamsakhandana to demolish Appaya's concepts, an attempt which was met with equal rebuke in Chitramimamsadoshadhikkara composed subsequently by one of Appayya's successors.

However his most significant contribution is in the field of vedanta. He commented upon Brahmasutra from a Vishishtadvaita standpoint, in Nayamayukhamalike(with Vyakhya), and refuted it in Ramanujashringabhanga. Similarly from Madhava's point of view, he wrote Nyayamuktavali and Nyayaratnamala (with Vyakhya) and then refuted it in Madhvatantramukhamardana (with Vyakhya). He respected Shankara's view point from which he commented upon the first Adhyaya of Brahmasutra, composed Nayamanjari dealing with all the adhikaranas (each in 2 verses) of Brahmasutra and composed Parimala commentary on Amalananda's Kalpataru In Siddhantalesasangraha (with Vyakhya) he expounds the views and principles of different Acharyas, proving once again his mastery over all the branches of Vedanta. In monistic Shaivism, Appayya Dikshita composed the poem Shikharinimala (with Vyakhya) and Shivakarnamritam to prove Shiva's supremacy; to establish firmly the school of Acharya Shrikantha, he wrote independent expository works Shivadvaitanirnaya and Anandalaharichandraika. His greatest work is Divakaramanidipika, a voluminous and profoundly brilliant commentary on Shrikantha's Bhashya on Brahmasutra. On its completion, its author was honoured with Kanakabhisheka (golden consecration) by King China Bomma, and came to be regarded as an incarnation of Lord Shiva Himself. The work has secured for Appayya Dikshita a permanent place in the galaxy of brilliant philosophers. He was regarded as Sarvatantrasvatantra 'versatile' and dominated the literary and scholarly world of South India, of the 16th century.

APPUSWAMI, P.N.(Tamil b. 1891) Widely known in Tamil literary circles for over half a century as 'Pey Naa Appuswami', Appuswami was born in a distinguished literary family in Madras. He studied law and became a member of the legal profession but he was drawn towards the new awakening in Tamil especially in the dissemination of modern scientific knowledge to general readers. He was closely associated with the leaders of Tamil enlightenment like U.V. Swaminatha Aiyar, S. Vaiyapuri Pillai and T.K. Chidambaranatha Mudaliar and the weekly meetings he organized at Chitrakulam, Madras, are even today fondly remembered by his contemporaries. He founded the children's section of the prestigious Tamil monthly Kalaimagal and wrote and translated a large number of informational and educational articles. He was a pioneer in the field of writing modern scientific books in Tamil and has dozens of titles to his credit, the most celebrated being Science and Commonsense, Today's Science and You and The Time-Machine. Another famous book of his is The Story of China. He collaborated with J.P. Manickam to write a set of science books in Tamil on the atom, wireless transmission, X-rays and so on and quite a few of these books have been prize-winners and have been prescribed as text books. He was awarded the Children's Writer Award for the year 1961 and honoured by the Tamil Writers Association in 1965 for his distinguished services to Tamil. He was in the forefront in the field of systematic translation of the core books and directed many a translation camp and workshop. His own translation of the monumental History of Bengali Literature and the direction he gave to the Southern Languages Book Trust are gratefully remembered by a large number of readers, writers, publishers and translators. His translations of Sangam poems and a few works of Subrahmanya Bharati into English are products of exemplary sensitivity to language and literature. He became a father-figure and a source of inspiration and guidance to science-writers, translators and writers of children's literature.

APTE, HARI NARAYAN (Marathi; b. 1864, d. 1919) is known as the father of the modern Marathi novel. Apte, popularly referred to as Haribhau, was a typical representative of the middle class in Pune of his time. He was one of the first batch of ten students, who had enrolled in the New English School, just established by such leaders as Chiplunkar, Tilak and Agarkar. He naturally came under the impact of their precept and was especially influenced by the vigorous new thinking represented by their weekly journal Kesari, which championed the cause of national freedom and social reform. Apte joined the Deccan College, the same institution that these leaders had studied in, but could not proceed beyond the First year. However, in the library of this College, he read the works of authors such as Scott, Dumas, Dickens and Jane Austen, and reaped a rich harvest from this study. It was at this stage that his wealthy uncle Mahadev Chimanaji Apte founded Anandashram, an institution for the study of Sanskrit classics and entrusted it to Haribhau so that he could devote all his time to his favourite pastime of reading and writing.

Haribhau has obvious claims to be considered the founder of the modern Marathi novel. When he appeared on the literary scene, the popular romantic novels of Halbe and Risbud had held the field. They were written in an ornamental style and had precious little to do with the realities of life. They were crude in almost every respect and equally lacking in plot-craft and characterization. Though everything spelt a kind of falseness about them, for want of better models they prospered. The advent of Haribhau brought dramatic change, opened the minds of readers to the power of a form of fiction which was then unparalleled, stylewise, constructionwise and contentwise. Haribhau's novel was altogether a new kind of novel.

Haribhau's novels can be conveniently divided into two groups: historical and social. All his historical novels were inspired by the national awakening that was well on its way during his time. While his historical novels like Ushakkal, Suryodaya, Gad Ala Pan Sinha Gela and Keval Swarajyasathi deal with the rise of the Maratha power, his Vajraghat, the finest of his historical novels deals with the downfall of the Vijayanagar empire. He travelled still backwards in time and wrote Chandragupta. All these historical novels are suspenceful, well-knit and spell-binding.

And yet Haribhau, in his own time was perhaps better known for his novels of social content. Prominent among them are Pan Lakshat Kon Gheto, Mi, and Yashavatrao Khare. All the three of them follow the autobiographical pattern of David Copperfield. All his social novels are fraught with contemporary social problems like child-marriage, dowry, widowhood, female education etc. All these novels depict very faithfully the social condition at the turn of the last century. It is true that the scope of his social novels is limited to middle class life, and that these novels are rather loose in construction, yet these novels of social consciouness and commitment are still fascinating and their impact still considerable.

He has left some seven novels unfinished. Haribhau has also written a powerful play on the life of Sant Sakhu, a short essay on classical literature and a number of short stories, one of which dealing with a famine-stricken peasant family 'Kal Tar Motha Kathin Ala' has been translated into English. Some critics consider him as the father of Marathi short story. He was the editor of the weekly Karmanuk, in which most of his novels were published serially.

Haribhau was elected to preside over the Marathi Sahitya Sammelan held at Akola in 1912.

APTE, NARAYAN HARI Marathi; b. 1889, d. 1971) was a popular novelist and a writer of practical books. He was born in the village Samdoli, Dist. Sangli, Maharashtra. He was educated at Samdoli and Satara. He did not go in for university education, instead he started a publication unit at Koregaon, near Satara and wrote extensively. For some time he was a co-editor of Kirloskar Khabar magazine. He started his own magagine Madhukar wherein he serialised many of his books.

He was a prolific writer, who wrote more than 35 novels and about 10 books in practical wisdom, particularly a guide to the happy family life.

All his novels and short stories are of a didactic nature, sprung from middle class idealism. Many of his novels were made into successful films, particularly Kunkoo based on his novel Na Patnari Gosta (1923) was a social hit of the time. His important social novels are Sukhacha Mulmantra (1924), Pahatepurvicha Kalokha

Banarasi Bore (1932) and Aaramviram (1934) are his popular short-story collections.

Grihasaukhya (1931), Aayushyacha Paya (1946), Kuryat Sada Mangalam (1949) are his important books in practical wisdom.

APTE, VASUDEV GOVIND (Marathi; b. 1871, d. 1930) was a writer of books for children, lexicographer and critic. Born at Dharangav, East Khandesh, Maharashtra, he obtained his early education at Dhule. He graduated from the Calcutta University in 1893, and took to teaching at a school in Pune. Subsequently he worked as the Reporter of the Native Press, Bombay Government, as the private tutor in the former princely state of Indore, as the editor of Jnanaprakasha in Pune, as the editor of Malahari Martanda, Indore and ultimately returned to teaching at Tilak Mahavidyalaya, Pune.

His most significant contribution has been in the field of childrens' literature. In 1906 he started Ananda, a Marathi monthly for children. For many years he himself used to write the entire issue of the periodical. The monthly became very popular with the children and it has played a significant role in moulding the children for some generations. Mani ani Motya (1913), Eka Divasachya Suttita (1916), Balabharata (2nd ed, 1931), Ramayanantalya Sopya Goshti (1906), Balamanoranjan (1915), Mulancha Vividhajnana Sangraha (1917) etc. are his more important works out of more than 50 that he wrote for children.

He has translated into Marathi all the novels of Bankimchandra Chatterjee under the title Sampurna Bankimchandra (in 4 vols., 1923-1925) and some short stories of Rabindranath Tagore under the title Raviche Ujjval Kiran (1920). He also compiled a Bengali Marathi dictionary, Bangali–Marathi-Kosha (1925) and wrote Marathi Bangali Shikshaka (third edition, 1925), a self teacher for Bengali language.

He also published a few novels. Of these mention may be made of Navayuga (1903) and Murtimanta Deshabhiman 1907). He translated some novels from English into Marathi as well. Out of his lexicographical works Marathi Bhasheche Sampradaya Va Mhani (1910), Vyavaharik Sanskrit Marathi Kosha (1913), Marathi Shabdaratnakara (1922), Marathi Bhashechi Sabdasampatti (1922) deserve special mention.

ARA NAAZHIKA NERAM (Malayalam). One of the finest novels written by Parappurathu, Ara Naazhika Neram (1967) won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award and the S.P. Benefit Fund prize. When it was filmed, it won the first prize for the story from the Government of Kerala.

The novel, like some of the other novels of the same period, presents a realistic picture of the decline in the moral values and political ideals of Indians in general that set in following the attainment of freedom. The chief character in Ara Naazhika Neram is the ninety year old christian Kunjenachen nurtured in the Old Testament-culture. He endorses Solomon's view that all is vanity. His life also bears testimony to that view. Man bears his burden of grief and gropes in darkness to reach a destination that is not there. Part of the novel unfolds itself through the memory of the old man. Death is at his door. In this situation, as he reviews his life, he gets a clear idea of the futility of the life he has led. He had fought against his opponents and committed adultery, yet he tried to hold fast to certain residual values of life. But the next generation tells a different story.

Kunjenachen had five sons. His eldest son Thoma died in a brawl with the Nairs years before. Thoma had left behind him a son, Kunjappi. The second son Kivarichen would not give his thirty-year old employed daughter Kuttiamma in marriage lest he should lose her income. She elopes with her lover; and marries him. She is loyal to the family. The third son is Kunjucherukkan, who does not know how to live an honest life. His son is engaged in smuggling; he is caught by the police. The fourth son Philippochen is rich, but immoral. His loose morals drive his wife mad. His son elopes with the maid in the house. Philippochen has had his eye on the girl. The youngest son Mathewkutty is engaged in church politics. Sivarama Kurup, who supplies Kunjenachen with opium, is his partner in business. Mathewkutty has a son, Rajan, by his first marriage. Rajan comes home for the holidays, marries Santhamma and returns. He dies in the battlefield and leaves Santhamma a widow. Mathewkutty's second wife Dinamma nurses Kunjenachen with sincerity.

None of Kunjenachen's sons finds happiness. No one is upright. Except Kuttiamma and Santhamma who keep the lamp of virtue burning, everyone else gropes in the dark. Kunjenachen is distraught. But once, to his utter dismay, he discovers Dinama in the arms of Sivarama Kurup. That shocks the man. He has now nothing to hold on to. He falls upon his bed never to rise again. Kurup, who fears the consequences of the old man's discovery, administers to him poison along with opium. That hastens the death of the old man. But the old man puts up a brave struggle with death. As the old man lies dying, this is what he experiences; "A cry was heard. It was the cry of the crowd that rushed in. The cry comes closer and closer. What's it that I see? The sea rises to devour the shore. Now the waves rise upto the sky. In the wink of an eye the sea swallowed the crowd. Their cries resounded in the air.

Somehow exert–come to the surface–But here is a mill-stone hung on the neck–It pulls me down–shall not give way–no–My hands reach for the sky. But the waves–take me away into the depth. My feet grow limp–impossible–impossible to rise".

Parappurath's chief concern is to express powerfully the human predicament in the present set-up. Nothing sustains man in the present milieu. Human existence has no mainstay; and man sinks into the abyss of nothingness. A few lamps flicker at a distance. But they recede as darkness envelops the consciousness of the modern man. Parappurath does not negate virtues. But virtues have lost their relevance in the present set–up. This view is a violent criticism of the Indian society. It hurls challenges that the society and the nation have to meet.

ARALU-BARALU (Kannada) is the sixth collection of poems by the late V. Sitaramaiah. It was first published in 1972. Though not representative of all his output or contributions to modern Kannada poetry, the collection has acquired importance by the fact that it won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1973. Even so, the collection contains fiftyone poems which are typical of his basic attitude and outlook on life. It is possible that the poems in the present collection strike the reader as different from those in his earlier, especially the first three collections, but the differences relate only to the manner of expression. This only indicates that in departing from the formal structures of earlier days he has not stagnated but has kept with the moods and modes of the contemporary literary scene.

Speaking about the poems in the collection he says at the end of his introduction that even if they do not display very great flights of imagination, the hopes and the aspirations, the outlook and its expression of the writer are what they seek to convey. What he says is the hallmark of all lyrical poetry and the poems brought together here cannot, in that sense, be exceptions. That he loved beauty in all its forms and admired all that is great and noble is only too well-known. But this love of the beautiful and the noble, instead of remaining a mere personal source of enjoyment, has to serve as an elevating and enriching experience and operate as an influence to make a richer life for all. That is his basic attitude and aspiration. The world's poverty is not of food or of clothing; what impoverishes it is the absence of high aspirations, he says in the opening poem of the present collection. There can be no greater or more honourable ambition for man than to strive for the good and happiness of all. This might look like the unreal dream of an idealist but it cannot be denied that the validity of the aspiration, if not the hope of its early fulfilment, is rooted in one's faith in the essential goodness of human nature. It is the loss or the absence of such faith which vitiates human relationships and causes all the avoidable suffering in life. Friendliness, sympathy, compassion, understanding and patience can solve all our problems and make life better in all respects. These are the salient ideas at the back of all the compositions in the collection. Some clearly state the idea and some others illustrate these aspects by picturing the positive and negative sides of what he hopes for as an ideal for contemporary man.

Sitaramaiah's earlier collection contained lyrics that could be sung. Some of them have made him justly famous. To the extent that this collection does not contain lyrics that can be sung, it lacks a typical feature of his poetical output. But there are other compensations of which the lengthy introduction is one. It raises some very fundamental questions which Kannada lyrical poetry, now having achieved maturity, has to answer as the history of its development approaches the close of the century. Is it possible to have an objective standard by which one can judge poetry? What does Indianness mean in our literature? What are the compulsions that make change in literature inevitable? Do such changes always serve progress? What is the nature of a writer's freedom? What are the limitations of expression? He discusses these questions and makes his stand quite clear. Changed times and tastes may make new ways necessary but none will welcome change at the expense of proprieties which man has always respected and accepted as inviolable parts of a humane culture. The poems and the introduction together represent a significant contribution by a major poet of our time.

ARALU-MARALU, (Kannada), the Anthology of Bandre's poems which bagged the Sahitya Akademi Award (1958), is a bunch of five collections, Suryapana, Haridaya Samudra, Mukta Kantha, Chaityalaya, and Jivana Lahari. This Anthology is a major milestone in the poet's creative career, marking a distinct transitional shift from the lyrical to the metaphysical mode. Comprising 273 poems, Aralu–Maralu incorporates broadly poetry that emanated during his stay at Sholapur (Maharashtra) between 1944 to 56, a period of troubles and turmoils in his life.

Bendre was born into a tradition which ardently believed in God and it appears that the traumatic experiences of parting with his eldest and the youngest children during 1944, which pushed him into the whirlpool of personal misery, provided a new life-experience which strengthened his belief in God and made him a devotee of the Divine. Perhaps this life-situation explains his increasing identification with the literature of seers like Shankaracharya, Jnaneshwar, Ramana Maharshi, Aurobindo and Sri. Mata and his engagement in the contemplation of their thoughts which prepared his mental frame for taking up this work. A new phase was thus paving its way in Bendre's poetic corpus.

To Bendre poetry is a process of exaltation. Bendre demonstrates in his poetry the cosmic structure and weaves countless verbal patterns that connect the body to the mind, flesh to the spirit, the empirical to the transcendental, the personal to the social and poetry to life. Indeed Bendre's poetry can be comprehended within a genuinely international humanistic frame-work. His world outlook is revealed through these lines : "Being the inner voice of the cosmos, I Kannadise here as Ambikatanayadatta".

A quarter of Aralu Maralu consists of translations of the poems of the Seers. Indeed the essential mode of this volume is Arshya, that of a Seer. The poet desired the maturity and power of the Seers' expression to flow into Kannada. Indeed, Bendre does not mechanically reproduce the metaphysical ideas but transmuted them with a distinctive flavour of its own.

In his theoretical stance, Bendre's model of poetry is structured in four successive and progressive forms– sensuous beauty, imaginative beauty, intellectual beauty, and ideal beauty. Bendre's ideal is apparently to produce poetry which uses all these forms in a complex structure whose apex is the last form. It is from this point of view that Bendre has transformed into poetry every idiom, emotion and experience of Kannada. This phenomenon is witnessed in his poetic creation ranging from Krishna Kumari (the first Anthology) to Kavya Vykhari (a posthumous publication). 'Devamata', a poem from Jivanahari (Aralu–Maralu) is a good illustration of this process. Aralu-Maralu represents poetry of excellence from the points of view of language, culture and ethos of the people.

There is a uniqueness about Aralu-Maralu; each collection contains a number of poems that can be read as individual pieces; nonetheless, at the end of a careful reading of the volume, one is impressed by a certain basic unity that underlies the whole volume. The unity may be said to consist of two things: the general ethos and atmosphere in which every poem, so to say, functions, and in the dominant thematic concerns that inform almost every poem in the five collections. The first kind of unity is the result of a fusion of a certain kind of cultural environment in which the poet grew and the individuality of the poet. The second kind of unity emerges from the fact that the poems share, in one way or other, the same thematic spirit, nature and history, the same thematic concerns; tensions between body and spirit, nature and history, existence and transcendence.

The poet who weighed the power of the Supreme Being with that of the predicament of man always remained optimistic and saw a bright future for humanity. The concept of 'The dawn of a new age', 'The emergance of a new man' and 'The child of tomorrow' etc. find crystallisation in Bendre's poetry.

While Bendre heard the music of a one-stringed instrument when he wrote Belagu (Gari), he was inspired by the music of a thousand strings when he created Aralu Maralu. This evidences his reception of the voice of the cosmos and his world outlook. Around 1957, Bendre found a new ground for his poetic creation as 'udbhava' (poetry of emergence). An exposition of this technique finds fruition in Naku Tanti.

Bendre explores metaphysical problems through poetry rather than merely writing poetry for its own sake. Bendre's poetry continues to probe into contradictions, paradoxes and polarities in order to seek an underlying unity and harmony. Bendre has not hesitated to subordinate the western-oriented tradition of artistic autonomy to his personal, spiritual, metaphysical, socio-political needs. To Bendre poetry is not an end in itself, but it is a part of a total search for an integral, comprehensive vision of man and the cosmos. Bendre, through his poetic corpus, has written himself into immortality.

ARAMBAM DORENDRAJIT SINGH (Manipuri; b.1901, d.1944) was a poet and dramatist of modern Manipuri literature. A graduate with Honours in Sanskrit from Calcutta University, he joined teaching profession as a school teacher and remained so till his death. His Moirang Thoibi, a play based on the immortal love story of Khamba and Thoibi of Moirang was first published in 1939. That he was well-read in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice and Kalidas' Abhijnan Sakuntalam could be seen in the characterisation of Thoibi. Moirang Thoibi was a successful stage play shown on the stage of the Rupmahal several times. The next play, Bhagyachandra written in 1945 on the theme of regaining of the throne of Manipur by Bhagyachandra, a saint king of Manipur in the 18th century and the subsequent installation of the image of Shri Govindaji shows also an influence of Shakespeare's Macbeth. Kamsabadha, an epic poem on the killing of Kamsa by Krishna, was published in 1945. He made new experiments in the language of this epic poem by an intermingling of Manipuri and Sanskrit. He translated a few more plays from Bengali but these have been lost. A pioneering writer, he was involved with the growth of journalism and periodicals in Manipuri literature. He was honoured with the title of Kavya Ratna posthumously by the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad in 1948 in appreciation of his contribution to the growth of Manipuri literature. His writings, like those of his contemporaries, which have influences of Sanskrit and Bengali literatures in style, mannerisms and language, represent the early phase of modern Manipuri literature.

ARAMBAM SAMARENDRA SINGH (Manipuri; b. 1935) is a leading playwright of contemporary Manipuri literature. Born in a Hindu family, he passed M.A. in Political Science from Poona University and got involved in social problems. A professional writer who tries to look at the problems of contemporary Manipuri society and interpret them seriously; he excelled in the art of short plays. His first short play, Judge Sahebki Imung (The family of Judge Saheb) published in 1973 brings out the dichotomy of the members of the family of a judge who are brought up in the atmosphere of liberal education, but with little moorings in the cultural tradition of the society where they were born. Karbar followed in 1976 which was again followed by Dasa in 1978. Yening Thagi Ishei (Song of Vernal Time) was published in 1981. Among one-act plays which he has written, Tirtha Yatra published in 1975 and Nong Tarakle (The Rain Comes) published in 1979 have been considered important. Some of his plays like Mirang (Cobweb), Hingnanaba Hingba (To Live for the Sake of Living) and Eigidi Cabinet Oina (Me as Cabinet Minister) have been staged for several nights at different theatre houses of Imphal. Honoured in 1981 with the Manipur State Kala Akademi award for literature, he is associated with various literary and social organisations and theatre houses of Imphal; he was a member of the General Council and the Executive Board of the Manipur State Kala Akademi. He is a member of the Film Development Council, a Government of Manipur undertaking. His plays are marked by an intense awareness of the contemporary social problems of Manipuri society which is passing through a period of upheaval in all spheres and a crisis of confidence of the people which he dramatises through rich dialogues in a mixed language of Manipuri and English. The conflict between tradition and modernity and a quest for new values in place of the old characterise his plays. His powerful dialogues especially in the plays dwelling on social, economic and political issues grip the reader and make up for the weakness in the action of the play. He represents the new group of young playwrights of Manipur, who look at human and social problems critically and rationally.

ARANYA PHASALA(Oriya: The Wild Harvest) is a drama in three acts written by Manoranjan Das, which won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1971. It provides a brief account of two couples–Subrat and Bebi, Barma and Lili who come to stay in a lonely forest bungalow to get some respite from the monotony of their lives. Meanwhile, Sangram who is in search of gold mines joins them. He also happens to be one-time lover of Bebi and an old acquaintance of Lili. The drama deals with the intricate relationship between these two women and three men. It depicts the absurdity of their lives—their hypocrisy, jealousy, cowardice which spring from their sense of utter dissatisfaction with their lives. Bebi and Lili are not content with their husbands. Bebi considers Subrat a 'book worm' and Lili considers Barma a 'brute'. Sangram, who lost Bebi because of a misunderstanding, is not satisfied with his fortunes and now is in search of gold fields which is symbolic of futile search for some meaning in life. And at last, unable to win his lost love he commits suicide. Bebi, torn between her duty and her past love is a pathetic creature. Lili is also unhappy, for she is growing fat and holds no more attraction for Barma.

In the lonely forest primordial impulses are roused defying the compulsions of social ethics. The plot moves round the central symbol of a goat who happens to be always hungry. Its bleating suggests the libidinal urges of the characters which have long been suppressed in their uncomfortable marital relationship. While Barma goes to hunt tiger, Subrat and Lili engage themselves in illicit sex. The past lives of both the women are associated with the memory of this bungalow and Sangram. For some time in the drama, both Bebi and Lili seek to escape from the suffocation of their present lives into their past relationship with Sangram, as much as the latter tries to regain his lost love. But the attempt fails as these 'domesticated animals' do not have the requisite guts to respond to the call of their real instincts and impulses. The goat is killed and the bleating stops suggesting the silencing of the primordial instincts to which the characters for some time attempted to be sincere. Sangram has realized the absurdity of all these, the various urges and attempts, the suffocation and pretensions of relationships. Since this hypocrisy is unbearable, he commits suicide. Ironically, Sangram is called 'actor'. But he is the only character who lives true to himself and being unable to reconcile himself to the hypocrisies of life he brings his own death. In this sense, all the other characters who address Sangram as 'actor', are themselves acting, never really living. Through short, sometimes incoherent dialogues and through distorted sentence patterns Manoranjan Das conveys the sense of absurdity of the warped relationships of these characters.

ARANYAK (Bengali). This novel by Bibhutibhusan Bandyopadhyay was first published in April, 1939. The subject matter of this novel is unusual in the sense that nature here plays the main role instead of human beings. The wild nature has captured the mind and imagination of the author completely. Unlike Bibhutibhusan's other novels the locale of Aranyak (The Wild) is not Bengal. The story is set in the forests of south Bihar near the banks of Kusi river. While working in the estate of Khelat Ghose, the author used to visit Ismailpur, Ajmabad and many such places. In Aranyak, he has described the scenic beauty of these places.

The story of this novel has been narrated in the first person. A young educated Bengali, Satyacharan, has come from Calcutta to the dense forests of Bhagalpur, to work as a manager. He is entrusted with the tasks of supervising the work of clearance of forests and arranging settlements by distributing lands among local people. In this sophisticated and town-bred youngman the wild nature around creates an initial feeling of revulsion and fear, but gradually it changes into a romantic longing, and at the end into a mystic experience. Satyacharan delays the clearing of forests and distribution of lands. In the end he finds solace in the belief that it is impossible for man to destroy nature completely. The hero has neglected his duties in order to save nature, but gradually he realises that man's desire for money is too strong for the passive resistance of nature, and he returns to Calcutta. Some critics are of opinion that Aranyak does not have the characteristics of a good novel, as it does not have any central story or plot. The novel gives us the feeling as if we are reading the day to day account of a traveller. The characters and incidents recorded are not connected but almost every character or incident is an entity in itself.

The narration is like a procession of characters and incidents in a wild forest. But the author has firmly declared that Aranyak is a novel and not a diary or travelogue. The host of landless poor men who come to the hero for land, display variety of characters. We find the teacher Gauri Tewari whose whole life is an account of one failure after another. Another character is Kunta, the daughter of a dancing girl and wife of a Rajput, Devi Singh. The society has rejected her after her husband's death. She has nothing to feed the children with and collects the remains of crops in the silent darkness of night. But this abject poverty or misfortune has not been able to destroy the purity and freshness of her mind and character. Beside these characters who are docile and submissive, we have the character of Dobru Panna, the king of the Santhals. Dobru has been defeated in the Santhal revolt, he talks very little and grazes his buffaloes in the mountains, but his character is vigorous, forceful and majestic. It will be wrong to think that Labotulia forest, the location of the story, is only full of simple minded jungle folk. We see here the cruel and greedy men like Dhantal Sahu, Nandalal Golawala and Rashbihari Singh, who have tried to pollute the whole atmosphere though without success. But by and large the characters depicted in Aranyak are as natural as their surrounding; even the Bengali characters have lost their own cultural identity and have accepted the hard and coarse lifestyle of the wild forest. Aranyak has been described by many critics as the best novel of Bibhutibhusan Bandyopadhyay. The relation of man and nature which has been the main theme of almost all his novels and short stories has reached here new heights and perceptions. The minute seasonal changes in nature have been described in a language full of poetry. The cosmic vision and imagination of the writer unveils the secret of creation. Aranyak is the only novel in Bengali which depicts such an intimate relationship between man and nature with such success.

ARANYAKA (Sanskrit). The concluding portions of many of the Brahmanas, which deal with esoteric matter, are called Aranyakas. Probably they were imparted and learnt in the forests. Some of the oldest upanishads are the concluding chapters of the Aranyakas e.g. Brihadaranyakopanishad. Aitareya Aranyaka and Kaushitaki Aranyaka belong to the Rigveda, Tattiriya Aranyaka to the Yajurveda and Brihadaranyaka to the Shatapathabrahmana of Yajurveda. The Brahmanas of Samaveda and Atharvaveda have no Aranyaka. The Aranyakas contain ritualistic and symbolic interpretations of the universe, and the upanishadic portions deal with philosophy.

ARASIPRASAD SINGH (Hindi; b. 1911) an important Hindi poet of Bihar (born Darbhanga), started writing poetry in 1927 and his first poem, Aam Ka Per, (The Mango Tree) was published in the same year. His first collection of poems Kalpi published in 1938, received high acclaim from Hindi critics and a critic of the stature of Ramchandra Shukla made a mention of it in his Hindi Sahitya Ka Itihas. Encouraged by this appreciation, the poet himself published his remaining poems numbering 796 in a rather ambitious anthology viz; Arasi in 1942.

Arasiprasad Singh, who is primily a poet, has more than 25 volumes to his credit. Besides, he has written a number of short-stories which are to be found in his four story-collections. His poems are charged with patriotic feelings, love of nature and a variety of erotic sentiments. Exuberance, gaiety and conviviality are some of the outstanding characteristics of Arasi's poems.

FURTHER WORKS: Poetry Kalpi (1938), Arasi (1942); Panchjanya (1945); Nayi Disha (1945); Nand Das (1953), Prem Git (1954), Ram Katha (1954), Jadu Ki Bansi (1954), Sanjivini (1964); Aranyak (1964); Aranyak (1965); Sone ka Jharana, Kathamala

(1965); Kagaz Ki Nav (1966); Kalam aur Banduk (1968); Uday (1971).

ARATI (Marathi). The origin of Arati seems to be the religious ritual 'Artikya'. In this ritual the devotees of a deity or a religious head, would wave auspicious wicker-lamps, around their idols or figures. This auspicious ceremony was also performed when a victorious hero would return home from the battlefield. Then scores of married women, considered as 'suwasinis', would wave five-wickered ghee lamps, around the hero, chanting welcome songs and praises. The temple Aratis were more or less general public performances and had definite time table. The 'Arati' would start right from the early hours of the dawn. This was called 'Kakada Arati', in which little wooden torches were lighted and people, holding them, would go round the village streets. The torches themselves were used as the auspicious lamps. The 'Arati' at the Puja (ceremonial worship) would be performed morning and evening. At the time of putting the deity to sleep, the 'Sheja Arati' was performed. There are different songs of Arati composed by the saints and devotional poets and they are also called Aratis because of their association with the ceremony of the same name. The visual affect of the Arati could easily be imagined.

A really grand performance on a mass scale is witnessed on the Ashadhi Ekadashi day at Pandharpur when thousands of the Warakari devotees join in the Arati to Lord Vithoba, and playing upon the Ektaris and Dholaks or Pakhawazas, all burst into the symphony of "Jaya Deva, Jaya Deva, Jaya Panduranga", the opening burden of the famous Arati to God Panduranga, credited to have been composed by Panduranga's most favourite 'bhakta', Santa Namadev. Likewise, the Khandoba temple at Jejuri (in Pune district of Maharashtra) must be having a similar spectacle of the ceremony, in as much as throngs of the Gondhalis, traditional religious performers of the Gondhala ritual, accompanied by hundreds over hundreds of the Dhanagaras, shepherds and goatherds, rend the skies with their loud ery, "Malhari devacha changa bhalay". This is truly a unique ritual, a peculiar way of performing an Arati ceremony. Khandoba is a primitive deity; he is also called Malhari Martanda, Mhalasa-kanta (Mhalasa's husband), Khanderaya. Thus in the Arati song, composed by Sant Ramadas, he is addressed as "Jayajaya Malhari"; in Madhvamuni's Arati he is 'Khanderaya'.

Perhaps the oldest of such Arati songs is the most famous of them all. That is the Arati to Panduranga mentioned earlier. It is a piece from the Gatha collection of Namadev.

The collection of ten (or eleven to be exact) Aratis compiled by Mahindrabhatta (Mahinbhatta as he was better known to his fellow Mahanubhavas) seems to be equally ancient. This collection is called Jatuchi (or Jatichi) Arati. The founder of the Mahanubhava sect, Shri Chakradhara Swami, is invoked and praised in these songs. Thus saints and poets like Namadev from the 13th century to the erudite poet Moropant, have written literally hundreds of such 'Aratis'. Ekanath, Tukaram, Ramadas, Madhvamuni have quite a few Aratis to their credit. One Arati, called Arati Bhavnasundrachi, is peculiar in its composition and perhaps evinces influence of the Hindi 'Arati Kunja Vihariki'. Even upto modern times people have continued composing newer and newer Aratis. Veer Savarkar's 'Arati to Shivaji' composed some time in about 1908, proved to be a trend-setting event. As poetic compositions not many would stand a rigorous analysis, still Namadev's famous Arati about Panduranga is perhaps a monument of meek and humble surrender of a devotee's mind to the grace of the Almighty, with a total abandonment of the Self. Ramadas's 'Aratis' evince an additional grace–a unique sense of sound and colour in their composition. Especially his Aratis to Shankara and Hanumana are case in point. Few Arati writers could claim any such fine nuances of sensitivity. In point of popularity Ramadas's 'Arati' to Ganapati would rank next to Namadev's 'Arati' to Panduranga, and Ekanatha's Arati to Dattatreya would be third in this line. Perhaps Narahari's 'Arati' to Durga Devi' would stand in line with these Aratis in popularity and fame. All these Arati compositions are in the peculiar Arati rhythm of 6 matra, 6 beats, the theka being that of the Dadara Tala, very common in the folklore rhythms. Majority of the Arati songs are in this measure technically called "Parilina". One of the famous Arati is, the Arati to Jnanadeva, composed by Rama Janardana. It runs like this: 'Arati Jananaraja', in 8 matra beats of the Dinavatsula measure. The other types of Aratis like the 'Sheja Arati', and the 'Kakada Arati' as also the 'Jatu Aratis' are composed in yet another measure of 8 matra beats. Dhumali as the Tala is, the common theka becoming the Druta Bhajani theka in the end.

ARDH KATHANAK. (Hindi. 1641). Mediaeval Hindi literature is not rich in autobiographies, but Braj Bhasha has two very important representative works in this class:

Ardh Kathanak of Banarasi Das Jain and Vichitra Natak of Guru Gobind Singh.

Poet Banarasi Das had a chequered course of life and at the age of 55 he was obliged to write his memoirs. He thought he was midway in his life's journey and that is why he named his work Ardh Kathanak i.e. Half of the story. Soon after, he fell ill and died at the age of 57.

Banarasi Das was a multilinguist. In the mediaeval society the rulers and the Pandits had a supreme position. Banarasi Das, though a businessman by caste, dared to crash into the field of letters successfully. At least four of his works are known to be authentic. The Nam Mala Nataksamaya Sar, Banarasi Vilas (a collection of minor works) and Ardh Kathanak.

Ardh Kathanak is a work comprising 675 couplets mostly 'doha' and 'chaupayi'. The poet calls his language 'the dialect of Madhya Desh' which was commonly spoken in the towns from Haryana to Uttar Pradesh. It contains numerous references of historical interest. The descriptions are not literary but factual. The poet also reflects on his past life. Thrice married, he had seven children–two daughters and five sons, all of whom eventually died leaving the old man lonely in deep anguish. During his youth, the poet led a non-serious life. Instead of attending to his business, he used to relax at home reading the two love tales (written by the Sufis in Hindi) viz. Madhumalti and Mrigavati, and to learn from them the pleasures of love-life.

Ardh Kathanak describes many places in different contexts of events. Even the names of localities and the markets are given. Rohtak, Narawar, Jaunpur, Etawah, Agra, Meerut, Khairagarh, Fatehpur, Ferozabad, Allahabad, Patna, Kashi, Korra Village, Moti Katra locality, Hastinapur, Delhi etc. catch the attention of the reader. Through the incidents of his life he presents the social fabric of his time. The poet does not exaggerate but narrates the incidents as faithfully as possible.

The Mughals, from Humayun to Shah Jahan, find mention in the book. The poet has no complaint about the Mughals but he gives a very crude picture of people's sufferings at the hands of the subedars. Every death meant uncertainty about the successor in the Mughal house and the public was surrendered to the cruel whims of the terrorists. When the news of Akbar's death spread in the city, all businessmen closed their shops, removed the valuables to unknown places, and bore torn clothes and dressed up like beggars to avoid torture and fleecing at the hands of the officers.

The world is full of strange people and none can predict the behaviour of even one's intimate friends and relatives. According to Banarasi Das, all depends on fate. 'Moha' is the strongest factor in the world which places the educated and the uneducated on the same footing. Peace comes to the mind only when one gives up everything (Aparigraha)–even his own desires. His autobiography is a true and brief picture of the life of a contemporary middle class trader of the region.

ARIF, DAYA SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1894, d. 1946) was a popular writer of devotional and didactic verses. He belonged to a backward rural family of farm labourers, called Mazhabi Sikhs. Having been thrashed by his poor father, Santa Singh, because of his pursuit of learning, left home and started living as a recluse; learnt Punjabi, Hindi, Sanskrit, Urdu, Persian and Arabic; and studied scriptures of the Sikhs, Hinduṣ and Muslims from their traditional teachers at their respective places of worship and instruction. He began writing poetry while in teens and published his maiden book, Fanah da Makan (Abode of Mortality), in 1914; followed by his most popular work, Zindagi Bilas (Discourse on Life), in 1915. These were produced in several editions and in various scripts, bringing him not only fame but also his life-companion in 1918 and invitation in 1928 from his admirers in Malaya. On return, he organised a 'dhadi jatha' (choir) and began composing and singing historical ballads, called 'parsang', in praise of Sikh Gurus, warriors and martyrs, most of which are lying unpublished with his son. Another of his popular books, Saputtar Bilas, was published in 1921 and addressed to Sardar Kultar Singh. These preachings and publications also earned him some disciples, one of whom, Sardar Dhanna Singh Gulshan, flourished as Union Minister of State for Education and Social Welfare. Punjab Government held a memorial function in his honour at his birth-place in 1967. Daya Singh followed verse-traditions of mediaeval Indian poetry and used traditional norms, popular forms and favourite metres for exhorting people to contemplation of God and self-purification; reminding them of the object of life and its ultimate end; and warning them against involvement in the world whose glory is evanescent and our stay in which is transitory. Being religious by nature, an underlying note of mysticism and ethical reflections is ever present in his devotional and admonitory verses.

ARIF, GHULAM HASSAN BEG (Kashmiri; b. 1910) was born in a well known family. His father's name was Sarfaraz Beg. 'Arif' got his M.Sc. from Aligarh Muslim University and was then appointed a Lecturer in S.P. College, Srinagar. He was later on appointed Deputy Director in Sericulture Department from where he retired as Director. He also worked as Director of Radio Kashmir, Srinagar, for a short period. He began his poetic career when Mehjoor's fame was at its zenith. He remained closely associated with Mehjoor, who saw in his early poetry a promising poet. Arif found the Kashmiri language in a neglected condition and he was determined to devote his whole life to its upliftment. In 1945, with the help of his friends, he constituted a literary society, namely, Bazm-i-Adab. He joined the National Cultural Front in 1947 and became its central figure. It goes to the credit of Arif that he motivated some talented writers, including D.N. Nadim, to write in Kashmiri. He edited the monthly Kashmiri Gulrez. In 1957, he visited the People's Republic of China and wrote his travelogue in a lucid style.

Arif's main contribution to Kashmiri poetry lies in his 'Rubais' (a quartet form of verse). He published the first collection of these 'rubais', under the title Rubaiyat-i-Arif (Arif's rubais). He also translated Khayam's rubais. His three collections Ramoozi Arif (Arif's Secrets 1958), Bangi Awal (the first call, 1960) and Agarwon contain his short poems and ghazals. Arif did never feel any temptation for innovations and followed the conventional forms of poetry. He has hardly anything new to say but his poetry has attained prominence for its quality of intermingling humour with pathos. Arif also translated Amir Kabir's Chahal Israr into Kashmiri which was published under the title Kashur Chahal Israr. He translated Tagore's The Cycle of Spring, published under the title Sontuk Ata Gath (1962). In collaboration with P.N. Pushp, he translated the Indian Constitution. He wrote a book on human physiology, Adim mor (Human body, 1972) which was awarded the J & K Cultural Academy's literary award. In 1974, Arif received the 'Robe of Honour' from the J & K Cultural Academy. Arif has been one of the editors of Kashmiri Dictionary (7 volumes) published by the J & K Cultural Academy.

ARIF, KISHAN SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1836, d. 1904) was a popular Punjabi poet. His father Narain Singh was a publisher and bookseller in Bazar Mai Sewan, Amritsar. He began studying books and Kissas at an early age. After the death of his father, he adopted the same profession. From his writings it appears that he was a disciple of Gulab Das (1809-1873), a saint of repute under whose impact he wrote didactic and mystic poetry. His compositions include: Kalianwali Hir, Shirin Farhad, Puran Bhagat, Raja Bharthari, Raja Rasaloo, Dulla Bhatti, Kafian, Kotre Khatpade, Kundaliy-e-Arif, Krishan Katar, Bibek Ban, Sarbangi, Kasid-e-Arif, Gian Charkha, Rajniti, Jiva-Siapa, Bujhartan, Baramahas (two), Satvar, Siharfi, Painti Akhri, Sati Shingar, Holian Harhar Astotar, Kar Sarovar and Pothi Sudharmi (Prose).

A close scrutiny of his compositions shows that he adopted the traditional style and metres. Kalianwali Hir is considered to be his masterpiece. His two Baramahas provide evidence of his great power over form. Arif holds a significant place among the traditional poets of the later nineteenth century.

ARIF, SYED MUHAMMAD USMAN NAQSHBANDI, (Urdu), son of Haji Mohd. Abdulla 'Bedil', the famous disciple of 'Bekhud' Dehlvi, was born at Bikaner (Rajasthan). He was initiated into poetry by his father and elder brother, Haji Mohd. Yusaf 'Rasikh' Bikaneri, was also a disciple of Ustad 'Bekhud'. Other sources of his inspiration include the heroic legends of Rajasthan and poets like Ghalib, Mir, Dard, Fani, Jigar and Josh. Maulavi Badshah Husain 'Rehna', taught him Urdu and Persian, and acquainted him with the Lucknow school of Urdu poetry. With the help of his Ustad on one hand and father and elder brother on the other, Arif learnt all the finer points of the poetry of both Delhi and Lucknow Schools, which accounts for his highly polished language and thinking. He is the author of about a dozen books including Nazr-e-Watan (Patriotic poetry), Aqidat Ke Phul (Hymns in praise of the Prophet), Qalm Ki Kasht (Rubaiyat), Zikr-e-Mehboob and Daman-e-Baghban. While Aqidat Ke Phul shows Arif's religious fervour and deep attachment to Sufi philosophy, Nazr-e-Watan brings out his passionate love for and loyalty to his country and countrymen. This book won the literary merit award of the Sahitya Akademi of Rajasthan.

Editor (Shola-e-Shabnam), scholar lawyer, politician is not an unimpressive record by any standards, and yet Arif is basically a poet and continues to be so despite his political eminence and official position first as Minister in Central Government and now as Governor of U.P.

ARIGPUDI, RAMESH CHAUDHARY (Hindi; b. 1922) popularly known as 'Arigpudi', is a multilinguist, a journalist and an author. Starting his career in The Hindu, Madras, he moved on to various dailies and journals. Turning later to authoring novels in Hindi, he has an impressive twenty six to his credit, the most popular being Khare Khote. It is a social novel depicting the village folk and in a masterly way their emotional life. In Apni Kahani he adroitly portrays the aristocracy with its incorrigible fads and whims, with scant respect for human feelings and always going about with the air of a superior being condescending to stay amongst earthly creatures of the middle and lower classes. Arigpudi has a deep understanding of the people at large and he portrays them sympathetically within their respective mental framework. He has also written a number of short stories, essays and one-act plays.

ARJAN DEV GURU (Punjabi; b. 1562, d. 1606) was the third and youngest son of Guru Ram Das. He was arrested and executed under orders of the emperor Jahangir, "for preaching false religion among the ignorant peasants and common people" and "for helping the rebel prince Khusrau and putting on his forehead the mark of his blessing". From this it can be surmised that the peaceful sect of the Sikhs had by then grown numerous and strong enough to attract the hostile attention of state power. He compiled in one volume the hymns of all his four predecessors and, in vindication of the catholicity of the Guru's preaching, included in the volume hymns of about a dozen of the bhaktas like Kabir, Namdev and Ravi Das, all belonging to the lowliest castes in the Hindu social system. He elevated this volume to the status of the scripture of the Sikhs. He also built at the centre of a pool dug in the time of his father, Guru Ram Das, a new temple of the Sikh faith which he called Hari Mandir (temple of the Demondestroying Lord). The walls of this temple were later, through the munificent contribution of Maharaja Ranjit Singh, covered with gold plate for which it came to be known as the golden temple (Swarna-Mandir). Thus he made Amritsar the Mecca of the Sikh faith.

More than half of the hymnology in the Guru Granth Sahib is the work of Guru Arjan Dev, but in his hymns a strengthening of the trend towards the use of 'Sadhvi Braj Bhasha' can also be seen. For as distinguished from his predecessors who came of the common stock of small shopkeepers, Guru Arjan Dev had been brought up in the scholarly and elite tradition of the Sikh establishment.

Guru Arjan Dev's compositions in the Guru Granth can be grouped under three main categories:

One: long polemical poems like Sukhmani (Peace of Mind), Baramaha (Calendar of Twelve Months) and Bavan Akhri (Fifty-two Letters). The name of the last would suggest that it was written according to the letters of the Devanagari script but actually the names, number and arrangement of the letters are those of the Gurmukhi or Punjabi script.

The first two are the most popular compositions of the Sikh liturgy. The Sukhmani consists of 'twenty-four Ashtapadis' (eight-stanza groups). The stanza may consist of eight to twelve lines. Each 'Ashtapadi' is preceded by a 'sloka' or 'couplet'. Its language stands somewhere between modern Punjabi and old Braj or Sadhvi. Its greatest virtue is simplicity both of diction and theme. The emphasis is on a life of meditation and abstinence from all kinds of indulgence and perturbing activity. A considerable space is devoted to the definition and description of a person of saintly life (sant), devotion to the Guru (Gurmukh) and divine light (brahma giani). In another portion, however, the writer undertakes a rather strongly worded condemnation of persons inimical to the saint. The poem is held in great esteem by men of learning as well as devotion. It is generally recited in part or whole as a part of the morning service in Sikh temples and homes. The Baramaha is similarly recited in Sikh temples and homes on the first day of every month as the main part of the morning service. Twelve of its thirteen stanzas are assigned to the twelve months of the Indian calendar while the thirteenth and the last provides a summing up of the argument. Of all Guru Arjan's compositions, the language of the Baramaha comes nearest to Punjabi diction and idiom.

The second category comprises eight of the twenty-two 'Vars' in the Guru Granth, which deal with the same subjects as do the 'Vars' of the other Gurus, the core consisting of those describing the traditional Vedantic cosmology and the stanzas clustered around them the moral build-up of the man.

In the third category fall the miscellaneous types of stanzas which, along with those composed by the other Gurus, form the greater part of the entire canon of the Guru Granth.

The general tone of Guru Arjan's writing is that of saintly devotion to God, sweet resignation to His will and simple but meaningful teaching of piety and virtuous living.

The situation in which the Sukhmani is composed is that of the Damocle's sword of the displeasure of the Mughal emperor hanging over the Guru's head when his traducers were constantly instigating the imperial authorities against him.

Guru Arjan Dev's poetry provides the best example of the chaste classical culture, like that of the Christian Bible in its English version. Unfortunately, the language, being a mixture of Punjabi and Braj, is of limited stylistic use today.

ARNOSE PADRE (Malayalam; d. 1732). John Arnosthus Hankselden was the full name. He was born and educated in Hungary and ordained a Catholic priest. He came as a Christian Missionary to Kerala in 1699. For a time he stayed with the Jesuits in the Ambazhekkat Monastery. Then he went to Trichur, attained proficiency in Sanskrit, with the help of two Brahmins and studied Malayalam by himself. He founded a church at Veloor. He passed away at the Pazhayur Church. With the intention of furnishing Christians with poetical works on religious themes he composed Chathuranthyam, Puthenpana (life of Christ), Uma Parvam, Vyakula Prabandham, Vyakula Prayagam and Athamanu Thampam. Padre's works include a Malayalam Dictionary, a Malayalam-Portuguese Directionary and Malayalam Grammar. His poetry was marked by sincerity and fervour, but it, however, lacks the felicity of expression and diction.

AROGYA NIKETAN (Bengali) is a major novel by Tarasankar Bandyopadhyaya (1898-1971), Published in 1953 it carries his philosophy of life which upholds its ultimate victory, though hunted and chased by death.

The principal character of this novel is an Ayurvedic practitioner, Jiban Masai. A resident of a village in the district of Birbhum (West Bengal) Jiban Masai has fought throughout his life on two levels, on one with Death, on another with allopathy, the modern scientific method of medical treatment.

This outstanding work can be called a philosophical novel in which the eternal struggle between Life and Death is portrayed. It tries to discover the ultimate end of life and the eternal mystery which is called Death, the ultimate reality. The novel starts and ends with this eternal quest. It grows under the shadow of Death. Hence all the episodes and characters bear the deep imprint of Death. That is why we do not have a robust, jubilant picture of life, but a pale pensive portrayal.

The principal character, Jiban Dutta, popularly known as Jiban Masai, has seen many a death. His professional attitude towards death is different from that of a modern physician. In the Ayurveda system the Vaidya not only takes care of the disease but also of the ultimate good of the patient. It is a philosophical attitude. But modern physician does not believe in surrender. He wants a fight with Death to the last. Therefore his attitutde is strictly formal and pragmatic; his duty towards patients does not take into account their inner life.

The young physican Pradyot in the novel, therefore, challenges Jiban Masai. Pradyot often comes to clash with him. It is not only a clash between two systems of medical treatment, but also between two different attitudes.

There is a host of patients in this novel, some quietly wait for Death, some surrender, some fight against Death but finally embrace it; they are Mahanta of the Mahapith, Rana Pathak, Bhuban Roy, Ganesh Bayen. But there is another class of patients who are not ready to surrender to Death—Banbihari, son of Jiban Masai, Manjari, his former ladylove, Dantu Ghosal, Motir Ma. They cry for more life but are ultimately crushed by Death.

Jiban Masai, the hero of the novel, takes a philosophical view of the scene. It seems the veil of the ultimate end trembles before his eyes and he becomes a witness to the never-ending scenes of life, which are enacted against the black backdrop of Death. The heroine is none but Death herself who comes stealthily and wins over life. She is the ultimate end. She reigns supreme and stays at the centre of life's deep mystery. Now and again, Jiban Masai feels her presence, carries endless dialogue with her and surrenders to her will. Jiban Masai has become a witness to the 'lila' of Death. He has seen many a fight between Life and Death in which Death has finally won the battle.

The untimely death of his only son and the never-ending complaints of neglect made by his wife on this point have destroyed the peace of his domestic life. As a result he has given up his practice and retired. But he has to come out of his self-retirement at the insistence of a young man, Kisore, who has called him back to public life.

Another incident which has left a deep imprint on his mind is the refusal of his invitation to a final five-course lunch by the young wife of a dying man, a patient of Jiban Masai. This refusal has forced him to think anew about the relation between a physician and his patient, between Life and Death. The impact of imminent Death on life can break a person, but can also make one tough and steady as is the case with Sasanka's wife. The incident has also given a new dimension to the horizon of his thinking. Jiban Masai has come to the conclusion that it is Death who reigns supreme over Life. This has been forcefully portrayed in the novel.

This novel earned Tarasankar the Rabindranath Tagore Memorial Prize.

ARSH MALSIANI BAL MUKAND (Urdu; b. 1908, d. 1980), an eminent urdu poet and writer, was the son of Abbul-Fasahat (Master of eloquence) Labbhu Ram 'Josh' Malsiani, a great poet and scholar of Urdu and Persian and one of the masters of Urdu prosody.

Having done an engineering course, 'Arsh' took employment in the Canal Deptt. of Punjab Government, but soon resigned to resume his studies and completed his B.A. In 1948 he joined the Publications Division of the Govt. of India as an Assistant Editor of Urdu Ajkal, then edited by Josh Malihabadi. He succeeded Josh Malihabadi as Editor in 1954 and continued in that capacity till his retirement in September, 1968.

A poet of the conventional school Arsh was also a prose stylist of no mean order. He has to his credit four collections of poetry titled Haft Rang (The seven hues), Chang-o-Ahang (The harp and the melody), Sharar-e-Sang (The stone and the spark), and Aahong-e-Hijaz (Rhymes of Hijaz). His prose compositions include Post Mortem, (A collection of humorous write-ups) Urdu Ki Numainda Mizahiya Nazmein (Representative Humorous Poems of Urdu), Hum Ek Hain (We are One) and Maulana Abul Kalam Azad (biographical sketch of Maulana Abul Kalam Azad). He enriched poetry with secular ideology.

ARTHASHASTRA (Sanskrit), also called Nitishastra deals with Artha (one of the four Purusharthas taken in a wider sense) and includes the conduct of kings (rajaniti) and punishment (dandaniti). Brihaspati is generally considered to be the founder of this science. The most important book on the subject is the Arthashastra of Kautilya (also identified by tradition with Chanakya and Vishnugupta), the adviser of Chandragupta Maurya (4th century B.C.).

The book is an encyclopaedia of information about the practical side of Indian life in ancient times. It is divided into 15 sections or Adhikaranas and 180 subdivisions. Book 1. deals with the education of princes, with special emphasis on dandaniti. Then with the ministers of the king's council, and the spies through whom the king controls his hold on the administration in the state, keeps himself informed of the activities in neighbouring states and also takes necessary precaution needed against trouble in the harem and attempts at assassination. Law is discussed in detail, and the police administration and punishment of the gentry described. Prevention of artificial increase of prices, adulteration, use of false weights, etc., are also discussed in detail. Different ways of collecting taxes are also mentioned. One chapter is on the salary and remunerations.

The seven elements of politics are described in book VI—the king, minister, land, fort, treasury, army and ally. Then come the following causes of action—peace, war, neutrality, preparation to march out of alliance and doubtful attitude. Addictions of kings, like hunting, gambling, women, drink, etc., and the evils that may arise out of them are detailed next. Book 9 and 10 deal with war, exhortation to the soldiers, etc. Then the means of sorting dissension among hostile people and the means to be resorted to by a weak king are dealt with. Book IV is the secret part (aupanishadika) describing recipes for murder, causing blindness, madness, etc. How to be invisible or to see in the dark, change colour or send people to sleep also are described. The last book gives the 32 principles used in the discussion of the Arthashastra.

The Arthashastra has influenced classical Sanskrit poets like Bharavi and Dandin. Kautilya considered Artha as more important than Dharma and Kama, but there is no discussion about their relation.

The text is in terse and short prose sentences. Some verses are used occasionally, mostly shlokas, giving the summary of the arguments.

ARU RAMANATHAN (Tamil ; b.1924, d.1974). A well-known stylist and experimentalist in forms and themes, he made his debut with Vanavil (Rainbow, 1948), a social play on the theme of social and economic equality at the national level. He founded and edited until his death Katal, a Tamil monthly.

His writings under his real name and pseudonyms reflect his versatility; he wrote novels, short stories, finely-cut and polished folk tales, translations, skits, philosophical and scientific essays, etc. His Kudumbattil Nadappavai (Happenings in the home) series is a testimony to his keen powers of observation and art. His Virapandiyan-Manaivi (Consort of Virapandiya, 12th century Tamil king) is a novel of epic proportions built on solid historical research.

His Raja Raja Cholan, a play on the life and work of 11th century Tamil king, staged by the prestigious, T.K. Shanmukham and Brothers, is a landmark in the history of Tamil theatre. M. Ramalingam, Tamil literary historian, hails Raja Raja Cholan as a unique play. He also wrote scenario and dialogue for films.

He founded Prema Prachuram and published about 320 titles, ranging from the mystic poetry of Tamil Siddhas, and Vinayaka Purana to stories by Tenali Raman, to preserve the best in the past for the future. His other works are : Kathanayaki (Heroine, short story, 1952); Chintanaiyalar Plato (Life and work of Plato, 1953) ; Ambikapati (Poet Kamban's son, short story, 1954) ; Pazhaiyanur Nili (Folk story, 1954) ; Gundu malligai (Jasmine flower, novel, 1965).

ARUDRA (Telugu; b. 1925) is the pen-name of Bhagavathula Sankara Sastry. He developed a love for poetry from his childhood. In his seventeenth year he wrote Loha Vihangalu (Metallic birds). Reading this, Sri Sri encouraged him to go ahead.

Progressive poetry in Telugu was born when Telugu literature came under the influence of western language, culture and traditions. Marxist principles were the foundation for this trend of poetry. Some had a strong belief that elitist ideas and sentiments should be and nothing else the only theme for poetry. But with the passage of time, this trend has changed and new experiments crept into literature.

In the beginning of his poetic career, Arudra wrote love-poems. He gradually came under the influence of Sri Sri, who was related to him. As a result, love as a theme of poetry gradually waned and he began observing society in the Marxist light. Words like feudalism, class-war, oppression, progress and social consciousness slowly percolated into his poetry.

His strong desire to conduct experiments in the way of writing poetry resulted in Twamevaham (You are myself). This is full of symbols. First he named it Telangana but Sri Sri changed it to Twamevaham. This establishes a non-duality between the poet and Time. He divided the march of time into several stages and composed this work symbolically. But the average reader was not able to decipher these symbols. His attempt to bring poetry to the common man thus became a failure. Arudra could not imagine poetry without technique, but the poet's ideas lost their power buried behind the heavy pall of technique. Under the name of technique there came about many strange patterns in western literatures, and Arudra and other modern Telugu poets tried their hands at them. This formed another wrong impression on the readers that modern poetry meant obscurity.

Cine Vali is another work by Arudra. 'Cine Vali' is another name for the new moon. In that darkness the orb of the moon would be there but invisible. This served him as a symbol to hold out that a ray of light, however dim it may be, surrounds the darkest and the most tragic life. After Cine Vali (1960), he wrote and published Kunalamma Padyalu (1964), Enchina Padyalu (selected poems) (1965) and Intinti Padyalu (Poems of every home, 1969). In his Kunalamma Padyalu he touched upon many aspects of life. He brought new beauty to the Telugu poetry by using foreign words for end-rhyming. Though going to the masses and uplifting of the common man are the goal of progressive poetry, works like Twamevaham, representatives of such poetry, have not fulfilled it in any measure.

Yet Arudra has a special place in Telugu literature. Besides progressive poetry, he wrote much patriotic poetry during Indo-China war in 1962. He praised national leaders like Nehru and Gandhi. We see many patriotic verses in his Selected Poems. The services he has rendered to the Telugu silver screen are quite remarkable. Many songs he wrote for the Telugu cinema have a place of distinction in the Telugu cinema literature.

Under the title Samagraandhra Sahityam (complete Telugu literature) he did yeoman's service to Telugu literature reviewing it since the pre-Nannaya period to date, in many volumes.

ARUMUGA NAVALAR (Tamil; b. 1822, d.1879), one of the 19th century Tamil scholars, was eminently known for his scholarship and tenaciousness in establishing his views as an exponent of Saivism. Born in a pious Saivite family in Jafna, Sri Lanka, he took his lessons in English under Rev. Father Pereyval and Tamil under Senathiraya Mudaliar and Muthupulavar, scholars of those days. Such was his interest and proficiency in Tamil and English in the tender age under twenty, that his master Rev. Father Pereyval appointed him English teacher in his school and as Tamil tutor for himself. He also asked the young Arumugam to translate the Bible into Tamil. While engaged in this task, the young scholar was impelled to master the religious lore of his own religion, the Saivite cult of Hinduism. So he started studying religious texts and philosophical treatises in Tamil and Sanskrit and gained a thorough scholarship in those realms.

Even from his teens he had been observing Saivaite rituals and then started giving religious discourses in temples as a youth. Though Arumuga Navalar was engaged to translate the Bible and had his lessons in English language under a Christian missionary, he was averse to mass conversions of Hindus to Christianity. He swore to remain a bachelor to devote more time and attention to religious affairs. He started night schools for propagating Hinduism when he was just 24. He charged the students no fees. And he attracted a good number of students. The very next year he started giving weekly discourses on Hindu religion every Friday. In the following year he founded the 'Saivaprakasa Vidyasala' in Jafna. He appointed some of his devoted old students as preceptors.

He got his title 'Navalar', meaning orator, when he was only 27 years old. The honorific was conferred on him by the Head of the Thiruvavaduthurai Adhinam in Tamil Nadu. He also enjoyed the patronage of the Sethupathis of Ramanathapuram. Apart from religious books, Arumuga Navalar also wrote a book on Sri Lanka geography, and logarithms, and text books for primary students. He proved himself to be an expert in Tamil grammar and wrote books on that subject. He published his commentaries on Nannul, a grammar text in Tamil, Tolkappiyam, books on logic and lexicography, Saivism in questions and answers, Saivite rituals, the hagiography of the Chidambaram temple, commentaries on Tirumurugatruppadai, Sivajnana Bodham, Thiruvachagam, Bharatham, Sethupuranam, Periya Puranam, Tirukkovaiyar, and rejoinders to works denigrating Saivism. Most of his dicourses, however, went unrecorded.

Arumuga Navalar's contribution to Tamil prose is quite substantial. In him Tamil prose became a vehicle for expressing subtleties of religion, philosophy, sociology, politics and culture.

ARUNACHALAK KAVIRAYAR (Tamil; b.1712, d.1779) even as a young boy could sing well. Under the tutelage of Ambalavanak Kavirayar of the Dharmapuram Adhinam, a Saivite math in Tamil Nadu, he studied Sanskrit, Tamil and Telugu. He devoted all his free time to literary studies, especially to Kamban, and improved his skills in writing poems, lyrics, and singing. At the request of Chidambaram Pillai, his fellow student at Dharmapuram, he lived in Sirkazhi. At the request of his disciples and songsters, Kothandarama Aiyar and Venkatrama Aiyar from Sattanathapuram, he composed Rama natakam, with its full complement of Pallavi, main theme, anupallavi, counter theme, and saranam, regular stanza or stanzas, in 1771, and performed its arangetram (first recitation) at Srirangam on the very spot where Kamban had recited his epic Kamba Ramayanam. The simple language, well-chosen tunes and homely proverbs made the libretto very popular. It became so prestigious that magical qualities were attributed to the palm-leaf manuscript. Anandarangam Pillai (1709-1761) of Pondicherry, Manali Muttukirusna Mudaliyar, celebrated linguist of Madras, Tepperumal Chettiyar, Yuvaranga Bhupati of Udaiyarpalaiyam, and Tulajaji, Maratha king of Thanjavur 1765-1787, conferred on Arunachalam Kavirayar high honours and gave him magnificent presents. According to Va. Ra. (d.1951) modern Tamil litterateur, Arunachalak Kavirayar was the first who really succeeded in bridging the abyss between the spoken and written Tamil language. His other works are: Sikazhit talapuranam (Sthalapurana of Sirkazhi, Saivite pilgrimage centre in Thanjavur District) Sikazhikkovai (Verse work on Sirkazhi), Anumar pillaittamil (Verse work in praise of Hanuman), Asomukhi natakam (Libretto) and musical compositions.

ARUNACHALAM, K.C.S. (Tamil; b. 1921). After finishing his school education Arunachalam joined the socialist movement and later the Communist party as a pamphleteer. It was here that he showed his innate ability to write poetry. A number of poems show his devotion to socialism. Kavithai En Kai Val (Poetry is My Sword, 1965) is the only published volume containing some of Arunachalam's poetry. He is a poet who sensitively handles social themes. He has also written a number of plays for the radio but they have not been published in book form. Purvika Sothu (Hereditary Property, 1965) is another publication of Arunachalam which contains his short stories.

ARUNAGIRINATHAR (Tamil) was a hymnist who flourished in the first half of the 15th century. He was a devotee of Lord Muruga on whom he composed a number of poetic works. He is regarded as the chief exponent of the Kaumara sect, devoted to the worship of Muruga.

Of his early life we do not know anything for certain : but from the clearly autobiographical references in his works we gather that he was born in a prosperous family and obtained high education in Tamil and Sanskrit, in both of which he became a scholar and that in due season got married. But he fell among bad company and began to lead a life of vice and dissipation; he soon acquired sex-propelled diseases which attained such ascendancy over him that he decided to end his life, stung by the social opprobrium. He is reputed to have leaped down from the temple tower of Tiruvannamalai when Lord Muruga intercepted and instantly cured him of his diseases : the Lord advised him to lead a life of piety composing hymns in his praise and dismissed him with this admonition. Thereupon Arunagirinathar went around visiting temples devoted to Muruga and singing melodious hymns in His praise. Today the Muruga temples on which he sang songs are specially honoured by the devotees of the Lord who rank them higher than the run of temples which he did not visit.

His most famous work is a collection of hymns sung at the many temples of Muruga visited by him; the work is termed Tiruppugazh and every simple hymn in it is also referred to by the same name. These hymns are carefully structured and they are full of melodious verbal effects which enhance their musical impact if not their poetic value. Scholars consider that only 1307 of them are authentic though devotees ascribe many more to him.

His other works are Kandar Antadi, Kandan Anubhuti and Kandar Alankaram; he has also composed a set of 18 uniformly patterned works called Tiruvakuppu which praise, among other things, the Lord's Javelin, His eyes and His shoulders. Kandar Antadi is a highly recondite work bristling with difficult figures of speech and is deservedly the least popular of his works. Kandar Alankaram is a moving work of a hundred hymns which praise Muruga's valour in the field of battle and His ineffable spiritual wisdom; on account of the latter quality He is praised as the preceptor even of his own father, Lord Siva.

Kandar Anubhuti is a highly musical, poetical work composed in simple Tamil. Anubhuti means experience and this hymnal work recounts the author's spiritual experience in eloquent language. Muruga is the preceptor and Muruga is the Godhead to be achieved : and what beatitude is his who achieves it! There, in that state of bliss, all talk, all operations of the senses and of the mind cease, all karma is destroyed and all suffering : the devotee finds himself totally emancipated, freed of all the trammels that shackle man.

Arunagiri's poetry achieved a high degree of integration of Tamil cultures. To illustrate

"O Guha, master of Shiva,
Lover of Valli, your bride!
You dwell in Tiruverakam,
On Kaveri's northern shores,
With fully grown shady groves,
Sweet child of Umai, Ganesha's brother,
Great hero, destroyer of demomic pride!"

Guha is Aryan but the lover of Valli is Tamil; child of Umani, brother of Ganesha is Sanskritic; but he lives in Tiduverakam on the shores of the Kaveri, which is indigenous.

His sound scholarship of two languages, enabled him to craft strikingly worded poetry. The Turuppugazh has successive stanzas which are based on near-exclusive Sanskrit or Tamil vocabulary, in no way affecting the flow of poetry.

In his poetry the chandam or regular rhythmic pattern reaches a peak of perfection making it eminently suitable for musical renderings.

In thought, content and themes Arunagiri is one of the peaks in Tamil bhakti poetry. An exquisitely crafted quatrain from the Kandaravubhudi 'uruvay aruvay...' says –

"you who have form and who are formless, you who are both being and non being,
who are the fragrunce and the blossom who the jewel and its lustre, who are the seed of life and life itself,
who are the mode and act of existence, who are the supreme guru, come and bestow your grace, O guha."

ARVI, (Tamil; b. 1920. real name R. Venkataraman). Though he did not have higher education, Arvi grew up to be a popular novelist credited with an imposing list of 23 novels of full length, 6 novelettes and 14 collections of short stories. Initially working as an apprentice journalist, Arvi wrote stories for children. He was appointed to edit a children's journal Kannan, a sister publication of the well-known monthly Kalaimagal. Writing became his full-time profession for more than twenty years and he ceaselessly wrote serial novels, short stories and plays—all contributed to various journals and later published in book form. His novels are of the popular variety discussing the family life and other themes mainly based on the society of the Tanjore area. A noteworthy aspect of Arvi's novels is the handling of a variety of characters. His easy handling of characters of different communities, belonging to several areas is remarkable. Anaiya Vilakku (Eternal lamp, 1956) is a novel in which Arvi excels in characterisation. A bold attempt to bring about a union of two characters belonging to different communities which gets the sanction even from the orthodox mother of the boy is portrayed in this novel. Manitha Nizhalkal (Human Shadows, 1975) reflects the typical Tanjore rural society and its simple ways of living. Thiraikkuppin (Behind the Screen, 1960) is an attempt by Arvi to portray the urban scene in the metropolis where writers of fiction enamoured by the illusion of the cinema attempt to go after the producers and ultimately get disillusioned.

Arvi's special forte is discernible in novels and short stories, but his involvement in children's literature also earned for him well-deserved praise while he was editing the journal Kannan. His stories for children as well as his illustrated strips are well known.

ARYA BHARATA (Marathi) written by poet Moropant is one of the major Mahabharata-based work in Marathi. Moropant belonged to the Pandit school of poets. He was well versed in the Sanskrit classics and his intention was to imitate these to the best of his ability.

Arya Bharata is an abridged version of the Mahabharata. The work follows the tradition of the latter day Sanskrit Mahakavya, and it consists of some 17,000 Arya stanzas as compared with the lakh and a quarter of the original Mahabharata. Moropant omitted what to his mind was irrelevant to the epic's essence and in effect concentrated on the bare story itself, leaving aside its extensive trappings. As a consequence, the essential story of the Mahabharata remains intact in his abridged version Arya Bharata which is so called because it is entirely composed in the Sanskrit Arya Giti or Marathi Arya meter.

The Arya Bharata has maintained the original force of characters and of other characteristic features of the Mahabharata. Being a Sanskrit scholar himself, the poet is fond of using antique Sanskrit words in place of the simpler Marathi ones. In his riddle-burdened terminology the garuda (eagle) becomes Vin, the hasti (elephant) becomes Abhrabhv, the Sarpa (serpent) becomes Dandasuka, the harina (deer) becomes Sanv and loha (iron) becomes Karsnayasa!

Moropant has coined strange conjunct words to rhyme with the ones used at the end of the previous line. It demands a considerable linguistic exercise on the part of the reader to first separate the Sanskrit words joined together and then hasten to find their meanings. It thus involves a tremendous effort to arrive at the ultimate meaning intended.

The epic characterisation of the Arya Bharat is commendable. Many situations are dramatically described as in the original. The poetic merit of Moropant finds expression in similes and metaphors used by him and which are not found in the original text. However there is such a plethora of these similes and metaphors in his work that the poetic quality of the text is clouded at places by them. Moropant rarely rises to the emotional pitch the situation demands. His work appeals more to the intellect.

Moropant remains an important landmark in the history of Marathi literature. He is the last and the best representative of the Pandit school of poets, even if the characteristics of this school are highly accentuated and taken to the extreme in the Arya Bharata.

ARYASAPTASHATI (Sanskrit). The composition of the Aryasaptashati in 700 verses, all in the same Arya metre and on the sole theme of love (shringara) is a unique feat of Govardhanacharya. This poet was one of the five excellent gems who adorned the court of the talented king Lakshmanasena of Bengal (12th century). The patron-king is glorified in this composition (verse 39) as a unique ruler, proficient in all the fine arts.

Govardhana hailed from a versatile family. His father Nilambara was his teacher also (verse 38), his brother Balabhadra and student Udayana helped him in revising and bringing out the Aryasaptashati.

The aim of Govardhana was to bring out a Sanskrit counterpart of the beautiful Prakrit love-lyric compiled by Hala Shatavahana, the Sattasai or Gathasaptashati. In imitation of the Prakrit model Govardhana styles the sections of his work also as Vrajyas. Besides, he also wanted to do something that his predecessors did not attempt. Says he in one of the concluding verses (no. 697)—"Great poets before me like Gunadhya, Bhavabhuti, Bana and Raghukara (Kalidasa) have worshipped the goddess of learning in verses of diverse metres. Let the critics who have enjoyed the varied poems, be presented with a unique opportunity of being delighted with my verse in a single metre". In the introductory section called 'Grantharambhavrajya' (54 verses) the author sings the charms of love that involve even great divinities like Shiva and Vishnu. He then pays homage to the master poets before him, like Valmiki, Vyasa, Gunadhya, Kalidasa and Bhavabhuti, and refers also to the highlights of his own composition. His verses are, according to himself, composed in smooth flowing diction, delineate the secret beauty of shringara in all facets and appeal to the cultivated critics (verses 51_4). Govardhana continues the remaining Vrajyas, each of these beginning with letters strictly in the order of the alphabet.

The Aryasaptashati thus emerges as a unique Aksharamalakavya in the history of Sanskrit literature. It must be said to the credit of Govardhana that although he worked within the self-imposed limited scope and pattern, he has been able to show his poetic capabilities in and through the long kavya, which is of course meant only for the enjoyment of advanced students of the language, 'Vidyavinodakanda' as the poet himself states (V. 700). However the word-collocation is mellifluent throughout and expressions are mostly clear and not strained. Simple Shlesha or double meaning runs through a majority of the verses which reveal the self-confidence of a competent writer.

It is no wonder that his famous contemporary Jayadeva pays encomium in his Gitagovinda that Govardhana is incomparable in effective erotic descriptions (Shringarottarasatprameyarachanair acharyagovardhanaspardhi kopi na vishrutah). The Aryasaptashati itself has become a basic text for the Satsai in Hindi of Behari lal, who has won a high rank among Hindi poets and whose work was again copied by a late Sanskrit writer, Paramananda in his Shringarasaptashatika.

ARYASHURA (Sanskrit) is sometimes called simply Shura translated into Tibetan, Hphagas-pa-apah-bo and Chinese as Shan-yun (or Ta-yun), having the appellations as slob-dpon (acharya) and snan-nag-mkhan-chen-po (mahakavi), can be said to have flourished during the period between 350 and 400 A.D. With the altruistic outlook of the Mahayana school of Buddhism he preaches Buddha-bhakti and extols the three ratnas (jewels), viz., the Buddha, dharma and sangha. He is also a Buddhist literary celebrity like Matricheta, Ashvaghosha and Kumaralata.

His Jatakamala or Bodhisttvavdanamala is his most well known work. It is a gadyakavya (prose literature) composed in grandiose Sanskrit prose interspersed with a good number of strophes in fancy classical metres like prithvi, shardulavikridita, pushpitagra, etc. After the fashion of the racy sermons of preaching monks, the Jatakamala retells thirtyfour old legends about the avadanas (noble deeds) of the Buddha in his previous births as the Bodhisattva, illustrating the different paramitas (perfections) like karuna (compassion), kshanti (forgiveness), etc. Each story starts with and ends in a particular moral. There are thirtyfour such didactic tales about the lofty ideals of personages like Shibi, Vishvamtara, etc. The kachchapajataka is a spurious addition to the total number of the tales. The Tibetan translation of the Jatakamala rejects this interpolation rightly even though the Chinese translation of the text accepts and retains it.

However, many narratives of the Jatakamala have their counterparts in the Pali Jatakas, Chariyapitaka, Vinayapitaka, Apadana and Mahavastu. Some verses of the Jatakamala are found in the Divyavadana, and some again correspond to some Pali gathas. Further, some stories of the Jatakamala have their source in the Mahabharata.

Anyway, some MSS. remains of the Sanskrit text of the Jatakamala have been unearthed at Murtuq and Toyoq in Eastern Turkestan in course of the Royal Prussian Turfan expeditions. Besides these, this work has been translated into Tibetan and Chinese as well.

Two fragments of a manuscript containing the Tokharian translation of some Jatakamala have been discovered at Sorcuq in Eastern Turkestan in course of the afore-said expeditions.

Some citations from Aryashura's Jatakamala are found in Sharanadeva's Durghatavritti, Vidyakara's Subhashitaratnakosha and Sarvananda Vandyaghatiya's commentary on the Amarakosha.

That the Jatakamala had once been popular among the Buddhists in India is attested by the Bharhut Stupa and Ajanta cave frescoes illustrating the Jatakas with verse citations inscribed below. In Greater India, too, the reliefs of Boro-Budur in Java illustrate the thirty-four jatakas after the Jatakamala.

I-tsin extols the lofty style of the Jatakamala.

Aryashura's Jatakamala has influenced the composition of the Hatthavanagallaviharavamsha, a late work in ornate Pali in Ceylon, with some verses of the Jatakamala translated into ornate Pali.

The following six works are also ascribed to him:

a) The Sanskrit text of the Subhashitaratnakarandakakatha has been published on the basis of a single manuscript written in Newari characters found in the Nepal Durbar Library. In lack-lustre style and faulty metres this text deals with the six paramitas (perfections), viz., dana (liberality), shila (morality), kshanti (forgiveness), virya (energy), dhyana (meditation) and prajna (wisdom), under 28 kathas in 190 verses. These kathas are of unequal size, some being long and some others short.

This text has been translated into Tibetan.

Anyway, the Subhashitaratnakarandakakatha is an Aryashura apocrypha.

In his Jatakamala Aryashura avows to compose in ornate Sanskrit. His saushabdya (elegant wording) has been eulogized by Abhinanda. Modelled on Kumaralata's Drishtantapankti, Aryashura's Jatakamala is a creditable gadyakavya (prose literature) which has exercised an influence on the Divyavadana.

ARZU LUCKNAVI SAYIYID ANWAR HUSAIN (Urdu; b. 1873, d. 1951). A poet, dramatist and film (dialogue and lyric) writer, Sayiyid Anwar Husain Arzu Lucknavi was one of the most important and highly respected literary figures of his time. Arzu's father, Mir Zakir Husain Yas, a disciple of Jalal Lucknavi, and his elder brother, Mir Yusuf Husain Qayas were also poets.

Brought up in a cultured and a fairly well-off household, the young Anwar Husain started receiving his early education at home at the age of five. His father taught him the Quran, Urdu and Persian. Later on, he studied Arabic and Persian under the guidance of some famous scholars of Lucknow, and learned Prosody from Jalal Lucknavi himself. Arzu started his poetic career with the composition of a Marsia at the age of twelve. Under the able guidance of Jalal he soon achieved mastery over the poetic art, and after the death of Jalal in 1909, was accepted as his heir to guide his disciples. Though he met with occasional successes, Arzu's life was, generally, full of financial hardships and domestic troubles. He had to make journeys, in search of his livelihood, to places like Calcutta, Lahore, Rampur and Bombay. During his stay at Calcutta, first in the 20's and then in the 30's, Arzu wrote some plays for the stage, Matvali Jogan, Sharara-i-Husn, Chand Gahan and Chragh-i-Tawhid (all unpublished) which turned to be popular. In between, Arzu had been working hard on the grammar of Urdu language. The outcome was a highly esteemed book Nizam-i-Urdu (Lucknow, 1929).

The real realm of Arzu, however, was poetry. He was a master poet composing in every prevalent form of Urdu poetry. But his fame rests mainly on his ghazals, which are endowed with spontaneity, simplicity and melodiousness of diction, an undercurrent of pathos and fine artistic beauty and craftsmanship. Three collections of Arzu's ghazals, viz. Fughan-e-Arzu (1924), Jahan-e-Arzu (1936) and Nishan-e-Arzu (1946) have been popular with the Urdu readers.

Mention may especially be made here of Arzu's Khalis (pure) Urdu. Arzu experimented, quite successfully, with using, in his ghazals, a diction based on pure Urdu words free from Persian or Arabic influence. Arzu himself gave this diction the name of Khalis Urdu. His collection of ghazals in this Khalis Urdu, entitled Surili Bansri first published in 1938 in Urdu as well as Nagari script, has gained a permanent place in the history of Urdu poetry. Arzu's several other poetry collections, and a prose work Mizan-ul-Huruf have also been published.

Arzu moved to Bombay in 1942, where he wrote lyrics and dialogues for films. In January 1951, he migrated to Karachi and joined Radio Pakistan.

ARZU, SIRAJ-UD-DIN ALI KHAN (Urdu; b. 1687, d. 1756), born at Agra, was the son of Sheikh Hisam-ud-Din, a soldier by profession who had held many high offices at the court of Aurangzeb. Arzu received instruction in Persian and Arabic at a very early age and acquired high proficiency in these languages. He also learnt Hindi, Sanskrit and Indian music. He began writing poetry when he was only fourteen. He also wrote commentaries on some important Persian works.

Arzu came to Delhi in 1719 during the reign of Muhammad Shah and soon gained access to Anand Ram 'Mukhlis' who was so impressed by the erudition of young Arzu that he introduced him to Nawab Qamar-ud-Din Khan who was at that time Prime Minister. The Khan gave him a suitable job and a title.

Despite the invasions of Nadir Shah and Ahmad Shah Abdali, Arzu stayed on in Delhi and continued his literary work. By the time he was 48 he had the following works to his credit: Siraj-ul-Lught (A lexicon of Persian) which also throws light on the relationship of Persian and Sanskrit; Chiragh-e-Hidayat (A glossary of words and idioms used by Persian poets after Jaami); A Collection of Ghazals and Qasidas; Diwan-e-Asar Shirazi (A rejoinder to the Diwan of Asan Shivasi); Mohiblat-e-Uzma (A treatise on prosody); Atiya-e-Kubra (Also deals with prosody)., Miyar-ul-Afkar (A treatise on grammar); Payam-i-Shauq (Collections of letters); Masnavis entitled Josh-o-Kharosh, Mehr-o-Mah, Ibrat Fasana and Gulza-ri-Khayal (a long poem on the festival of Holi and the coming of spring season).

His fame as a poet and a scholar of Persian spanned the entire length and breadth of the country. He used to hold Mushairas at his home to promote love for Urdu poetry. Young poets from all over the country including Mir Taqi 'Mir' became his disciples. He migrated to Lucknow in 1754 from where he went to Ayodhya, the city where his great grandfather Sheikh Mamal-ud-Din had once lived. Arzu died in Lucknow at the age of seventy, and was buried in Vakilpura (Delhi).

ASAIT THAKORA (Gujarati, 14th Century) a poet who flourished in fourteenth century, is looked upon as the founder of Bhavai, the Gujarati folk drama. Asait belonged to north Gujarat where even now the tradition of Bhavai is preserved and carried on by the Targala community. The Targalas are traditional Bhavai players who trace their origin to Asait.

A legend about Asait declares him as a social rebel. It tells us that Asait defied all caste taboos and social restrictions to save a Hindu girl from a forced marriage and resultant proselytization, for which noble act he was excommunicated by the members of his own caste.

Asait dared to face this social boycott and founded a new subcaste of performing artists viz. the Targala. Being a creative writer he wrote a great number of plays depicting a kaleidoscope of the then prevailing social set-up. Asait consolidated and gave a new turn to the existing rich traditions of folk-theatre and thus evolved a new and yet indigenous folk drama for Gujarat.

ASAMARTHUNI JEVAYATHRA (Telugu) is a novel by Gopichand. The story centres round Sitaramarao who, like his father, is quite concerned with the perpetuation of his family prestige. He simply believes that prestige is the be-all and end-all of man's existence. After the death of his father, he decides to lead a simple and straight-forward life, without quarrels or any social or domestic turmoil. He just wants to be good, and do good to all, thus satisfying everybody including his ego, as best as he can. But in the heart of hearts he feels smug in regard to his attitude towards society, which he naively expects to be grateful to him for all that he does to its members. Ramayya warns him in vain against his complacent view of men and women around him. Sitaramarao, anxious to make his uncle feel externally obliged to him, virtually writes off his uncle's heavy debt to him of about Rs. 40,000/- by accepting in lieu ten acres of worthless land. His uncle, a worldly wise man, applies the flattering unction of family prestige to his nephew and gets his work done.

Sitaramarao used to be an idealist in his younger days. Now because of his own 'split personality' he finds it extremely difficult to abide by his own decisions. To his mind, all knowledge seems to be conflicting in character. He, therefore, promptly comes to the conclusion that he should stop working. Work or no work, time passes. Life seems to be full of avoidable sound and fury, signifying nothing. It appears to be quite futile to search for a meaning in the impersonal, unfeeling and mechanically moving universe. It does continue to exist, irrespective of what man does or does not. Even society seems to be apathetic towards an individual's pursuit of knowledge. Sometimes the attempt even boomerangs on the individual because he is not immune to social evil. Ignorance is bliss in a society that frowns upon knowledge. The struggle for existence is equally senseless because death is inevitable and inescapable. Life is an intermission between two unknown and unknowable conditions of death. If death is the ultimate reality, human happiness or the lack of it is inconsequential. In fact, man can never be sure that he is happier than an animal. Thus Sitaramarao's introvert brooding drives him to mental anarchy and philosophic nihilism. He wrecks his marriage by ending up as a perverse wife-beater. All his love for Indira becomes poisoned owing to his incompetence, do-nothingness and false knowledge. Hard pressed for money, he writes an arrogant and accusing letter to his uncle charging him with ingratitude. His uncle's reply shocks him into realizing that he is no better than his father whose family pride ultimately caused the premature death of Sitaramarao's mother. He also learns that his wife, Indira, has been highly noble, sympathetic and understanding in her relations with him. His daughter–a mere slip of a girl–is mortally afraid of him mainly because of his violent moods. All this knowledge in fact aggravates his fast deteriorating condition. He becomes schizophrenic and violently crazy about moral values in social life. He apparently forgets the mess of his own private life and wanders in the streets crying down the social hypocrisy and corruption. Presently he attends a public meeting where all the speakers, without exception, happen to be corrupt in one way or another. Sitaramarao springs a surprise on them by disclosing in public the scandalous background of the so-called leaders. The mob, however, turns violent against him when it is informed by Ramayya that Sitaramarao himself is a sadistic wife-beater. A little later in the evening Ramayya and Sitaramarao sit quietly near the funeral ground and discuss the latter's problems, at length. Ramayya explains in detail the theory of evolution of the biological species, emphasising the need of an organism to adjust to its environment in the interest of its own survival. As for the gap in social and individual ethics, the individual should strike a balance between the two extremes. Negativism, anarchy and nihilistic attitudes lead him nowhere.

But having already reached a point of no return psychologically, Sitaramarao spends the night all alone in the funeral ground, absorbed in deep thought and rapt in intense introspection. The morning discovers him dead in the funeral ground.

Gopichand's novel is undoubtedly a classic in modern Telugu literature. The form is purposefully closed and claustrophobic. The action is mostly dramatized in the stream of individual consciousness. To date, this remains the best known psychological novel in Telugu. The tone of the narrative, as evidenced by the title, is consistently ironical. The portagonist's death in the end is relentlessly and perfectly logical, even though it somewhat militates against the artist's vision.

ASANTE SITAKAVYAM (Malayalam) is the first literary venture in book form of the well-known scholar, critic and writer Sukumar Azhicode. Published in 1956 it is an admirable appreciation of Kumaran Asan's famous poem Chintavishtayaya Sita (1919), which, even when it came out, raised a storm of protest from the orthodox readers and the traditional adorers of Sita as the embodiment of all that is best in Indian womanhood since it wounded their long-cherished sentiments about the heroine of the Ramayana. The same, more or less, was the fate of Sukumar's work as well. But, as a matter of fact, both have stood the test of time, having run by now into several editions and still being subjected to scholarly discussions.

The book (4th edition, 1970) is divided into four sections. In the first the author discountenances the unreasonable practice of naming the Malayalam translations of Sanskrit classics after their original writers or poets and yet opines that Kumaran Asan is the fittest Malayali to be honoured with the appellation 'Kerala Valmiki'. The second section opens with the thought-provoking statement that the Ramayana is a combination of 'Sitayana' and 'Ravanayana'. This, the longest section, is subdivided into a few units to facilitate discussion of the different aspects of the uniqueness of the poem from different angles, especially that of psychology. Sita's mind, the author observes, has passed through reflection on life, excoriation and condemnation of her husband before it reaches the penultimate stage at which she experiences a temporary relief from her soul-gnawing retrospection and visualizes a bright future for herself by the side of her royal consort in the ocean of infinite calm. The third section is a rejoinder to those who had pointed out certain inadequacies and incongruities which they thought could be found in the psychological and other explanations of the evolution of Sita's thoughts in the first edition of the book. The last is concerned with the vision, expression, imagery, etc. of a gifted writer with special reference to Asan and his poem Chintavishtayaya Sita.

The overall impression left in the mind of the reader when he puts down the book is of a work in which the author's classical education, modern knowledge, argumentative skill, mastery of language, critical acumen, analytical intelligence and hero-worship contend with one another.

ASAR, JAFAR ALI KHAN (Urdu; b. 1885, d. 1967), a Urdu poet and prose writer, was born in an Indo-Iranian Mirza family, as the sole offspring of his father Mirza Afzal Husain Khan whose ancestors had been attached to the court of the Nawabs of Oudh as Unani physicians.

Asar was brought up in the traditional oriental environment of Lucknow and was educated primarily at home. Syed Muhammad Jafar was his teacher in Arabic and Persian while Mirza Ali Husain taught him calligraphy. He started learning English with Abdul Majid and Wajid Husain at home and was admitted to the sixth class in Jubilee High School, Lucknow (1896). Having passed through High School examination in 1902, he joined the Canning College and graduated in 1906. Then he started post-graduate studies and also joined the LL.B. course which however, he could not finish. His uncle Nawab Dilawar Husain Khan had a very refined taste for literature and literary criticism and Asar imbibed the same from him. From 1906 onwards he started composing Urdu verses regularly and became the pupil of Mirza Muhammad Hadi 'Aziz Lucknavi' (d. 1935).

Nawab Mirza Shauq, author of the famous Urdu mathnawi Zehr-e-Ishq was a close relative of his father and Asar, when he was a child, had seen his son Nawab Sultan Mirza. His ancestors were Sunni Muslims, but later on some members of his family embraced the Shi'a faith. Asar paid a visit to Shi'a holy shrines in Iraq (1924) and used to recite 'marsias' from above the pulpit during the month of Muharrum. He was an admirer of Mir Anis (d. 1874) and Mir Taqi 'Mir' (1723-1810) and was a keen connoisseur of the poetic art and prosody. Moreover, he was an embodiment of the culture of Lucknow and an authority on the standard usage of Urdu words.

Asar was awarded 'Padma Bhushan' (1962) for his academic services. Very few literary figures among his contemporaries could rival Asar in critical insight, poetical talent and knowledge of philology, etymology and lexicography as evident from the following works in Prose: Mazamin (A selection from six Diwans of Mir Taqi 'Mir', Delhi, 1947); Asar ke Tanquidi Mazamin (A collection of his articles on literary criticism, Budaon, 1948); Chahan Been (A collection of his critical essays, Lucknow, 1950); Anis ki Marsiya Nigari (A critical study of the art of Mir Anis in 'marsiya' writing, Lucknow, 1951); Mutala-e-Ghalib (A critical study of some prominent aspects of Mirza Ghalib's poetry, Lucknow, 1952) and Farhang-e-Asar (A dictionary of Urdu usage based on a critical survey of Nur-al-Lughat, in two volumes, Lucknow, 1961).

His works in poetry are: Asaristan (A collection of ghazals, 1924), Zangari Begum (A translation of a humorous French drama in Urdu verse, 1939); Rangbast (translations of various classical verses selected from Asian and European languages, 1942); Lal-o-Gul (A collection of ruba'iyyat and qata'at 1944); Naghma-e-Javed (A translation with explanations of the Gita into Urdu verse, 1945); Halak-e-Faraib (A translation of a Polish drama in Urdu verse, 1947) and Siyah Chashman-e-Kashmiri (A collection of his compositions on Kashmir landscape and human beauty, 1948).

ASCETIC AND HERMITAGE (Pan Indian). All great Indian writers at least in the past took Nature as their canvas for painting the picture of human life and that nature was obviously symbolised by forests far from the artificial life of the cities or even from developed rural areas. The poets used to decorate their creations with the descriptions of seasons, mountains, rivers and hamlets to reflect the human mind and society and they particularly mentioned the hermitages of the forests as places from where one could enjoy the grace of nature's beauty. Beginning from the age of the Samhitas it is found that nature played a very significant part in the sphere of creative art and sculpture. However the hermitages and the dwellers therein are not seen in the Samhitas.

The hermitage in Sanskrit is called ashrama, a word which comes from the root shram 'to exert'. The word indeed means a place where austerities are performed and also the purpose of performing such austerities. There are however controversies regarding the original meaning of the word among the scholars. When the Aryans first settled in the Punjab, there was probably no division of different orders of life or of castes and ashramas. In the Rigveda we find the castes mentioned only in one hymn and that hymn too seems to be a later addition.

After the end of the vedic time there was a change in Indian thought and the caste system was imposed on the society as a result of which the life of man had to pass through four stages. Every Arya (i) had to be a Brahmacharin or a student in the house of a teacher during his boyhood and early youth, (ii) should perform the duty of a householder in the garhasthya stage (iii) should devote himself to gradually increasing austerities in the forests, in the vanaprastha stage (iv) should give up all wealth and become an ascetic, mendicant, or wandering hermit in the last stage—the stage of sanyasa. The four ashramas are considered as representing the different steps by which one can gradually purify oneself from the earthly taints and be able to attain the supreme bliss in life.

In this fourfold division of Indian life-style the hermitage and ascetics played a very important role. The ancient Indian education was completely based on the hermitage system and in this connection the ascetics struck the keynote of the social set up. While the vedic seers envisioned the world in their mantras, the others went into the forest to meditate upon the nature of the Self. These forest philosophers attacted pupils from far and wide who sat at their feet to attain wisdom and they developed a system of education in their forest academies. The instruction imparted to the students formed a Upanisada. The word Upanishada which is derived from up ni-shad kvip, literally means to sit closely, but it came to indicate the teachings given by the gurus to the pupils who sat nearby.

The Upanishadic texts also elaborate on the qualifications for education in the hermitages and the discipline through which a young student could learn in the hermitages. Owing to his truthfulness only Satyakama got the chance of being educated in the hermitage of Gautama, the preceptor. Thus in the earliest stage truthfulness and honesty were regarded as some of the criteria of being admitted into the forest academies.

Among 108 Upanishadas, according to the traditional count, seventeen deal with renunciation, and expatiate on the ideal attributes and approved ways of those who practise it under different names and designations like bhikshu, sannyasin, parivrajaka, avadhuta and paramahamsa. As the highest example and embodiment of this virtue, ancient Upanishadas point to a class of men who have forsaken the world and changed themselves into almsmen. In the Brihadaranyakopanishad 3.5.1 it is stated that men knowing Brahman give up the desire for sons, wealth and property and become almsmen. In the Mundakopanishad also the same idea is expressed thus, 'Those who live in the forests purified by austerities, those who know and are learned, become almsmen.' Such passages seem to anticipate the aims, objectives and customary ways of the asceties that we find in a later age prevalent among the bhikshus, shramanas, yatis, sannyasins etc.

Besides unflinching devotion to Vedic studies the student had to abstain from all sorts of pleasures. He had to control his passions, wait on his gurus, keep himself pure in mind and body and beg for his food.

The hermitage took a great part in the Vanaprastha stage. Manu in his Samhita describes the stage thus:

> grahasthastu yada pasyedvalipalitamatmanah/> apatyasyaiva capatyam tadaranyam samasrayet/> santyajya gramyamaharam sarvanchaiva > paricchadam/putreshu bharyam nikshipya vanam > gacchet sahaiva va/(Manu 6.2-3).

The same idea is expressed in XII 245.4 of the Mahabharata. When the householder sees his skin wrinkled and his hair white and the sons of his sons, he has to retire to the forest in order to devote himself solely to austerities and penance.

A sannyasin, i.e. one who has abandoned everything, would be homeless and should live merely on alms. The Mahabharata XII.246.13 describes this stage thus, "let him be free from society as from a serpent, from comfort as from hell and from woman as from a corpse". Whatever may this statement of the Mahabharata mean, women also accompanied men to celebrate this stage of forest life. The blind king Dhritarashtra in the company of Gandhari and Kunti went to the forest after the war.

The Ramayana presents the charming description of the hermitage of Valmiki which accepted Sita as a resident and she gave birth to her children there. Thus, it can be seen that the regulations of ashrama in later period was not so strict as it was in the time of Samhitas and Upanishads. There are many hermitages and asetics in the two epics. In these great epics the admixture of human life and nature is seen everywhere.

However, the law books of later period envisaged the parivrajaka stage which is more or less homely in nature. Apastamba's Dharmasutra in II. 21.10 restricted the life of the ascetics thus, "he shall renounce all worldly pleasures, shall not take recourse to anybody's help, nor perform any act conducive to temporal well-being and spiritual benefit derivable in the other world". The place of their resident is also restricted only to the forest by the Dharmasutras. In the 6th book of the Manusamhita it is stated regarding them, 'let him put down his foot purified by his sight, let him drink water purified by a cloth, let him utter speech purified by truth, let him keep his heart pure, let him presently bear hard words, let him not insult anybody, let him not become anybody's enemy for the sake of this body. Against an angry man let him not in return show anger, let him bless when he is cursed, let him not utter speech devoid of truth scattered at the seven gates '.

What we find in the literary composition of great writers in Sanskrit coincided with the style maintained in the Smritishastras. Some aspects of the garhasthya stage of life are seen in the hermitage too, particularly Kalidasa's hermitage. In the writings of Kalidasa the descriptions of the penance grove (hermitage) of the sage occupy an important place. In Shakuntala and Raghuvamsha an atmosphere of peace and spiritual eminence often tones down the scenes of enjoyment. Hermitage of Kanva played a very significant part in the development of the plot of Shakuntala. A fine homely atmosphere is created by the hermitage in which both nature with its wealth and super-human beings are set side by side. The artistic admixture of garhasthya stage and parivrajaka stage of life has been beautifully portrayed in the play. Not only in Shakuntala but also in other works of Kalidasa, the asce-tics and the hermitage are painted with meticulous care. Kalidasa loves to depict all human complexes and difficulties amidst nature. Shakuntala the heroine of the drama is the daughter of the hermitage of Kanva. The hermitage with all its natural beauty and quietness is presented in the drama superbly. In Kumarasambhava and Raghuvamsha also Kalidasa has given excellent pictures of hermitages of the time. The description of Vashishtha's hermitage in Raghuvamsha is strikingly charming.

In Bhattikavya a very clear picture of the groups of ascetics is available:

tam yajayukah saha bhikshu-mukhyaistapahkrisan shantyudakumbhahastah/yayavarah pushpaphalena chanye pranarchurarchyam jagadarchaniyam.

"He, worthy of being adored by the whole world, worshipped the sacrificing and respectable saints constantly, emaciated by austerities. There were mendicant chiefs with vessels of evil-averting water in their hands and other wandering saints with flowers and fruits. Here Bhatti also maintained the tradition of depicting hermitage and the life of the ascetics as "peaceful abode of tranquility." In the second canto Bhatti gives a brief but beautiful description of autumn. The description is very lively and colourful with its dancing creepers, humming bees and glittering lakes.

The characteristic features of the 'muni' or an ascetic is thus stated in the Bhagavadgita:

dukkheshu anudvignamanah sukheshu vigatasprihah
vitaragabhayakrodhasthitadhirmuniruchyate

The features mentioned in the verse can be visualised in the character of seers residing in hermitages. The style of life of the hermits presented in ancient Indian writings symbolises the fondness of wise persons for calmness after all passion spent.

From the very beginning of Indian civilization the forests were associated with ritual smoke and chanting of mantras related to various rituals. And the kings used to take care of the hermitages and protected the quietness, serenity and sanctity of the hermitages. According to the smritishastras it was their holy duty. The Bhattikavya narrates how Vishvamitra came to the court of Dasharatha to beg for little Rama for fighting the demons creating disturbances in the ashramik life. Dasharatha could not refuse him. Banabhatta also in his Kadambari gives a very fine pen picture of hermitage and its inhabitants.

According to the Indian tradition the highest aim of mankind is not to be found in this worldly existence, but in a life beyond. They do not, however, think that the perishable things of the earth are useless; the world, according to them is a preparatory school for the higher truth.

The Buddhist and Jaina literature prescribes a rigorous course of action for the ascetics. For the accomplishment of emancipation the ascetics are sometimes found to have recourse to serious determination. They are to practise penance with dogged tenacity saying "let my body wither on this seat of meditation. Let the skin, bones and flesh perish. Without obtaining release from bondage which is difficult to get in many births, my body will not move from this seat". In the Mahavagga I.II.I Buddha's message and exhortation to his followers are: 'Go along in accordance with what has been enjoined, having realised ..... the supreme goal of brahmacharya for the sake of which family men go forth from home into homelessness'. The quest of brahman and the quest of nirvana, i.e. liberation are the same and the only difference lies in the definition of the goal. The aims of almsmen are identical in Indian tradition. In the Vanapattha sutta it is stated that almsman may dwell in a forest or quit it, or dwell anywhere in a village, a township or a country, if such a dwelling is conducive to his spiritual cultivation. Being professed almsmen, the bhikshus (ascetics) would naturally look for their dwelling abodes in any place. Some of them preferred to live in forest clearings which is why they are called aranyakas (forest dwellers).

In many literary works related to Buddhism and Jainism the description of such sannyasins and bhikshusanghas are found. The education imparted in Bauddha viharas, the educational institutions of Bauddhas, was somewhat different from the education imparted in the hermitages in ancient India though some of the former's features were modelled on the ashramik system of education.

However, the hermitages and the inhabitants of the ashramas played a very important part in the development of ancient Indian education and in the history of ancient Indian civilization and culture.

Along with the external invasions the ashramik system ot education was slowly disintegrating in India and thus it was gradually disappearing from the literary panorama of the country. The later Indian literature, which has taken its sources from the great creations in Sanskrit more or less took hermitage for depicting the characters of the age concerned. With the decline of Buddhism and Jainism, the brahmanical religion gradually rose into importance once again. But the former homogeneity was seldom found. It included the remnant of the old Vedic cult with the elements of different sectarian religions like shaivism, shaktism and vaishnavism. With the introduction of such religious sects the old ashramik process was graudally losing its character.

The later Indian literature looked upon the ancient hermitage with nostalgia. It exhibited almost a sentimental yearning for the past. Krittivasa's Ramayana was the transcreation of original Valmiki's Ramayana and hermitage is there depicted with all its natural grandeur. In the Bengali transcreation of Kashidas's Mahabharata also the same age-old depictions of hermitages and ascetics are available. Madhusudan Dutta was indebted to the great epics of India for his outstanding works. In the Meghanavadhakavya he depicted the hermitage and ascetic in the same way as his Sanskitic predecessors had done. Rabindranath Tagore in many of his poems and prose writings expressed his view in favour of education in hermitage. In a famous poem he expressed his longing for the hermitage, and desired to revive the traditions of the hermitage and the ascetics. In fact in his Shantiniketan he experimented with the idea of reviving the ancient Indian system of education.

In the realm of Hindi literature the natural beauty and the life of ascetics are beautifully described by Tulsidasa in his Ramacharitamanasa. In some pre-Tulsidasian writings related to the epic Ramayana, the hermitage and ascetics are presented particularly in Adiramayana of Sodhi Meherban, in Avadhavilasa of Laldas etc. In post-Tulsidasa writings also the status of the hermitage and ascetics was maintained. In Govinda Sinha's Ramavatara hermitage with all its natural grandeur and calmness of the life is presented. The hermitage and ascetics are also presented in the following :– Padma-Purana of Daulatrama (1661), Ramacharita of Sarala Mishra, Ramcharita chintamani of Ramacharita Upadhyaya and others.

In Marathi literature the Bhavartharamayana of Eknath had a very prominent place in the 16th century. In this work of Eknath the highest respect to hermitage and the ascetics is shown. In the works of Mukteshwara and Shridhara Swami, hermitage and ascetics are presented with charm.

The Oriya literature is rich in the depiction of the ascetics and the hermitage. Even from the 15th century the tradition of presenting hermitage and ascetics was carefully followed with reverence. In the works of Siddheshwara Parida, Sarla Das, Balarama Das, Keshava Tripathi, Kapilanandana and Kapileshwara it is found that the life of the ascetics is highly commended.

In Asamiya creative works particularly those which are connected with the great epics elaborately painted hermitage and ascetics. In 14th century Harihara Vipro composed Lavakusha Yuddha, in which hermitage plays an important role with its sublime atmosphere. In the works of Durgavara, Gangarama, Bhavadeva, Srichandra and Raghunatha the ascetics and their life in hermitage are painted colourfully with all their beauty and simplicity.

In the domain of Gujarati literature hermitage was given a dominant place and the ascetics were highly respected. Particularly in the works of Mandava, Naraka and others the life in 'tapovana' and its inhabitants are presented with all their punctiliousness. Even in the 20th century Gujarati literature, especially in the works which are influenced by the earlier Sanskrit writers, the hermitage has been given prominence.

In Kashmiri literature also the tradition of presenting hermitage and ascetics is observed. Especially in the work of Divakara Bhatta and Prakasharama the hermitage and ascetics are presented. The south Indian literature is disposed to maintain its age-old tradition. Asceticism and hermitage draw full adoration there.

Thus, poets and litterateures, of all ages in India have taken more or less keen interest in painting the hermitages and the life in the forests.

ASCETIC LITERATURE (Pali). The very subject-matter of the entire Pali Tripitaka incorporating the Buddha's teachings is ascetic in character. Buddha's teachings centre round the eradication of suffering and suggest ways and means to cross the ocean of worldly suffering. Thus the compass of the Pali ascetic literature would cover the entire Tripitaka, or, at least the major portions of the Abhidhamma and the Suttapitakas. But portions of Suttanipata, such as Prabbajjasutta which depicts in a beautiful poetic manner, the renunciation of Siddhartha Gautama, the Dhammapada (s.v. Pali Canonical Literature) which contains in all its gathas a clear exposition of the ascetic theme, the Theragatha and the Therigatha which contain experiences of the various monks both male and female and several suttas of the Udana may be cited as the best examples of the Pali ascetic Literature.

The Theragatha and the Therigatha contain the natural assertions of 255 bhikkhus and 55 bhikkunis respectively. The bhikkhus and the bhikkhunis under whose names the spirtiual experiences or renunciation or detraction from the world are recorded, are said to be contemporaries of the Buddha, or most probably memebrs of the Buddhist Sangha in the time of the Buddha. This viewpoint has been questioned by scholars such as Winternitz and Neumann, but it has to be admitted that whether the verses are written or not by the bhikkhus and bhikkhunis under whose name they are found recorded, their attribution to the members of the Buddhist church and their ascetic quality cannot be undervalued. These verses have superb literary value resonant with the ascetic tone. At places graphic pictures of natural panorma as well as the inner feeling of wrldly suffering are also met with. The denunciation of worldly pleasures and personal family memoranda of several authors to whom these verses are attributed, make them poems of real philosphic value.

The verses of Dhammapada display in a natural strain the encouragement to renunciation, performance of deeds according to the ethical principles preached by the Buddha and the emulation of the qualities of a Shramana, Brahmana or a Pandita. The commentaries on these works by Buddhaghosha and Dhammapala present an explanation of the various aspects of the standpoints laid down in these texts.

ASGHAR HUSAIN GONDVI (Urdu; b. 1884, d. 1936) whose forefathers belonged to Gorakhpur, was brought up at Gonda where his father had settled down, retiring as Qanungo. Asghar failed to appear at the High School Examination, but despite domestic stresses and strains he continued studying Urdu and Persian till he obtained full command of these languages. He was a poet by temperament and he turned to writing and contributing his lyrics to the leading periodicals. He was a disciple to no one but benefited from suggestions given to him by Munshi Khalil Ahmad 'Wajid' Bilgrami and later by Amir-ul-Lah 'Taslim'. For his living he dealt in optical goods. He was a devout sufi and had great reverence for Qazi Shah Abdulghani a famous sufi saint of the time. The first collection containing Asghar's ghazals (lyrics) and three poems, spread over 43 pages with foreword and review occupying another 83 pages, appeared in 1925. It was entitled Nishat-e-Rooh (Exultation of the Self). Asghar's next publication was Sorood-e-Zindagi (Song of life) which saw the light in 1935. His poetry elicited acclaim and applause from all those interested in standard literature. Abul Kalam Azad and Tej Bahadur Sapru paid glowing tributes to his poetic talents. Asghar's poetry is charaterized by Romantic qualities, and informed by Sufi thoughts. Sublimity of imaginatiion, style of putting forth ideas, beauty and brilliance of language, and mystic flights lend an aura of enchantment to his verse.

Asghar composed Persian verse also. He was indeed a great poet.

ASHADH KA EK DIN (Hindi), a well-known Hindi play by Mohan Rakesh, was first published in 1958. The title of the play comes from the opening lines of the Sanskrit poet Kalidasa's long narrative poem Meghaduta. This three-act-play takes for its theme the life of Kalidasa and the tortuous conflict within his soul between a natural urge to go out and become famous, and the desire to retire into his rural surroundings, be ever with his beloved Mallika and lead a quiet idyllic life. The play won the Sangeet Natak Akademi's best play award in 1959. Kalidasa, in the first Act, is accosted by the men from Ujjayini who wish to present him at the court of the great Chandragupta. After a prolonged discussion, Kalidasa leaves for Ujjayini, deeply beset with doubts. The second Act dramatizes the plight of a downcast and lonely Mallika. Kalidasa has attained fame by now, and is basking in his new-found glory. An encoutner between Kalidasa's sophisticated royal wife and his erstwhile beloved Mallika follows. The scene, with the vain courtiers Anuswara and Anunasika, and the snobbish ladies in-waiting Rangini and Sangini, is rich in satirical humour and repartees. Kalidasa's wife offers to help Mallika, but she politely declines the magnanimous offer. The last Act reveals Mallika as a prostitute, with a little daughter. Kalidasa, she hears from Matual, has relinquished his glorious post in Kashmir and renounced the glamourous court life. Shortly he comes to see her and both Mallika and Kalidasa find that time has taken its toll. The play closes amid the noise of thunder and the sound of the baby's cries, as Kalidasa leaves Mallika's house to find a freedom of sorts. The ending seems to pose a question mark on the nature of this freedom.

In handling the ancient theme, Mohan Rakesh shows full awarness that in a gripping play, the emotions of our day must motivate the old narrative. This he has been able to achieve with great delicacy of touch. The language is purposefully archaic and mellifluous, and unmistakably helps to create the desired environment and effect. Kalidasa's spiritual struggle becomes the universal dilemma of every great artist. Should he accept royal patronage and fame? Or should he live the life of a recluse, content to die unsung and unwept, but devoted entirely to his artistic pursuits? What comes first, commitment to his craft, or fulifillment of his human aspirations? The play further raises questions on the miserable plight of Mallika: to what purpose do noble women like her suffer. What do they get for their sufferings?

The play drew immediate notice and approbation in literary circles when it was first published. Its stage-worthiness, however, was recognized only when it was staged in 1962 by the National School of Drama, New Delhi. Since then it has also been translated into Bengali, English, Gujarati and Marathi. The play established Rakesh as a major Hindi playwright of the modern times.

ASHANGBAM MINAKETAN SINGH (Manipuri, b. 1906) was an eminent Manipuri poet, folklorist, essayist, grammarian and literary critic. A graduate of Calcutta University, he studied Sanskrit and old Manipuri language and literature, worked as a teacher from high schools to the University and retired as an Associate Professor and Head, Manipuri Language and Literature Division, Centre of Post Graduate Studies (J.N.U), Imphal. He is well versed in English, Sanskrit, Bengali and Hindi. History is also his favourite subject. He won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1977 for his poetic work Asheibagi Nitaipod (Concluding Verse of the Poet, 1976). His first book of poetry Basanta Sheireng (Poems of the Spring, 1932) contains some of the better poems of the period.

Prior to his teachership he was a Government Officer. But in connection with a murder case he had given up his post and studied Sanskrit literature. After that he studied world history and old Manipuri Literature. He takes keen interest in comparative literature.

He is one of the pioneer grammarians in Manipuri. In his Manipuri grammar Meitei Lonjan (1949) he tried to analyse Manipuri language in the light of systematic grammar and thereby tried to find out the origin of the Manipuri language. He is the first autobiographer in Manipuri. In his autobiography Punsigi Saktam (part 1, 1980) the educational development, cultural integration and political milieu of his time are well depicted. His drama Sita Banabas (1946) was staged several times in those days and appreciated by the educated reading public as well as commoners. As an idealist he aims at establishment of a humanitarian society, the Ram-rajya on this earth. He is very much influenced by Sanskrit language and literature. His Manipuri is regarded as a hard language because samasa and sandhi of Sanskrit are freely adopted by him. He translated Meghanadbadh Kavya of Madhusudan Dutta in Sanskritised Manipuri. Some of his publications include Bharat Charu in two volumes, Tonu Laijinglembi, Meitei Upanyas, Asheibagi Sheiroi etc. He is associated with seveal literary and cultural organisations of Manipur. He was President of the Manipuri Sahitya Parishad which gave him the title of Sahitya Ratna. He received the Fellowship Award of the Manipur State Kala Akademi.

ASHEIBAGI NITAIPOD (Manipuri) is a book of two poems by Ashangbam Minaketan Singh, first edition of which was published in 1976.

The first poem which runs from 1 to 21 pages in Piye Thadoi and the second poem which runs to another 81 pages is Nungshi Wakheiba. On the first poem Piya Thadoi the poet in the preface says that it is a reconstruction of a lost poem 'Pithadoi' which he composed long back. It was once a text in Intermediate class but is now untraceable. The second poem 'Nungshi Wakheiba' is based on the legendary tragic love of Itiben and Chalamba, two characters of Manipuri history.

'Piye Thadoi' is based on the legendary Khomba-Thoibi story of Moirang. It relates the conversion of the soul of Nongban, the villain as well as the other lover in the triangular love-tale, after his violent death in the encounter with a man-eater.

Thoibi was the only daughter of Chingkhuba, the heir-apparent of Moirang. Nongban was a noble man married to several wives but still very much after the hands of Thoibi. Chingkhuba, Thoibi's father, also wanted to marry off his daughter to Nongban. But Thoibi did not agree. She was in love with Khamba, an orphan of Moirang who was brought up by his elder sister Khamnu. Various plots were hatched against the life of Khamba by Nongban in collusion with Chingkhuba; however, nothing could do any harm. These plots and ill-will against Khamba by Nongban were prompted by his instatibale love for Thoibi. Ultimately, both Khamba and Nongban were asked to catch a man-eater, the winner being promised Thoibi as prize. Nongban unfortunately was killed in the encounter and in his dying moments he begged of Khamba to allow him to sing the name of Thoibi, otherwise known as Thadoi, when his soul would be turned into a bird known as Pithadoi. This request was granted and the legendary bird Pithadoi is considered to have been turned so from the soul of Nongban who still continues to sing in pathetic and tragic notes the name of Thadoi. Taking the legndary story Ashangbam Minaketan Singh turns it into a beautiful poem by virtue of his poetic imagination. The language is poetic and the conception of the whole poem is tragically beautiful.

The second poem 'Nungshi Wakheiba' which literally means 'love's last' is also based on the legend of the tragic love between Itiben, a daughter of the ruler of the Sheloi Langmai and Chalamba, a prince of the Ningthouja, a clan of ancient Manipur. Both of them met clandestinely and when the identity of Chalamba could not be established properly, he was killed by the father of Itiben. Itiben committed suicide and their souls were united in death. This is the story in bare outline and the poet Ashangbam Minaketan Singh in the height of his imagination and poetic flight could weave a beautiful poem out of it.

The two poems are cast by the poet in epic structure and he observes certain epic traditions in the composition of the two poems. The two poems, the poet says in the preface, depict mundane love as conceived by ancient Manipuri poets and also eternal love as spiritualized by them. A comparative reading of the compositions of Kalidasa and the Vaishnava poets with the love as depicted tragically by ancient Manipuri poets will be a rewarding experience. Ashangbam Minaketan Singh is distinguished in Manipuri literature by his individualistic use of Manipuri language and coinages of new words. In Asheibagi Nitaipod also he makes experiments in the use of Manipuri language and in making new coinages. Happily these help in the poetic achievement of the poet. Asheibagi Nitaipod won for the poet the Sahitya Akademi Award for Manipuri in the year 1979.

ASHIRVAD (Sindhi) by Shewak Bhojraj is the first ever Sindhi novel on political theme encompassing political events that took place during the second and third decades of the present century. It was first published in 1933 and its second edition was brought out in Devnagari Sindhi script by Lok Seva Mandal, Bombay in 1964. The author happened to be a freedom-fighter and the major portion of the novel is based on the near real incidents in which he was involved personally. Written in first person, the novel, narrates through its hero Shyam the episodes of his life beginning with childhood.

Set in the thick of the political movement, the author at places provides respite to the reader and pushes him into occasional romantic scenes. The skilful narration of the events succeeds in leaving the reader engrossed in the work which no doubt has been written in chaste language and lucid style. It faithfully and artistically depicts the tender human emotions which transcend the basic animal-ity of man and elevate him to the heights of spiritual love thereby providing the much needed solace and happiness in life. In the end, after being released from the prison, Shyam, the hero of the novel, and Kamla, a girl of his dreams when he was young, seek Ashirvad (blessings) of Shyam's mother so that they can spend their lives in the service of the humanity and fight for the freedom of their motherland.

The novel has historical significance in as much as it delineates faithfully several incidents of national movement in Sindh during the second and the third decades of the present century. The book, being the first work of its kind written on political theme, is a trend-setter in Sindhi novel writing.

AS TE AN BANJARE LOK (Dogri) by Vedpal 'Deep', published by Dogri Sanstha, Jammu in 1968, contains 113 ghazals which are among the finest poetic creations in Dogri. With these ghazals, Deep has emerged as a great classic master of the Dogri ghazal. He has used the form of ghazal, adopted from Urdu, to create beautiful compositions, full of meaning and great artistic merit. He symbolises the best in Dogri ghazal and his success in the medium as seen in this book went a long way in encouraging others, providing models and establishing this particular medium of poetic expression as a continuing feature of Dogri poetry of the years that followed. The title of the book As Te An Banjare Lok, meaning 'we the wanderers' reflects the bohemian character and temperament of the author and those of his ilk. The predominant theme is romantic love, with strains of socio-political ideas, comments on social reality and passion and hope for reform. There is a thread of deep humanism running through all the ghazals and the artistry of the ghazal medium comes through naturally, effortlessly. A large number of ghazals are woven round the author's personal emotions–the heart-rending traumatic experience of estrangement from his wife, his otherwise turbulent and uneasy life as a ticket-holding worker of the Communist Party, nerve-racking dreams of revolution and change and hopes and frustrations of an idealist. The melange of emotions, artistically transmuted into great poetry, is rendered sensitively, tenderly and elegantly. His open-hearted and candid expression of personal experiences makes for effective communication to the reader or listener and strikes a sympathetic chord in him.

His progressive ideas crystallised in ghazals of ideological and philosophical import reveal his sympathy for the downtrodden and his passion for reform. The expression in this type of ghazals is vigorous and warm-hearted. His deep sincerity both in love and in ideology dear to him, lend a rare beauty and charm to his thoughts and feelings. There is a certain freshness and originality in his expression of thoughts and feelings and behind them there is imagination, earnestness and pulsating passion which comes out forcefully. The book presents a happy marriage of modern Dogra sensibility, politically conscious and active, socially committed, and emotionally troubled and tortured, with an adopted but appropriate medium, made pliable to the requirements of the author and given respectability and popular place in Dogri poetry.

ASHK, UPENDRANATH (Hindi; b. 1910) is a novelist, short story writer and a playwright. Ashk, after his initiation into literature, through journals, began serious writing in Hindi in the mid-thirties. Till then, his two collections of stories in Urdu, Navratan and Aurat Ki Fitrat, had appeared. His first collection of Hindi stories Judai Ki Sham Ke Geet was published in 1933. During the early phase of his literary career, Ashk was an idealist. His writings were imaginative and romantic. It was imagination kindled by romantic beauty and bereft of intense experience.

Within a period of three years, Upendranath Ashk produced nearly a dozen plays, several stories, poems and an evaluative work on Urdu poetry. A stream of intense experience and a melancholic note appear to motivate these poems, stories and plays.

In 1939, Ashk went to Pritnagar and edited the Hindi section of a monthly journal. Here he wrote some stories, a drama and some portions of the novel Girti Diwaren (The crashing walls). He joined the All India Radio in 1941. In December, 1945, he went to Bombay and aspired to write for films. Later, he came to Allahabad and founded the Nilabh Prakashan. Ashk is a versatile writer and he has enriched almost all literary genres through his creative writings. He has a deep insight into the life of the middle class and identifies himself with their aspirations and failures, their stresses and strains, the hollowness of their existence and their intense frustration which makes life a veritable inferno.

Among his dramas, Chhatha Beta (the sixth son), Anjo Didi (sister Anjo) and Qaid (imprisonment) are the most successful ones. In Chhatha Beta, his humour and satire and in Qaid his characterization are remarkable. Ashk is familiar with modern techniques of the stage. His plays, with a few changes here and there, can be enacted with good effect. Among his one-act plays Bhanwar, Charvahe, Chilman and Sukhi Dali are fine pieces of dramatic art. Ashk has nearly fifty plays and one-act plays, more than hundred and fifty stories, collections of poems and several articles to his credit.

As a story writer Ashk, like Premchand, is an idealistic realist. His characters are not mere representative patterns but are intensely real human beings. He has a balanced realistic approach to life. His plays and stories depict the social and individual life with all its infirmities and strength. His unhampered expression, remarkable use of language, and his authenticity are of some of the characteristic features of his work.

FURTHER WORKS: Plays: Jay-Parajay (1937); Swarga Ki Jhalak (1938); Chhatha Beta (1940); Qaid (1943-45); Uraan (1943-45); Alag-Alag Raste (1944-53); Anjo Didi (1953-54).

Novels: Sitaron Ke Khel (1937), Girti Diwaren (1947); Garm Rakh (1952); and Bari-Bari Ankhen (1954).

Collection of poems: Deep Jalega (1950); and Chandni Raat-Aur-Ajgar (1952).

ASHOKAMITRAN (Tamil; b. 1931), real name J. Tyagarajan is a Tamil novelist and short story writer. He had his formal education through the medium of English in Andhra Pradesh. Some western influence is perceptible in the technique and structure of his works. Consequently, some of his stories translated into English appeal easily to western readers.

Ashokamitran has to his credit five novels and five collections of short stories, Karainda Nighalkal (Dissolving shadows, 1969) is a picture of the make–believe world of the cinema, an area to which he brings the insight of an insider being a member of the regional censor board. Thannir (Water, 1973) is a novel in which the author brings out some poignant situations experienced by the urban population of Madras during a drought. Another novel Pathinettavathu Akshakkodu (Eighteenth Latitude, 1977) describes the historic event of the take-over of the Hyderabad State by the Government of India and the turmoil that preceded it. This novel received an award from Ilakkiya Chintanai, a literary trust. Ashokamitran is one of the few full-time Tamil writers who depend on writing for a living.

ASHTACHHAP (Hindi). They are also designated 'Ashta Sakha' (the eight companions) of Krishna, indicating the highest honour accorded to them in the 'Pushtimarg' sect of the 'Krishna-cult.' During the mediaeval period, they were foremost among the chosen disciples of Vallabhacharya (1478-1530), the founder of the sect and of Vitthalnath (1515-1585), his son and successor, who established this celebrated order of devotees. Vallabhacharya's disciples consisted of Kumbhandas (1468-1582), Surdas (1478-1580-83), Krishnadas (1495-1575-83) and Parmananddas (1491-1583) and those of Vitthalnath were Govindswami (1905-1986), Chitswami (1510-1586), Nanddas (1533-1586) and Chaturbhujdas (1540-1585). Obviously, it was due to their artistic temperament and poetic and musical talents that their services were sought by the preceptors for reaching out to the masses. They were given special assignment of leading the musical sessions turn by turn at the eight daily rituals of the diety, 'Srinathji' at the holy hillock 'Govardhan'. There is no doubt that the popularity of the Krishna-lore as a religious cult has been largely due to its having used the power of word and sound as the twin media of its expression.

The Ashtachhap poets rose from the common masses and remained with them as their friends, philosophers and guides. Surdas started life with nothing but his own gift of song and poetry. Parmananddas did likewise, though he came of a respectable Brahmin family. Kumbhandas, a poverty-stricken farmer, supporting a large family, never accepted any gift offered by such great persons as Raja Mansingh and emperor Akbar himself. Surdas, too, flatly declined the honour to sing in praise of the emperor. Kumbhandas could, however, be persuaded to visit Fatehpur Sikri, but he had nothing but contempt for the royal splendour. Krishnadas joined the sect after having been driven out by his parents of a low community of Gujarat, because he had fallen into bad company. Govindswami had also left his home to lead the life of an ascetic and was picked up by Vitthalnath. Chaturbhujdas was given as an offering to the sect by his father, Kumbhandas, even when he was not born. According to some scholars, Nanddas was Goswami Tulsidas's brother. But this is not the generally accepted view. He was in love with a pretty married woman and was rescued with great difficulties. Chhitswami eked out his living through petty priestly profession. Almost all of them had tended to deviate from social norms. But once their emotive faculties were diverted towards Krishna, they were liberated from all constraints on their instincts. Sublimitation, rather than suppression, turned many a man of clay into gold. 'Ashtachhap' poets were living examples of this phenomenon.

These poets lived through a period of political turmoil followed by an all-round socio-political progress of Akbar's reign. But, much as the emperor might have liked, they would never seek any patronage other than the Lord's. Even the continued generosity of Akbar in granting a number of concessions to Vitthalnath and his family did not change their attitude of indifference towards the establishment and of pride emanating from the realization that they were citizens of a superior divine state.

'Ashtachhap' poets were believed by the devouts to be incarnations of the divine companions with Krishna himself having taken his birth as Surdas. There is no doubt that but for Surdas, most of the 'Ashtachhap' poets would hardly have attracted notice outside the sect for all of them, except Surdas, devoted considerable part of their poetry to ritualistic and sectarian compositions. They sang in praise not only of the preceptors but of the latter's sons and grandsons also, while Surdas is conspicuous by not having mentioned even once the name of his Guru.

In poetic excellence, only Paramanand with 1101 'padas' (lyrics) appears to have approached Surdas. He has tried to give a rough outline of the 'Krishna-lila' as a whole. Kumbhandas has about 500 miscellaneous 'padas' to his credit. He has, however, acquired a name for his intense devotion as also forceful expression of regret on a visit to Fatehpur Sikri. But Nanddas rightfully deserves a place of honour after Surdas. He produced 14 independent works, some of which are only indirectly connected with the Krishna-lore. Besides his love for ornate language and poetic artistry, he is also fond of philosophical discussions. Though sometimes he becomes didactic, he has given a new turn to devotional poetry wherein the motif of Krishna-lore provides the subject matter for poetry which need not be essentially devotional. Krishnadas and Govindswami with about 250 'padas' each, Chaturbhujdas with about 150 and Chhitswami, merely 64 could hardly rise above the rank of minor poets. Taking their cue from Surdas, however, all of them enriched the emotion-saturated Krishna–literature and devotional music in which Radha and other 'gopis' almost always enjoyed the focal position. Child psychology in the context of paternal love, however, remains the special preserve of Surdas with only Parmananddas trying to follow him.

Though the 'Ashtachhap' poets are unequal in rank and quality of their poetry, collectively they all, through their spiritual zeal, and then after negation of the court life contributed to the cultural resurgence of the sixteenth century by projecting the 'Lila' of a lord that lived and rejoiced amongst the commonest of the common, as one of them.

ASHTADHYAYI (Sanskrit) also called Ashtaka, Shabdanushasana and Vrittisutra, is a monumental work having eight chapters by Panini (6th-5th century B.C.). It is an ordered set of about four thousand rules framed by the great grammarian giving a comprehensive but economical description of the Sanskrit language. These rules are metalinguistic in character as they are a combination of algebric symbols, procedural assumptions and meaningful ordering. They are called sutras (aphorisms). The sutra is traditionally required to be economical, unambiguous, faultless, pervasive and generalised formulation. Sutras are so inter-linked that the entire Ashtadhyayi functions as one entity.

The book is divided into eight chapters; the first two deal with rules of procedure and rules relating to syntactic relationship and compound-formation and rules having a very specific application. Chapter three deals with verb and verbal formations while chapters four and five describe secondary derivations (taddhita). The last two chapters deal with sandhi (morphemics). Variations in the older Vedic language termed Chandas by Panini as different from Bhasha (language) a name given to the Sanskrit language spoken by the people are interspersed in the whole body of the rules. Occasionally variations found in regional dialects (such as northern or eastern) or parallel usages have also been given wherever deemed necessary. Panini's main objective is to give a synchronic description of the language of his times accepted as the standard language; he does not aim at historical evolution of the language. Panini worked out intuitively a generic frame which could cover the Indian frame of mind in the context of using language for communication. So he could visualise the potentials of his rules which by and large are applicable to a language separated from him by centuries. Some scholars misconstrued this situation as an attempt to set a prescriptive model, from which no deviation could be allowed. Actually, Ashtadhyayi is a discovery of facts from life arranged in such a manner that it can provide a frame for describing process of human commmunication in a cultural situation identical or similar to his. That is why he has served as a model for grammars in almost all the Indian languages, particularly his semantic and syntactic categories are universal. Ashtadhyayi is itself an end-product of a rich antecedent grammatical tradition. Panini has referred to a number of preceding grammarians and has assimilated most of their procedures and techniques into his own system in such a manner that he has surpassed them all.

Ashtadhyayi is not merely a treatise on grammar, it is a rich documentation of socio-cultural milieu of his times as well as one of the rarest accounts of the people and their ways of living, as he perceived, through their finding expression in speech-behaviour, as rightly observed by V.S. Agarwal. Ashtadhyayi is also a remarkable repository of colloquial idioms and usages. To give an example, a crop gets its designation from the month when it ripens and is reaped, a crop reaped in ashvina (October) is called ashvina. An attendant having no initiative of his own is called Lalatika (he is looking at the forehead of his master all the time). The Ashtadhyayi thus serves as a source material for the study of Indian society and culture.

Furthermore, Ashtadhyayi provides a frame for use of metaphor and for effective communication of ideas in different speech-situations. Ashtadhyayi shows a keen insight into the total human situation as mirrored in speech on the part of its author and is rightly described as a monument of human intelligence by L. Bloomfield.

Ashtadhyayi has a large chain of commentaries, the most important being in a chronological order Varttika (Katyayana or Vararuchi, 4th-3rd century. B.C.), Mahabhashya (Patanjali, 2nd century. B.C.), Kashika (Jayadittya and Vamana, 7th century. A.D.), Nyasa or Kashikavivaranapanjika (Jinendrabuddhi, 7th-8th century. A.D.), Padamanjari (Haradatta, 12th century A.D.), Durghatavritti (Sharanadeva, 13th century. A.D.) and Siddhantakaumudi (Bhattoji Dikshita, 16th century. A.D.). An independent school of grammar came to grow up around Ashtadhyayi and it is a unique feature of evolution of Indian thought that grammar could play such important role and that the analytic frame of Ashtadhyayi could become the base of all intellectual achievement and could become the key to an idependent philosophical system (Linguistic philosophy) propounded by Bhartrihari in his Vakyapadiya.

ASHTADIGGAJA POETS (Telugu) are eight eminent poets who adorned Bhuvanavijaya Sabha, the court of Sri Krishnadevaraya, the greatest of the Vijayanagara Emperors. They are generally known by the name Ashtadiggaja poets. The word 'ashta' (eight) 'dik' (quarter) 'gaja' (elephant) the eight elephants that are supposed to bear the earth in eight quarters. This title indicates their eminence as poets. It is said that the emperor used to carry on literary discussions with those poets and enjoy the samasyas, anyopadesa and occasional verses composed by them extempore in the court. He also used to honour poets and scholars who came to meet him in order to display their poetic talent and scholarship, in a befitting manner. Some times the Ashtadiggajas carried on literary disputations among themselves at the request of the emperor and vied with one another in exhibiting their literary and poetic talent.

Allasani Peddana (Manucharitra), Nandi Timmana (Parijatapaharana), Madayagari Mallana (Rajasekharacharitra), Dhurjati (Srikalahastimahatmyam), Tenali Ramakrishna (Pandurangamahatmya), Ayyelaraju Ramabhadrudu (Ramabhudaya), Bhattumorti alias Ramarajabhusana (Vasucharitra etc.) and Pingali Surana (Raghavapandeviya, Kalapurnodaya, etc.) are the eight poets who are known by the title Ashtadiggajas. The first five poets lived in the court of the emperor but regarding the other three, critics are of the opinion that they might have been too young during the reign of the emperor to occupy such a high position in that celebrated court. They hold that those three might have been Kannada or Sanskrit poets who were also patronised by the emperor. Nevertheless the title Ashtadiggajas brings to the mind of the Telugu people, the eight poets mentioned above. Moreover it is not clearly known who those Kannada and Sanskrit poets were, who occupied a place among the great Ashtadiggajas.

These great poets wrote famous Prabandhas, some of which became models to the poets who succeeded them and it is only on account of them that the age of Krishnadevaraya is called the golden age of Telugu literature. They were great as poets as they were great scholars. Peddana and Timmana dedicated their works, Manucharitra and Parijatapaharana respectively to the emperor himself. Timmana is said to have been sent as Harana (gift given by the parents to the bride) along with one of the queens of the emperor. Dhurjati was a great devotee of Siva and in spite of that he could obtain the patronage of the emperor who was a staunch Vaishnavite.

Some scholars hold that Kandukuri Rudrakavi, the author of Nirankusopakhyans, Sugriva Vijaya and Janardanastakamu, was one of the Ashtadiggajas and occupied the throne in the Isanya direction. But further proof is required to accept this view.

ASHTAKA POETRY (Kannada). Ashtaka literally means a group of eight. In the present context it means a form of literary composition consisting of eight stanzas or verse-pieces. Though ashtaka is a literary form common to many of the literary languages of India, it originated in Sanskrit. Ashtakas are generally psalms or hymns in praise of gods and goddesses of the Hindu pantheon. Occasionally the subject-matter is a sacred river or hill; Gangashtaka, Yamunashtaka and Govardhanashtaka in Sanskrit may be cited as instances. Kannada also has a few ashtakas on natural objects. The purple patches of lyricism and loud overtones of didacticism that characterise the ashtaka literature are generally absent in Kannada ashtakas, which are hymns pure and simple and are limited in scope.

Hundreds of ashtakas are available in Sanskrit. And they are collected in anthologies like Brihatstotraratnakara. No concerted effort has so far been made to get at least a rough idea of the number of ashtakas available in Kannada as independent compositions and those occurring in poetical works. Hence it is difficult to figure out even the approximate number of ashtakas available in Kannada. A good number may come to light when thousands of unpublished palm-leaf Mss. are examined, if not published. Very recently an ashtaka was discovered among miscellaneous writings in a paper Ms. in the library of the Kannada Sahitya Parishad, Bangalore. This stray Kannada ashtaka is entitled Nidugalla Virabhadrana Ashtaka.

The ashtaka in Kannada naturally resembles its counterpart in Sanskrit both in form and in content. Though an ashtaka is a bunch of eight verses, most of them contain nine or more verses both in Sanskrit and in Kannada. All the verses in Sanskrit ashtakas are usually in the same metre, one of the more popular Varna Vrittas. But in Kannada the ashtakas are found to be composed in Sanskrit Varna metres and indigenous matra metres. All the verses are composed in the same metre, and every verse ends with the ankita or mudrika (signature) of the author, which generally happens to be the name of the "ista devata" (chosen deity) of the author.

A fairly good number of ashtakas in Sanskrit are ascribed to famous authors like Valmiki, Vyasa, Kalidasa, Adi Sankaracharya, Vallabhacharya, etc. Sankara is credited with many of them, and his Chandrasekharashtaka, Kalabhairavashtaka, Gangashtaka, Annapurnashtaka are very popular in Karnataka. Since the matra metre of Chandrasekharashtaka (3+4, 3+4, 3+2 matras) is found in a good number of latter day composers of ashtakas in Kannada, it seems likely that Sankara provided the model for them. At any rate, it may generally be stated that as a genre the ashtaka of Sanskrit in all its variety has greatly influenced the tradition of composing ashtakas in Kannada right from the beginning.

Gajashtaka (Ashtaka on Elephant) is the ealiest ashtaka extant in Kannada. It was composed by Saigotta Sivamara (c. 800), a king of the Ganga dynasty (350-1050) who ruled the southern parts of Karnataka. One of the verses in a Kannada epigraph refers to the Gajashtaka and eulogises its author in glowing terms. That the Gajashtaka came to be known as ovanige and onakevadu, two types of folk songs, is proof of its immense popularity in its time. But the text of the ashtaka is unfortunately not available.

There are any number of folk songs in tripad (three-lines) metre called 'bisuva padagalu' (Songs sung while grinding corn with mill-stone). It is obvious that onakevadu means 'a song that is used at the time of pounding'. That Gajashtaka was in Kannada is certain, as otherwise it could not have become popular along with 'onakevadu' as a folk song. But there is some controversy as to what type of song it was. R.S. Mugali has suggested that ovanige was a 'bisuva pada'. Some scholars differ from this view (Karmataka Bharati, vi-4, 1964). They argue that on the face of it Gajashtaka has something to do with elephants. It is known from an inscription (E.C. Vol. viii, No. 35) that Sivarama wrote a 'gajasastra' (scientific treatise on elephants) named Sivamaramata, and that it has been commented upon by one Karenu Yati (Karenu elephant). Gajashtaka is a part of that book. Further, Desinamamala of Hemachandra explains the Ovam as a pit for catching elephants, etc. And ovam is the first component of the compound word 'ovanige'. And so it appears that 'ovanige' was a song sung while trying to entice the wild-elephant into the 'ovam'. Whatever be the interpretation as to the significance of Gajashtaka, this ashtaka has historical importance in that it happens to be the first Kannada ashtaka known to us.

The next significant ashtaka is Mudigeya Ashtaka by Harihara (1200), author of Girijakalyana, Basavaraja Devararagale and a hundred other ragales. (Ragale is a Kannada metrical form used extensively by Harihara for the first time). This ashtaka is noted for its legendary significance. The story goes that Harihara composed the ashtaka extempore in praise of Siva before a gathering of devotees who derided him for having worn a mudige (head-gear) made of rudraksha flowers which fell down on to the ground when he bowed before the image of Siva. Harihara composed the ashtaka on the spot with the challenging phrase 'mudigeyanikkiden ikkiden avan ettuvam' ('I have laid the mudige on the floor, let me see who can pick it up);. When none could, Chandesa, an attendant of Siva, appeared on the scene and placed the mudige on the head of Harihara.

The Kannada ashtakas are mostly of a devotional nature. The poet addresses himself to God in the form of his "ista devata" (chosen deity) recounting His holy names and divine attributes.

R. Narasimhachar has mentioned about 15 ashtakas in his Kavicharitre volumes, a good number of which are hymns on Jaina Tirthankaras like Santhinatha, Parsvanatha, Anantanatha, etc. Bhojaraja Patil has for the first time collected and published 15 ashtakas. Puspashtaka on names of flowers offered to Siva, by Sankardeva (1620), Parvatashtaka (annonymous), and Tungabhadrashtaka (anonymous) on river Tungabhadra are refreshingly distinctive on account of their new themes.

Among the ashtakas by well-known authors, the following are noteworthy: Vardhamanashtaka by Nagavarma II (1042); Chandranathashtaka by Gunavarma II (C. 1215) (Chandranatha is a Jaina Tirthankara); Gummata Stuti by Madhura (C. 1385); Sri Sailajavallabhashtaka in Rajasekhara Vilasa by Shadakshara Deva (1653); Venkatesashtaka by Timmappa Dasa (1784-1860) (This is a unique ashtaka, but it is in Sanskrit.)

Nidugalla Virbhadrashtaka, already referred to above, requires special mention: so far as is known this ashtaka is the only one by a woman writer. She addresses Virabhadra as her lover and yearns for union with him. She cannot bear the pangs of separation from her Divine Lover and implores Him to meet and join her at night in her house when all her relatives, including her husband, are asleep. Though this composition appears to be erotic, it expresses the mystic experience of Madhura Bhakti of the writer towards her Lord. The innocence and intimacy of feeling is very touching.

Basavesvarashtaka by Raghava, broadcast on the occasion of the 8th centenary of Basavesvara, seems to be the only ashtaka by a later poet.

ASHTAPRABANDHAM (Tamil). Ashtaprabandham, an anthology of eight poetical works on the glory of Lord Narayana, was composed by Pillai Perumal Ayyangar who is believed to have flourished in the 12th century. Vaishnava tradition has it that he was a disciple of Parasara Bhatta who was the son of Kurattu Azhwar, the foremost adherent of the great Ramanuja, the founder of the Visistadvaita school of philosophy. Pillai Perumal Ayyangar was honoured during his life time as a great devotee and a gifted singer of songs; he is referred to as divyakavi by devotees of Lord Narayana; he is accorded a high place among religious poets in Tamil.

Ashtaprabandham was neither collected as an anthology nor given this name by the author. Later, anthologists got into the habit of calling the collection by this name and the name has stuck. It is read by both the students of Tamil and mature scholars with equal respect. Apart from the sentiment of devotion it inculcates, it bristles with verbal effects to an extent not found in other Tamil works, even though admittedly Tamil poets have always been partial to verbal figures of speech. Some of the stanzas with double entendre do not yield up their meaning to the student unless he arms himself with a commentary. But the poems are not without a charm of their own and their genuine sentiments are unmistakable.

The collection consists of short works on Lord Narayana as seen at Srirangam, Tirupati and Azhagar Koil near Madurai principally and at other 105 places of pilgrimage celebrated in the Vaishnava tradition; the total number of stanzas in all the 8 works together is 751, if we exclude the 39 stanzas which are clearly not from this poet but are usually found added in all the manuscripts.

Perhaps the most charming of the eight works is the Tiru Arangakkalambakam where the devotee, a lady in love with Lord Ranganatha, is described in beautifully lyrical poems in her various stages and moods of love. Thus, unable to bear the separation, she begs a cloud to take her message to her lover and bring back to her a few leaves of Tulsi worn by Him. Noticing the restlessness of the sea, she concludes that the sea too must be in love with Him and consequently suffering the pangs of separation as she does, herself! She laments that she sent her heart as her messenger to Him but it does not return to her with His reply; it surely must have lost itself in admiration for Him!

Further, in the manner of the Azhwars, the poet in another work sings wonderingly of the cosmic size of the primordial Boar in whose single hair follicle the seas can find a comfortable refuge! There are poems describing the dichotomy of Krishna which makes him appear as a helpless child accepting meekly the beating administered by his mother–a beating felt by all the living things in the fourteen worlds of the universe!

In some of his works, the emphasis is on assonance and verbal play: the same word apparently occurs at the beginning of each of the four lines of a verse but the word either has to be broken up differently to yield different words or has more than one meaning. In the last work, where the poet salutes the Lord as worshipped in different sacred spots all over the country, we see an admirable dexterity at work in finding suitable words to rhyme with the often long and involved names of the temple towns.

A.V.S.

ASHVAGHOSHA (Sanskrit), sometimes abbreviated simply as Ghosha, transliterated into Chinese as A-ssu-fo-ku-sha, and translated into Chinese and Tibetan as Ma-ming and Rta-dbyans respectively, is the earliest known poet and dramatist of the ornate Sanskrit literature. He has been identified wrongly with Matricheta, Kumaralata and Aryashura whose works have also been ascribed to him. He has also been confused with one Ashvaghosharaja of the time of Kanishka.

On palaeographic grounds he can be placed safely round about 100 A.D. which agrees with the accepted date of the Kushana King Kanishka (78-150 A.D.).

However, Ashvaghosha is introduced in the colophons to his authentic kavyas (literary works) as Suvarnakshiputra (a metronymic meaning a son of Suvarnakshi), Saketaka, (born in and a denizen of Saketa i.e. Ayodhya), arya (noble), bhadanta (venerable), bhikshu (a mendicant), acharya (a teacher), mahavadin (a great controversialist) and mahakavi (a great poet).

Hsuan-Tsang (7th century) refers to him as a Pusa (Bodhisattva). He professes to have resorted to the charming secular technique of ornate kavyas for popularizing the Buddha's teachings as prevalent in the 1st century. A.D. He must have belonged to some such Hinayana school which was gradually melting into the Mahayana, the Mahasanghika school. His doctrinal standing on the frontier of the Hinayana ethics and the Mahayana Buddhabhakti (devotion to the Buddha) and spirit of altruism gives him a remarkable position, and his great scholarship, gift for poetry and sense of piety make him very famous in both the Hinayana and the Mahayana schools of Buddhism.

Ashvaghosha has to his credit four kavyas of which the first two are mahakavyas (ornate epics), viz., i) the Buddhacharita and ii) the Saundarananda, and the remaining two are dramas, viz., iii) the Shariputraprakarana and iv) the Rashtrapalanataka.

Of these four kavyas the Buddhacharita treats of the whole biography of the Buddha beginning with his birth and ending in his death and the division of his relics. The story is depicted on a gigantic canvas of 28 cantos to touch upon briefly all possible aspects of the life of the Buddha. This racy account concentrates chiefly on the more or less matter-of-fact narration in the true epic style and there is not enough scope for the leisurely elaboration of the individual facets and the display of the secular elements.

Next comes the Saundarananda which deals with the conversion of the Buddha's half-brother Nanda and thus dilates upon a particular episode of the Buddha's life. The initiation of Nanda has been elaborated in 18 cantos.

Now comes the Shariputraprakarana, or the Sharadvatiputraprakarana, which deals with the initiation of Shariputra and Maudgalyayana. This single episode of the Buddha's biography has been amplified with ample historical imagination and retold under the ornate garb of a typical 'prakarana' (social drama) of 9 Acts. This drama strikes a new note in so far as the Buddha is shown here as initiating two persons outside his prepravrajya (prerenunciation) family. Here too we find plenty of popular elements in the form of a hetaera heroine, a jester and a wily villain and appropriate shringara (amorous) scenes.

This bourgeois drama has been handed down to us in two hitherto known textual traditions noted underneath :–

a) The first textual tradition has been preserved in the extant fragments of a MS. written in the script of the Kushana period unearthed by the third Royal Prussian Turfan Expendition Party at Qyzil near Kuca in Chinese Turkestan. All these fragments originally formed parts of several smooth Talipat palm leaves written in a script which is closely similar to that of the dated North Indian inscriptions of the time of the Northern Kshatrapas and Kushanas. The MS. appears to have been a palimpsest because there are several letter-forms of the early Central Asian Brahmi of the Turfan reviser of the late Kushana era.

This MS. was written originally in India during the reign of Kanishka and Huvishka and imported later on into Central Asia.

This Kushana-era MS. is of singular importance in as much as it is known up till now as the oldest Indian MS.

b) The second textual tradition is represented by the fragments of a Central Asian palm-leaf MS. which was written in Central Asia in the earliest type of Central Asian Brahmi. This MS. appears to have been written originally in the late Kushana era. It is also a palimpsest.

The book is not known to have any Chinese or Tibetan translation.

Lastly, the Rashtrapalanataka depicts the conversion of Rashtrapala of some royal or aristocratic family. The existence of the text of this drama is known to us only from certain direct and indirect references scattered in some Buddhistic, Brahmanistic and Jinistic works.

a) The earliest known reference is found in the Fu fa tsang yin yuan chuan, a Sutra or Record (chuan) on the Nidana or Cause of transmitting the Dharmapitaka of the Chinese Tripitaka. This work is the third Chinese translation in verse done in 472 by Ki-Kia-Ye in collaboration with T'an-yao of the Pe-wei or Northern Wei dynasty (386-534). The author of the Sanskrit original is not known and the Sanskrit text, which is now lost, is said to have been existing when the Cheng-yuan Catalogue (785-804) was compiled.

However, in this Chinese translation there is a detailed account of the role of Ashvaghosha as a musician-preacher in company with an opera party in Hoa-che (Pataliputra), his composition of a melodrama called Lo-tch'a-ho-lo (Rashtrapalanataka) for converting the citizens to Buddhism, and the nirveda (renunciation) theme of the drama. The drama was a great success and its performance caused the renunciation of five hundred Kshatriya princes of Pataliputra. Eventually the king of Pataliputra was afraid that his other subjects might leave their homes and take to religion and therefore banned the enacting of the drama in his kingdom.

b) The second reference to the drama is found in the Vadanyaya, a treatise on the Nigrahasthana of Buddhistic logic, by Dharmakirti who is generally placed in the 6th century. In the text of the Vadanyaya we find a brief citation from the prastavana of the drama (nandyante tatah pravishati sutradharah). Dharmakirti says that after the prasanga or introductory pratijnavachana concerning nairatmya (soullessness) the nairatmyavadin Buddhist vadin should dance, sing, make appropriate action (nrity-agitadi) and recite the whole text of the Rashtrapalanataka in such a clever way that the tirthika (heretic) prativadin is outwitted and defeated.

c) The third reference to the drama is found in the Nyayamanjarigranthibhanga of Chakradhara on Jayantabhatta's Nyayamanjari (900) in the form of the same quotation from the prastavana.

d) The fourth reference to the drama is traceable in the Nyayavinishchayavivarana of Vadirajasuri, a protege of the Western Chalukya king Jayasimha II (1018-42), on Akalankabhatta's Nyayavinishchaya in the form of the selfsame citation from the prastavana.

e) Fifthly, there is also an allusion to the drama in the Pimdanijjutti (Pindaniryukti), which is ascribed to Bhadrabahusvamin. In this Jinistic version we have an altered form of the story. Here the author of the Rashtrapalanataka is Asadabhui (Ashadhabhuti), a disciple of Dharmaruchisuri. This drama deals with the edifying adventures of King Bharata of the Ikshvaku dynasty and the scene is at first laid in Rajagriha during the reign of King Simharatha.

A comparison of this Jinistic version with the Chinese account given above reveals the fact that the name of the drama only is common to both the versions. Otherwise the name of the author and the plot are different in the Buddhistic and Jinistic accounts.

However, the story of Rashtrapala's indomitable urge for renunciation and faith in religion not only made it extremely popular to both the Hinayana and the Mahayana schools of Buddhism but also its universal appeal grew so wide later on as to cross the frontiers of Jinism and the theme was finally adapted in the Jinistic canon.

Moreover, the three extracts from the nigrahasthana section of the Buddhistic, Brahmanistic and Jinistic texts on logic prove beyond doubt that the text of the drama survived at least up to the 6th century when a dramatic recital of the whole text was acknowledged as a highly effective means of defeating an antagonist in debate.

The Rashtrapalanataka is also not known to have any Chinese or Tibetan translation.

Of these four kavyas the Buddhacharita no doubt stands first in importance as the central story to which the Saundarananda, Shariputraprakarana and Rashtrapalanataka form the three detailed supplements. These kavyas appear to have been composed in due succession.

For these four kavyas Ashvaghosha culled appropriate materials from the earlier Tripitaka literature. He has perfectly synthesized historicity with imaginary elements, and shows much restraint in the handling of the supernatural phenomena. His sense of proportion and awareness of the ornate technique account for his logical arrangement of the plot and the dialogues, and explain the avoidance of exaggeration. His handling of the matter is far better and more authentic than that of the authors of the Mahavastu (of the Lokottaravadins) and the Lalitavistara (of the Sarvastivadins), which are marred by insipid repetition, loose elaborations and many marvels. However, the common aim of Ashvaghosha's kavyas is preaching the kernel of the Buddha's technings and through it conversion. His missionary motto is the enlightenment of the commonalty. He has no original philosophy to offer. Nirvana (emancipaton from the metempsychosis), both of the aspiring jiva (individual self) (i.e., attainment of arhattva or pratyekabuddhatva) and of other beings, is the professed goal.

The cream of the nirvanamarga (way to salvation) is said to be an improvement upon the pro-Vedanta Samkhya-Yoga dhyana-process (process of meditation) as we find in the Mahabharata. This psychological process of bodhichittasamutthana (rise of the mind towards enlightenment) aims at eliminating in the pratilomakrama (reverse order) all the non-atman (non-self) alambanas or ayatanas (objects of meditation) and finally the Paramatman or Purushottama (Universal Soul) and even the jnana (knowledge) pertaining thereto.

Ashvaghosha's contribution to Buddhism in the role of a philosopher pales into insignificance besides his legacy to the classical Sanskrit literature as a poet and a dramatist.

He is well versed in the Vedic literature along with the Vedangas, the two great national epics, viz., the Ramayana and the Mahabharata, some Puranas, the philosophical systems like Samkhya-Yoga and Purvamimamsa, Dharmashastra, Arthashastra, Kamashastra, some early classical canons of poetics and dramaturgy, Vaidyaka, different arts like music, architecture, sculpture, etc. This vyutpatti (erudition) and presumably abhyasa (practice) roused his bhavayitri pratibha (assimilative talent), that is, the veritable kavitva-bija (seed of poesy). The harmonious combination of pratibha, vyutpatti and abhyasa constitutes his poetic character.

His vivid depiction of the society about the time of Buddha with the roles of the people like the harlots, hangers-on, villains and hermits of different orders is influenced obviously by the realistic background of his own time.

The Ramayana of Valmiki and the Mahabharata of Badarayana Vyasa have exercised abiding influences on the form, manner and spirit of his kavyas. His characterization, depiction of episodes, description of the charming frailties of nature and the planned presentation of dialogues show the indelible influence of the epics. Many of his ideas and expressions bear the clear stamp of the epic legacy. His narration retains the simplicity and racy verve of the epics. Further, the shantarasa (quietistic sentiment) synthesis of the Mahabharata has exercised an unmistakable influence on his kavyas. He shares this legacy with Kalidasa and both of them within themselves also share common diction, imagery and idea of poetic excellence.

This shantarasa controls the khandarasas (subordinate sentiments) like vira (heroic sentiment), shringara (amorous sentiment), etc., which converge finally in the former. In this way shantarasa synthesis is achieved and the khandarasas subservient to shantarasa are cases of rasavat alamkara (figure of sense).

In consonance with the paryantika (final) shantarasa the guna (literary quality) is madhurya (sweetness) as collocated with prasada (perspicuity).

Vaidarbhi is the riti (literary style) in the Buddhacharita and the Saundarananda.

Bharati is the vritti (dramatic style) in the Shariputraprakarana.

In other words, Ashvaghosha's language is on the whole sonorous and simple and direct in its appeal to the common populace though there are some pedantic and enigmatic verses in his kavyas.

Ashvaghosha's Buddhacharita and Saundarananda have every claim to be termed mahakavyas (ornate epics) in the light of the technicalities known to us from the post-Ashvaghoshan texts on Sanskrit poetics.

His Shariputraprakarana also corresponds properly with the rules of dramaturgy relating to a prakarana. This drama is important to the historian of classical drama and dramaturgy as the earliest known decisive document of a prakarana.

His genius as a scholarly kavi (poet and dramatist) is applauded highly by the Buddhists, both Hinayanic and Mahayanic, of India and Greater India. The warm encomia by Hsuan-Tsang, Hwui-Li and I-tsing attest to the popularity of Ashvaghosha. The Buddhacharita is said to have been widely read in the Malay Archipelago (Sumatra, Java and the neighbouring islands).

Ashvaghosha's nirvanakavyas (literary works preaching emancipation) as compared with those of the similar missionary kavis like Matricheta, Kumaralata, Aryashura are more appealing as works of art. Judged by the literary standard Ashvaghosha must be hailed as the best among his brethren.

But Ashvagosha cannot be said to represent the perfect standard of the ornate technique in the classical Sanskrit literature. With his pristine spontaneity and simplicity he belongs to an early and premature stage of this literature while Kalidasa claims the highest and mature stage. Thus the first place in the hierarchy of the ornate Sanskrit kavis must be assigned to Kalidasa, the national poet of India, while the second place must be apportioned to Ashvaghosha.

Some apocryphal works in Sanskrit as well as in Chinese and Tibetan translations have been ascribed wrongly to Ashvaghosha.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF BENGAL (Bengali) is a research institution founded with the avowed aim of cultivation, promotion and spread of oriental studies and knowledge in the country. Yet judging by a wider perspective and considering its great overall impact on the cultural life of Bengal, no account of the literary history of Bengal, undivided and divided, can be complete without a reference to this premier culture spot of the city of Calcutta. This learned body is not only the pride of Calcutta but also of the entire East. It was established on 15th January, 1784.

The founder of Asiatic Society was Sir William Jones, who was a profound scholar of Sanskrit, Arabic, Persian and other oriental languages. He came to Calcutta in October, 1783 as a Judge of the Supreme Court of Calcutta. In collaboration with thirty European scholars, he founded this body where they met to discuss matters relating to history, archaeology, arts, literature and different branches of science, etc. First housed in Western annexe of the Calcutta High Court, the Society later (1808) was shifted to the junction of Park Street and Chowringhee Road and accommodated in a plot of land gifted by the Government. Since then it has been there (1, Park Street) with periodic extensions and renovations,now thoroughly rebuilt in a new mansion.

In course of time the Society became the focal point of cultivation of various branches of arts and sciences of the East. The Serampore missionaries under the stewardship of William Carey and John Mack also joined the society and contributed to its activities especially in the field of science. Mackay was the first compiler of a book of Chemistry (1834) published under its banner. The European physicians of the then Calcutta (1823) banded themselves together into a body named Calcutta Medical and Physical Society and merged it with the Asiatic Society. For long 30 years they were here, carrying on researches in different branches of Medical Science.

For more than 50 years (1788-1833) the Society continued to bring out a serial publication entitled Asiatic Researches and with 20 volumes threw light on various branches of Indology like Indian archaeology, mythology, ethnology, numismatics, iconography, astronomy, history, agriculture, etc. The principal contributors to these compilations were: Jones, Charles Wilkins, Nathaniel, Brassis, Halhead, H.T. Colebrook, J.H. Harrington, William Carey, Rajendralal Mitra, James Princep and others. The last named scholar of Indology, who had deciphered Asoka's inscriptions, brought out from 1832 onwards a journal–Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal–which after the cessation of the publication of Asiatic Researches in 1939 was regarded as the official organ of the society.

The continued accumulation of archaeological, iconographic and other kinds of finds under the aegis of the Society became so huge in course of time that it became well-nigh impossible to store them under the same roof as that of the Society. This necessitated their transfer from the parent building to some other suitable site nearby, thereby giving birth to what at a later date came to be known as Indian Museum (1875). The history of the Asiatic Society and the Indian Museum are thus closely connected with each other, the former practically supplying the base for the latter. The Danish botanist Nathaniel Wallis had a great hand in giving concrete shape to the idea of the Museum. It may be noted in passing that the Indian Science Congress also had something to do with the Society in its initial stages.

Side by side with collection of articles of antiquarian interest, collection of old manuscripts in various languages such as Sanskrit, Arabic, Persian, Hindusthani, Nepalese, Tibetan, Chinese, Burmese, etc., also began to grow in size as days passed. The entire collection of Arabic-Persian manuscripts in the library of Tipu Sultan after his fall in 1804 was made over to the Society as a gift from the Fort William College where these had been first stocked after their transfer from Srirangapattam. With the winding up of the College in 1854 its entire collection of books was also handed over to the society. Most of the Manuscripts referred to above were printed subsequently in a serial publication called Bibliotheka Indica under the editorship of an able body of Indologists, both European and Indian.

With the passage of time Indian scholars began to evince greater interest in the affairs of the Society and more and more of them came to be associated with its functioning. The pioneer in this field had of course been Rajendralal Mitra who was followed in his wake at different points of time by such names as Mahamahopadhyaya Haraprasad Shastri, Rakhaldas Banerjee, Rameshchandra Majumdar, Sunitikumar Chatterjee, Dineshchandra Sarkar, Haritkrishna Dev, Sukumar Sen, Niharranjan Ray, Sisirkumar Mitra, Mahadevprasad Saha and others. The present President is Rudrendrakumar Pal and the General Secretary Chandan Roy Chowdhury.

ASIRIYARGAL PANNIRUTIRUMURAI (Tamil). These are twelve books of Saiva hymns which are very popular and held in high regard by the devotees of Siva. The hymns composed by different minstrel poets at different times (spread over five to six centuries, at the least) were organised later into twelve canonical books. Though on the basis of their contents, they have been collected together as a group, their quality as poetry is very varied. The high poetic excellence of Sambandar's poetry is no where matched in the entire collection and the verses in some of the later books viewed as poetry do not rank high; in fact they may not have been preserved and remembered over the centuries had they not been hymns of regligious value.

The first three books contain what remains of Jnanasambandar's poetry. The verses abound in beautiful descriptions of nature; they are passages of high poetic value where god is delineated as the lover and the poet as the love-lorn lady pining for union with him. Though Sambandhar sings in different moods, religious tradition regards him as pre-eminently a singer of the filial relationship with God. A number of miracles are attributed to Sambandhar and his hymns are said to have played a vital role in them.

Tirunavukkarasar, known as Appar was the author of the hymns collected as books four to six. Appar lived up to a ripe old age; his deep humility urged him to sing of Siva as the master under whom he was most happy to serve as a serf. His hymns are among the most emotional and soul-stirring in all hymnal literature. He is said to have suffered much torture at the hands of the king for his religious beliefs and he is reputed to have obtained relief by miraculous means through his poems.

The seventh book contains the hymns composed by Sundarar. He commands a felicity of diction and a mastery of different metres which raise the poetic value of his hymns from the level reached by common liturgical literature. He preferred the approach of a loving but critical friend when singing of God and many are the poems where he lampoons Him for His (to him) many mistakes and failures. Sundarar's hymns are the most interesting to read because of the liberties he could take with the Lord and the sharp tang of his poetic diction.

The Tiruvachakam and the Tirukovaiyar of Manikkavachakar have been collected into the eighth book among the twelve. Manikkavachakar's mood is one of repentance and his lamentation can be called his mode of worship. Tirukkovaiyar is cast in the erotic mood, the poet singing of God as the lover. Saiva tradition regards him as a student who regards God as the preceptor.

The hymns of nine devotees among whom was a Chola king constitute the material of the ninth book. While in their depth of devotion these minstrels were second to none, the quality of their composition did not reach any considerable heights and one discerns a big fall in poetic standard after the eighth book.

Tirumoolar's Tirumandiram constitutes the tenth book of the Saiva canon. Tirumoolar is regarded as a very old poet who lived earlier than Sambandar and is said to have entered the body of a dead cowherd, performed penance and composed 3000 verses at the rate of one a year. In content they rank very high in Saiva tradition; they constituted the basic ground work of the philosophy of Saiva Siddhanta.

The hymns of 12 devotees were collected into a book which ranks as the eleventh; those of Karaikkal Ammaiyar are easily the outstanding ones in this collection. Sekkizhar's accounts of Saiva devotees collectively called the 'Periapuranam' constitute the twelfth book. They appear to be the result of assiduous research and the accounts are clothed in good poetry composed at the height of devotional fervour.

ASIYO BANKIDAS (Rajasthani; b. 1781, d. 1833) was born at village Bhandiyawasa in the erstwhile state of Jodhpur. He had his earlier education from his father, Fatehsinghji. Thereafter, he got his higher education from various teachers at Jodhpur, with the kind help from Arjunsinghji Udawata, the 'Thakur' of Raipur (Jodhpur). He was well versed in Sanskrit, Persian, Braja and Rajasthani languages, and was an eminent scholar of history. He acted as teacher of poetry, adviser, courtier and state poet to Maharaja Mansinghji of Jodhpur. Maharana Bhimsinghji of Udaipur also had high regards for him. He was a man of self-respect and of frank and fearless speech. He is counted among the most prominent 'Charana' poets of the first half of the nineteenth century. Most of his writings have been published by the Nagari Pracharini Sabha of Kashi (Varanasi) in three parts of the volume known as Bankidasgranthavali. All his available works are given here, together with the mention of the subject matter and total number of verses in each of them: Sur Chattisi (38 verses)–Merits and specialities of a brave warrior; Sinha Chattisi (38 verses)–Nature, merits and characteristics of a person of the lion class; Vir Vinod (75 verses)–Tendencies, merits and specialities of a brave person; Dhawala Pachchisi (34 verses)–Merits, characteristics, nature and deeds of a brave man in comparison with the strong and sturdy bullock that draws a carraige; Datara Bawani (53 verses)–Appreciation of a generous person and the virtues and fruits of munificence; Niti Manjari (39 verses)–Enemies and policy relating to them; Supaha Chattisi (39 verses)–Deeds of persons doing good to others, and their praises; Vaisakha Varta (59 verses)–Prostitutes and the persons visiting them, the harms that follow; Mawadiya Mijaja (88 verses)–Effeminate men; Kripana Darpana (45 verses)–A miserly fellow; Chugala Mukha Chapetika (52 verses)–A backbiter and evil person; Vaisha Varta (77 verses)–Censure of the business class; Moha Mardana (39 verses)–Futility and perishability of the world to ward off all illusions of the human being; Kukavi Battisi (39 verses)–Description of evil-doers; Vidura Battisi (36 verses)–Description of sons born of slave girls and cross breeds; Bhurajala Bhusana (70 verses)–Chittorgarha and warriors fighting in its defence; Gangalahari (44 verses)–Prayer of the Ganges; Jekhala su Jasa Jadava (74 verses)–Eulogy of Jesala Bharani of Kucch-Bhuj; Kayar Bawani (54 verses)–Coward, hypocrite and a flatterer; Jhamala Radhika Nakha Sikh (27 verses)–Description of Radhika's beauty from head to foot; Sujasa Chattisi (38 verses)–Admiration of famous heroes and generous persons, and condemnation of misers and non–liberals; Santosha Bawani (55 verses)–Importance of contentment and censure of greediness; Sidharava Chattisi (39 verses)–Eulogy of Siddharaja Jaisinha of Gujarat; Vachanaviveka Pachchisi (28 verses)–Admiration of wise speech and censure of the irrational one; Kripana Pachchisi (29 verses)–Censure of the miser; Hamarata Chattisi–Admiration of Umarakota and description of the beauty and embellishments of the ladies of the place; Thalawata-Battisi (32 verses)–Satirical verses of the tract known as Thala or Thali in Marwara; Thakura Rupasinha Raipurri Jhamala–Seige and battle of Raipur by Amir Khan; Anyokti Panchasika (58 verses). His miscellaneous writings are: Dingala Gita concerning historical personages, such as, Pabuji Rathauda, Maharaja Mansinha of Jodhpur, Gopal Medatiya, Rava Suratana of Sirohi, Hada Chatrasal of Bundi, Maharana Bhimsinha of Udaipur and others; devotional and didactic poems and preachings; miscellaneous 'Kavittas', 'Sawaiyas' etc. related to aesthetic pleasure (Rasa), figures of speech, prosody, etc.; 'Khyala' (Published under the title of Bankidas ri Khyat)–which is a collection of historical notes, written in prose, on different topics. In addition to these, the following works are also attributed to him, which have so far been not available: Krishna Chandra Chandrika, Virah Chandrika, Chamatkar Chandrika, Manayasomandana, Chandradusan Darpan. Vaisakha Varta Sangraha, Sri Darbar ri Kavita (Sri Darbar ra Kavitta), works on aesthetic pleasure and figures of speech, Vritta Ratnakar Bhasa or Vyakhya (Commentary), Mahabharata Chandonuwada, collection of Gitas or metres, and Antaralapika. This clearly shows that Bankidas tried his pen on a variety of topics. Mainly, these are of history, devotion and warnings. The poet had tried to warn and encourage everybody by describing the virtues and traits of a brave man, and to bring out an improvement in the society by presenting a satirical portrayal. This system of praising the virtues of the brave was later on adopted by Suryamall in his Vir Satsai, though in a different way. Bankidas reminds one of the old values, as he raised the voice of warning against the then political conditions of the state. His Dingal Git opening with the line 'Ayo Ingareja-Mulaka rai Upara' is the best poem on the subject. His works provide a background of modern literature. He has mostly used 'Duha', 'Soratha' and 'Git' metres. His writings in the 'Braj' are in 'Sawaiya' and 'Kavitta' metres. His prose work–'Khyata'–is very important for the history of Rajasthan. It forms an integral part of the three famous 'Khyatas' of the language–Nainasi ri khyat, Bankidas ri khyat and Dayaldasa ri khyata.

ASIYO MODAJI (MODAHANA) (Rajasthani) was born at a village Bhandiya in the renowned family of Asiya Charana better known by the names of Asiyo Bankidas and his brother Budhaji (Budhadana), court poets of Maharaja Mansinha. Modaji was the son of Budhaji and a high class poet in Dingal. He had no son and so he took a vow that if and when he got a son with the grace of Pabuji, he would compose a narrative poem for the deity (Pabuji) and would also name his son after him. It is said that he got three sons instead of one and the eldest one was named Pabudana. In fulfilment of his vow he also composed Pabu Prakas Bada which contains over 3000 verses in different metres—Duha, Saraji, Kavitta, etc. on the life of Pabuji. The work was first published in early 20th century and reprinted, duly edited, in 1983 from Jodhpur. His other works are Jekhala Sujasa Jadava, Takhata Vinoda (in the name of Maharaja Takhat Sinha), Chanda Rupa Dipmala, Granthasanjna Prakriyartha, Jhamala Mama Govind Giri, Devanathaji ri Vata, Vaira Sujasa Vinod, Pratap Pachchisi and Grantha Visarga Sandhi. He got his education from his father and, perhaps, from other masters of subjects, as may be presumed from his works on grammar, prosody, etc. He is considered to be an eminent poet of his time (first half of the 19th century).

ASOPA, RAMAKARNA (Rajasthani; b. 1857, d. 1943) was born at village Badalu in the Medata region (Jodhpur). He got his education at different places from various teachers. The complete range of the subjects of his study included 'grammar', 'poetry', 'astrology', 'astronomy', 'ayurveda', various scripts, 'Vedas', and 'philosophy' including vedantanyaya-sankhya, scriptures, the 'puranas', etc. This course was completed in stages by 1883. Thereafter, he developed the various faculties by his own attempts. He served the then Jodhpur State government in various posts, but for most of the period he was entrusted with the state historical records. He helped Haraprasad Sastri (1910) and L.P. Tessitori (1914) in their search for bardic manuscripts in Jodhpur. The Calcutta University engaged him as a lecturer on Rajput history (1920–21). He did not find it convenient to continue in the post and returned to Jodhpur to devote himself to the cause of language, literature and history of the state. He possessed an equal command on Sanskrit, Hindi and Rajasthani languages and successfully composed works in all of them. He also edited a monthly magazine namely Bharat Martand which contained Rajasthani articles and poems along with other topics of history and literature in Hindi and Sanskrit. His contribution in the field of history, however, was unique. He was one of those few eminent scholars who could decipher and edit ancient texts of stone slab inscriptions found in the country (Letter of Sir John Marshall to Jerskin, Resident of Jodhpur–Itihasavid Ramakarna Asopa, Parampara, Vol. 49–50, Jodhpur, 1979). He was honoured by the title of Mahamahopadhyaya, posthumously awarded by the Government of India. His special contribution to the cause of Rajasthani literature may be enlisted as follows–Marawadi Vyakarana (1896–99), Rajasthani translation of Srimad Bhagavata (1900), editing of Suraja Prakasha by Karanidana, Pt. I (1924), editing of Rajarupaka by Virabhana (1941), collection of eighty thousand words (out of which sixty thousand carry derivations and meanings in English and Hindi) with a view to publishing dictionaries; three course books for elementary students of Rajasthani, and Geography of Marwada in Rajasthani. He is also said to have helped in the editing of the volumes of Vansa-Bhaskara by Suryamalla (edited by Krishnasimha Barahatha, and printed by Asopa at his own press. He was one of the giants in the fields of langauge, literature and history which Rajasthan produced during the 19th and early 20th centuries.

ASSOCIATIONS AND INSTITUTIONS (Marathi). Many small and big literary institutions situated in Maharashtra and outside are working for the furtherance of Marathi language and literature. They have common programmes like arranging discussions, seminars and annual conferences, running libraries, publishing literary works and literary journals, etc. Today the number of these institutions exceeds hundred.

On the eve of the nineteenth century, Justice M.G. Ranade and Gopalhari Deshmukh alias 'Lokhitwadi', the personalities conscious about the social uplift of the natives, paved the way for the rallies of authors. In the beginning these rallies were rather irregular. But in the 4th rally at Pune in 1906 the Maharashtra Sahitya Parishad the first representative literary body was established on a sound footing. Thereafter the Parishad arranged for the regular annual literary conferences every year. The annual conference held at Akola in 1912 gave constitutional status to the working of the Parishad. The Parishad has so far arranged 45 annual conferences. The Parishad runs a Marathi quarterly, Maharashtra Sahitya Patrika, dedicated to the cause of research and criticism in Marathi Literature for over last sixty years. Besides this, there are many other activities to the credit of the Parishad. It runs a reference library. It also conducts various qualifying examinations in Marathi language and literature. It also conducts preparatory classes in Marathi language for non-Marathi speaking citizens in Pune. The Parishad has undertaken an important project of publishing History of Marathi Literature in 7 volumes. So far volume numbers 1 to 5 have been published. Besides this the Parishad has to its credit some important prestigious publications. The Maharashtra Sahitya Parishad is an active and foremost literary organisation with its multifarious activities like lectures by eminent authors and critics, discussions and seminars on topics of current literary events, award of prizes to literary works, extension work by establishing branches in the interior parts of Maharashtra.

With the spread of education and literary taste various new institutions came into existence in the other parts of Maharashtra. These institutions are doing their work on the lines of the Parishad in their respective regions. Today there are three prominent literary institutions in Maharashtra and they are: (1) Vidarbha Sahitya Sangh, Nagpur (estd. 1923), Marathwada Sahitya Parishad, Aurangabad (estd. 1937) and (3) Mumbai Marathi Sahitya Sangh, Bombay (estd. 1935). These institutions arrange literary conferences in their regions. Various Marathi literary institutions came into existence at places outside Maharashtra viz. Madhya Pradesh Marathi Sahitya Parishad (Jabalpur), Andhra Pradesh Marathi Sahitya Parishad (Hyderabad), Marathi Sahitya Parishad (Karnataka), Gomantak Sahitya Seva Mandal (Panjim-Goa).

All these literary institutions have come together and have formed a central confederation under the name Marathi Sahitya Mahamandal. For the last ten years the annual literary conferences are conducted by the Mahamandal. The main achievement of the Mahamandal is preparation of a standard orthography for Marathi.

Literary institutions and libraries often go together. In Maharashtra, Mumbai Marathi Granth Sangrahalaya, Bombay, Marathi Granth Sangrahalaya, Thane, Nagar Vachan Mandir, Pune, Sarvajanik Vachanalaya, Nasik, Apte Vachanalaya, Ichalkaranji, Karwiranagar Vachan Mandir, Kolhapur, Rajaram Sitaram Vachanalaya, Nagpur, etc. are engaged in various literary activities. Besides this, institutions like Maharashtra Sahitya Sabha, Indore, Sharadopasak Mandal, Gwalior, Marathi Vangamaya Parishad, Baroda, Vangamaya Charcha Mandal, Belgaum are also noteworthy in literary activities.

In Maharashtra there are four Government level institutions working for the advancement of Marathi literature and culture. They are (1) Directorate of Languages, Bombay (2) State Board for Literature and Culture, Bombay (3) Vishvakosh Mandal, Vai (4) Folklore Committee, Poona.

Institutions like Marathi Sanshodhan Mandal, Bombay, Vidarbha Sanshodhan Mandal, Nagpur, Ekanath Sanshodhan Mandir, Paithan, Rajwade Sanshodhan Mandal, Dhule and N.R. Phatak Sanshodhan Kendra, Bombay provide facilities for research activities in medieval as well as modern Marathi literature. They do publish their research work for the use of the scholars.

Marathi Natya Parishad, Bombay works for the uplift of Marathi drama and stage.

There are a few institutions which are complementary to literary activities, e.g. Bharat Itihas Sanshodhak Mandal, Pune, Bhandarkar Institute, Pune, Bharat Natya Sanshodhan Mandal, Pune, Satkaryottejak Sabha, Dhule, Tilak Maharashtra Vidyapeeth, Pune, Prajnya Pathshala, Vai. etc.

ASURAVITTU (Malayalam) is a novel by M.T. Vasudevan Nair. In his first novel Nalukettu, Nair reposes his faith in a resurgent India. In Kalam he shows a man corrupted by society and never regains his paradise. Asuravittu produced in between the above two, is perhaps more truly representative of the Indian situation than either. Its hero is Govindankutty, a victim of his circumstance, but he has in him the vigour to rise out of his own ashes like a phoenix.

Govindankutty belongs to an ancient family in Kudallur village. The family is now in utter ruin. Govindankutty has his widowed mother and unmarried sister to support. His elder sister is married to Sekharan Nair, a flourishing businessman. His elder brother is married. Neither the elder brother nor the elder sister gives any help whatsoever to the mother. As a scion of an ancient family Govindankutty shuns manual labour. He idles away his time. In the meantime the mother, the sister and he himself sink into misery. Govindankutty loves Rajamma, but the rich girl is beyond his reach. The future seems to brighten for Govindankutty when the beautiful Meenakshi, a distant relative, is offered to him in marriage by Sekharan Nair. Sekharan Nair gives him a job also. Not long afterwards Govindankutty realises that his wife bears in her womb the child of Kochappan, the son of Sekharan Nair. Govindankutty grows furious, deserts Meenakshi and beats Kochappan to pulp. Sekharan Nair retaliates; his men chase Govindankutty who would have been destroyed by them but for the timely intervention of the humane and generous Kunjarekkar.

Govindankutty embraces Islam to spite the Hindus who persecuted him. Very soon he realizes that his Muslim friends are no better than his Hindu relatives. Now the Hindus and Muslims join hands to ostracise Govindankutty. Thereupon Gonvindankutty runs away from his village, crosses the river and reaches the hut of a Harijan. There Govindankutty experiences a brief spell of peace. He smokes, drinks, and identifies himself with the Chandala. In the meantime his mother and sister suffer untold misery.

As it happens cholera infests the Kudallur village. Men and women, old and young, die every day. Their corpses lie unburied, as the rich and practical-minded leave the village to its fate. At this time Govindankutty goes back to the village to bury the dead. The living people had driven him out, but the dead need him. As the pestilence subsides those who had deserted the village come back. They cannot deny the service Govindankutty rendered to the village. Meenakshi has given birth to a baby; she dies. Govindankutty buries her dead body and takes the baby. As the villagers who had earlier driven him out of the village approach Govindankutty to express their gratitude and appreciation, Govindankutty prepares to leave the village with the baby. He says that he goes away for the present, but he will return some day. He will bring up the baby in his own way, certainly not as a member of any communal denomination but as a man. The new baby symbolises the birth of the new citizen of secular India freed from communalism.

The novel raises many questions of importance, economic, ethical, social and even political. The novel shows that many feudal families became poor because of sheer mismanagement and laziness on the part of their masters. The hard-working capitalist, symbolised by Sekharan Nair, exploits the society. Poor women suffer, helpless girls are exploited by unscrupulous people. No community as such is better than another. The authenticity of individuals may be tested only in times of crisis. That Govindankutty undergoes a transformation for the better augurs well for India. Asuravittu extols humanism and secularism even as it gives us a poignant portrayal of the suffering villagers of India. All is not lost, the best of human virtues can still be preserved for the regeneration of India.

ASWATHI THIRUNAL (Malayalam; b. 1756, d. 1794). A talented member of the Travancore royal family, Aswathi Thirunal is said to have accidentally composed, while quite young, a few lines by way of completing a song in the Narakaasuravadham Kathakali then being written by his elder brother Kartika Thirunal Maharaja, already well known as a Kathakali writer. The Maharaja was so impressed with the lines that he got it completed by the budding poet instead of completing it himself. Aswathi Thirunal's other Kathakali works are Poundrakavadham, Ambarishacharitham, Rukminiswayamvaram and Poothanamoksham, most of which are popular even today. Vanchisastavam, Karthavirya Vijayam and Santanagopalam, all 'prabandhas', Rukminiparinayam, a drama, and Dasavatara, a bhana are his Sanskrit works.

ASWATTHA (Kannada). Kuduvalli Aswatthanarayana Rao who writes under the pseudonym 'Aswattha' is an engineer by training but a writer by choice. Educated at Tirthahalli and Bangalore, Rao, after securing his degree in civil engineering, served for a while in the Public Works Department of the State and then in the Military Engineering Service at Simla from where he resigned during the Quit India Movement. After a stint with the Hindustan Construction Company of Bombay he finally landed at the Benaras Hindu University as a lecturer and rose to be Reader in the department. In 1963 he sought voluntary retirement to be able to devote himself entirely to writing.

Aswattha is primarily a short story writer. His nearly two hundred stories have appeared in several collections as well as in a single volume. Doorada Kashiyalli, Abhinaya Jagattu, Sosegondu Udugore, Deopavalige, Agnisakshi and Kalyanamestu are some of his collections. He has written a few novels of which the latest and the most voluminous is Nanjundayana. Muniyana Madari, Ranganayaki and Maryade Mahalu are among his more popular novels. Magu, Huchcha, Nirmala and Bahumana are some of the plays he has written. A long poem, Mahayuddha, has also flowed from his pen.

His stories and novels are drawn from his wide experience of men and matters. He belongs to no school and holds no brief for any ideology. What matters to him is the experience of life and the innumerable ways in which men and women in their peculiar situations act and react. Though his novels and stories are carefully constructed, they move naturally and succeed in giving an impression of life as it is lived with all its compulsions and complexities. Aswattha was honoured by the State Sahitya Academy with its Annual Award for 1982.

V.M.I.

ASWATTHAMAN (Kannada), a tragedy on the Greek model by B.M. Srikantia, was first published in 1929. Srikantia, who had been impressed by the beauty and power of the Greek dramatic tradition from his student days was convinced that Indian dramaturgy had, by prohibiting the tragic, deprived the Indian reader and spectator of an elevating dramatic experience. And so, adapting Sophocles' Ajax, he wrote his play, which remains the first and the only example in Kannada of a tragic play in the Greek manner.

In Sophocles' play, Ajax, under the spell cast by Pallas Athene, kills innocent animals believing that he was taking revenge on those he thought had slighted him in giving dead Achilles' armour to Odysseus and on realising what he had done, kills himself in remorse. Similarly in the Kannada adaptation, Aswatthaman, in order to avenge the wrong done by Bhima to his master Duryodhana in the mace-fight sets out to destroy the Pandavas under the cover of darkness but under the spell cast by Rudra kills innocent animals and, like Ajax, commits suicide for his self-degrading act. In both the plays the wrangle over funeral rites for the dead heroes is amicably settled by the intervention of Odysseus in one and Krishna in the other and their honour is redeemed.

The parallel between the Greek and the Mahabharata situations, though achieved at the expense of some fundamental modifications in the latter, which for a while deeply irked orthodox opinion, however, helped the author to fashion a tragic play truly Greek in form and spirit with all the elements like the chorus, a heightened emotional level, quick-moving ironical development of the dramatic action leading to the hero's doom and the sense of the overwhelming mastery of fate. All these make a perfect tragedy in the Greek manner. Though Aswatthaman closely follows the original in action and movement and even in dialogue, yet by the simple transposition of the story into the Indian context by discovering and devising a parallel, the play instantly becomes Indian and creates the impression of being rather an original work than an adaptation so much so that no one, unless told, would be reminded of the Greek original.

In two respects, however, the Kannada play improves upon the original. Aswatthaman, as the play portrays him, strikes the reader as a nobler tragic hero than Ajax for the simple reason that his motivation was loyalty to his master as against hurt pride which prompted Ajax. The post-suicide portions of the play concerning funeral rites due to the dead achieve in the original nothing more than rehabilitating the reputation of the hero whereas in Aswatthaman, the same portion achieves, in addition, a deeper significance in so far as Krishna's intervention brings out the message of the rarer virtue of forgiveness as the way to end all strife and war.

In diction and style the play employs the older Kannada idiom. This helps in creating an old world atmosphere and sustaining the exalted level on which the action moves from beginning to end. The choric interludes, while deepening the emotional impact of the developing action, represent poetic achievements of a very high order. The metrical variations used to convey a variety of emotions reveal a mastery of poetical form for which Srikantia was well-known. For these reasons and the sheer beauty which the author has poured into the alchemy of the hero's character, Aswatthaman remains a unique achievement in the field of Kannada poetic drama. It is an entirely new creation fashioned out of old material and thus the new creation derives strength from a double source.

ATARTHI, PREMANKUR (Bengali; b. 1890, d. 1964) was a novelist and short story writer, belonging to the Bharati group of writers. Premankur had a very chequered career. During his truant days from home in his boyhood (his father was the well known Brahmo leader Maheshchandra Atarthi) he saw life from a very close range, living under various circumstances and under various roofs. The wide experience that he gathered thus formed the staple of almost all his novels and short story collections of which the more well known are: Bajikar (The Juggler, 1922) Achalpather Jatri (The Traveller along the Barren Path, 1923) Chashir Meye (The Farmer's Daughter 1924), Dui Ratri (Two Nights, 1927), etc. The most remarkable, however, is his Mahasthavir Jatak (The Recollections of an Old Infirm Savant, 1944) in three volumes in which he narrates his varied experiences of the world in a reminiscent, intimate style. He was also connected with cinema for a time and directed several films in Lahore and Calcutta.

ATHARVAVEDA (Sanskrit), the last of the four Vedas, the other three being Rik, Yajush and Sama, which are mainly concerned with the heiretic (shrauta) sacrifices, is predominantly the Veda of domestic (grihya) ceremonies and practices. This characteristic feature bestows upon it the distinction of being a unique record of the popular beliefs and day-to-day domestic and social life of the Vedic people. Atharvaveda is the short form of Atharvangirasah, which is its oldest name. This name implies the traditionally two-fold division of the contents of Atharvaveda, viz., Atharvan, referring to the incantations of the Atharvan priests, employed for peaceful purposes like curing diseases, praying for prosperity, etc., which are termed as shanta (pious) or paushtika (auspicious) and Angiras i.e. the curses and exorcisms of the Angiras-priests, denoting hostile magic (abhichara or yatu) designated as Ghora (terrible). Bhrigu is sometimes substituted for Atharvan and thus the name Bhrigvangirasah for Atharvaveda. Later on, it was claimed as the Atharvaveda of the Brahman-priest and hence it was designated as Brahmaveda.

Though tradition, embodied in the Charanavyuha and later works, mentions nine schools or recensions (shakha) of the Atharvaveda, only two recensions of its Samhita (collections of Hymns) are extant, viz., the Shaunaka (AVS) and the Paippalada (AVP). The AVS is found in numerous manuscripts and also has a commentary on it ascribed to Sayana. It has been edited critically. The AVP was first discovered from Kashmir in a single inaccurate birch-bark manuscript in 1875 and lately a palm-leaf ms. of the same, incomplete but accurate has come to light from Orissa. The AVS and AVP vary considerably in the arrangement of hymns and in the text of common material. Contents of one whole book XX of AVS are not found in AVP and many hymns of AVP are missing in AVS. Both the recensions, however, contain 20 books (Kanda), subdivided into hymns (sukta) and stanzas (mantra). The books are also mechanically divided into sections (anuvak) of equal number of stanzas.

The AVS in its 20 books (kanda) has in all 731 hymns containing 5977 stanzas (including prose-pieces). Almost all the hymns in book 20 are taken from the Rigveda. Besides, there are numerous verses from the Rigveda scattered in the other books, so much so that one-seventh of the AVS is borrowed from the Rigveda. These borrowings, are mostly from books I, VIII and X of Rigveda which are its latest parts. Book XIX of the AVS also seems to be a later addition, as it does not conform to the plan of arrangement of the earlier books and also as the 72 hymns contained in it, except a dozen, are all scattered in the various books of the AVP. The remaining eighteen books show a definite plan of arrangement. Books I to VII have short hymns, containing as a rule 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 3 and 1 or 2 verses respectively; books VIII–XIV, XVII and XVIII contain very long hymns, having the shortest of 21 verses at the beginning (VIII. 1) and the longest of 89 verses at the end (XVIII. 4). Books XV and XVI are composed mostly in prose.

The hymns of the Atharvaveda are composed in all those metres which are found in the Rigveda viz. Gayatri, Anushtubh, Pangkti, Trishtubh and Jagati, but great freedom is taken in handling the metres. The language, though mostly archaic, contains some late forms also. Popular usages of language are more common here than in the Rigveda, which predominantly exhibits the priestly idiom. The Gods Agni, Indra, etc., though often alluded to, have lost their characteristic features in the Atharvaveda, and are here implored in a general way as 'demon killers' and 'bestowers of prosperity'. The hymns of the Atharvaveda do not mention the names of the Rishis (seers), which are given in a very late work entitled Brihatsarvanukramani.

The contents of the hymns of the Atharvaveda are varied and embrace all the physical and mental activities and aspects of domestic and social life. Keeping in view the contents and the purpose for which they are employed, the hymns of the Atharvaveda may broadly be classified as following:

1. Hymns for achieving longevity and health (ayushyani) are employed, according to the tradition, codified in the Kaushikasutra, at such ceremonies as tonsure (chudakarana), initiation (upanayana), first shaving of beard (godana) and the like. Book XVII, containing only one hymn of 30 stanzas, and numerous hymns in other books belong to this class. Agni (Fire God) particularly, is prayed to for a life-span of hundred years, for good health and for keeping away hundred and one types of death (mrityumekashatam VIII.2.2.). Many hymns praise gold-amulets (suvarnamani 1.55, XIX.26), collorium (anjana, IV.9, XIX.44, 45) pearl (krishna) and pearl-shell (shankh IV.10), girdle (mekhala VI.133), etc., as bestowing long life.
2. Hymns for achieving prosperity (paushtakani) make up nearly one-fifth (except book 20) of the Atharvaveda and are connected with such multifarious activities as ploughing, sowing, growth of corn, irrigation, breeding of cattle, house-building, trade and travels, in which happiness, prosperity, success and safe conduct are prayed for. This class includes some beautiful rain-hymns (IV.15, VI.22, VII.18). Then there are hymns praying for protection from lightening, accidental fires, field-vermins, wild animals, serpents and robbers. These include a group of seven hymns (IV.23–29) termed as Mrigara hymns of seven verses each, addressed to the seven deities Agni, Indra, Vayu-Savitri, Dyavaprithivi, Marutah, Bhavasharva and Mitravaruna.
3. Hymns for achieving harmony (sammanasyani) in family and social life, aim at establishing unity of heart and mind between husband and wife, parents and sons, brothers and sisters (III.30, etc.), teacher and pupil (III.8), driving away hatred from rivals and enemies (VI.42, 43, etc.) and securing success and influence in debates and assemblies (II.27, VII.12, etc.). VI.43 prescribes an amulet of Darbha-grass for appeasing wrath (manyusamana) and II.27 praises and prays to an amulet of Pata-plant for overcoming rivals in a debate.
4. Hymns to cure diseases (bhaishajyani) present the oldest record of medical science. The hymns refer to diseases, like fever (takman, I.25, V.4, 22, VI.20 etc.), jaundice (harima, I.22), dropsy (jalodara, I.10, VI.24, VII.83, etc.), diarrhoea (asrava, I.22, II.3, VI.44), constipation and retention of urine (I.3), rheumatism or colic (VI.90), pthisis (balasa, VI.14), cough (kasa, VI.105, VIII.107), consumption (yakshma, III.2, IX.8, XIX.36, etc.), paralysis (pakshahata, VI.80), inherited diseases (kshetriya, II.8, 10; III.7), leprosy (kilasa, I.23, 24), abcesses (vidraddha, VI.127, 1; IX.8. 20), sores, tumors and fistula (apachit, VI.25, 57), wounds and fractures (IV.12, V.5, VI.109), bleeding (I.17), serpent-bite (V.13, 16; VI.12, etc.), other types of poisioning (IV.6, 7; VI.100), diseases caused by worms (krimiroga, II.31, 32; V.33), diseases of eye and ear (IV.16, IX.8), and many more. Then there are hymns for the luxuriant growth of hair (VI.21, 136), for promoting virility (shepaharshana, IV.4; VI.72, 101) and also hymns which are charms for driving away disease from every part of the body (II.33, IX.8, XIX.44). Mental afflictions, insanity and even physical ailments are considered as due to the visitations of male and female demons (gandharva and apsarases), goblins (pishacha) and evil spirits (rakshas) and a large number of hymns provide charms, incantations and exorcisms to drive them away. Some plants and trees, which are mostly unidentified like Ajashringi, Jangida-tree, Varana, Kushta, etc., are praised and prayed to cure the affliction (IV.36, 37; VI.25, 95, etc.). The hymns often express the wish that the disease may leave the patient and go to other people or places. The diseases are often described with great clarity and the description is sometimes very poetical and picturesque. Fever (takman) is addressed in V.22 in these words "O Fever, thou, who makest all men yellow, consuming (and) heating them like fire, now may become powerless; then now pass away to downward regions or far away. Thou now cold, now burning hot, hast made us tremble with cough. Terrible art thy darts, O Fever, with them do not injure us. Go Fever to those foreign people with thy brother consumption and with thy sister cough and with thy nephew itch. The fever of the third day, of alternative days, the constant and the autumnal, the cold, the hot, that of summer, that of rainy season do thou destroy".
5. Expiatory hymns (prayashchittani) are spells and formulas for wiping out physical as well as mental sin and guilt, committed consciously or unconsciously. Hymns of this class give a fair picture of the concept of morality and norms of good behaviour amongst the Vedic people. A hymn (VI.26) personifies sin (papman), as a 'thousan-eyed immortal' (sahasrak-shoamartyah), Unpaid debts, particularly gambling debts, are atoned for (VI.117–119). Precedence of a younger brother over the older one, especially in marraige, is looked upon as a sin (VI.112, 113). Even sins committed by one's parents, brothers and sisters require atonement (X.3). The scope of the hymns of this class extends further even to misfortunes (nirriti), lapses in the performance of sacrifice and to omens and portents (X.3, etc.)

6. Hymns pertaining to exorcisms (abhichara) and sorcery (yatu) are directed against demons, evil spirits, sorcerers and enemies. Besides hymns of exorcisms (abhichara) which are offensive witch-craft used against enemies, there are also hymns of retaliatory sorcery (pratyabhicharana), meant to repel the witch-craft undertaken by others, which is personified as Kritya vividly described in X.1 as prepared by the sorcerer with head, nose, ear, etc., and adorned 'like a bride at wedding'. Such a sorcerer may be Shudra, a king, a woman or even a Brahmin (X.1.3) and this Kritya may be directed against one's fields, or men. An amulet is praised as pushing back the Kritya to its source. In the same way curse (shapa) is also personified and repelled (VI.37). These hymns mention numerous popular names of demons not found elsewhere. Agni is prominently invoked to ward off malevolent activities of demons and evil spirits. More numerous are hymns pertaining to curses, incantations and spells against human enemies. Many amulets, herbs, plants and trees are praised and employed in these hymns to impart vigour to the incantation.
7. Hymns related to women's domain (strikarmani) contain love-charms (I.34, II.30, III.25, VI.8, etc.), incantations for ousting rivals in love or co-wives (sapatnibadhana) for making a rival woman un-attractive, luckless and barren (III.18, VII.35, etc.), for depriving men of virility (VI.138, VII.90) and for bringing back a truant woman or man (VI.77), sleeping charms (VI.5), charms for driving out inauspicious characteristics (arati) from a maiden (I.18) for obtaining husband (pativedana, II.36, VI.60, etc.), for securing conception (V.25, VI.81), for the protection of embroyo and the prevention of miscarriage, (VI.17), for securing the birth of a son (pumsayana, III.23, VI.11, etc.), for securing safe delivery (I.11), expiations for a child born under inauspicious constellations (VI.110) and for the irregular appearance of the first pair of teeth (VI.140).
8. Marriage hymns: only two in number, containing 64 and 75 stanzas respectively, make up the fourteenth book. These two hymns have much in common with the Suryasukta (X.85) of the Rigveda and contain many other stanzas from the Rigveda.
9. Funeral hymns: four in number, having in all 283 stanzas, make up the eighteenth book. A large number of stanzas in these hymns coincide with the stanzas in Rigveda 10–12, 14–17, etc. But the original stanzas throw much side-light on funeral practices and mourning.
10. Vratya hymns: 18 in number making up the fifteenth book, glorify the Vratya as Brahman. The Vratyas, originally were hordes (vrata) of roving bandits, not conforming to sacrificial practices, who were later on converted to Brahmanism through some rites called Vratyastoma in the Brahmanas of the Samaveda.
11. Hymns pertaining to royalty (rajakarmani) deal with the election (varana) of a king (III.4), his consecration (abhisheka, IV.8), restoration to power of an exiled king (III.3), superiority over other kings (IV.22, VI.54, etc.), sovereignty (III.5), acquisition of strength (varchas) for the king (III.22, VI.38, etc.), glorification of the king (VI.39) and glorification of the powers of the Purohita (chaplain) of a king (III.19, V.24, etc.). The first four hymns of book 13, glorifying Rohita and Rohini as the heavenly king and queen. Then there are quite a large number of hymns pertaining to battle-charms and for the destruction of enemies (I.20, 21; VI.65–67, etc.), for removing arrow-wounds (I.19) and for the effectiveness of the battle-drum (V.20, 21), armour (VII.118), war-chariot (VI.125, VII.3), army (VI.31, 3, etc.).
12. Hymns related to heiretic ritual, like the two Apri hymns (V.12, 27) belonging to animal-sacrifice and prose formulas on the pattern of the Yajurveda, seem to be late additions to the Atharvaveda. The whole twentieth book, which is decidedly a very late incorporation in the Atharvaveda and has borrowed its whole materials (except some hymns) from the Rigveda, is related to the soma-sacrifice. These portions, foreign to the spirit of the Atharvaveda, are a later attempt to place the Atharvaveda at par with the other three Vedas.
13. Theosophic and cosmogonic hymns are more numerous in the Atharvaveda than in the Rigveda. Many of these hymns in Atharvaveda are borrowed from the Rigveda, of course with variants (Cf. AV.IX.9, 10 RV.I.164; AV.XIX.6 RV.X.90; AV.IV.2 RV.IX.121; AV.IV.30 RV.X.125). The theosophic-cosmogonic content in the Atharvaveda does not seem extraneous to the spirit of the Atharvaveda as it often permeats even the incantations, spells and exorcisms, which are described as emanating from the Supreme Principle. Even sacrificial victims like the goat (aja) in IV.14 and IX.5 is raised to theosopic level. Similarly (rishabha, IX.4), steer (anadvan, IV.11) sterile cow (vasa, X.10) and even cooked rice offered to the priests (brahmaudana, IV.34, 35) and its leavings (uchchishta, IX.7) are identified with the primeval principle. In the purely theosophic-cosmogonic hymns in the Atharvaveda, the Supreme Principle is described as Vena (the Sun, II.1), Virat (Holy speech, VIII.9, 10), Skambha (support, X.7, 8), Prana (life or breath, IX.4) and Kala (time, XIX.53, 54). X.2 poses questions about the origin of the various parts of the body and biological character of man and the universe and puts forth the answer that all this evolved from Brahma. This hymn provides a detailed catalogue of human anatomy. In XI.8 Purusha (the cosmic Man) is poetically described as the product of the marriage of Brahman (supreme soul) with Akuti (intellect). At this marriage Manyu (will) leads Akuti (intellect) from the house of Samkalpa (determination); Tapas (asceticism) and Karman (action) are the wooers (varah) and Brahman the chief wooer (jyestha-varah).

14. Miscelleneous hymns, which do not fall in any of the foregoing classes include hymns that glorify a Brahmacharin (student of scriptures, XI.5), Brahmana (V.17–19, XII.5, etc.), cow (X.9 etc.), Honey-lash (madhukasha) of the Ashvins (IX.1), atmosphere (antariksha, I.32), Earth (prithvi, XII.1) and the like. The last one, of 63 stanzas is a remarkably sublime hymn.

By the very nature of their contents, the hymns of the Atharvaveda are very often monotonously repetitive in their contents. But poetical pieces of great beauty and charm are not lacking. Many of the magic songs are fine examples of lyrical poetry. Hymns addressed to Parjanya (Rain-God), particularly III.30, many battle-charms and war-songs are full of literary merit. Very pleasing indeed are some of the hymns pertaining to family accord. The hymn to Varuna (IV.16) and to Mother Earth (XII.1) are sublime and impressive. Such are also some of the stanzas in the philosophical hymns. Even the curses and exorcisms with their vigorous language possess a charm of their own.

Though the inclusion of a large number of hymns and verses from the Rigveda, the prose formulas of book XV and XVI in the style of the formulas of the Yajurveda, the numerous theosophic-cosmogonic hymns, and the mention of Anga and Magadha are proofs of the lateness of the final redaction of the Atharvaveda, the exorcisms, magic spells and incantations point to its origin even before the oldest hymns of the Rigveda. The name Atharvan corresponds to the ancient Iranian Athrava, which is the name for the 'fire priest' in the Avesta. Similarly, Angiras and Bhrigu, with whom the Atharvaveda is closely connected, are pre-historic fire-priests. Many of the magic formulae of the Atharvaveda have been shown to have wonderful parallels in the remains of the old German magic incantations. Thus the Atharvaveda encompasses a surprisingly long period, starting from the Indo-European and Indo-Iranian times to the latest phase of the Vedic thought verging on the Upanishads and concerns itself from the lowliest shepherd to the highest sovereign.

ATHWARA–SATWARA (Punjabi) was a folk-form, popular in the mediaeval age. Like Baramaha, Pahare etc. both Athwara and Satwara are based on span of time; which plays a significant role in the physical as well psychic or spiritual life. Athwara means eight days and satwara seven days, as such both these genres are based upon and related to different days of a week. Ordinarily this form is of seven stanzas, each devoted to a particular day of the week. Athwara is of eight stanzas the first day generally the Aitwar (Sunday), is repeated again at the end, thus completing the circle.

Many folk beliefs are attached to each day of the week. The seven days are named after seven planets. It is considered that each planet has some good or evil impact, according to its nature, on the life and activities of living beings. For instance under the influence of Sanichhar (Saturday) planet, the person will always be in difficulties. A work or sowing started on Budh (Wednesday) is always fruitful and brings happiness and affluence. Both Satwara and Athwara were based on similar notions in the beginning. Later on this form developed and its main theme became love—generally pangs of love, but the couple are united at the end. The lady in love, writhing in pangs of separation relates her innermost feelings. Bulle Shah, a great Sufi poet wrote an Athwara. In Adi Granth a Satwara, written by Guru Amar Das in Bilawal Raga is available.

ATISH, HAIDER ALI (Urdu; b. 1778, d. 1847) was the pseudonym of Khawaja Haider Ali, who belonged to a Delhi family which had migrated to Lucknow. He lived an independent life without any employment or State patronage.

Atish is deemed to be the main pillar of the Lucknow School of Urdu poetry. Along with Nasikh (1771-1883), he demarcated the main feature of the poetic identity of the period. While Nasikh emphasized the form and diction, correctness of idiom and strict observance of the rules of prosody, Atish though considerably influenced by these criteria, was perhaps the only ghazal writer of Lucknow to retain a little independent approach and concern for the dignity of man and interest in the expression of subjective experience in poetry. For him, it was not mere form or diction but also a meticulous rendering of the subjective experience into carefully selected words.

Unlike most of the Urdu poets of the period, he neither adopted self-pity nor meloncholy as the keynote of his poetry; nor did he opt for sensuousness as its corner stone. Instead he chose dignity in the face of adversity as the mainstay of his sensibility. Though not a mystic, he maintained the uprightness and independence of his character and abhorred worldly riches and glory, and debasement of the human ego. His ghazals ring true of his challenging tone which makes him the most prominent ghazal writer of protest poetry in a feudal age.

Another forte of Atish is the wine poetry tradition (Khamariyyat) which called for the inebreiation with the self with the exclusion of other exterior considerations. The tradition soon became popular and symbolised self-respect and human dignity as expressed in ghazal. Sorrow and pathos, then, appeared not as the compulsion of the circumstances but as consciously adopted social attitude leaning towards stoic revolt against the prevailing unjust order.

The tradition of Atish, thus, became one of the styles of the Lucknow ghazal and combined sense of human dignity in the face of adversity, a challenging posture of social protest and the sense of abondon marked by adherence to wine and abhorrence to the unjust worldly norms. Yet another contribution to the diction of ghazal made by Atish was the new pattern of ghazals containing thematic unity and uniformity of mood (Ghazal-i-Musalsal).

Atish gave a touch of masculanity and a sense of continuity to Urdu ghazal.

ATIT KE CHALCHITRA (Hindi) is a collection of eleven pen-portraits by the famous Hindi poetess Mahadevi Verma. The poetess has chosen her subjects from amongst those who came in her contact and impressed her sensitivity with their characteristic simplicity, honesty, sincerity, faithfulness and chastity and left an indelible impression of their innocence and deep suffering on her mind. She rebels against age-old and outdated customs, traditions, orthodox beliefs and expresses deep sympathy for the down-trodden, the helpless and the oppressed. The victim of the orthodox patriarchal society has mainly been the woman. The majority of these sketches relate to women–a child widow, an innocent motherless girl, a woman deserted for no fault of hers, a young girl victimized by marriage to an old man, a maiden deceived by a young boy who leaves her after impregnating her, a daughter of a prostitute and a simple girl from the hills. There are four sketches related to males: Ram a simple, affectionate and faithful domestic servant; Ghisa—a poor and simple young boy conscious of his duties and anxious to learn the three r's, a blind man Alopi and a potter Badlu.

The purpose of these sketches is not to entertain the reader with the narration of interesting events; but to expose the evils of society and to create a sense of deep sympathy for the oppressed and the innocent. The satire and the undercurrent of sympathy is so deep that the reader is moved and forced to introspection. 'In a society where an old man of sixty four wants to marry a girl of fourteen years, it is difficult to re-marry a thirty two year old widow', she points out.

The portraits give an outline of the social action which the author took up to counter these evils, eg. schools for the children of poor parents, and for women who wasted their time in quarrelling with each other. Mahadevi has herself hinted, "My life has been reflected in these memories....if somebody finds his own image, however faint it might be, I would deem my labour a success".

The author has given realistic portraits of men, women, children and their surroundings in a graphic style.

Mahadevi is basically a poet. Her portraits of nature–a morning in the mountains, an evening in the spring-sky, the enchanting snow-covered mountains and the cataracts full of melting snow are all captivating.

The style of these memoirs changes according to the subjects. Sometimes it is poetic and emotional, at other places it is starkly realistic. She is a conscious artist, though this consciousness is not the result of arduous labour. At places where she suppresses her resentment and agony her style becomes scathing.

Atit Ke Chalchitra is a landmark in the genre of Memoirs in Hindi.

ATMA HATYA KE VIRUDDHA (Hindi) is Raghuvir Sahai's second volume of poems after Siedhiyon Par

Dhoop Mein and was published in 1967. It contains 39 poems on themes ranging from human love to the act of poetic creation, from political upheavals to the state of Hindi. They may be occasionally irreverant, but they are never flippant or coarse. The anger behind a poem like 'Film Ke Bad Chikh' (A scream after the Movie), is generated by a very genuine concern for the real values of life against the coarseness and indifference that seem to have enveloped the masses in our times.

In his preface to the volume, the poet says that he is often assailed by a sharp sense of dismay on realising that the writers today are in a sense totally cut off from the world they live in, and when they participate in the life around them at all, they seem to leave behind their literary susceptibilities and end up in schizophrenia. The poet would like to carry on the fight on both the frontiers–the literary and in life around him, and not evade either.

It is clear from these views that Raghuvir Sahai is reacting sharply against the common romantic misgiving about the creative act. In 'Neta Kshama Karen', he illustrates these views through a poem.

That democracy has come to mean something different from what it meant earlier, is only too clear now. Poems like 'Nai Hansi' (The new smile), 'Mere Pratinidhi' (My Representative) and 'Loktantriya Mrityu' (The Democratic Death) combine in a strange chemistry a passion for ideas normally not considered poetic, and the language works here as a catalytic agent. The normal urbane idiom of the poet is juxtaposed with the coarse speech of our small towns and the fossilized and pompous tones of the politician. Sahai's poems are remarkable for an eloquently satirical use of names of individuals–not real ones–but as carricatures of reality. Their deliberately exaggerated ring sharply underscores the deceitful malevolence of a democratic system gone haywire.

The inter-relation between music and poetry is an increasingly dominant feature in the poetry of Sahai.

ATMAJIBANI (Bengali) by Debendranath Tagore was published in 1898 by Priyanath Shastry of the Adi Brahmo Samaj, Calcutta. The full title of the autobiography is Pujyapada Sriman Maharshi Debendranath Thakurer Swarachita Jiban-Charita though it is popularly known as Atmajibani. In this unique autobiography we get a glimpse of the inner life of Debendranath Tagore, the father of Rabindranath Tagore. It can be said that he guided the Brahmo movement in India started by Rammohan Roy. Debendranath gave a clear conception of Brahmoism and preached it from the platform of the Adi Brahmo Samaj. One gets a clear outline of the movement from the journal Tattva Bodhini Patrika of 1874. "The Adi Brahmo Samaj maintains that Brahmoism is both universal religion as well as a form of Hindooism. The principal ground of its maintaining this opinion is that Theism is true Hindooism according to a right interpretation of Hindoo Shastras."

Debendranath was a prose-writer of high repute. He published 15 titles during a span of half a century (1845-1895). His last work in Bengali is his autobiography. He wrote a letter to his publisher Priyanath Shastry in which he stated, "I have completed the story of my life from the age of 18 years to 41 years in 39 chapters. I give you the rights of the book. Don't change a line, don't add a word. Publish it after my death". But it was published before his death.

The period of 24 years (1835-1859) of Debendranath's life covered by this autobiography was very fruitful in his personal, social and religious career.

In this autobiography Debendranath gave illuminating accounts of his inner and outer life. He travelled widely in the Himalayas and northern parts of India. A former pupil of the Hindu College, Debendranath joined as a partner of Carr, Tagore and Company and Union Bank founded by his father Prince Dwarakanath Tagore. But he was drawn towards music and scriptures written in Sanskrit. Both these financial and banking institutions had declared insolvency and were closed in 1847 after the death of Dwarakanath Tagore. Afterwards the Tagore of Jorasanko depended heavily on their landed property.

Debendranath had a large landed property throughout Eastern India. But Debendranath was a seeker of Truth. He founded the Tattvabodhini Sabha (1939), a society dedicated to the preaching of Brahmavidya as written down in the scriptures. For this purpose a journal, a school and a printing press were started by Debendranath who was initiated in Brahmoism in 1843. He switched from the Hindu way of worshipping many gods to the worshipping of one, of only one Brahmo. He firmly believed in the holiness and correctness of the Hindu scriptures.

But there was an intense debate among the Brahmos during 1848 and 1850 whether the Vedas were written by gods or not. In 1849 Debendranath selected slokas mainly from the Upanishadas and published a book Brahmo Dharma which became the Bible of the Brahmos. Soon he found the debates in the Tattvabodhini Sabha uninteresting and wanted to retire in seclusion. With this purpose he left Calcutta for the Himalayas (1856), travelled widely in the lonely beautiful valleys, had glimpses of the One and even felt His divine presence. He came back to Calcutta after two years.

Here ends the fascinating and illuminating accounts of his autobiography which is eminently readable. This book has other qualities. We get pictures of the peoples of the Himalayas and a glimpse of Delhi. While crossing the Jamuna Debendranath saw the last Mughal Emperor flying a huge kite from the rooftop of the Red Fort. Such anecdotes have contributed to make this autobiography interesting. The descriptions of natural beauties reveal the poetic bent of the mind of the writer who developed a prose-style of his own.

ATMAJIVANI CHARITA (Oriya) of Fakirmohan (1843-1918) is the first autobiography in Oriya. This is important not only because it tells the life history of a reputed novelist and poet, but also at the same time it is a fine record of the social, religious and political conditions of his time. As the testimony of a man who took a leading part in the most critical phase of Oriya language and literature, it is invaluable.

The first appearance of this autobiography was in the pages of Sambalpur Hitaishini and Balesore Sambadabahika, in the month of July, 1892, with the title Bholanathaku Chithi or 'A letter to Bholanatha'. In September 1915, Utkal Sahitya, the leading Oriya literary monthly, reported that Fakirmohan was engaged in writing his Atma-charita. The September-December issue of Satyavadi, a weekly, carried a portion of the autobiography under the caption Fakirmohana ka Atmajivanira Eka Adhyaya (A chapter from the Autobiography of Fakirmohan). Later the Utkal Sahitya serialised it between 1918 and 1920.

While going through the pages of this autobiography one finds many interesting details relating to the 'Moghulbandi' areas (that is, the districts of Puri, Cuttack, Balasore, which were under the direct administration of the British) and Garhajatas (feudal states like, Nilagiri, Dasapalla, Dampara, Kendujhar, etc.). Fakirmohan, as an inhabitant of Balasore, the northern town of Orissa close to Bengal, was familiar with problems such as language crisis, religious movements, modern education, exploitations of administrators, etc. of the Moghulbandi area. Again as the Dewan of some of the feudal states he came across the arbitrary and uneducated kings as well as the poor tenants of those areas. Everywhere he took a leading part to spread modern habits and manners, and modern ways of living, but sometimes he had to face stiff opposition from the people and kings around him. Thus his autobiography can be said to be an account of a series of adventures, many of which, particularly his experiences at Kendujhar at the time of Bhuyan rebellion, were not very pleasant.

Fakirmohan's autobiography was written in that inimitable colloquial language in which his novels were written. Also the frame of his autobiography is almost like that of his novels to the extent that apart from being a narration of facts it is tempered with a fine creative vision, understanding and wit. But there are some differences in the approach to the two different types of writing. Thus whereas in his novels he is sympathetic towards the oppressed and is critical of the exploiters, particularly the upstart landlords and the newly educated neo-rich connected with the district courts, in the autobiography he shows support to the feudal system of kings and landlords and at times willingly becomes their instrument of exploitation. But that apart, the book is a remarkable work of art, and gives a deep insight not only into a turbulent time in Orissa (later 19th century and first decade of the 20th) but also to the understanding and intelligence of a great creative writer, one of the greatest in Orissa.

ATRE, PRALHAD KESHAV (Marathi; b. 1898, d. 1969) was a well known poet, parodist, playwright, scenario-writer, journalist and orator. He hailed from a family of Kodhith, a village near Saswad in the Pune district. His father was a clerk and for a brief period secretary of the Saswad Municipality. After having his primary education at Saswad, Atre had to move to Pune for further education. He matriculated from Fergusson College in 1919.

While at college Atre had come in contact with the famous Marathi poets-Balkavi Thomare and R.G. Gadkari alias Govindagraj. He considered them as his Gurus and following them tried his pen mainly in three literary forms: poetry, humour and drama.

After graduation Atre took up a career as a school teacher. His securing first class at B.T. Exam in 1924, however, was a turning point in his career. With the help of his friends and well-wishers he managed to go abroad and get T.D. from the London University in the year 1928. He returned home in 1929 infused with modern ideas. He revitalised the defunct school of Camp Education Society and founded a new high school for girls in the memory of the great reformist G.G. Agarkar. His model lessons were watched by the teaching community with keen interest. The reading series called Navayug Vachan and Arun Vachan edited by him brought about a radical change in the orthodox tradition of preparing language text books. He wrote inimitable nursery stories and tales for kids and two plays Gurudakshina (1930) and Veeravachan (1932) for boys. Atre dominated the educational scene for more than two decades.

Atre's early ambition was to become a romantic poet. His collection of poems Gitaganga (1935) however failed to make any impact. By about 1922, he found his real forte viz. parody and his Zenduchi Fule, a tiny collection of nine pieces appeared in 1925 under the pseudonym Keshavkumar. He had successfully parodied the didactic matter and highly Sanskritized style of the old school of poets as well as the so called progressive ideas of platonic love and fashionable Persianized diction of Ravi Kiran Mandal's poets, especially of Madhav Julian. The comprehensive eighth edition (1972) contains almost all i.e. 68 of his parodies. This work of Atre can be called a unique contribution to the genre in particular and Marathi literature in general.

Due to the advent of motion pictures Marathi theatre was then passing through a dismal period. Atre who had imbibed emotional spirit and ornate style from his guru Gadkari and new ideas and modern stage techniques from Western dramatists came to its rescue. His first play Sashtang Namaskar (1933) produced by Balmohan Natak Mandali was a great success. It satirized many prevalent fads in Maharashtra such as prescription of the exercise of Sashtang Namaskar as a panacea for all the evils under the sun, the effeminate image of a romantic poet, a blind faith in astrology, a mad craze for cinema-world etc. This was followed by ten plays which became popular in Maharashtra. Two of his serious social plays mainly deal with the problem of women, Gharabaher depicting woman's plight in a middle class joint family and Udyacha Sansar a tragedy of higher middle class family with an irresponsible head. After 1946 he wrote more than a dozen plays. Notable among them is To Mi Navhecha (1965) showing an unscrupulous fellow exploiting helpless, employed girls who have crossed marriageable age. His Lagnachi Bedi, a hilarious comedy; Bhramacha Bhopala, a burlesque; Kavadichumbak (an adaptation of Moliere's L'Avare) and Mourchi Mavashi (an adaptation of Brandon Thomas's Charley's Aunt), both farces, have been Atre's major stage successes.

By 1938, Atre entered the film world and achieved almost the same success; he wrote more than a dozen scenarios. His Brahmachari parodying the excessive importance attached to celibacy in the Gandhian era was a box office hit. His film Shyamchi Ai based on Saneguruji's famous novel of the same title won the President's gold medal in 1954. In the succeeding year Atre also bagged the silver medal for his feature film Jyotiba Fule.

In 1938 Atre had plunged into politics as a supporter of the Congress party and was elected the party-leader in the Poona Municipality. In 1940 Atre moved his headquarters from Poona to Bombay and started Navayug, a weekly, to propagate the Congress programme. After independence, however, he joined the Socialist party. He became the leader of the opposition in Bombay Municipal Corporation (1949) and for a term a member of the Legislative Assembly (1957). He virtually found his life's mission in the form of the unified Maharashtra movement. In 1956, he started his popular daily Maratha for championing this cause. With his direct and forceful style he almost flattened the opponents of the movement. Hasha Ani Talya, Mudda Ani Gudda, Sinhagarjana, Ashadhasya Prathama Diyase are the works which represent his journalistic talent as well as his powerful oratory. Brandichi Batali, Sakharpuda, Kavalyanchi Shala and Mule Ani Fule contain his short stories and nursery tales.

Throughout his career Atre was a controversial figure. He had encounters with many leading contemporaries like B.V. Warerkar, N.S. Phadke, S.M. Mate, R.K. Tatnis, and P.B. Bhave.

Atre was a literary giant. He excelled in parody, was quite inimitable in nursery tales and a real master of lucid prose. His Mi Kasa Zalo and Karheche Pani (an autobiography in 5 volumes) amply testify to the fact that he had lived a full life. As a mark of appreciation of his literary greatness he was elected the President of Marathi Literary Conference held at Nasik in 1942. He also presided over the conference of Marathi journalists held in Sholapur (1950) and Marathi Dramatic Conference held in Bombay (1955).

ATRE, TRIMBAK NARAYAN (Marathi; b.1872, d. 1933) is a lesser known but able writer of the first decade of this century.

He studied at Ahmednagar and Pune and became a graduate in Arts and Law. He was in the civil service of Bombay Government and served variously as Mamledar (Deputy Collector), Mujrub (Revenue Officer), and a Sub-Judge in Khandesh Division. For sometime he was also a Famine Officer during two severe famines of 1899 and 1901.

Atre made extensive study of various subjects like rural economics and sociology, criminal tribes and was well versed in Sanskrit and English, all of which his books Gavgada (Village Community) and Gunhegar Jati (Criminal castes or tribes) amply prove. He has also two booklets in his name : Marathi Shalamadhye Modicha Upayog (The Use of 'Modi' Script in Marathi Schools) and Vajane Mape Va Nani Yamadhye Pramanikaranasathi Vinanti (An appeal for standardization of weights, measures and coins) which go to indicate his other interests.

Both his books, especially Gavgada on which his fame rests, are scholarly expositions of the rural system, its sociological and economic problems, the transformation through which it went during the different regimes, relationships between various castes and their crafts. In Gunhegar Jati he discusses the how and why of these castes and their criminality, with which the village life is cursed. They are the first books of their kind in Marathi. When other reformists were busy with their agitations in the cities Atre was the first to draw their attention to the plight of the villagers and exhorted them to extend their reformist activities in the rural areas and criminal communities. He also writes feelingly about the upliftment of the untouchables and thus saving them from religious conversions.

He was, perhaps due to his scholarship and flair for writing, asked by Lokmanya Tilak to join the editorial section of Kesari, his famous Marathi daily. A reformist in his ideas he also wroked with Pandita Ramabai for sometime.

Importance of Atre's writing was rediscovered when his book Gavgada was brought into limelight through its new reprint (1959) after a lapse of about half a century.

ATREYA (Telugu ; b.1921) playwright, actor, producer, film script writer and lyricist, was born at Mangalampadu Village, Sullur Taluk, Nellore District. After preliminary education at Chittoor, he had undergone teacher's training, but left it to participate in the Quit India Movement and was imprisoned. He had moved from one job to the other in quick succession, as a clerk in the settlement office at Tiruttani, in the Munsiff Court at Nellore, as an assistant editor in Zamin Rytu and as office secretary of the Andhra Nataka Kala Parishad at Gudivada.

His theatre activities started while at Chittoor and his association with Venkatagiri Amateurs brought him and the group both recognition and fame. Though his initial association with theatre was as an actor, he soon wrote a series of plays which found a permanent place in amateur theatre. His early plays Gautama Buddha (1946) followed by Ashoka Samrat (1947) were not immediately popular on the stage. Recognition as a playwright came to him with Parivartana, staged at the Progressive Writers' Meet at Madras (1947).

Atreya's N.G.O. or Gumasta (1949) established a new trend of realism on the Telugu stage. Powerful, realistic characters and identifiable, commonly experienced conflicts in day-to-day middle class life struggling to maintain a semblance of honour and prestige under constant pressures of power and money made N.G.O. a trend-setter in contemporary drama.

Atreya was the author of other successful plays such as Kappalu, (1954), Eanudu (1947), Bhayam (1957), Viswasanti (1953) and also many one-act plays including Pragati, Evaru Donga and Vara Prasadam.

Atreya had entered the cinema world as a script writer and lyricist in 1958 and had attained recognition as a powerful writer in that medium also, supplying scenarios and lyrics to about 200 films. He was the recipient of a fellowship for his service to the Telugu Theatre and films by the A.P. Sangeet Natak Akademi.

Atreya's main contribution to Telugu drama lies in his powerful delineation of basic social conflicts seen in our everyday life, portrayed with great sincerity and in an authentically realistic vein.

ATTAKATHA (Malayalam). This is (literally, a 'story for dance performance' from Atu 'to dance' and Katha 'story'), the generic name for the literary works specially written for Kathakali performance. The progenitor of this literature is believed to be one Vira Kerala Varma. He was a member of a royal family and is presumed to have lived during the latter half of the seventeenth century. The family was known as Kottarakkara Kovilakam (Kottarakkara palace). Since his palace was situated at Kottarakkara in Eastern Travancore, the prince was popularly known as Kottarakkara Tampuran (The Prince of Kottarakkara). A widely circulated legend attributes the origin of this literature of performance to the offended pride of Kottarakkara Tampuran on the refusal of King Manaveda, the Zamorin of Calicut, to send his palace troupe of Krishnanattam to Kottarakkara in response to the former's request. Failing in his attempt to bring the Krishnanattam troupe to his palace, Kottarakkara Tampuran decided to compose a series of stage plays which were subsequently enacted for the first time under his patronage and supervision. He wrote eight such stories based on Ramayana episodes, each one intended for a night's performance. The works are : Putrakameshti, Sitasvayamvaram, Vicchinnabhishekam, Kharavadham, Balivadham, Toranayudham, Setubandhanam and Yuddham. Inspired by the name Krishnanattam, the performance based on these eight works was initially called Ramanattam since all of them dealt with incidents connected with the Sri Rama story. The term Ramanattam became obsolete as it was later replaced by Kathakali.

The structure of the attakatha consists of padams (songs) which represent the dialogues of the characters, shlokas (quarts in Sanskrit meters) and dandakas (the collective name of meters having more than 26 syllables in one foot) which narrate the incidents and describe the interlinkages in between the scenes. The padams and dandakas are in Manipravala language and the shlokas in pure Sanskrit. Some authors have deviated from this general rule. The author himself indicates how the shlokas, padams and dandakas should be sung in performance by specifying the respective ragas (tunes) and talas (rhythms) for each.

Kottarakkara Tampuran's Ramanattam plays paved the way for the popularity of attakkatha literature in Malayalam extending upto the first half of the twentieth century. But in literary quality his works are mediocre and are ranked far below many other creations of the same genre that followed. Among his works only Kharavadham and Toranayuddham are popular with the performers of Kathakali today. For the portrayal of characters and the narration of sequences of the Rama story, Tampuran has mainly relied on Valmiki's original Ramayana and the later Tamil adaptation, Kamban's Ramayana of the twelfth century.

After Kottarakkara Tampuran, a few years later, one comes across another member of a royal family producing a set of attakatha works. He is popularly known as Kottayathu Tampuran (Prince of Kottayam, in Northern Kerala) and from the internal references in his works it could safely be assumed that this prince was the younger brother of one Kerala Varma who was the first poet in Malayalam to translate Valmiki's epic, though the translation has not been completed. The translation is believed to have been attempted around the turn of the 17th century and therefore, in the absence of more reliable evidences, his younger brother must have lived during the first few decades of the 18th century. Kottayattu Tampuran wrote four attakatha works, viz. Bakavadham, Kalyanasoughandhikam, Kirmiravadham and Nivatakavaca kalakeyavadham. All these stories are based on the Mahabharatam, and the Ramanattam works of Kottarakkara Tampuran. Among the four works, the last one tops in literary quality and stage adaptability. In this work the author compares the celestial damsel, Urvasi, to poetry in an oft-quoted quartet in which the qualifications described are applicable to both.

Among the other attakatha writers of the 18th century, two stand out. They are Kartika Tirunal Rama Varma Maharaja (1724–1798) and Asvati Tirunal Rama Varma Tampuran (1756–1794). The former was a benevolent ruler and hence was known as Dharmaraja (The charitable king). He has written six complete attakathas (Rajasuyam, Subhadraharanam, Bakavadham, Gandharvavijayam, Panchalisvayamvaram and Kalyanasoughandhikam) and another incomplete one, the first part of Narakasuravadham. Though he rendered substantial service to the development of Kathakali by encouraging artistes and introducing innovations in the performance, the literature that he produced for the art is of moderate standard. Asvati Tirunal wrote four attakathas (Poundrakavadham, Ambarishacharitam, Rugminisvayamvaram and Putanamoksam) and is believed to have completed Kartika Tirunal's unfinished work. Scholars and art lovers are unanimous in their opinion that Asvati Tirunal's works are in no way inferior to the best works in this genre produced earlier and later. All his works, except Poundrakavadham are popular on the Kathakali stage.

Amongst all the attakatha writers none equals Unnayi Variyar who is believed to have lived during the last quarter of the 17th century, and the first half of the next. No convincing clues are available on the exact date of his birth, his real name, his family background and other particulars of his life. Most of the information about his life and career that has been collected by researchers is either based on legends and hearsay or reconstructed from bits of indirect evidences. There is only one record which states that in the year 1745 his work was enacted during the festival season in Padmanabhasvami temple in Trivandrum. Hence he must have lived close to that period. Variyar has written only one attakatha, the Nalacharitam, which is divided into four parts, each one intended for a day's performance. In all other works belonging to the attakatha literature, the authors are conspicuously constrained by the rules of the corresponding performing art, viz. Kathakali. Unnayi Variyar was first and foremost a poet par excellence, never sacrificing the glow of his imagination to the glitter of the stage. This perhaps, has made his work a challenge to the Kathakali artists. No artists of mediocre calibre can translate his verbal beauty to the complex system of gesture-language that Kathakali is made of. He mixes Malayalam and Sanskrit words indiscriminately to the utter bewilderment of readers and actors on the stage. And yet, the total effect that he creates is astoundingly marvellous. The Nala story of Mahabharatam has been handled by many in different forms. Variyar's re-creation of the plot surpasses all others. Each one of his characters, major as well as minor, is portrayed equally naturally and skilfully. The way he has drawn the minor characters, especially the Swan, the Woodsman, Narada, etc. reveals his deep insight into human psychology. The way he has conceived the various scenes reflects his mastery of dramaturgy. And above all, the style of the dialogues employed for characters of various types establishes his sense of propriety and depth of vision.

Many attakatha works were produced during the next two centuries, roughly down to the first quarter of the twentieth century. A good majority of these later works are poor replicas moulded inexpertly on the earlier works, though some attained moderate success on the stage. In this period, only the works of Irayimman Tampi (1783-1863) and V. Krishnan Tampi (1890-1936) attracted serious attention of the scholars and artistes. The former penned three attakathas, viz. Uttarasvayamvara, Dakshayagam and Kichakavadham. All three were frequently enacted and have proved popular among Kathakali lovers, the main reason being that the padams in his works can be sung quite effortlessly and melodiously. As poetry also, his compositions are enchanting and imaginative though not of a standard that could be equated with Variyar's or Kottayattu Thampuran's. He was conscious that essentially attakathas are meant for performances and this awareness is evident throughout his works. Krishnan Tampi belonged to a much later period. One of his attakatha works reaches so high a standard that it could be called a classic. Among his four creations (Tatakavadham, Vallikumaram, Chudamani and Urvashi), it is Tatakavadham which has perpetuated his name among attakatha composers. The twist he has given to the epical episode is worth recalling. Tataka in Krishnan Tampi's plot is a Dravidian princess, and Sri Rama an Aryan prince. Rama came to the forest to protect the sages from attacks by demons while they performed Yajna. The Dravidian princess who opposed the ritual sacrifice of cows saw in Rama a protector of the same ritual, and hence hated him. But Cupid's ways are curious. The tall handsome Aryan prince capitavated the dark princess's heart. Torn between reasoning and emotion, Tataka ultimately decides that 'a queen requires only intellect; let the mind perish'. She was eventually killed by Rama. This novel conception of the ancient story is narrated in a fascinating manner, embellished with rhetoric and in a highly classical, chaste style.

Besides these half a dozen and odd poets, there are about one hundred and thirty attakatha composers whose total output amounts to nearly three hundred. None of these three hundred odd works deserves special mention either in respect of literary quality or in respect of stage adaptability.

During its decaying years, some attakatha composers attempted to cater to modern tastes. The consequence was a small number of works dealing with modern and alien themes. To this group belong Kuttamattu Narayana Kurup's Higlar vadham, O.M.C. Namputiripat's Snapakacharitam, P.N. Paramesvaran Namputiri's Umakeralam, Vallottol's Jappukattalan, V. Madhavan Nair's Gandhicharitam and an anonymous work Pattunnicharitam. All attempts to modernise attakatha have miserably failed because the ultra symbolic nature of its characters, the complexity of its structure and the necessity of conforming to the conventions of a highly intricate stage craft do not permit new plots to enter into this genre. It is doubtful whether there is going to be any rejuvenation of this literary form in future years.

ATTAPRAKARAM (Malayalam). Attaprakaram, which literally means mode of acting, is the general term given to stage manuals prepared for such dance dramas of Kerala as Kuttu, Kutiyattam and Kathakali. According to tradition it was king Kulasekhara Varman (12th century), author of the two dramas, Subhadradhananjaya and Tapatisamvarana, who was responsible for reforming the stage in Kerala. A Brahmin contemporary of his composed Vyangyavyakhya commentaries on the above plays detailing the modes of staging the plays in a novel way and this text in Sanskrit is the first stage manual produced in Kerala. Another Brahmin scholar and contemporary of the king, Tolan, is credited with the authorship of the Attaprakarams in Malayalam, in which he has given copious details of his innovations in staging plays. Tolan, along with his patron, is said to have introduced 'Kutiyattam' in which Sanskrit plays are staged in a peculiar way as set out in stage manuals. These stage manuals are known as 'Kramadipikas' or 'Attaprakaras'. The former, written either in Sanskrit or in Malayalam or in both, explain the procedure adopted in the staging of the plays and deal with the songs, dances, the ragas and the various stage directions. The latter indicate the way of acting, the meaning of the verses, etc. in detail, in the form of a continuous moving story to enable the actor to represent it by gestures and movements. These are mostly written in Malayalam and are not to be spoken on the stage, but are only intended for the benefit of professional actors. There are texts in Malayalam to be spoken by the Vidushaka explaining the meaning of the Sanskrit texts for producing humour. The earliest Attaprakaras in Malayalam are Mantrankam (unpublished, available in the Kerala University Manuscripts Library, Trivandrum), Mathavilasam Asokavanikankam (Trivandrum Malayalam Series No. 95, Trivandrum, 1957), Surpanakhankam (unpublished, available in Trivandrum) etc. Most of these texts are attributed to Tolan, the court–jester of Kulasekhara Varman. There is an Attaprakara on the Ascharyachudamani of Shaktibhadra of Kerala (Ascharyachudamani, ed. K.P. Narayana Pisharodi, Mangalodayam, Trichur, 1967) giving the details of its staging, also produced at an early period. Among the later Attaprakaras, the Ashtapadi Attaprakaram (Trivandrum Malayalam Series No. 114, Trivandrum, 1964) composed by Ramavarma (1801) details the staging of the Gitagovinda of Jayadeva. Kathakali Attaprakaram (Vol. I, K.P.S. Menon) gives the details of the staging of 17 Kathakali stories.

The Attaprakaras in Malayalam often show the influence of Tamil in addition to that of the Manipravala style in which Sanskrit is the predominant factor. It is believed that such stage manuals have considerably helped the standardisation of the Malayalam language.

An instance of staging the 12th stanza of the Act I of Subhadradhananjaya may be noted here. The actor playing the role of Arjuna first looks at the heroine and begins to describe her from head to foot. When he comes to the eyes he stops and recites this verse slowly in the Raga called Arttan indicating the meaning of each word through hand gestures in the same order as in the text. Then the meanings are shown again by the gestures, but without reciting the verse. The number and gender of words, the nature of compounds, etc. are indicated. During the recital there is no instrumental music, but during the explanation the instruments are played. Then the verse is taken up for the third time for explaining the syntax (anvaya). First he recites the portion "iyam ka" and begins to indicate through gestures all its suggested meanings : "what sort of girl is she? What is her name? Who is her father? Who is her mother? What is her family?" and so on. Thus the procedure is followed as detailed in manuals specially written for the play. These manuals are the hand books of the professional actors (known as Chakyars) in Kerala and they guard them jealously. All the plays attributed to Bhasa were staged in this way, in addition to those by the early dramatists of Kerala, though the later ones were not staged in this form.

ATTICUTTI (Tamil) by the poetess Avvaiyar of the 12th Century A.D. is one of the celebrated ethical works in Tamil. Atti is the name of the ebony tree whose flower resembles the moon; 'Cuti' means one who wears and here Atticuti denotes the Lord Siva who wears a chaplet of moon-like atti flowers. The work Atticuti contains 108 didactic aphorisms commencing with words beginning with letters in their order in the Tamil alphabet. The work begins with an invocation. The influence of the work is so great that it has become a literary genre also. Following this work, Poet Bharathi, V.S. Manickam and Poet Vanitacan among many others have contributed to this genre. Atticuti Virttiyurai, Atticuti puranam, Atticuti Venpa, Atticuti Tiravukol, Atticutic Chintu and similar works have been written to propagate the ethical ideals already advocated in Atticuti of Avvaiyar, the most popular and prolific writer of ethical maxims of the 12th Century.

Atticuti states the eternal truths and the perennial wisdom of ages in the most cryptic language. It lists all rules for an upright and useful life in society. Avvaiyar is accepted by the masses as their symbol of wisdom and her profound maxims are current to this day in the Tamil land. Her name is known even to school children who repeat with zest her reflections on life meant for the young. Her poetry has percolated down to the lowert strata of Tamilian socrety because of its simplicity and intelligibility. Some of her ethical teachings have been crystallized by the common folk as proverbs used in common parlance. Atticuti is one of the most powerful instruments available in Tamil to mould one's character. That is why it has been prescribed among other texts in the curicula for elementary education in Tamil. "Be interested in virtuous deeds. Avoid anger, Learn while you are young, Don't avoid munificence"; are some of the aphorisms of Atticuti.

ATUKKALAYILNINNU ARANGATTEKKU (Malayalam) is a drama written by V.R. Bhattathirippad (1930) in protest against the discrimination and injustice being suffered by Nambudiri women in their custom-ridden, male-dominated community. It is a part of the critical reappraisal of the old practices in the light of the modern concepts of freedom and equality.

A young Nambudiri girl Teti and her cousin Madhavan have grown up together along with the girl's brother Kunchu, in their family by name Vilayur. They have pledged their tender hearts to each other although not in so many words. Madhavan goes to the city to complete his English education. In the meanwhile certain developments take place in the Vilayur family. Teti's father is on the lookout for a bridegroom for his daughter. There is the usual astrologer who compares the horoscope of the girl with the horoscopes of the 'boys'. The choice ultimately falls on a thrice married old man, head of the Karkatakamkunnu family, who is only too happy to marry the young girl for an appropriate dowry. He declares that if any opposition comes from his existing wives, he will kick them out. But things do not happen the way the two old men plan. When the bridegroom arrives at the home of the bride for the wedding ceremonies he receives an injunction order against going ahead with the marriage. The order has been obtained by Kunchu, brother of Teti. Kunchu converts his father to his way of thinking and the old father ultimately agrees to give Teti in marriage to her cousin Madhavan. In the last scene we find Madhavan's colleagues in Madras assembled in his home in the village and participating in the marriage celebrations. We also find felicitations and presents arriving for the unorthodox couple. Among them is one from the London Nambudiri Yuvajana Samajam (Association of Nambudiri Men, London).

The sincerity which throbs in Bhattatirippad's play is obvious. Records show that when the play was staged in 1930, men took the parts of women characters as well. The play depicts the life and practices of their community in faithful terms.

Though Bhattathirippad is no more, he lived long enough to see the social evils he had fought against almost removed. His play in the company of one or two other similar works functioned as the literary bastion of the reform movements in the community.

AUCHITYA (Sanskrit). In literary criticism no concept appears all of a sudden. Literary critics collect ingeniously materials from older literature and build their theories on them. Kshemendra likewise found the rudimentary concept of auchitya (propriety) in earlier literature which he developed into an elaborate thesis.

Bharata (2nd century B.C.) was the first to observe that, for a proper and full development of rasa, the rules of propriety have to be observed in all their forms; thus there has to be a proper employment of the anubhavas in relation to the subject–matter, the speaker, the sentiment and the means with which it is evoked. It is, as a matter of fact, clear that it is difficult to speak of gunas, or doshas in absolute terms and in a clear-cut manner. When the theorists writing on the rasa speak of rasapariposha and rasapakarsha, i.e., nourishment and detraction of rasa, they are governed by the considerations of auchitya Hence arises their conception of nitya and anitya, permanent and transitory, doshas or gunas. It is therefore not surprising to find the Dhvanikara observing that the secret of rasa lies in observing the established rules of propriety. It was out of these considerations of propriety that he recommended the avoidance of conflict or virodha with the principal rasa; and spoke of propriety of different kinds with reference to the speaker, the theme, the vibhavas, the alamkaras and the like. This concept of rasadoshas gradually led to the concept of doshas connected with the pada and the padartha, the vakya and the vakyartha, i.e. the word and its meaning, the sentence and its meaning. Mahimabhatta (1020-1100) also in second chapter of his work Vyaktiviveka deals with the problem of anauchitya and speaks of two aspects of impropriety, referring to shabda and artha. He also speaks of propriety which is internal-antaranga and external-bahiranga, as it is with reference to the meaning-arthavisaya or pertaining to word-shabdavishaya. Finding that the internal propriety has been discussed by the earlier writers, Mahimabhatta discusses only the external propriety, dividing it into five varieties; nondiscrimination of the predicate, which he calls vidheyavimarsha, violation of uniformity of expression, i.e., prakramabheda, syntactical irregularity, i.e. kramabheda, tautology, i.e. paunaruktya and omission of what must be expressed, i.e., vachyavachana.

Rudrata (825-850) in his Kavyalamkara while dealing with different styles called ritis, like the vaidarbhi and the panchali and the different rasas and their development and the use of compounds in this context, admits auchitya as the governing principle. It can be said that Rudrata has anticipated here the theory of auchitya developed by Anandavardhana (9th century) and fully established by Kshemendra. The rasa, no doubt, is of paramount importance in poetry and all other constituents like the riti, guna and alamkara move in the direction of its development and are expected to contribute to it. Rudrata actually uses the concept of auchitya and seems to develop the principle in some respect in his work; for he speaks of the five vrittis–madhura, praudha, parusha, lalita and bhadra—and advises a good poet to use them all skilfully after considering the propriety in the context of the speaker and the sense. While speaking of alamkaras the yamaka and the anuprasha as well as the shlesha, he observed that these are detrimental to the development of the two principal rasas, the shringara and the karuna, i.e. erotic and pathetic, though admitting their usefulness in the hymns of praise or descriptions of battles. This would mean that he thought of the principle of propriety as governing the use of the alamkaras in the context of the themes.

It is curious to note that Udbhata defines in his Kavyalamkarasarasamgraha the figure of speech urjasvi as having its essence in propriety, especially in the matter of love and anger; for here the emotions and the sentiments are developed on the basis of love and anger that seem to be improper. Anandavardhana has discussed the excellence of diction and the adjustment of words, letters and sentences with regard to their capacity to contribute to the development of rasa. This was in essence an indirect statement of the theory of auchitya or propriety. Anandavardhana speaks of samghatana as depending on the use of long or short compounds as well as its appropriateness in the matter of manifesting the rasa and suitability in the context of the speaker and the theme. This would really mean that it is the propriety governed by three principles-rasaniyama, vachya or vishayaniyama and the vaktriniyama. The samghatana depends on the gunas; and the gunas directly contribute to the development of rasa. The gunas like the alamkaras are subordinate to the rasa as they are expected to contribute to its development and naturally these are also governed by the principle of propriety.

Kuntaka (950-1050) admits auchitya as a guna, a quality on account of which any charming expression brings out the excellence of the subject described. Kuntaka holds that propriety pervades in the word, the sense and the entire poetical composition; and if a composition, in any of its parts or anywhere, suffers from impropriety, auchitya in two varieties, one resulting from the excellent description of an object and the other from skilfully bringing out the nature of the speaker or the listener, fails to lead to the desired end. Kshemendra picks up all these scattered threads, expressed or implied hints in the writings of the early writers like Rudrata, Anandavardhana and Mahimabhatta and develops his own theory of auchitya as the soul of poetry. It is to be noted that Bhamaha and Dandin neither mention the principle of auchitya nor use the word.

All this discussion leads one to believe that in the pre-Kshemendra period, the principle of auchitya was thought of particularly in the context of character, meaning, subject, vritti, rasa, word, excellence of the objects, the nature of the speaker and the listener, the sentence, and the entire composition. Aesthetically, its vital relation with the rasa was also realized as it governed the entire internal and external organization of the constituent factors of poetry. At the same time no writer had declared that the propriety was the soul of poetry.

Abhinavagupta had commented on the Dhvanyaloka of Anandavardhana in a brilliant manner and Kshemendra was a direct student of Abhinavagupta in the matter of literary criticism. In all probability, therefore, he was inspired and influenced by both of them. According to Kshemendra, auchitya resides in 28 places and he appears to have been more or less inspired by the approach of Kuntaka in listing the places where vakrokti resides. Like Kuntaka, Kshemendra also brings out excellences as well as defects of earlier writers and at places his indebtedness to Kuntaka is quite obvious. In the formulation of his original thesis Kshemendra is not an original thinker that way, but his critical insight can be definitely seen in his formulating a new doctrine and basing it on the earlier discussions. He was widely read and had good insight into poetry, had also the necessary discipline and love of labour, but he was no genius and therein lie his limitations and the causes as to why the auchitya school of poetry could not belong to the list of recognized schools in Sanskrit poetics. Kane's judgement that 'Kshemendra's contribution to poetics is meagre' is harsh and does no justice either to Kshemendra or to his work.

The concept did not receive much attention from the writers on rhetorics in the post-Kshemendra period. But it is seen to play an important role in the literary criticism of the 19th and 20th centuries. Correctness is essentially identical with conformity to a standard, to a rule or to a convention, or to a custom. Auchitya comes into play when a rule, or standard or custom comes into conflict with the reality at hand, and decides the issue. Regard for propriety really leads to classicism where rules, norms and correctness are of supreme value. However, according to some, auchitya, propriety or correctness is a negative virtue, for, it is of the nature more of avoiding defects rather than some positive achievement of graces. But the theory of auchitya as elaborated by Kshemendra makes it look like inner harmony of poetic creation.

AUCHITYAVICHARACHARCHA (Sanskrit) is the most important of the four treatises devoted to literary criticism, by Kshemendra, the other three being the Kavikanthabharana, the Kavikarnika and the Suvrittatilaka. As Kshemendra himself says in his work, it was written in the times of the king Anantaraja i.e., some time before 1080. He is widely read in classical Sanskrit poetry and his taste is highly sophisticated and cultured. He may not be a first rate poet, but as a critic he cannot be ignored at all.

The Auchityavicharacharcha contains 39 karikas with a prose Vritti and about 606 illustrations and the work is rounded off by 3 concluding verses. The main argument of Kshemendra is that auchitya, propriety, is the essence of poetry and of rasa. This principle of auchitya is discussed in connection with a pada, vakya, prabandhartha, guna, alamkara, rasa, kriya, karaka, linga, vachana, upasarga, kala, desha, kula, vrata, tattva, etc., these being 28 significant points in which the auchitya is seen to reside. Just as sentience pervades the entire body likewise the principle of auchitya pervades the entire poetical composition. Kshemendra has discussed this topic in a very systematic manner, for, at the outset he defines auchitya, discusses its relation with poetry and its varieties in the opening karikas and then proceeds to discuss and explain the same with illustrations in the remaining part of the work. It is very clear that he was familiar with the works and the views of his predecessors like Bhamaha, Vamana and Anandavardhana. Anandavardhana and Kuntaka seem to have inspired him; for like the former, he seeks to establish a new thesis of his own, and like the latter, he writes his own Vritti, illustrates his points with suitable illustrations from literature before him and offers his own comments on the poems of great poets like Amaru, Kalidasa and Bhavabhuti. To prove his thesis he gives appropriate examples as well as inappropriate ones, so as to leave no ambiguity about his point. The idea of auchitya however, is not entirely new, for Anandavardhana himself had very clearly pointed out (Dhvanyaloka 3-7-14) that propriety was the highest secret of proper development of rasa. But credit must be given to Kshemendra for having developed the idea fully and having brought it into a relation with rasa and chamatkara, the principles of paramount importance in poetry, according to earlier thinkers. In the manner of Kuntaka who found the concept of vakrokti in earlier writers and developed it fully. Kshemendra developed fully the concept of auchitya. This may not be a new thought altogether but Kshemendra belongs to the category of Anandavardhana, the Dhvanikara, and Kuntaka, the Vakroktijivitakara, in his formulation of a new thesis out of older material and also in writing a systematic treatise on the subject.

AUROBINDO SRI (English; b. 1872 d. 1950). Known earlier as Aurobindo Ghose, poet, patriot, philosopher, prophet and Yogi, was born at Calcutta. Aurobindo was the third son of a Bengali surgeon, Krishnadhan Ghose, and received an English education at the Loretto Convent School, Darjeeling (1877-9), before he was taken, along with his two elder brothers, to England. After being privately educated for five years, Aurobindo entered St. Paul's School, London, in 1884 and proceeded to King's College, Cambridge in 1889 with a classical scholarship. He proved to be a brilliant scholar, and took first class Honours in the Classics, besides acquiring mastery on English and French. And although he passed the written examination for the I.C.S., he could not finally qualify for the Service, mainly because of his pronounced political views.

Returning to India early in 1893, he found employment in the native State of Baroda, rising to become Vice-Principal and Professor of English and French at the Baroda College. His fourteen years in Baroda were a strenuous period of study, teaching, poetic composition, yoga and secret revolutionary activity. He saw India, not just as a geographical area, but as the Mother unhappily living under foreign subjection. Not seduced by the easy security afforded by his teaching career, he embarked upon a programme of revolutionary action. First he was content to exercise from behind the scenes a long-distance control over a nationwide underground revolutionary organisation that would be ready, when the time came, for armed uprising. His pamphlet Bhavani Mandir was already in circulation among young revolutionaries. In 1906, he openly plunged into political action, moved to Calcutta, and edited the Bande Mataram, voicing a vehement protest against the partition of Bengal and preaching the nationalist cause with missionary fervour. This open espousal of extremist nationalism made him, in the eyes of the alien bureaucracy, the most dangerous man in India. The killing of the Pringle-Kennedy ladies in April, 1908 by two young revolutionaries provided the needed pretext for the arrest and solitary confinement of Aurobindo. After a protracted trial on charges of conspiracy and murder he was honourably acquitted in May, 1909. But during his time in the Alipur jail, he had certain profound mystic experiences which were to make him turn his back on politics and retire to the French settlement at Pondicherry in April, 1910 for the undisturbed pursuit of yoga and spirituality.

In this 'Cave of Tapasya' at Pondicherry, he began working out the meaning of his earlier spiritual experiences and realisations. In collaboration with the French spiritual adept, Mirra (later known as the Mother), he edited the philosophical monthly, Arya, from 1914 to 1921, and established his Ashram in 1926. It was in the Arya that his major works in prose first appeared: The Life Divine, The Synthesis of Yoga, The Secret of the Veda, Essays on the Gita, The Psychology of Social Development ('The Human Cycle'), The Ideal of Human Unity, The Foundations of Indian Culture and The Future Poetry. Although there were always a few disciples living with him at Pondicherry, it was only after the formal establishment of the Ashram in 1926 that more and more sought his spiritual guidance, and thus the Ashram community grew year by year. In the last decade of his life, he was mainly engaged on Savitri, a 24,000–line epic that retells in symboilic terms, and in consonance with his spiritual insights, the ancient Mahabharata story of Savitri's victory over Death and her reclaiming of Satyavan, her husband. Aurobindo was cast in the hallowed mould of India's great sages and Rishis, and it was his destiny to participate in mighty world movements–a free and united India, a resurgent Asia, and emerging world union, the overflow of India's spirituality into Europe and America, and a quantum leap in evolution from the mental to the supermental consciousness–and help to hasten their fulfilment. His Ashram in Pondicherry and 'Auroville' on its outskirts are mini-worlds, spiritual pilot-projects in which several hundred men, women and children, drawn from most of the nationalities of the world, are trying to lay the foundations of the 'Deva Sangha' (the Community of Gods) that Aurobindo had envisaged in his many prophetic writings.

Aurobindo's achievement as a lyricist, dramatist and epic poet, must rank him high among the writers of our time. From Songs to Myrtilla (1895) till almost the end, he composed a large number of lyrics, sonnets and (towards the end) futurist poems in quantitative metre as in Thought the Paraclete and Rose of God. He wrote 5 five-act plays–Perseus the Deliverer, Rodogune, Vasavadutta, The Viziers of Bassora and Eric–that are Elizabethan in their cast, though charged with the Aurobindonian evolutionary dialectic. His early narrative poem, Urvasie (1896), was followed by Love and Death, the heroic poem Bali Prabhou, the unfinished Ilion (a sequel to the Iliad) in quantitative hexametres, and Savitri in 'Kalidasian' blank verse. In richness of content, mastery of the medium and power of articulation, these constitute a body of narrative and epic poetry not surpassed, and but rarely equalled, in contemporary literature.

Whether in The Life Divine, a synthesis of all knowledge in symphonic prose, or in Savitri, the epic of supermental change, Aurobindo's diagnosis of the human predicament is that, while mastery over the outside world has been growing at an accelerated pace, inner development seems to have halted long ago. Our environment is changing fast, but the inner psychological climate has remained the same. In the past, the evolutionary adventure led to the growth of 'life' in 'matter' and later to the burst of 'mind' in 'life'. The time has now come for the leap from 'mind' to 'supermind'. Sri Aurobindo also thought that, with the destined supermental change, there will be change in social and political organisation, and in Art and poetic expression, governed by the 'overhead aesthesis', and the 'future poetry' will increasingly approximate to the inspired Vedic mantra. While this argument is persuasively presented in the Arya sequences earlier (notably The Life Divine, The Psychology of Social Development, The Ideal of Human Unity and The Future Poetry), it is in Savitri that the last-ditch battle in the evolutionary adventure is actually shown as happening, and we have sovereign assurance:

> Nature shall live to manifest secret God,
> The Spirit shall take up the human play,
> This earthly life become the life divine.

Aurobindo's works have been published in 30

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Assamese) Compared to biographies in Assamese, autobiographies are smaller in number. It is because there was no tradition of writing one's own life-story in Assam before the British rule. When the Assamese came to be acquainted with Western literature during the British Period, only then they knew the importance of this branch of literature and started producing it. Assamese autobiography began thus in the 19th century when the British rule was established in the State. But even then no autobiography was published in that century. Publication of autobiographical writings in book-form started only from the forties of the 20th century and most of these publications were posthumous in the beginning. After all, the Assamese at this initial stage of autobiography-writing were naturally shy and apologetic, to break the Indian tradition of not writing about their own selves.

Harkanta Majindar Barua (1815-1901) has been the first in Assamese to write his autobiography. A British government official at the initial stage of British rule in Assam, he went on recording the experiences, incidents and events of his private and official life almost till the end of his life but left the writings unpublished during his life-time. When these were published sixty years after his death in the form of a book entiled Harkanta Sadar-Aminar Atma-Jivani (1960), the book proved to be of immense value as a storehouse of information about the social, economic and political aspects of life in Assam in the 19th century. The first and second part of this book covering the author's life till 1856, are in the narrative form of an autobiography proper, and they contain all the dates and years of the events and incidents narrated here. There is also an introduction to his ancestors. But the third and last part covering the author's life from 1856 to 1890 is in the form of an elaborate diary, containing a day to day record of the author's life. However, this cannot be treated as a diary proper since the original diaries for these years were retouched by the author himself towards the end of his life. The language of the book appears archaic today. But its simple colloquial style of the time has a charm of its own.

Lakshminath Bezbarua's autobiography Mor Jivan Sowaran (Reminiscences of My Life) (Part I, 1945; Part II, 1961), published posthumously, is a very readable work. It narrates not only the story of Bezbarua's life and family but also many other events and activities of his time that have social and cultural importance. Padmanath Gohain Barua's Mor Sowarani (My Reminiscences, 1971), also published posthumously on the occasion of his birth centenary, is another pleasant reading autobiography, throwing light on many known and unknown incidents and events of this writer's life and time, covering the later part of the 19th century and the early part of the 20th, just as Bezbarua's life does.

Another important autobiography of a writer is Mor Jivan Darpan (Mirror of My Life, 1969) by Benudhar Rajkhowa. A government servant of the first half of the 20th century, the author while telling his life's story, focuses light on various aspects of life in Assam. Two other autobiographies by two other writers may be mentioned here together. One is Atitar Sowarani (Reminiscences of the Past, 1973) by Sailadhar Rajkhowa and another is Eri Aha Dinbor (The Days of Life Behind, 1976) by Nalinibala Devi, the last mentioned being the only autobiography so far to be published during the author's life-time. Both these autobiographies reflect not only the two poets' lives but also their times. Nalinibala Devi, the daughter of the reputed political leader Nabin chandra Bardoloi, brings in the freedom movement too, as it touched her and her family.

Pratap Chandra Goswami's Jivan Smriti aru Kamrupi Samaj (Memories of Life and the Society in Kamrup, 1971) is written in a different key. While recollecting the life of the author, a traditional Sanskrit scholar and writer, the author lays emphasis here on the social customs of his place in his time. This has enhanced the importance of the book as a social document too.

Besides these autobiographies, there are a few memoirs of public life by a few public figure, writers and artists. Three of them need special mention here. The first is Congressar Kamciyali Rodat (In the Morning Sun of Congress, 1959) by Benudhar Sharma. It reflects the freedom movement in upper Assam during the twenties and thirties of the present century when the author, a reputed writer and historical researcher, was a young man. The author tells in his typically charming language the story of his involvement in the movement as it affected the towns and villages around him under the magnetic influence of Gandhi. The second memoir is by a devout freedom fighter Krishnanath Sarma. It is Kishna Sarmar Diary (1972) published posthumously. This memoir, not a diary, though called so in the title, has proved itself to be a valuable source of information about the Congress movement in Assam in the early part of the present century.

Hanhi Kandonar Mela (A Fair of Tears and Laughter, 1971) by Kamalnarayan Chowdhury is the third important memoir. A musician and screen artist of repute, Kamalnarayan writes here in the form of stories, his varied experiences of life as an artist. The author consciously makes his memoir unconventional by portraying the personalities or telling the stories of many adorable persons of Assamese music, film, literature and so on while narrating his own experiences in life. A highly readable memoir because of the method of narration, the book brings into focus many background stories of Assamese film and musical history from twenties to the sixties of the 20th century.

Over and above these memoirs of public life, we have a few reminiscences of private life too. One such reminiscence is Mor Jivanar Kichu Katha (A few words regarding my life, 1969) by Nazar Ali. An obscure primary school teacher in an interior village, Nazar Ali while narrating his exclusively private life, brings to light here many important aspects of village life, especially Muslim village life in Assam in the early part of the 20th century. Another important reminiscence is Jivan-Sowaran (Reminiscence of Life, Vol. I, 1979) by Rajendralal Uzir. Though this too is the story of an exclusively private life, it deserves public attention for the descriptions of life and living condition in Assam in the first three decades of the 20th century and the last decade of the 19th. What is more, the book contains the author's experiences as a young man in the first World War in Europe.

Summing up, it may be said about Assamese autobiography that it shows little variety in contents. Besides this limitation in subject matter, there is a limitation in its nature too. All the Assamese autobiographers, reminiscence or memoir writers have brought to light only the bright aspects of their life. There is little self-analysis or self-criticism in Assamese autobiographical writings. So a really frank autobiography like that of Gandhi or Rousseau or Bertrand Russell is still a far cry.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Bengali). Though poets in premodern Bengali literature had sometimes introduced themselves in their writings, autobiography as a form of literature had to wait for the growth of Bengali prose. The 19th century awakening in Bengal shattered the old concept of man being only a member of a religious sect, caste or professional guild. That he is an individual with his own personal sentiments and emotions was a new concept that claimed and received respect. People came in contact with English education and the world came closer. English history was being taught in schools and colleges and events of personal heroism, courage and dedication captured the imagination of the rising Bengali intelligentsia. Along with these changes autobiography as a form of self expression also had an ever-expanding attraction for new writers and social reformers. Persons who could not shape their experiences in story telling found in the form of autobiography a way to express their sensitive reactions to the hundred and one calls of the world they lived in. Even those who were masters in the art of novel writing also did not leave this form of expression untouched. Beginning with Rabindranath Tagore till the present day short story writers and novelists have also explored this form.

In the old Bengali poetry most of the poets supplied some information about themselves, the patronage they had received from kings and zamindars, their own parentage and some times the society they lived in. Such autobiographical notes may be found in the Ramayana by Krittibas, whose date has not yet been finally ascertained. Mukundaram Chakrabarty (16th century), the poet of Chandimangal while introducing himself drew a picture of the terrible situation the peoples were then living in. He realised that without a reference to the social condition around him his own introduction would be incomplete.

Persons like Raja Rammohan Roy and Iswarchandra Vidyasagar wrote something about themselves but their works were not autobiographies in the real sense but a bunch of autobiographical information. Rammohan Roy did it through the medium of English but this goes to show that from the beginning of the 19th century the educated Bengalis could appreciate the beauty and utility of this new form.

The most important autobiographical writing in Bengali literature, (Maharshi Devendranath Thakurer Atmajivani, 1898) is by Devendranath Tagore, the leader of the Brahmo movement in Bengal, widely acclaimed as a saintly religious personality for his integrity of character and deep religious realisation. Being the leader of a new progressive sect within the Hindu circle he had many battles to fight. He not only reassessed certain rites and ideas of the traditional faith by a rational judgement, but from his own aesthetic perception worked out a new mode of worship which attracted a large section of the educated people of his time. His father Dwarakanath Tagore was a legendary figure who by his own effort and imagination became one of the pioneering Indians who had taken to commerce and industry. He amassed vast wealth but after his untimely death in 1843 the business house had to face unforeseen calamities and Devendranath, honest as he was, decided to do away with every material possession to satisfy the debtors and to uphold the honour and prestige of the family with a serene composure of mind. But he, on the one hand, reorganised his estate and on the other gave a new spurt to the Brahmo movement. He wrote history of his own remarkable life. There was no model before him, but the simple and lyrical language in which he expressed himself made it one of the most important autobiographies in the Bengali language. The three leaders of the Brahmo movement Rajnarain Bose (Atmacharit), Krishna Kumar Mitra and Shivnath Shastri (Atmacharit) wrote about their own experiences of life, which contained valuable material for historical research, but from the literary point of view lacked the flavour and tenderness of Devendranath's writings. While Devendranath was expressing the tale of his inner growth, the others were writing of the growing Brahmo movement and their respective roles in it.

In 1866, long before the publication of autobiographies just mentioned, a book was published with the title Amar Jiban. The author, Rassundari Devi, was an ordinary woman and nothing was remarkable about her story. But that some one who spent her life entirely within the four walls of her house could think of writing an autobiography is in itself a striking incident. The women in Bengal at that time were denied every freedom. Expression of agony caused by utter subjection of the womenfolk is punctuated with other not-so-bitter experiences. The popular position of the writer and the time of its publication make this book worth mentioning but on the whole it had not much influence on the art of autobiographical writing in Bengali literature.

Rabindranath Tagore's autobiography which was published in 1912 with the title Jiban Smriti, still remains the best of its kind and according to some critics the best book written in Bengali prose. Tagore was reluctant to write the story of his own life. So he had tried to depict the growth of a young boy as a poet, his inner sensibilities, his gradual development to maturity, as if it was some one else's story though written in the first person. While reading this book one should remember that he is reading the reminiscences of a romantic poet who has not taken much trouble to state factual events in the correct chronological order. How the sights and sounds charmed the mind of a child, how the flying birds roused in him a craving for the far, how he reacted to the sweet flowing rhymes of Jaidev, how with the sonorous sound of ' Om Bhurbhubaswa' (prayer to the earth, the sky and the heavens) his mind spread out over a wide area are certain representative topics of the book. It is the biography of a poet in the making written by the poet himself. In his later years he wrote a book for the children Chhelebela (Boyhood times) in a much easier language. Some of his articles, where he has tried to analyse his poetic personality have been bunched together under the title Atma Parichaya. Tagore, who consciously would not love to write an autogriography remains the master of that genre in Bengali literature.

From the beginning of the twentieth century people from different walks of life took fancy for writing autobiographies. There are quite a number of books written by the revolutionaries who have spent years in jails and suffered much. To meet the pressing demand of the journals, writers, sportsmen, musicians, film stars, painters, journalists have all attempted to write autobiographies and many of their writings are of a very high standard. Apan Katha (Abanindranath Tagore), Atma Katha (Pramatha Choudhury), Amar Kaler Katha (Tarasankar Bandopadhyaya), Yatri (Saumyendranath Tagore), Amar Jiban (Nabinchandra Sen), Amar Katha (Binodini Dasi), Smritichitran (Parimal Goswami) are some of them.

This form of writing in Bengali has reached maturity and some of the good books in Bengali literature are autobiographies.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (English). Autobiography is the gift of Western education to India. The first piece of autobiographical writing in Indian English is Raja Rammohan Roy's short autobiographical sketch (1833). Its authenticity has not been conclusively established, and it is a rather matter-of-fact document. Of greater literary interest is the brief account of himself given by the poet Kashiprasad Ghose, in a letter published in James Lang's Handbook of Bengal Missions (1848). The first extensive autobiography (1857) is by Lutufullah, a tutor in Persian, Arabic and Hindustani to British officers. Partly travel diary and partly autobiography, Lutufullah's book is the expression of a man who was not only well-read (he quotes from Shakespeare and Bacon), enterprising, observant and broadminded but also bold in his judgement of British character and society. Novelist Lal Behari Dey's Recollections of My School Days, serialized in the Bengal Magazine (1873 to 1876) extols the virtues of English education and proclaims its superiority to oriental learning. Apart from these, Nishikanta Chattopadhyaya's Reminiscences of German University Life (1892) and two diaries viz. Rakhal Das Haldar's The English Diary of an Indian Student (written during 1861-2, published in 1903) and the Diary of the Late Raja of Kolhapur during his Visit to Europe in 1870 (1872)-are the only attempts at autobiographical writing in English by Indians in the 19th century.

Indian English autobiography appears to have become considerably diversified in the first half of the 20th century. While men from different walks of life now attempt autobiographical writing, the first women autobiographers also make their appearance. The overwhelming question in Indian life upto 1947 was the quest for independence; it is therefore but natural that a large number of men engaged in the freedom-struggle should have produced a considerable body of autobiographical writing. Various shades of political thinking are represented here. Surendranath Banerjee's A Nation in Making (1925) is an apologia for moderate politics. Autobiographies by more radical Congressmen include Lala Lajpat Rai's The Story of my Deportation (1908), and Jawaharlal Nehru's An Autobiography (1936), which is easily one of the major autobiographies in world literature. Though it does not cover the last and the most significant twenty five years of his life, it is at once a piece of searching self-analysis, a living record of the eventful course of Indian history, a mine of vivid pen-portraits and a model of urbane and trenchant prose. Barindrakumar Ghose's The Tale of My Exile (1928) and B.K. Sinha's In Andamans : The Indian Bastille (1939) are notable autobiographies by revolutionaries.

Among autobiographies by writers are Dhan Gopal Mukherji's Caste and Outcaste (1923), a highly nostalgic account of his boyhood and youth and Mulk Raj Anand's Apology for Heroism (1946), which besides offering a much more objective analysis, also remains a valuable aid to the understanding of his fiction. K. Subba Rao's Revived Memories (1933) is one of the earliest autobiographies by a journalist.

Other autobiographers of the period include social reformers like D.K. Karve (Looking Back, 1936); men of God, like Swami Ramdas (In Quest of God, 1923), officials like A. Balakrishna Mudaliar (Reminiscences of a Retired Hindu official, 1905); an educationist, G.K. Chettur (The Last Enchantment, 1933) and a jurist, Chimanlal Setalwad (Recollections and Reflections : An Autobiography, 1946).

The first Indian woman to write an autobiography in English was Sunity Devi, Maharani of Cooch Behar. (Autobiography of an Indian Princess 1921). Both of Nehru's sisters wrote autobiographies. Vijayalakshmi Pandit's So I Became a Minister, Prison Days and The Scope of Happiness appeared in 1936, 1945 and 1979 respectively, and Krishna Huthee Singh wrote With No Regrets (1944) and We Nehrus (1968).

The post-Independence period (1947) has continued to produce an equally rich harvest of autobiographies, those by men in politics and public life being now more numerous. Among the most outstanding of these are Morarji Desai's The Story of My Life (Vol. I-III, 1974, 1979), and M.R. Masani's Bliss Was in that Dawn (1977). Some notable memoirs by diplomats are K.P.S. Menon's Many Worlds (1965) and Apa B. Pant's A Moment in Time (1974). Those by eminent jurists include M.C. Mahajan's Looking Back (1963) and M.C. Chagla's elegantly written Roses in December (1973). Prominent examples of autobiographies by civil servants and other officials are Prakash Tandon's vivid Punjabi Century (1961) and Beyond Punjab (1971) and S.K. Chettur's The Steel Frame and I : Life in the I.C.S. (1962).

Of the life-stories by authors, the most remarkable is Nirad. C. Chaudhuri's The Autobiography of an Unknown Indian (1951). Though the author calls it more of a national than personal history, the historical aspect of the book remains controversial but the depiction of the man–a very unusual Indian–and his milieu in it and its stylistic excellence have justly made it a classic. Ved Mehta's Face to Face (1963), Sasthi Brata's My God Died Young (1967), Dom Moraes's My Son's Father (1968) and R.K. Narayan's My Days are other notable examples. Those by journalists include K. Rama Rao's The Pen as My Sword (1960) and Frank Moraes's Witness to an Era (1973).

Women autobiographers form a sizable class which includes Nayantara Sahgal, Kamla Das, the poet, whose My Story (1976) is in the same vein as her confessional poetry and Lady Dhanvanthi Rama Raus' An Inheritance, (1978).

Among the other numerous autobiographers are artists (Ravi Shankar : My Music, My Life, 1968) and educationists (D.C. Pavate : Memories of an Educational Administrator, 1964), while Hazari's An Indian Outcaste (1951) is a unique example of the life-story of a member of the depressed classes.

M.K.N.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Gujarati). In middle ages, it was against the tradition of Indian culture to talk about one's own self because it would amount to committing the sin of self-praise. It was only after the influence of western culture through education that subjective mode for expression developed in Gujarati literature.

It was Narmad who first consciously wrote autobiography and printed a few copies for private use. He pledged at the outset to tell the truth and truth alone. Accordingly he gives a faithful account of his personal life and activities in his Mari Hakikat (written in 1866 and published in 1933) but abstains from giving certain details of his love-affairs, etc., so as not to make public the names of the persons involved. He takes pains to give correct details of his birth, childhood, association with friends social activities, literary pursuits and so on. Even at the risk of being inconsistent he sticks to the facts, e.g, his views on social reform and idol worship, talk with his first wife Dahigauri on the issue of his re-marriage, his clash with the Vaishnav Maharaj Jadunathji, etc. While talking about himself as well as about others, he is thoroughly outspoken. This trait of his personality is reflected in his prose style which though rugged and uncouth is powerful and picturesque. Though the narration stops at 1866, Mari Hakikat lays a solid foundation for the development of Gujarati autobiography in the right direction.

Next comes Manilal Dvivedi. He handed over the manuscript of his autobiography to his trusted friend Anandshankar Dhruva before death, which the latter preserved throughout his life. During 1930-32, Anandshankar published some excerpts of Manilal's autobiography under pressure from several young enthusiasts. But he soon stopped doing so as soon as the agitation subsided. The manuscript saw the light of day as late as 1979.

Manilal started to write an account of his life on February 1887 and by May 1, 1887 completed the story. Subsequently he maintained a diary in which he noted important events of his life at certain intervals. Uptill August 22, 1895, he wrote 27 such notes. The account of the last three years is not available.

Manilal's autobiography differs from Narmad's in two respects. He mentions his achievements briefly but narrates in detail his weaknesses and moral lapses. Since he was sure that the manuscript would not be read by anyone during his life-time, he made free confessions and impulsive statements in respect of conflicts in his private and public life. Like Gandhiji and Tolstoy, Manilal tells the truth but rather crudely. He does not aim at self purification or spiritual advancement through introspection. He simply presents his life, crude and naive, full of contradictions, but does so truthfully. It reminds one of the confessions of Rousseau or Havelock Ellis, and as such stands unparalleled in Gujarati literature.

A couple of autobiographies need to be mentioned before we reach another milestone. They are Hum Pote (My self, 1900) of Narayan Hemchandra and Mara Anubhavni Nondh (1912) written by Bhaishankar Nanabhai. Since Narayan was a great traveller, his autobiography becomes an interesting travelogue, describing the traits of the peoples and places he visited. Though frank and humble by nature, Narayan lacked literary grace and sense of proportion. The reputed solicitor Bhaishankar narrates his own experiences of life and draws lessons from each of them. Half the bulk of the book is devoted to Shankara Vedanta, Vairagyashataka and miscellaneous verses that have hardly any relevance to the central theme.

Gandhi's autobiography titled Satyana Prayogo (Experiments with Truth) is the highest peak of that form in Gujarati literature. At the time of its first appearance (1925-1929), neither Narmad's nor Manilal's autobiography was out. It was Gandhiji's Atmakatha that provided a model to the writers of autobiography. Gandhiji clearly stated at the outset that he was primarily interested in narrating his experiments with truth, which might incidentally weave the story of his life. Like Tolstoy he too made truth the hero of his tale. While narrating his experiences, which do not extend beyond 1925, he tests his inner self on the touchstone of truth with due repentance and modesty.

In humility and purity of expression Gandhiji excels all. Instead of events of glory he chose those that inspired him to achieve spiritual progress through introspection. He wields simple but admirable style of narration. He draws realistic pen-pictures of men and events with restraint, exhibiting a wonderful sense of proportion. Thus, in content and form, Gandhiji's Atmakatha stands unsurpassed as a perfect autobiography.

Kakasaheb (Dattatreya Balkrishna) Kalelkar picked up the ideal provided by Gandhiji's Atmakatha while depicting reminiscences of his early life in Smaranayatra (1934) in the sense that there is an under-current of self-analysis based on unflinching faith in truth. He talks to the reader in the vein of a common man with uncommon sensitivity. His optimistic approach to life, minute observation, unfailing sense of humour and lively style of narration maintain the interest throughout.

Passing by Sharda Mehta's Jivan-Sambharanan (1939), the first autobiography of a lady, written with the purpose of guiding women to fight the conservative social force, we reach another landmark set by Kanaiyalal Maneklal Munshi, the doyen of Gujarati novel. He began writing his memoirs for the journal Kaumudi in 1932, but the complete autobiography running into three books, viz. Adadhe Raste, Sidhan Chadhan and Madhvaranya, was published in 1942-43.

Munshi gives creative turn to Gujarati autobiography. Fidelity to truth preached by Narmad and perfectly practised by Gandhiji is in a way replaced by imaginative mode of narration in Munshi. He brings novel and autobiography very close to each other. As Vishvanath Bhatt says, Munshi has given creative autobiography in order to prove that biography is not science but art.

Munshi's story is full of adventures, real as well as imaginary and colourful characters. While giving an account of early life, youth and of public activities, he creates an unreal atmosphere of utopia, which persists till the end. This reads like a novel.

Munshi thus gives an artistic twist to autobiography, but at the cost of truth. His ego is projected throughout converting his own story into an imaginary tale of superman born with superhuman faculties. This hardly leaves any scope for self-analysis or confession of lapses. Despite this serious flaw, Munshi's autobiography has attracted many lovers of creative literature.

In his autobiography Athamate Ajvale (1944) Dhansukhlal K. Mehta talks of his past experiences in a light vein, offering a faithful picture of the life-style of the people of his native place Surat. Portraits of his friends and associates in the fields of art and culture drawn here virtually construct the story of amateur activities in those fields. Sorrowful events impart a tragic touch to the otherwise pleasant account of Dhansukhlal's life.

Panchoterme (1946) is a collection of lectures delivered by Balvantrai K. Thakore at various places from Pune to Bhavnagar on the occasion of the celebration of his diamond jubilee. To these lectures he has appended a note of 1000 pages giving a glimpse of his life, of the forces that moulded his character, and sketches of the members of his family with details, indicating his love of learning, aesthetic taste and progressive outlook. Far from being a full-fledged autobiography this note should be considered as a source book of his biography.

Next comes Ramanlal Vasantlal Desai, a popular novelist of the Gandhian era. Gai Kal (1950) and Madhyahnanan Mrigajal (1956) constitute his autobiography. It is full of rambling thoughts on the fast changing contemporary social life. He compares the two generations in the light of his own experience.

'Dhumketu' (Gaurishankar G. Joshi), the prince of Gujarati short story, has given Jivanpanth (1949) and Jivanrang (1956) depicting his life upto 1926. While narrating his life-story 'Dhumketu' identifies himself with the past and speaks the language of a sensitive poet. Unlike Munshi he controls his ego and honestly talks of poverty, Brahministic style of living and old customs that influenced his character. He will long be remembered for his sincere and outspoken style of narration.

The veteran freedom fighter, fearless journalist and bold social reformer Indulal Yajnik has substantially contributed to this genre of literature also. His autobiography, running into five parts (1955-1958), furnishes a vivid and faithful account of the social and political currents of Gujarat that were fast changing during the first four decades of the 20th century.

The wide range of public activity depicted herein can easily stand in comparision with that of Gandhiji's life. His indomitable spirit of love and dedication for the people of Gujarat pervades the entire account and yet there is not a trace of self-love to mar its truthful beauty. Apart from being an inspiring story of the self-less struggle of a towering personality Indulal's autobiography furnishes significant information about the cultural and political history of modern Gujarat.

Another prolific writer of autobiography is C.C. Mehta. There has been a subtended flow of his life story in a series of eleven books. Bandh Gathariyan, Parts I & II (1954), Chhod Gathariyan (1956), Rang Gathariyan (1965), Roop Gathariyan (1965), Natya Gathariyan (1971), Antar Gathariyan, Part I & II (1971,1973), Dhrub Gathariyan (1973) and Ganth Bandhaniyan (1976)–one wonders at the multi-dimensional canvas on which the author's experience is presented covering a wide range of fields from theatre and literature to railways and astrology. His curiosity knows no bounds. He has travelled far and wide. He draws impressive pen-pictures of the places and persons he visited abroad. His narration is lively and vivacious. Like Indulal Yajnik, he too admits his weaknesses and repents for injustice done to his wife. Being himself a renowned theatre-artist, he furnishes interesting information about theatres and theatre artists of different countries. His prose-style has a special literary quality which reflects wit, humour, satire, love, anger, arrogance, grace, pity, hope, despair and such other shades of his temper. Chandravadan is a successful craftsman of this literary form. This is perhaps the last milestone of Gujarati autobiography in its course of development as a full-fledged literary form.

Other works worth mentioning are Smritisamvedan (1954) by the literary journalist Champshi V. Udeshi, Samsmarano (1971) by Ganesh Vasudev Mavlankar, Atmakatha (1971) written by the social thinker Sumant Mehta and Marun Jivanvritta (1980) an inspiring story of struggle for learning after losing eyesight by the well-known scholar Pandit Sukhlal.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY(Hindi). The oldest autobiographical work in Hindi is the Ardha Katha (1641) by Banarasi Das, a Jaina poet and a near contemporary of Emperor Akbar. The author has frankly and unhesitatingly exposed his own shortcomings and foibles.

Like biography, autobiography too appeared on the literary scene for the first time in the Bharatendu period (1851-1900). In April, 1879 Alcott persuaded Swami Dayananda Saraswati to write his autobiography. The Swami agreed and his autobiography originally written in Hindi was published in the numbers of the journal Theosophist from October, 1879 to November, 1880. Those who attempted to write their autobiographies are Bharatendu Harishchandra, Radhacharan Goswami, Pratapnarayan Misra and Ambikadutt Vyas. But they could not complete their works. As a matter of fact, these sketches are akin more to memoirs than to autobiographies. They tell more about the events in their life than about their inner self, their character and personality.

The Dwivedi period (1901-26) is definitely richer in this genre. Bhai Parmanand's Kale Pani Ki Karavas Kahani tells about the cruelties and inhuman tortures perpetrated upon the prisoners in the British jails. Kalyan marg ka pathik by Swami Shraddhanand is a milestone in Hindi autobiography. Mahavirprasad Dwivedi himself tries his hand but his work is more of an autobiographical essay than an autobiography.

In the Post-Dwivedi Period (1927-1947), Hans was the principal journal of the age which tried to bring literary and social changes in the Hindi speaking region. Premchand, at the cost of his health and inspite of heavy monetary loss, continued with its publication. The autobiographical number of Hans (September, 1931) is a landmark in the field of autobiographical writing. It contains 32 titles, all autobiographical. Prominent among those who contributed to it are–Premchand, Lakshmidhar Bajpai, Jaishankar Prasad, Ramchandra Shukla, Vinod shankar Vyas, Bhai Parmanand, Srinath Sinha, and Jainendra Kumar.

Hindi autobiographical writing came into its own with the autobiographies by Ramprasad 'Bismil' 'Lala Lajpatrai and Swami Satyanand's Swatantrata Ki Khoj.

Authors like Balkrishna Sharma 'Navin', Ambika prasad Bajpai, Shyamsundar Das, Rahul Sankrityayana and Gulab Rai wrote their autobiographies. Meri Atma Kahani by Shyamsundar Das concentrates on the author alone, it seldom dispassionately throws light on the contemporary events and individuals : Rahul Sankrityayan's Meri Jivan Yatra (4 volumes) is more descriptive than analytical and does not reveal the man.

The two other autobiographies which attract our attention are written by Rajendra Prasad and Bhavani Dayal Sanyasi. The Atma Katha by Rajendra Prasad tells more of the age than of the writer and the modern India. Rajendra Prasad in his introdution to the book by Bhavam Dayal has correctly said, "This is the story not only of the Swami but is the image of modern India through the mirror of Swami's life,".

Viyogi Hari's Mera Jeevan Pravah (1948) tells more about the literary activities of the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Allahabad and his services to Harijans than about his own self. Similarly, Shantipriya Dwivedi's Parivrajak ki praja (1952) is more a story of a literature than of a individual man. Chand Suraj ke biran (3 parts) by Devendra Satyarthi is different. In the first two parts, the writer gives a glimpse of his childhood and school days. The book is written in an interesting style but there is so much emotion that facts are lost. Atma Nivedan (3 parts) (1958) by Seth Govind Das gives a personal history of the freedom movement. Sant Ram's Mere Jivan ke Anubhava (1963) tells more about the events related to narrow casteism and sectarianism than about the author's personal life. Zyada Apni Kam parayi by Upendranath 'Ashk' throws light on the writer's literary personality and his views on literature. Similarly, Meri Apni Katha by Padum Lal Punnalal Bakhshi is more about the contemporary literatures than about his own self. Bachapan Ki Katha by Rahul Sankrityayan presents not only the early life of the author but also the environment. Devraj in his Yauvan Ke Dwar Par (1970) has emphasised the techniques of psycho-analysis in this genre. Thus most of the autobiographies written in this period tell more about the persons. The only exceptions are Uljhi Smrtiyan by Vinodshankar Vyas, 'Yadon Ki Parchhayan (1956) by Chatursen Sastri, Apni Khabar (1960) by Bechan Sharma 'Ugra'. Bachpan Ke Do Din by Devraj Upadhyay, Kya Bhulun Kya Yad Karun (1963-69) and Nid Ka Nirman (1970) by Hari vansh rai Bachchan. They tell more about the personal life of the authors than about the outside world. Chatursen's work, besides presenting beautiful sketches of the people who came in his contact, paints the picture of his childhood and informs us about India's cultural heritage. It gives an authentic record of the important historical events like the bomb attack at Lord Hardinge, the martyrdom of Swami Sraddhanand and the death of Lokmanya Tilak. Vrindavanlal Verma's Apni Kahani (1970) is a record of hardships undergone courageously by a man of strong will and deep faith.

Among the autobiographies written by the revolutionaries, Sinhavalokan (3 parts) written by Yashpal (1951-55) is noteworthy. Yashpal's book not only gives an exhaustive history of the armed revolution in India but also reveals the character and personality of the author.

Ajitprasad Jain (Agyat Jivan), Bhavani Dayal Sanyasi (Pravasi Ki Atma Katha), Gangaprasad Upadhyaya (Jivan Chakra) and Janki Dévi Bajaj (Meri Jivan Yatra) are notable among those who came from the political and social fields. Pravasi Ki Atma Katha and Jeevan Chakra are different from other works because the former tells about hardships of the Indians in South Africa and their efforts to get human rights, and the latter gives a detailed account of the missionary work done for spreading the Vedic religion in foreign countries. Nardev Shastri's Atma Katha (five parts) deserves mention because it is written by a non-Hindi speaking South Indian. Meri Jivan Gatha (1948) by Ganeshprasad Varni, a veteran Jain saint, is written in the style of fiction. Swami Satyadev Parivrajak's Swatantrata Ki Khoj Mein tells us about his experiences during his travels far and wide.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Kannada). Autobiography as a literary form has not attracted many Kannada writers. Though some have put their hands to it with distinct and distinguished success, they have been few and far between. But autobiography as a form of writing has been popular enough with the reading public. This explains the phenomenon that autobiographies translated into Kannada from other languages outnumber original ones. Even if the number of original autobiographies is small, it is to some extent supplemented by books of memoirs and reminiscences which can be rightly regarded as partial autobiograhpies. Autobiographical writing in Kannada can therefore be classified under three heads: (1) Original autobiographies (2) Memoirs and Reminiscences, and (3) autobiographies translated from other languages.

Masti's Bhava in three volumes in which he recounts the story of his life in extenso is not merely the longest autobiography in Kannada but besides being a narrative of his life, development and work, it recreates the entire background; social, cultural and in particular, literary, of the entire period. Apart from the story of his own progress as a writer, the three volumes depict the way Kannada literature as a whole has developed during the six decades of his life with which it deals. This is only natural in as much as Masti is one of the major architects of modern Kannada literature. So Bhava in its three volumes while being an account of his life, his childhood and education, his distinguished career as a civil servant and his work for Kannada after his retirement from services—details how a sensitive and righteous temperament evolved and expressed itself in a variety of outstanding works in almost all branches of literature. Less voluminous but equally revealing is Huchchu Manisina Hattu Mukhagalu by Shivaram Karanth. As implied by the title which means "the many faces of a crazy mind" the book records the many sided interests, experiments and efforts of the writer in many other fields than literature proper including the arts. Unique among Kannada writers as Karanth is for the wealth and diversity of life's experience, the story of his struggles and achievements reveals the evolution of a many-faceted personality whose dominant pursuit is fullness of life in all its aspects and based on a rationalistic approach as a practical, personal as well as a social ideal. The book can aptly be described as the story of his experiments with experience. Similar in approach but different in temper is Sriranga's Sahitya Atmajijnase which, as the title indicates, is an exploration and dissection of the writer within himself. It portrays the making of a dramatist whose experience early in life had fostered a rebellious and critical attitude towards hypocrisy of all kinds and whose close study of the Mahabharata had made dramatic dialogues his favourite medium of expression. The story of his struggles in developing and popularising the new drama of ideas and building for it a new theatre of educated amateurs is the story of the way modern Kannada drama has grown during the last half a century. Javare Gowda's Horatada Baduku is an account of another kind of struggle—a struggle against indigence and all kinds of odds inherent in poor rural background. It is a narrative of how persevereance and courage shaped a village youth into an eminent academic, an author, a university Professor and finally a Vice-Chancellor of a University and all along an inveterate protagonist of the Kannada cause. The recently published autobiography of Basavaraj Kattimani portrays a similar fight against rural poverty and ignorance, against hypocrisies of religious and social leaders and the inhumanities of the exploitation of the downtrodden. The account reveals how the angry young man became a trenchant critic of the existing social order. All the writers noted above are masters of prose, each in his own way, a fact which makes their autobiographies remarkable as much for their contents as for their style. To these should be added the accounts of their life's struggles by Beechi and G.P. Rajaratnam.

Apart from these full-fledged autobiographies, there are essays, short and long, which are essentially autobiographical and which could justifiably be regarded as partial attempts at that form of writing. Kannada Sahityajnara Atmakathana brings together several such essays by eminent writers like Govind Pai, Betgeri Krishnasharma, Devudu, Gokak, Mugali, Shamba Joshi, Uttangi, A.R. Krishna Sastri, C.K. Venkataramayya, R.V. Jagirdar (Sriranga) and D.R. Bendre. Of these the last two have written more extensively about themselves in Atmajinjnasa and the second in his Chaturmukha and in the opening issue of Manvantara in which he has described the background of his poetry and the making of his poetic personality. Simpi Linganna in his Muvattaidu Varshagalu narrates the sweet and sour experiences of the thirtyfive years of his life. Alur Venkarao's Nanna Jivana Smritigalu recollects events from his life which made him an early advocate of Karnataka's historical and cultural heritage.

Autobiographical accounts of stage and film artistes, actors and musicians, narrated by them and recorded by others, even if less remarkable for their literary quality, have added to the wealth and variety of experiences acquired during years of struggle in their respective fields of endeavour. Such, for the most part, have appeared in popular magazines and periodicals but some of them like Gubbi Veeranna's account of the travails of his celebrated dramatic company make absorbing reading.

Memoirs, reminiscences and excerpts from personal diaries cannot strictly be discussed as partial autobiogrphies to the extent that they deal with the person's personal life in one or other of its aspects. Kuvempu's voluminous Nenapina Doniyalli (On Memory's Boat) and the three volumes of Karanth's Smritipataladinda are remarkable for the wealth of detail they provide about the two eminent writers. Kuvempu takes the reader on a long journey down the memory lane, aided by notes and excerpts from journals and builds up an accurate account of his development as a poet and writer. Karanth's three volumes of memoirs are arranged subject-wise. The first two volumes recount his experiences of the world of Nature, his work in the areas of drama, education, literature, the fine arts and his dealing with the business world. The third volume deals with social relationships. All in all, these volumes describe, as he says, the ways in which certain areas of interests attracted him and provided him with the means of enriching his experiences in these fields. V. Sitaramiah's reminiscences of his college days reconstruct the truly academic atmosphere of his University and the beauty and charm of the city of Mysore during the second decade of the twentieth century. His Mumbaivsa describes the experiences of his short stay in Bombay during the early twenties when he worked for a while in the Currency Office and brings to life the City as it then was in those pages. Navaratna Rama Rao's Kelavu Nenapugalu is among the most delighful books in this categroy. An upright administrator who could stand his ground against his alien official superior, a sensitive lover of the arts and things of beauty, an officer who never ignored the human side of his problems, never overbearing or high-handed but capable of humour—such is the personality that emerges from these delectable pages. Similar books by the composer Vasudevachar and the great scholar Rallapalli recreate pictures of their great contemporaries in the world of music just as Ranganatha Diwakar recalls his experiences in prison during the freedom struggle. All these provide autobiographical matter and supplement the few full fledged writings in that field.

Autobiographical literature in Kannada has also been considerably supplemented and enriched by translation from other languages. Taken together, to some extent, they compensate for the rather meagre output of original, full-fledged autobiographies in Kannada.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Malayalam). Vaikam Pachu Muthatu (1815-1882) is believed to have been the first writer of an autobiography in Malayalam. It is a short sketch dealing with a few incidents in the author's life. Kovunni Nedugadi's grammatical treatise, Keralakaumdi (1878), and Valia Koil Thampuran's Ente Mrigayasmaranakal (Memories of my Hunting) also contain some bigoraphical details of the respective authors. The first important autobiography is that of K.Ramakrishna Pillai (1878-1916), who has given a clear picture of his life in his Ente Nadukadathal (My Banishment), 1911, which has ever since been acknowleded as one of the best of this genre. His wife B. Kalyani Amma (1883-1959) later wrote touchingly about their short but eventful married life in her Vyazhavattasmaranakal (Memories of the Twelve Years), a work marked by sincerity, love, devotion and understnading. Her Ormayil Ninnu (From Memory), is a continuation.

In the 1930's and 1940's there appeared a number of autobiographies, of which R. Easware Pillai's (1834-1940) Smaranakal, C.V. Kunjiraman's Asan Smaranakal, and Sahitya Panchananan P.K. Narayan Pillai's Smaranamandalam and E.V. Krishna Pillai's Jivta smarankas are important. Though published a little later, E.M. Kovoor's Gnan Kanda E.V. (The E.V. I saw) is also significant. Of these, perhaps the most fascinating is the autobiography of E.V. Krishna Pillai, for whom life was a big joke. His disarming candour and penetarating insight have made the work memorable.

The next two decades saw the publication of the autobiogrphies of a number of men distinguished in public life. The foremost among the writers is Sardar K.M. Panikker, whose Atmakatha appeared in 1953. It deals with the author's brilliant career as a historian, educationist and diplomat. The book gives the impression that the writer's private life was engulfed in the details of the life he lived in the luxurious courts of Indian princes and the far-flung corridors of Indian diplomacy. He has not enlightened the reader as to how he got the title 'Sardar'. Again, amidst the numerous exploits of his maternal uncles he did not find enough time or space to make more than just one reference to his father.

C. Kesavan (1891-1969) is another writer of the period. His Jivitasamara (The struggle of life, in two parts) is a valuable document giving a clear picure of the long-drawn out struggle of his life. He was a champion of equality and justice and a fighter for national freedom. The book does not describe the events in a sequential order.

K.P. Kesava Menon's Kazhinja Kalam (The Bygone Days) is another valuable autobiography in Malayalam. There is the picturesque narration of his personal experiences in various walks of life including his experience the struggle for freedom and social justice.

The autobiographies by Mannathu Padmanabhan (1878-1960), the founder-leader of the Nair Service Society, A.K. Gopalan, a communist leader of India, P. Kesava Dev, the prolific novelist, are remarkable, each in its own way. The works respectively are Ente Jeevitsmarankal (1957), A.K.G. Yute Atmakatha (1958-59), Etirpu (1950-60) and Kozhinja Elakal (1960). In all these one finds a heroic fight against odds, sometimes social and political and sometimes literary and personal. They also clearly bring out a luminous account of contemporary life in Kerala as the authors saw and participated in it.

In addition, there are over a fifty autobigoraphies written mostly by creative writers such as M.P. Paul, C.I. Raman Nair, Ullor S. Parameswara Iyer, N. Srikantan Nair, C.K. Mattam, P.J. Cherian, Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai, G. Sankar Kurup, K.A. Damodara Menon, etc. Some autobiogiraphies are also translated into Malayalam mainly from English or through English.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Manipuri) The first autobiography in Manipuri, Jiban Charit by Lairenmayum Iboongohal Singh (1895-1966), was published in 1975 by his son. He was a magistrate by profession. Besides, he was a great researcher, pioneer writer of modern age in Manipuri literature, an artist, a singer, an educationist, and a known social worker. The book tells the life history of the writer in the early decades of the twentieth century. As he was connected with important government and public activities, his life history depicts, by and large, a large portion of the social life. More emphasis is given to facts and figures and there is less of literary flavour in the composition.

The second and latest autobiography is Punsi Saktam (Life Sketch) by Asangbam Minaketan Singh. The book was published in two volumes, first in 1982 and second in 1983. The author is a great poet, essayist, dramatist, literary critic, a translator and a noted researcher. He is a teacher by profession though for some time he was in a very high postion in the administration. As a historian he is quite loyal to facts and figures and there are instances of high poetic imagination in the book. The author analyses his society like a social scientist and thereby provides a picture of social and cultural development of Manipuri and Manipur during his time. At times his poetic vision is so high that factual data have been set aside. Even then, loyalty towards history is not disturbed. The author is so accustomed to decorative language that he cannot do away with it even in the composition of an autobiography which is mostly factual. Sometimes he writes in poetic prose.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Marathi) is a genre that has attracted a large number of writers. Autobiography of Nana Phadnis, a Finance Minister of Maratha Kingdom in the 18th century is well-known in this regard. In Marathi, special interest is shown by lady writers in writing their autobiogiraphies. Ramabai Ranade's Amachya Ayushyatil Kahi Athavani (1910) and Mazi Kahani of Parvatibai Athavale (1928) are worth mentioning. An uneducated and poor widow finding an opportunity for visiting the U.S.A. and collecting funds for social institutions in Maharasthra is an example of much interest. Smritichitre by Laxmibai Tilak (1934-36) is a masterpiece of Marathi literature. She has depicted in it her simple, domestic life with feeling. Maze Puran (1944) by Anandibai alias Baya Karve is an account of her humble service to the cause of girls' education. Smaran Sakhali (1943) by Kamalabai Deshpande is also an account of a lady who even after becoming a widow went to Europe and obtained higher education. Amachi Akra Varshe (1945) by Lilabai Patwardhan describes her married life with Madhavaro Patwardhan, the great Marathi writer. Sangte Aika by Hansa Wadkar (1969) is also an account of her theatrical life. In Snehankita Snehaprabha Pradhan gives her account of Cine Industry as well as domestic life. Sandhyakal (1972) by Gajanan Jahagirdar gives the life-account of a well known cinema director. Godavari Parulekar is a well-known communist leader. Her Jevha Manus Jaga Hoto won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1972. Here she has depicted the pathetic conditons of Warlis, a scheduled tribe settled in Thane District. Chanderi Duniyet (1981) by Leela Chitnis is a life story of an actress. Mi Durga Khote by Durga Khote is also a life account of a distinguished actress. Mi ani Balkavi (1983) by Parvatibai Thombre is a simple account of a lady who spent her married life with a great Marathi poet.

Autobiographies of male writers are also equally large in number. Dadoba Pandurang has written an autobiography. Dharmanand Kosambi, a distinguished Buddhist scholar gives his life account in Nivedan (1899). Baba Padmanji in his Arunodaya gives an account of his life. Charitra chandra (1938) by L.R. Pangarkar depicts the life story of an erudite scholar devoted to saint literature. N.C. Kelkar, known as 'Sahitya Samrat' gives an account of his rich life in Gatagoshti Arthat Mazi Jiwan Yatra (1939). There is Maza Jeevan Vihar by Govindrao Tembe, a great musician of Maharashtra. N.G. Chaphekar's Jeevan Katha is an account of the life of a distingugiehed person. P. Vitthal's Maze Krida Jeevan (1944) depicts the past history of Indian Cricket. Karheche Pani by Acharya Pralhad Keshav Atre is an account of a great Marathi writer, poet and humourist. M.V. Joshi's Eka Pathikachi Jeevan Yatra delineates the life story of a middle class person. Mazi Bhumika of G.G. Bodas (1940) is an account of a stage actor. Bahurupi by Chintamanrao Kolhatkar is also the life story of a great Marathi actor. It gives information about many dramatists and actors who came in close contact with him. V.D. Ghate, has depicted his life in his Divas Ase Hote (1962). Chitra Ani Charitra (1968) by Baburao Pendharkar is also an account of life of a great Marathi stage actor. S.N. Pendse's Lekhak Ani Mi (1972) gives an account of how he became a writer after surmounting difficulties. Tasbir Ani Takdir by S.K. Kshirasagar, a Marathi critic gives detailed account of his literary career. Daya Pawar's Baluten (1979) created sensation in the literary world. He belongs to a backward community. He has depicted the pathetic life of his society in a lucied style. Upara by Laxman Mane (1980) who comes from a nomadic tribed gives an account of his community which is struggleing hard to come up. V.S. Khandekar gives his life story in Eka Panachi Kahani (1982). Jadan Ghadan by Wamanrao Chorghade (1981) is a simple account of a short story writer. D.K. Kunte who hails from Konkan region described in his Watchal (1982) how he participated in freedom struggle and after Independence occupied the coveted position of the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly. Wagh Sinha Maze Sakhe Sobati (1982) by Damu Dhotre is an autobioraphy with a difference. He depicts how he spent his life in circus in the company of wild animals. Bandopant Deval's Circusbarobar Chalis Varshe (1982) is also an account of an owner of a circus company who spent forty years in that field. Taral-Antaral by Shankarrao Kharat (1981) is an account of an eminent writer from Backward class who had to fight all the way to rise up to the present position. Datta Bhat's Zale Mrigajal Ata Jalmaya (1983) is an account of a great Marathi actor. B.N. Purandare's Shalya Kaushalya (1983) is the story of an eminent doctor who had to overcome odds in his life. S.M. Joshi's Mee S.M. (1984) depicts the social and political upheavels in India and particularly in Maharashtra. He has participated in almost all the activities during last sixty years. He gives a penpicture of such activities. Yeshwantrao Chavan's Krishna kath (1984) gives an account of his early life which enabled him to rise up from the position of a humble worker to the status of a Deputy Prime Minister. It is not a full account of his life but it gives historical information about the political saga of his life.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Oriya). The first autobiographer in Oriya literature was probably the poet Radhanath Ray (1848-1908). He wrote his autobiography sometime in the last decade of the 19th century. A portion of the autobiography was published in the year 1907 with the caption Atma Nivedana (Self-Appeal). This is mentioned in Radhanath Ray's biography written by Durgacharan Ray, his son-in-law.

The next autobiography was written by Fakirmohan Senapati (1843-1978), the noted novelist. Portions of this were first published in the periodical Sambalpur Hitaishini in 1915, and subsequently in the monthly journal Satyabadi in 1916, and also in the literary monthly Utkal Sahitya in 1918. Finally it was published in the form of a book in the year 1927.

In his characteristic style of presenting facts in the language of fiction, Fakirmohan depicted the social conditions, events, happenings and the role that he played in them. His critical and satirical assessment provided a very vigorous and living account of his contemporary times. In a way his autobiography is considered to be an important social and cultural document of Orissa in the 19th century.

In the first quarter of the 20th century another Oriya poet, Lakshmikanta Mohapatra (1889-1953), published a few articles in the monthly journal Mukura which were autobiographical in nature.

The next attempt at writing autobiography was made by Gopalchandra Praharaj, the compiler of the famous Oriya Bhashakosha (Oriya Lexicon). This was done during the period from 1941 to 1945. Though it has remained unpublished so far, a major portion of his work was published in a souvenir entitled Praharaj Parikrama brought out by a literary organisation. Though this autobiography was largely a personal account of the personal life of the author, yet in a general way it provides glimpses into the lives of the affluent aristocrats of the period.

An imporant social worker, Govindachandra Mishra, wrote his autobiogrphy entitled Jatiya Jibanara Atmabikasha (Self-evolution of National life). This autobiography is replete with many stirring facts and events related to pre-Independence days. Besides he refers to the existing relationship between the rulers and the ruled, to the educational system, to the economic and social conditions, as well as to the social customs and traditions of the period. The author himself was a leading participant in the Non-co-operation movement, and hence his autobiography gives a detailed description of the history of the Non-co-operation movement in Orissa.

Harekrishna Mahatab, the veteran politician, also wrote an autobiography which was publicshed in 1949, under the title Sadhanar Pathe (On the Way to Achievement). Being the autobiography of an aspiring and rising politican the book projects an expression of political consciousness as well as an account of political movements in India after the First World War.

In the year 1955, Baishnaba Pani published his autobiography. Pani was a noted writer of Oriya Yatras or folk-operas and he had a very chequered life. As he continuously moved from place to place, both inside and outside Orissa wherever Oriya people lived in order to stage his plays, he could present a vivid and interesting picutre of Oriya rural life in his autobiography.

Godabarish Mishra's (1886-1956) autobiography Ardha Shatabdira Orissa O Tahinre Mo Sthan (Half a century of Orissa and my place in it), which was posthumously published in 1958, may be considered as one of the outstanding books of this genre. It was the first autobiography in Oriya to receive the Sahitya Akademi award (1961) for its literary merit. The author was a famous social worker, a political leader, a poet, an educationist as well as a social reformer. He suffered a lot during his early life, but his undaunted spirit moved him to fight against all evils and one can see this reflected in his autobiography. His style of writing, which is satirically humorous, has strong content of emotion. Besides, it provides a vivid picture of the state of education and the educated people of the period before Independence. It also gives many interesting personal anecdotes related to the national school at Satyabadi near Puri, where he was a teacher under the supervision of Pandit Gopabandhu Das, the famous Congress leader, as also a number of incidents about the political life of his contemporaries and the movement for unification of the outlying tracts of Orissa.

Narayana Birabara Samanta, a social worker and a participant in the Non-co-operation movement, who came from a royal family in the coastal areas of Cuttack district, serialized his autobiography in a literary monthly entitled Diganta. It gives a good account of the state of life in pre-Independence Orissa.

Kumbhar Chaka (Potter's Wheel), published in 1976 was the autobiography of Kalicharan Patnaik, the eminent dramatist and theatre director of Orissa, and it received Sahitya Akademi award in 1977. As Patnaik throughout his career was actively engaged in the promotion of Odissi dance, music as well as drama in Orissa, the book graphically presents these details through an anecdotal structure and in a very colloquial language.

Another autobiography deserving special mention is that of Pandit Nilakanta Das (1848-1967), one time Congress leader and Speaker of Orissa Assembly, who played active role in politics, education, journalism, literature and social reform. The book, entitled Atmajiba- ni is important both as an important social document as well as a fine work of literature. Pandit Das has an entertiaining style and the book secured for him Sahitya Akademi award. (1964).

In addition to the above, a number of autobiographies written by well-known politicians, teachers, administrators, social reformers and men of letters may be noted. Most of these books have been published after Independence and particularly after 1960. They have been written in a variety of style, from purely narrative, matter of fact accounts to personal, anecdotal details. Together they provide important insights into the changes that have taken place in Oriya society and conditions of living in the Orissan villages and towns during the 20th century and particularly after the First World War. Such books are; Svabhava Nirata Jibana Judha (Natural Life Struggle, 1960) by Bairage Mishra, social reformer, Muktipatha Sainika (The Soldier on the Path of Freedom, in 2 volumes), by Pabitramohan Pradhan, a noted politician and freedom fighter, Drishtipata (Observation, 1965) by Adhirajmohan Senapati, philosopher and teacher, Mora Purba Smriti-katha (The Memories of My Past, 1966) by Bharatchandra Nayak, an administrator from Western Orissa, Satyabadire Saptabarsha (Seven years at Satyabadi, 1966) by Chandra-sekhar Mishra, teacher and writer, Mo Barabula Jiban (My Wandering Life, 1967) by Lakshminarayan Sahu, a noted social reformer, Mo Jibana Smriti (My Memories, 1968) by Anantaprasad Panda, administrator and writer, Jibana Taranga (Waves of Life, 1969) by Ramakrishna Nanda, teacher and noted writer for children, Ange Jaha Nibhaichhi (My Personal Experiences, 1973) by Kalindicharan Panigrahi, a noted writer and Sahitya Akademi Fellow, Jane Sikshyakra Niya Katha (A Teacher's Own Story, 1973) by Banamali Brahmachari, a teacher and leader of education, Mo Kahani (My Story, 1976), another Akademi Award (1979) winning book by Kunjabehari Das, noted folklorist and poet. Besides these some autobiographies that have been published recently are Gandhi Maharajanka Shishya, (the Disciple of Gandhiji, 1981) by Udaynath Sarange, Mo Jibah O Janabar Kahani (The Story of My Life and Troubles, 1981), by Nandakishor Das and Rinaparisodha (Paying the Debt, 1983) by Surendranath Dwibedi. All these books were written by veteran freedom fighters and they deal with their involvement with the freedom struggle. Rama Devi, the most respected lady social worker of Orissa, has also written her autobiography. The autobiographies by Nilamoni Senapati and Gananath Das, administrators, Pranakrishna Parija, educationist, Gopinath Mohanty, novelist and Rabi Singh, poet, have been serialized in the journals, and when published they are expected to add to the rich mosaic of autobiography in Oriya.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Punjabi). The art of autobiography is a recent phenomenon in Punjabi. The earliest autobiography written in prose was that of the great Punjabi novelist Nanak Singh (1897-1971) in 1949 under the title Meri Duniya (My World) which he kept on revising and enlarging till his death in 1971. Another autobiography came into existence in Punjabi with the writing of Arsi (1952) (Hand Mirror) by Teja Singh (1894-1958) written at the fag end of his literary career.

Gurbaksh Singh (1895-1978) published his autobiography in three volumes under the titles Meri Jivan Kahani (My life story) Part I in 1959, Manzil dis Pai (Destination in sight) and Meri Jivan Kahani Part III in 1979. The first volume covers his teenage years, his earlier youth and his struggle during the course of his higher studies in America, his travels in this continent. The second refers to his experiences in his own motherland upto 1947, especially his partial success in the establishment of a colony of writers and artists 'Preet Nagar' near Amritsar. His dream was shattered with the partition of Punjab at the time of Independence. He had to shift to Mehrauli in Delhi for some time and again returned to his 'Preet Nagar' which fortunately remained within India. The third part of his autobiography covers his post-independence experiences. It is more detailed and is, at places, self-eulogizing.

Rasidi Ticket (Revenue Stamp 1976) is the autobiography of Amrita Pritam. After giving a brief account of her parents, Amrita Pritam jumps to the time when she lived in Delhi and met Imroz with whom she has been living since 1960. The intervening period of nearly 35 years has been left untouched. She has referred to her other romantic attachments to some outstanding literary figures of Urdu and Punjabi. Although incomplete as an autobiography, Rasidi Ticket is a trend setting book so far as the boldness and frankness of feelings are concerned. Another autobioghry of the sixties is that of Balraj Sahni who wrote Meri Filmi Atma Katha giving a vivid account of the hard struggle he had to put in to achieve success as an actor in the film world. This book however, portrays only one aspect of the multi-faced personality of Balraj Sahni and as such cannot strictly be termed a complete autobriography. Three autobiographies were published in 1981. They are Nange Pairan da Safar (Journey on Barefoot) by Dalip Kaur Tiwana, a novelist, Adhi Mitti Adha Sona (Half dust and half gold) by Sohinder Singh Wanjara Bedi, a folklorist and Mere Patte Meri Khed by Mohinder Singh Joshi, a short story writer and a retired Judge of Delhi High Court. All these autobiographies relate the struggle of their childhood and early years of their youths and do not relate the events of their present years of life. A few autobiographies have been written by other writers also such as Meri Jiwan Kahani (My life story 1979) by Sahib Singh, Oh Vee Din San (Those were the days) by Gurcharan Singh Sahnsara, Mera Apna Apa (My own self 1979) by Arjun Singh Gargaj, Meri Jivan Kahani (My Life Story) by Sohan Singh Dhakna.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Sindhi). The first ever autobiography in Sindhi was written by Mirza Qalich Beg (1853-1929) in 1923 under the title of Sao Pano Karo Pano (Green Leaf, Printed Page). This was, however, published posthumously in 1965. Qalich Beg sincerely describes his hectic life and the events he was engulfed by. Chetan Mariwala (1916-1984) in his autobiography entitled Sanbhari Je Darishina Tan (Reflections of My Recollections, 1960) tries to recollect incidents and episodes concerning his early life. Mariwala writes in chaste language and lucid style and describes the things that happened to him when he was a student. He fondly remembers his class-mates and teachers and tells the tales of innocent games he played with his friends.

Narasindas Ratanmal Malkani in his autobiography Nirali Zindagi (A different life, 1973) gives intimate pictures of the Indian political leaders such as Mahatma Gandhi, Jawaharlal Nehru and Acharya J.B. Kripalani and describes his own public and private life.

The memoris of Popti Hiranandani were published in the form of 12 episodes in the Jhulelal (1978-79) which were, later on, compiled in a book form entitled Munhijia Hayatia Ja Sona Ropa Warqa (Golden and Silver Leaves of My life, 1980) which won her the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1982.

The latest autobiographical work entitled Bukha. Ishqu-e-Adabu by Mohan Kalpana was published in 1984. It goes to the credit of the author that he has been bold enough to describe his personal life and love episodes.

The genre of autobiography in Sindhi literature is yet to catch up with the other forms of Sindhi literature. The autobiographies so far published in Sindhi are, to an extent, not completely objective in so far as the observations of the authors are concerned; they tend to conceal things that the authors could have perhaps brought to light.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Tamil). Barring the diary (1736-1760) of Anandarangam Pillai, 'dubhash' and Commission Agent at Pondicherry, whose daily jottings cover historical, political and sociological events under alien rule and give intimate pen portraits of men he had known in a racy but dated style, the history of the genre belongs to the 20th century. One of its earliest manifestations is the poetical autobiography of Subramaniya Bharati Swacharitai (1910). A generic experiment, it tells in traditional metre and rhyme the story of the poet's boyhood in pedantic language though relieved sometimes by reflective passages tinged with melancholy thought of the childhood loss of his mother and paternal imposition of English education against the boy-poet's natural inclination to Tamil.

Two more autobiographies in verse are the first by Bharati's associate V.D. Chidambaram Pillai (1946) and the other by the poet's disciple, Bardatiasan (1960), which is too short to be taken seriously. Both are in 'Akaval pa' or blank verse. Chidambaram Pillai's covers the period from his birth to his imprisonment by the British for his fierce nationalism. Besides his imprisonment, it deals with the shipping company he started–the first of its kind by an Indian which was a major event of national importance.

Rajaji's jail diary, Chirayil taven covering a year (1921-22) came out in 1949 as a mixture of meditation and reminiscence, a case of the subject being more important than the writing.

One of the finest autobiographies ever written in Tamil is Tiru Vi. Kalyanasundaranar's two-volume Valkaik Kurippukkal (Notes on Life, 1944). Though he is said to have written it from memory, it shows a careful organization of the materials of his life from the casting of his horoscope to the minutiae of his health in his old age. He tells with remarkable candour the story of his life which is also the story of the Tamil community during the struggle for political independence. It contains a whole gallery of portraits of scholars, savants, patriots, social reformers and others whom Tiru. Vi. Kalyanasundaranar knew. What emerges is the picture of a man who served the country, his people and his literature with a deep sense of dedication and who hated hypocrisies of all types. Valkaik Kurippukkal is a model autobiography in both form and content.

En Valkkai (My Story, 1944) brings together the reminiscences of the patriot-poet, Namakkal Ramalingam Pillai. It is a string of lively episodes retold in the manner of a story, roughly divided into the poet's life history, his political experiences and his artistic life. The subject presents himself as a self-made man with no pretensions to any kind of achievement.

En Charitram (My Story, 1950) of V.V. Swaminatha Iyer, the most prominent name in the history of modern textual scholarship in Tamil, covers only the first part of his life and not the latter part spent in the resurrection of ancient Tamil classics in manuscript form. But the manner of his writing implies that he was planning a more detailed account of his experiences.

Suddananda Bharati's Atma Cotanai (The Trials of the Spirit, 1950, revised 1957) reflects an ascetic's review of his life and therefore it is only homiletic but tends to warn its readers against the pitfalls of easy and complacent living. The polemical Vanavacham (Exile, 1956) by Kannadasan deals with a segment of his life, from 1943 to 1961, the years of his political association with the DMK.

It is interspersed with frank confessions of his amorous adventures. Daringly confessional passages have brought in an element of 'modernity', new to Tamil autobiography writing.

The great veteran of the Tamil stage, Pammal Sambanda Mudaliar's En Chuyacharitai (My Autobiography, 1963) is a very brief account of his life as lawyer and judge. The account of his long association with the Tamil drama alone occupies half of the narration written in his old fashioned Sanskritised Tamil. The book is complementary to the earlier work, Natakametai Ninaivukal (Reminiscences of the Stage, 1938) in six volumes.

The novelist Jeyakanthan's Or Ilakkiyavatinyin Araciyalcintanaikal (A Literary Artist's Political Experiences, 1978) is an autobiography with a difference. Considering his fiercely independent affiliation to communist political philosophy and his commitment as a novelist, he has made a polemical and often brutally frank analysis of his forty years of political experience in the turbulent politics of Tamil Nadu. However controversial his views on the relationship between politics and literary art might appear to many readers, his book is a triumph of confessional writing.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Telugu). The genre of autobiography is entirely a product of the influence of English literature on Telugu letters.

Popularly known as the 'maker of modern Andhra', Kandukuri Veerasalingam (1848-1919) was the first autobiographer in Telugu. Indeed, he was the pioneer in every literary and social field of activity in Andhra Pradesh.

Full of admiration for the British genius, he adapted every kind of English literary creation and even borrowed from several English writings especially from Shakespeare and Goldsmith.

Veeresalingam's autobiography, called Sweeya Charitra was published in two parts, the first in 1910, and the second in 1915.

Kandukuri had none of the characteristic modesty of the upper caste intellectual of his times, and was uniformly forthright in his condemnation of what he considered unjust in the social fabric of his day. His words, 'I am temperamentally incapable of tolerating inequity in any form, any where; I can never rest until I see the wrongs around me corrected', aptly describe his lifelong fight against the evils of child marriage, the taboo against widow-remarriage and immorality in high places.

Apart from the story of the troubles he had to go through in order to fulfil his life mission, Veeresalingam provides a glimpse into the social life's of his day in his autobiography. None can quarrel with his self-esteem, which borders on infallibility, if one takes into account the fact that he had to fight singlehanded against very heavy odds to see his ideals translated into reality. His early dedication to literature and his later perseverance in his chosen task, were so inspiringly depicted in this autobiography as to blaze a fresh trail in both literature and social service in Andhra Pradesh.

Of the nearly sixty autobiographies in Telugu, which followed Veeresalingam's pioneering attempt, only a few merit our attention.

Of these the foremost is by Veeresealingam's younger contemporary, and kindred spirit, Chilakamarti Lakshmi Narasimhan (1867-1946), which also bears the same title as the pioneer's.

In every respect Chilakamarti was the equal of Kandukuri. In point of fact, as a litterateur, the former is much better remembered. His play Gayopakhyanam is still popular on the stage. In this autobiography, it is interesting to read about Tanguturi Prakasam (a Chief Minister of Andhra Pradesh) playing an active role literally as well as figuratively–in the success of a Chilakamarti as a playwright.

In the establishment of schools, one of which was meant for adult education, and for the promotion of women's education and widow-marriage, Chilakamarti worked hand in hand with Kandukuri. In one respect, at least, Chilakamarti proved himself to be superior to his mentor. Where Veeresalingam condemned the influence of Bipinchandra Pal's lectures on the patriotic people of the day, Lakshmi Narasimhan actually translated the speeches into Telugu, and even ended up by reciting a patriotic poem of his own (in Telugu) on the conclusion of one of Pal's lectures at Rajahmundry in 1906. One of the admirable features of Chilakamarti's autobiography (1944) is an index, a rare phenomenon in the Telugu publishing world.

The next autobiography that deserves one's notice is that of Tanguturi Prakasam's (1872-1957), Naa Jeevita Yatra (My life's journey). It was written when the former Chief Minister of composite Madras State (1945-46) was in jail (1942), following the 'Quit India' movement. Prakasam himself wrote the book, covering the events of his life till 1941; the rest of his life story was completed for the publication by his close associate, Tennetti Viswanatham.

Valour and candour are the two traits in his early life as a dramatic actor, reported in Chilakamarti's autobiography, discloses the young man's intrepid attempt at taking revenge on a man who had ill-treated him formerly. We find many instances of Prakasam's almost reckless bravery recorded by him in his autobiography.

Apart from Prakasam's political adventures, his account of editing the paper, Swarajya (1921-29) is also interesting.

Probably the most moving autobiography in Telugu is by the comparatively little-known terrorist here, Darisi Chenchayya. He was a member of the 'Gadar Movement', which, during the years 1913 to 1919 terrorised the British Government. In this book, titled "Nenu-Naa Desam" (I and My Country), Chenchayya writes about how he became a member of the organisation when he was a student of California University (the organisation was founded in America by an Indian patriot, named L.H. Dayal Varma); how he survived the various attempts of the British to torture him mentally and physically; how he crusaded against the social evils, along with his political agitation; and how he was impressed by the simplicity of Sun-Yat-Sen whom he met in China.

K.N. Kesari (1875-1953) in his memoirs, Na Chinnanati Muchchatulu (My childhood events), tells of his dedicated spirit which enabled him to graduate from rags to riches and which made him dedicate his wealth to the welfare of women and children. He was the founder editor of a renowned women's monthly, Grihalakshmi, the maker of the health tonic 'Lodhra', and the founder of a Telugu school at Madras for the Children of Andhra origin.

Among the modern fiction writers, Buchi Babu holds a special place; by virtue of his intellectual and psychoanalytical approach to the novel and the short story. In his autobiography, called 'Antaranga Kathanam' (Internal Story), he analyses his childhood experiences in the Freudian way and expresses himself in favour of experience which makes him appreciate man and his surroundings in the detached spirit of a silent spectator, rather than as an involved witness. The words, "In my opinion, the symbol for science is the wheel; that for Nature is the Flower. The flower must not be crushed by the wheel", best reveal his literary credo.

Although somewhat sentimental and amateurish, Achanta Janakiram's Sagutunna Yatra (The current or continuing pilgrimage) and Samriti patham lo (Down Memory Lane), have won popular approval, on account of the touching anecdotes of the writer's encounters with famous men and women of the 30s and 40s of the twentieth century.

Chalam in his Atma Katha (autobiography) makes this characteistic remark: "can there be not a world free from money and power? Why not a world where culture, beauty and love rule supreme?".

AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Urdu). In Urdu, writers have adopted different methods and forms to write their autobiographies. Autobiographies are thus found in the form of direct narration, diaries, letters, travelogues, reportage etc. Mir Taqi 'Mir' recorded the experiences of his life in Zihr-e-Mir (1808) but this was in Persian (Nisar Ahmed Faruqi translated it into Urdu in 1957). In the opinion of some scholars Masnavi Husn-e-Akhtar (1860) is the first versified autobiography of the ruler of Avadh, Wajid Ali Shah, who after his being dethroned was imprisoned in Matiaburj (Calcutta) between 1856-1887. This is, however, an incomplete work in as much as it narrates events only after 1856 (when he writer's age was 54 years) and ends in 1860 (while the was yet to live 27 more years).

Manuscript of the Autobiography by Abdul Ghafur 'Nasikh' is available in the library of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. This was completed in 1886 but has remained unpublished. The first autobiography in Urdu Prose, is Twarikh-e-Ajib by Jafar Thanesari, the famous freedom fighter. He was arrested in 1863 and deported to Andamans where he passed 18 years in prison. During this period Jafar wrote three books. Twarikh-e-Ajib is one of them. This may be called a partial autobiography because besides describing the events of his life, the writer has indulged in narrating details of his ideology and discussions about law and religion etc. The book also contains interesting information about the Andaman archipelago.

In 1910 Zakir Dehlvi wrote the first regular autobiography in Urdu. As a considerable portion of the book describes in detail a first hand account of the tragic incidents of 1857,the publisher gave it the title of Dastan-e-Ghadr.

Khwaja Hasan Nizami brought out his Aap Biti in 1919. Most probably he is the first writer to use word 'Aap Biti' in Urdu for an autobiography. Hasan Nizami was a sufi saint attached to a Khanqah. It was, therefore, natural that he wrote his life story for the benefit of his spiritual disciples. For its distinguished freshness of style, the book is a piece of literature. The book was completed when the writer was 41 years of age.

In 1919 Fazlu-ud-Din Ahmed Mirza edited the Tazikra often described as an abstract biography, with the help of scattered writings of Maulana Abul Kalam Azad but its publisher succeeded in obtaining the last chapters directly written by Azad which throw light on the story of his own life as also the persons who influenced him in many ways.

Aamal Nama by Syed Raza Ali which is spread over 578 pages is generally considered to the best autobiography written in 1943 the pre-partition period of the Indian sub-continent. In 14 chapters and under more than 300 sub-titles, Raza has narrated the story of his life, touching political issues, literary problems and religious opinions of his period. The writer was 63 years old at that time and basically a lawyer and a politician, his narrative satisfies the literary standards.

In 1915 a group of young students left India to join forces with Turks against British aggression. Zafar Hasan Abeck aged 20 years, was one of them. He returned to India after 34 years and published his Aap Biti in two volumes. Not only does it tell the life story of the writer but also throws light on some unknown facts about the famous revolutionary and freedom fighter, Obedullah Sindhi. In simple but heart touching style this unique literary piece reveals the strange romances and adventures of a young Indian patriot and a brave soldier.

Khun Baha (1942) by Hakim Ahmed Shuja is an autobiography, famous for its sophisticated narrative, humility and sincerity of purpose. More than half the text of this voluminous book has been spent on specifying the writer's ideology and his opinions about prose and poetry. Under the title Picchhle Pachas Baras, life story of the writer is narrated but here too, he is found to cherish the memory of his friends, class-mates and elder family members with respect and love. He is so generous that even recollections of minor persons like barbers and postmen also find a place in his autobiography. His simple and fluent language is very effective.

Yad-e-Ayyam (1949) is the autobiography of Hafiz Mohd. Ahmed Syed Khan, Nawab of Chhatari. In this book, the writer has given glimpses of his life and experience in a direct and artless manner.

Husain Ahmed Madni's Naqah-e-Hayat (1952) is not only his biography but also a record of important events of British rule in India from the time of their arrival in and departure from this country. The book consists of two volumes. It was written in 1942 when the writer was imprisoned in Naini Jail for his political activities. This autobiography emphasises the purity and importance of the writer's pedigree and and illustrates as to how and why a sufi and a teacher like Husain Ahmed Madni turned to politics. His style is warm and stirs the readers' emotions.

Contribution of Sardar Diwan Singh Maftoon, in the field of autobiographies in Urdu can never be forgotten. He used to write a column under the title Naqabil-e-Faramosh (Unforgetable) in his Urdu weekly Riyasat which uncurtained many a misdeeds and short-coming of the rulers of erstwhile Indian states. In between, events of his own life, though not in any chronological order, also came into light. A collection of these columns was produced by him in book form under the same title Naqabil-e-Faramosh. Even though this book is an irregular autobiography, it brings out the writer's unusual boldness and direct approach to his subject with his famous razor sharp style of expression.

Josh Bilgrami's Mushahidat (1955) is important for its description of the political movement in the erstwhile Hyderabad State. It reveals many hidden facts for the first time. Conspiracies of the Durba have been laid bare in forceful narrative that helps the reader to understand the true nature of that atmosphere

Shad Ki Kahani-Shad Ki Zabani (1958) by Shad Azimabadi though completed in 1921 was published by his disciple Muslim Azimabadi after his death. It is a disputed autobiography because Muslim says in the foreward that Shad Azimabadi himself had written this book in a style as though to indicate that Muslim was the writer of Shad's biography whereas actually it is the autobiography of Shad Azimabadi.

Abdul Majid Salik's Sarguzasht (1966) is a valuable record of pre-partitioned India's political, cultural and literary movements, with particular emphasis on the situation in Punjab. Yadon Ki Duniya (1967) by Yusuf Husain Khan, as is evident from the title, is based on his memories. He was a younger brother of Zakir Husain and himself a great scholar. This book is important because of the very valuable source material it provides about one of great Presidents of the Indian Union. The autobiography is written with conviction and in a forceful style.

Yadon Ki Barat (1970) by Josh Malihabadi is another important autobiography. Even though the book is full of tall tales, it presents a beautiful life picture of an important and colourful poet. Besides its biographical importance, it has the added importance of being an excellent sample of literary prose.

Mujhe Kahna Hai Kuch Apni Zaban Mein (1974) by Khwaja Ghulamus-Saiyadain was published posthumously by his sister Swaleha Abid Husain. Due importance has not been given in this work to biographic details. It is more an attempt to pay homage to the personalities who helped in the building of the career of Saiyadain. The writer was an educationist. The book, therefore, contains his reformative ideas about education.

Kalim-ud-Din Ahmed has collected the memoirs and events of his life in Apni Talaash Mein (1975) in three volumes two of which have come out. His egotism is evident from every page of his autobiography.

Jahan-e-Danish (1975) by Ehsan Danish, describes the bitter story of the struggle of this important poet who starting as an ordinary labourer reached great heights in his literary career.

Sarguzasht (1976) is a humorous autobiography of Mushtaq Ahmed Yusufi. Aap Biti (1978) by Abdul Majid Daryabadi is also an important autobiography as the writer has tried his best to write truthfully. Yaden (1976) by Rahm Ali Alhashmi contains the memoirs of the writer as also his life sketch.

Kar-e-jahan Daraz Hai, an autobiographical novel by Quaratularin Hyder is a family saga which throws light on the life of the writer and her ancestors; S. Akthar Husain's Sarguzasht-e-Hayat is also a worthy attempt. Ismat Chughtai's autobiography was published in serial form under the title Kaghazi Hai Parahan in Urdu monthly 'Ajkal' (Delhi). Under the column 'Ghubar-e-Karwan' in the same magazine, many other writers also contributed their short autobiographies. A short biography of Muzaffar Hanfi Kuchh Apne Bare Mein is included in Naqd Reze (Collection of his essays).

Nuqoosh (1964, Lahore, edited by Mohd. Tufail) published its Aaap Biti Number in two bulky volumes and hundreds of short autobiographies were included in the Aaap Biti Number (1980) of Fann-aur Shaksiyat brought out by Sabar Dutt under the supervision of Kalidas Gupta.Riza also contains a number of brief autobiographies of some prominent men of letters. Monthly Shair (Bombay) edited by Iftikhar Imam often produces special studies of writers along with their autobiographies.

Some autobiographies from other languages have also been translated into Urdu. Hazrat Maulana Syed Abul Hasan 'Ali Nadavi, a Muslim divine of international renown, has written his autobiography entitled Karvane-Zindaqi (Vol. I & II) which has a detailed account of the institution Nadwatul Ulama and its growth, besides the socio-cultural background of the times.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY, AN (English) written between June, 1934 and February, 1935 when Jawaharlal Nehru was a political prisoner, was published in 1936, soon after his wife Kamala's death, and dedicated to her. It was written, he admitted, partly to occupy himself with a definite task so as to partly master the long solitudes of life, and partly to recollect past events with which he had been connected and weigh them in a mood of objectivity. His autobiography was thus begun and continued in a mood of self-questioning, and this imparts to the narrative its distinctive flavour of personality. While the autobiography is no doubt important as the self-portrait of one of India's great sons in the formative years of his rapid ascent to national fame, it is also–by sleight of hand, as it were–the testament of a whole generation that was trying with varying degrees of success to make the usually difficult and sometimes dangerous passage from a flawed world that was dying to a hoped–for world that seemed as yet powerless to be born. But those were certainly memorable times.

Jawaharlal's father, Motilal Nehru, and the new messiah, Mahatma Gandhi: the culture of Harrow-Cambridge, and the aggressive idealism of Marx-Lenin, the discipline of the sciences, and the fascination of the Humanities; the involvement in agitational politics, and the periodic call of loneliness; the heady wine of mass adulation, and the intimations of the still small voice of friendship or companionship; the intolerance of the Napoleonic go-getter, and the wide tolerance of the democrat—these elements and these pulls and these influences somehow fuse and balance to make this work of prose art. Personal history coalesces with the nation's political evolution, and there is a sense of drama throughout. All life was an adventure for him, and much of the excitement of the adventure is here recalled so as to glow with life again. The impact of life and letters, of the subtle influence of places (even of the gaols), the fascination of Nature, the excitement of participation in (or the making of) current history, the quiddities of human behaviour, the psychology of colonialist rulers, the mystique of Gandhian satyagraha all get woven into the delicate fabric of the narrative which is nervous and pure and insinuates its charm into the reader's heart. Jawaharlal can be the observer and the observed at once, as when he describes the lathi charge at the time of the Simon Commission in 1927, and all the tragedy and brutality and pity of the situation is recalled and recorded movingly but without acerbity or anger. Occasionally, as in his references to the saintly V.S. Srinivasa Sastri, Nehru is less than just, and here and there intolerance erupts somewhat, but taken as a whole, the work is a classic of the genre, almost on a par with Mahatma Gandhi's The Story of My Experiments with Truth.

K.R.S.I.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN UNKNOWN INDIAN, THE (English) Although entitled an autobiography, the book goes beyond the scope of the author's personal history and encompasses a crucial period of the national history of Bengal. The author of the book is Nirad. C. Chaudhuri. It was published in 1951.

Dedicated to "the memory of the British Empire in India", the book in the course of narrating the personal life of the author, expresses in a representative way the typical conflict suffered by a middle-class Indian intellectual in the early years of the twentieth century, because of his European sensibility acquired through English education and Western influences. The author's intention is "to tell the story of the struggle of a civilisation with a hostile environment, in which the destiny of British rule in India became necessarily involved."

The author begins by describing his childhood in his village in East Bengal, where beliefs were shaped by the rural social values. His father's influence moulded him along the lines of Western liberal humanism making him a non-conformist, while his mother inculcated immense strength of moral convictions in him.

When his father with his family moved to Calcutta in 1910, Nirad C. Chaudhuri came in touch with a new environment in an exciting metropolis. He acquainted himself with the modern literary and intellectual movements, besides cultivating an active interest in contemporary politics. He traces, in the book, the roots of these movements to 19th century Bengal. He refers to the new cultural movement based on the formula of a "synthesis of the values of the East and the West, which passes under the name of the Indian Renaissance" represented by Rommohan Roy and his followers. He also stresses the other important strand in the 19th century Bengali psyche–the Hindu revivalist trend which he feels, was represented by Bankim Chandra Chatterjee. This brings him to contemporary politics. He feels that the national movement, dominated by the Hindu middle class, was irreconcilable with the liberal nationalism, represented to some extent, by the Western-trained Brahmo intellectuals–who influenced Chaudhuri at a certain stage in his life. He also traces the roots of the Hindu-Muslim divide in national politics to the Hindu-dominated national leadership. But he tends to undermine the role of the British rulers in exploiting the Hindu-Muslim conflict, as evident from his comment that the British rulers "did not make use of it to the extent they might have easily done."

Although Nirad Chaudhuri at one stage was drawn to Gandhian politics, he soon got disillusioned. As he says in The Autobiography: "In the end Gandhism in politics and in practice came to stand for very little else but a concealed mass of atavistic aspirations and prejudices."

He felt that the new politics of the national movement strangled the moral awareness created by the Brahmo Samaj movement and destroyed the "concept of synthesis aiming at a fusion of the values of the East and the West."

Apart from the historical anecdotes and the picture of middle-class Bengali social life that one gets from the book, it is important for the enunciation of a concept of history which marks Nirad C. Chaudhuri's style and assessment of Indian society, that one also finds in his later books. According to his concept of history, it "cannot think of being partial or impartial. It shows a development and lays bare its causes..." This approach often tends to push him to a position of alienation. To quote from his Autobiography: "In formulating my conception of history I was moving away, in relation to my past life, from the ethical standpoint to an amoral intellectual need, and in relation to my countrymen and contemporaries I was erecting a barrier of intellectual isolation which was to become more and more impenetrable with the years."

AVADANA (Sanskrit). The term (avadana) sometimes also called (apadana) because of the affinity with the corresponding Pali term (apadana), has been translated into Tibetan as (rtogs-brjod). This term has been confused by some with nidana (primary cause). Derived from dai (sodhane; to purify), the name avadana denotes pure conduct consisting of suddhakarmas (noble deeds) like self-sacrifice or merely a gift in incense, flowers, ointments, gold and precious stones, or the erection of sanctuaries (stupas, chaityas, and so on).

An avadana work deals with the retribution of deeds, both good and bad, of living beings in the present birth as connected with those in the past and the future in the metempsychosis (samsara). The moralist aim of this chain of actions and reactions has been couched in legends which are looked upon as actual events in the lives of the Buddha in his previous births as so many Bodhisattvas. The sermon is regarded as authentic as a Buddhistic sutra or Buddhavachana.

Thus an avadana is a Buddhistic parable which starts with an introduction indicating the place and occasion of the narrative, and ends in a lesson. In many cases the story pertains to the past and the present actions of the Bodhisattvas followed by a moral for edification. In some cases there is a vyakarana (explanation>prophecy) about the future by the Buddha in the light of the present actions. Sometimes the story relates to both the past and future. At times the good or bad fruits of actions in the present existence are narrated.

The avadana class of works is scattered in both the Hinayana and the Mahayana schools of Buddhism. The earlier Hinayanistic works are relatively free from the exaggerations and mythologies which characterize the later Mahayanistic ones. All the works are punctuated with devotion to the Buddha

Such avadanas occur sporadically in the Vinayapitaka and the Sutrapitaka as well.

Like Kumaralata's Drishtantapankti and Aryashura's Jatakamala, the avadanas correspond to the Pali Jatakas and apavanas, and remind one of the Brahmanistic Puranas.

However, the avadanas are composed in prose interspersed with poetry, or in poetry alone, in Classical Sanskrit popularized under more or less dialectal influences. The style is simple.

A succinct account of the avadanas is given below:—

1) Mahavastuavadana: This avadana belongs to the Vinayapitaka of the Lokottaravadins of the Mahasanghikas of the Madhyadesha. It deals with the biography of the Buddha and several old and new jataka stories stuffed with miracles, and incorporates some passages in prose and poetry from the earlier canonical texts.

This work in popularized Sanskrit is an important document of the political, social, economic and religious conditions of India about the beginning of the Christian era.

2) Lalitavistara: This work, also called variously as the Vaipulyasutra, Mahanidana and Purana, is composed in prose interspersed with poetry in twentyseven parivartas (chapters) dealing with the life of the Buddha up to the dharmachakrapravartana, the first sermon, characterized by exaggerations and supernatural feats.

3) Avadanashataka: This work is a planned compilation of one hundred avadanas made in about 2nd century A.D. It has been classified into ten vargas (decades) with a certain subject for each. It reminds one of Kumaralata's Drishtantapankti which has been divided into dashatis (dacades). It is decidedly a Hinayana text in as much as it contains passages from a Parinirvanasutra and other Sanskrit sutras of the Sarvastivadins. But there is no trace of the Mahayanistic Bodhisattva cult.

4) Divyavadana: This work, quite distinct from the Divyavadanamala, is divided into 38 sections. It is a compilation of different authors of different ages. In this collection there are some very old Hinayana elements besides a few obviously later additions in the Mahayanistic spirit. Thus the text begins with the Mahayanistic benediction of paying homage to the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas. The text refers also to the Mahayanistic shadaksharavidya, the six-syllable magical formula: om mani-padme hum.

The whole work, in its present form, can be assigned safely to a period between 200 and 350 A.D. The various parts of the text belong virtually to different periods. Further, we find the mention of Ashoka's successors, the kings of the Shunga dynasty down to Pushyamitra (178 B.C.) and the dinara coin (Roman denarius).

There is also some correspondence with the Pali Jatakas. The Sanskrit Canon and single canonical texts such as Dirghagama, Udana, Sthaviragatha, and so on, are frequently quoted. The four agamas (like the Madhyamagama) are also mentioned. The advent of the future Buddha, Maitreya, is also notable.

The Ashoka cycle of avadanas in the Divyavadana is an old portion of the work consisting of the four legends, viz., i) The Pamshupradanavadana, ii) Kunalavadana, iii) Vitashokavadana and iv) Ashokavadana. The Sanskrit original of this cycle of legends was composed in Mathura between 150 and 50 B.C. The existence of this once known original is inferred from the Chinese translations of the Samyuktagamasutra.

The Ashoka legend is said to be a kind of mahatmya (praise) of the Natabhatika monastery of Mathura.

Excepting the references to the persecution of the Jain and Buddhist monks there is not of much historical value in the Ashoka cycle of legends in the Divyavadana.

The dramatic episode of Upagupta and the convert Mara in the guise of the Buddha in the Pamshupradanavadana is taken almost word for word from Kumaralata's Drishtantapankti. The influence on the language, metre and style is remarkable.

5) Kalpadrumavadanamala: This avadanamala is in verse and criticizes the Brahmanistic caste system.

6) Ratnavadanamala (or Ratnamalavadana): This avadanamala is a collection of 38 tales in verse.

Some avadanas of this collection have their parallels in the Kalpadrumavadanamala and Ashokavadanamala.

7) Ashokavadanamala: This avadanamala about King Ashoka is composed in verse.

These avadanamalas are composed in the form of a dialogue between Ashoka and Upagupta and are based on the Avadanashataka, Aryashura's Jatakamala and some other Mahayana sources. These avadanamalas are decidedly Mahayanistic in character because they mention the Sukhavati, the Mahayana paradise.

8) Mahajatakamala (or Brihajjatakamala): This work also belongs to the avadanamalas.

9) Dvavimshatyavadana: This avadana collection is composed in prose interspersed with poetry in popular Sanskrit. This work is divided into 22 sections to teach as many morals. It is in the form of a dialogue between Ashoka and Upagupta, and later on between Shakyamuni and Maitreya.

The source of the legends in this collection is the Avadanashataka.

10) Avadanakalpalata (or Bodhisattvavadanakalpalata): This work is composed entirely in various ornate metres. It consists of 108 avadanas of which the first 107 were composed by Kshemendra (990-1066) of Kashmira and the last one named the Jimutavahanavadana was added by the poet's son, Somendra.

This work comprises edifying tales depicting the Bodhisattva ideal of self-sacrifice. These legends are meant for Buddhistic propaganda and preaching to an audience of simple and common populace.

This collection of avadanas is based on some Pali sources and the Mahavastu.

The Manichudavadana of the Avadanakalpalata has been retold in the Svayambhupurana.

11) Haribhatajatakamala: This work is a collection of 35 jatakas in Sanskrit composed by acharya (teacher) Haribhata, a prince.

This is known from the Tibetan translation in the Bstan-Hgyur.

As regards matter and manner, Kumaralata's Drishtantapankti and Aryashura's Jatakamala also come under the avadana literature.

Thus the main aim of the avadana literature is to deal with noble deeds leading to the state of a Buddha or a Pratyekabuddha or an Arhat.

The mythologies are marked by miracles and exaggerations. The supernatural features are meant for effective preaching among the laity. Excepting Kshemendra's Avadanakalpalata the avadana works, in general, have little literary value. The wearisome prolixity of the narrations and the numerous monotonous repetitions of the selfsame formulas and commonplace phrases and descriptions have caused the decadence of the avadana literature.

AVADHANAM (Telugu) is a form of poetic art which is characteristically specially cultivated in Telugu. It constitutes one of the five treasures of Telugu literature. It is a poetic performance which combines entertainment and enlightenment, amusement and edification. Avadhanam requires spontaneous poetic composition, prodigious memory, melodious voice, resourcefulness and wisdom, varied knowledge and sense of humour. One who is endowed by nature with all these gifts shines as an avadhani or performer of avadhana. Rapidity of versification is the prime requisite of avadhana and the performers boasted that they could compose hundreds of verses in an hour. Avadhanam is broadly divided into two categories: 'Satavadhana' and 'Ashtavadhana'.

In Satavadhana the performing poet will be asked by a hundred knowledgeable persons chosen for the occasion to compose a poem on a specified topic in the metre prescribed by each of them. The performer begins by composing the opening line of the hundred poems and then goes on to compose the second, the third and the fourth lines of each stanza. After completing the four lines, the performer repeats from memory the hundred poems one by one. Sometimes the questioners change their places to confuse the performer but the poet is aided by his unerring memory to compose the other lines of the poem in continuation of the opening line. It takes many sessions spread over two or three days to complete the Satavadhana. The resourcefulness, wit and sense of humour are the ingredients of the performance of Satavadhana.

Ashtavadhana is more complicated and difficult as the poet performer is constantly forced to digress and deviate. His attention is diverted to cater to many irrelevant items. Eight learned persons confront the performer and pose a severe test to his powers of concentration and composition. The performer has to carry on simultaneously different kinds of mental activity. Certain words are prescribed and the performer is asked to compose a poem in the specified metre and context. Certain letters are prohibited and the poet has to carry on with the composition by avoiding them. The performer is called upon to describe given situations, persons or events. He is required to solve riddles which sound absurd and ridiculous. The performer's readiness and resourcefulness are displayed in solving the riddle by giving a twist to the verbal expression and flinging a surprise upon the listeners. Simultaneously the performer is required to expand and comment upon a difficult passage chosen from some text. He has to be alert and give the correct number of bells sounded at random during the performance by one person who is selected for that purpose. The performer's attention is distracted by one person whose main business is to sit idle and ask untimely any irrelevant questioners which may sidetrack the performer. Despite all these distractions and diversions the performer successfully satisfies the demands of all the eight questioners and carries on with his composition of the verses. At the end he recites from memory the different verses composed by him during the performance. Satavadhana has been compared to a circus feat and astavadhana may be described as mental acrobatics.

Avadhana originated as an itinerary art during the Prabandha period. Cherikonda Dharmanna, the author of Chitrabharatam was the first to initiate and perfect the form of Satavadhana. Rama Raja Bhushana, the author of Vasucharitra also distinguished himself in this form. Nellori Raghava Kavi who wrote poems with three meanings was also famous for his avadhanas. In the later half of the 19th century Avadhana was revived by Madabhushi Venkatacharya whose memory was phenomenal. Inspired by his example the renowned poets Tirupati Venkata Kavulu attained great fame and distinctions, by performing avadhanas at many royal courts and public places. Their performances created great enthusiasm and taste for the creation and appreciation of poetry. Their contemporaries, the Devulapalli brothers, Venkata Ramakrishna Kavulu and Kopparapu Brothers were also eminent in the field of avadhana. In course of time avadhana degenerated from a war of wits into petty squabbles, recriminations prompted by personal hatred and caste feelings. Rayaprolu Subba Rao, the initiator of the new school of Telugu poetry bade goodbye to the avadhana tradition because he considered that it was not conducive to the creation of pure poetry. Rapidity of composition was the only virtue of the poems turned out during the performance. They were mostly poems of the moment and did not possess qualities of abiding merit.

However the avadhana tradition has continued to the present. It is kept alive by competent performers like Perala Bharata Sarma, Subbanna Sate Avadhani, Narala Rama Reddy, Prasada Raya Kulapathi, and Medasani Mohan Choudhuri. Sahasravadhanam has also been performed by the late Jandyala Subrahmanya Sastry who displayed incredible memory and powers of composition. As a literary form avadhana depends for its success upon the prodigious retentive memory of the performer. Powers of concentration which the performer invokes from the Muse at the beginning of the performance enable him to surmount all obstacles and reach the goal of success. The performer must be ready to compose on any topic under the sun without any inhibition. The greater the constraints, the better will be the performance. Though works of lasting value may not be expected from avadhana, it surely serves the purpose of popularizing literature and stimulating interest in the appreciation of literary quality.

In Telugu Avadhana is considered to be a unique feat—Avadhana Vidya. It is difficult to trace its origin, but it seems to be a later development. In the past this craft was confined only to the learned scholars of the Vedas, who were endowed with prodigious memory and were able to answer any question about the Vedas on the spot. Here the main features were memory and the ability to interpret the Vedas. Later, Avadhani took various forms and performed different functions. Besides the forms already mentioned, there are also two other interesting forms: they are Netravadhanam and Natyavadhanam.

In Netravadhanam Avadhani will have his assistant who will sit at a distance visible to the Avadhani. A poem or a passage or a topic on which a poem is to be composed by the Avadhani is given to his assistant. The assistant conveys it through the signaling of the eyes. The Avadhani should understand it and read out the poem or message or compose a poem spontaneously on the topic given. This performance is not in vogue now.

Natyavadhanam is a kind of spontaneous 'Eka-Patrabhinayanam' or monoaction. Sometimes the Natyavadhani may take the assistance of one or two more persons to enact a scene, to dramatise a given situation. The audience will give situations either from History, Puranas or contemporary society. The Avadhani should have suitable makeup and dress and act in delivering his speech spontaneously.

In recent times Dhara Ramanatha Shastry started and developed the art. P. Satyanarayana Murthy of Regional College of Education, Mysore, is also giving performance of Natyavadhanam.

Being a difficult job requiring knowledge and intelligence Avadhanam has become a poetic feat.

One must have fluency, extraordinary memory readiness and adroitness if he wants to become an Avadhani. Above all, Avadhani must have attention. Avadhanam means attention. Amid all the disturbances the Avadhani should be able to keep his mind alert.

With all his literary abilities and memory power Avadhani should have a sweet voice to keep the audience spell bound.

AVAKASIKAL (Malayalam) is a four volume novel by Vilasini (M.K. Menon, b. 1928) published in 1980. The title of the novel is translated as 'The Inheritors'. Set in exotic Malayasia, this novel of immense length (it has nearly four thousand pages, perhaps the longest one to appear in India to date) deals with the seventy year old Velunni Kurup, a self-made millionaire and a host his greedy relatives who try to defraud him of his wealth. Married twice, first to a widow with three children, and then to the younger sister of his brother's wife, Velunni Kurup is childless and dying but still a match for his scheming relatives. Krishnanunni, a leading lawyer who gave up practice on being deserted by his unfaithful wife, and a trusted friend of Velunni Kurup, is to mediate. Krishnanunni, who lives with his little daughter Priya, is loved and respected by all; he was Velunni Kurup's first choice for his step daughter, Subhadra Amma. She was, however, married to one of Kurup's nephews who left her after the birth of Raje, a beautiful danseuse who made her debut and burst into stardom and went back to his poor Malay sweetheart. Saraswathy Amma, an erstwhile hospital nurse and now wife of Doctor Ravunni Kurup, the younger brother of Velunni Kurup is the arch schemer who wants to get possession of Velunni Kurup's properties by hook or by crook. Against the backdrop of Malayasia, a confluence of various cultural streams like Indian, Malay, Chinese and Japanese, greedy men and women battle against one another for the wealth of a dying man who himself got rich by devious means. Jim Hoffmann, the hippy, adds to the colour of the alluring atmosphere pervading the novel in which about fifty leading characters besides insignificant ones without number figure. The chief concern of the novelist is the basic insincts of man, his aspirations, frustrations and failures. Dying Velunni Kurup is a towering personality, dwarfing every other character. Of all his near relations, Rajee and her mother alone have a selfless regard for him. Vishalakshi Amma, the wife of Velunni Kurup, who leads a sanyasin-like life of seclusion, Saraswathy Amma, her brother Sakuni Kuttammaman, her son Bhasi and Sridhara Menon, the eldest son of Vishalakshi Amma are some of the memorable characters drawn with verve. And throughout the novel is perceptible a romantic strain—the delicate relationship between Krishnanunni and Raje. Krishnan unni's hesitation whether or not to admit openly his love for Raje deepens the agony of both. It is anybody's guess how things might end. True, Vilasini has never been a conventional novelist: from the very beginning his preoccupation has been with the minds of his characters. An adept practitioner of the stream of consciousness method, Vilasini spotlights the spiritual, emotional and mental lives of his characters; his forte is the analysis of character and not the weaving of plot and action. An event or a character is viewed from more than one angle; the novelist does not thrust himself to the fore-front. Avakasikal depicts the minds of about ten persons with deep insight. Vilasini wants his novel to be eminently readable, and he has shrewdly put in a few spicy ingredients. He has no use for the Joycean variety of stream of consciousness, a brain teaser to men of sensibility. He might, however, be accused of prolixity as all his characters talk too much. Avakasikal is a remarkable achievement of which Vilasini can be proud; but to describe it as the modern 'Vyasa Bharata' is to betray one's ignorance of Vyasa or his unequalled epic. Avakasikal got a number of awards including the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award, the Odakkuzhal Award, the Sahitya Akademi Award (1981) and the Vayalar Rama Varma Literary Award of 1983.

G.N.P.

AVANTISUNDARI (Sanskrit) was the beloved and worthy wife of the famous poet Rajashekhara and generally supposed to be the sister of Dharmapala. Rajashekhara refers to her as his wife in the Prastavana or Prologue to Karpuramanjari where he states that the drama Karpuramanjari was staged at her request; and Dhanapala in his Prakritakosha Paiyalachchhinamamala states that he composed the work for his young sister Sundari of Avanti (Verse. 277). She was a very illustrious member of Chahuvan family, and probably, she a Kshatriya by caste had a romantic marriage with the Brahmana poet Rajashekhara. Avantisundari did not shine in the light of her illustrious husband Rajashekhara alone but was herself a bright luminary amongst the learned women of those days.

First, that she herself was a rhetorician of outstanding merit is clearly proved by the fact that her opinion on some abstruse rhetorical questions have been quoted thrice, the last one very extensively, by her husband Rajashekhara in his celebrated work, Kavyamimamsa.

Not only that, she has also been referred to thrice by Hemachandra in his Deshinamamala, also called Deshishabadasamgraha or Ratnavali, while citing instances where Avantisundari had different opinions from his (I. 81). Here, he quotes three verses by her, one, e.g., in connection with the meaning of the word' Idamaha!.

Secondly, Avantisundari was also a well-known Prakrita poetess. There is no doubt that Rajashekhara had Avantisundari in mind when he declared joyously and with firm faith that:

> " Like men, women, too, can be poets. Genius inheres in the self, irrespective of sex differences between men and women. It is heard as well as seen that princesses, daughters of ministers, courtesans and concubines are possessed of extensive knowledge of scripture and poetry".

Here, Rajashekhara practically reiterates the inspiring view of Vatsayans's world known Kamasutra (2nd centruy B.C.) that is:

> "There are verily, concubines, princesses and daughters of ministers, possessing extensive knowledge of the scripture"

In this connection, we may take into account also the famous Kamasutra (3.14) where a list has been given of 'Chatushashthikalas' or 64 arts to be mastered by women essentially, and this includes composition of verses too.

Further, we may also take into account the well known works Majjhimanikaya (III) and Lalitavistara, were also the great literary powers of women have been gratefully acknowledged.

Unfortunately, three prakrita verses of Avantisundari are known to us only through the three quotations from her by Hemachandra in his celebrated work Deshinamamala (I. 147, 181).

All the three verses referred to above, are best specimens of Prakrita love poems.

The first portrays a Virahini or a lady-love, separated from her lover. Apprehending that he has totally forgotten her, she laments piteously, recalling past sweet experiences, viz., as to how once, for his sake, she did not even hesitate to face the risk of being condemned as a forward and shameless woman, and went so far as to go to him openly even before sedate and criticising elders.

The second verse portrays a Virahi or a lover, separated from his lady-love, thus, giving vivid picture of the other side. Here, the pining separated lover points out that his lady-love is totally misjudging him when she thinks that he has totally forgotten her. On the contrary, he is always thinking of her lovely lotus face, in a frame of profuse beelike black curls.

The last verse gives the happy picture of a loving couple where the husband says jokingly as a retort to his wife's baseless complaint that he has totally forgotten her and that he lives only for her sake, only by drinking the fresh beauty of her face.

The following are English translations (by the writer) of the above:

1. A lady-love separated from her lover laments—
   O, merciless one, Have you forgotten alas, even that I, with my upper garments slipping off, caught hold of you by running towards you even in the midst of my elders. (Quoted in Hemachandra's Deshinamamala I. 157).
2. A lover separated from her lady-love laments—
   I remember her face—she who was defiled by me only for a while; her face encircled by dangling creeperlike tresses, just like a tree, bowed down with the weight of bees.
3. A happy husband jokes with his wife—
   O, lotus-eyed one, possessed of youthful beauty: Now, having seen the beauty of your face, Indra is mocking Indrani.

The above verses, although very few in number, bear ample testimony as to Avantisundari's great poetic/ abilities, as well as to her very simple, sweet, charming style. A happy use of short alliterated words in her poems, makes her poems instances of rhythmic and musical works of a high order.

AVANTISUNDARI (Sanskrit) is the earliest prose composition from South India on the model of Bana's Kadambari. Its author is Dandin who flourished in Kanchi in the 7th century and hence a close contemporary of Bana.

The heroine Avantisundari is a princess of Avanti and her marriage with the Malava prince Rajavahana, is the main story narrated in the work. The work has been edited in the Trivandrum Sanskrit Series from the single available incomplete manuscript, full of lacunae. But even the present available fragment presents important details about the author and his learned predecessors, his wanderings to other parts of India due to invasions of the Pallava region and the circumstances under which the prose romance was composed at Kanchi. There are also other interesting details like those, for example, about the Mamallapuram shore temple near Madras and its architect Lalitalaya, who was not only an expert in manufacturing military machines but was also the author of the story of Shudraka in Tamil.

The style is smooth, flowing and classical, providing the varied patterns of narration, description (both detailed and brief) as well as beautiful imagery decorated with apt figures.

The Dashakumaracharita is a work by Dandin on the same theme: scholars like Raghavan feel that the Dashakumaracharita formed part of the voluminous Avantisundari, while D.K. Gupta feels that the Avantisundari was the last incomplete masterpiece by the same author.

The popularity of the theme is evident also in the Avantisundarikathasara, (published in Journal of Oriental Research, Madras, Vol. XVI onwards) where the anonymous author has narrated the full story, following Dandin's diction and style.

AVATARA CHARITA (Rajasthani) is the creation of Barahatha Naraharidas. The work has been extremely popular among the 'Charanas' as a caste as well as among those interested in devotional texts. It was only five or six decades ago that the Charanas made its study almost compulsory. The concluding verse of this voluminous book reveals that it was composed in the year 1676. The total number of verses is 1686. The metre, 'Paddhari', has been used more often than others like 'Shataka', 'Kavitta', 'Duha', etc. It contains a detailed descriptions, full of devotional sentiments, of the twenty-four manifestations of god, which is extremely interesting, natural and appealing. The language used is Pingala, a mixture of Braja and Rajasthani. The originality of ideas and feelings is rarely to be seen. The narration of Ramavatara seems to carry the influence, here and there, of Ramcharitamanas by Tulasidas and also of Ramachandrika by Kesavadas. The detailed descriptions of the twenty-four incarnations and the interesting style of narration are the two main reasons which made it so popular.

AVVAIYAR (Tamil) Avvaiyar is a hybrid form derived from Avvai and the honorific suffix ar. Avvai is the corrupt form of Ammai 'goodwoman'. Avvaiyar verbally means a respectable woman. Some hold that Avvaiyar itself is a natural proper name. There have been several bearing the name Avvaiyar in different periods.

Avvaiyar tops the list of nearly 30 poetesses of the Sangam period in her intelligence, creativity and fame. It is also said that there was another poetess named Avvaiyar in the later Chola period, contemporary to Kamban and Ottakkuttar.

Avvaiyar of the Sangam period has written 59 verses in total: 7 in Narrinai, 15 in Kuruntokai, 4 in Akananuru and 33 in Purananuru. Paranar, one of the great poets of the Sangam Age was her contemporary (Puram 99). She saw the three kings Chera, Chola and Pandya together in one place and sang of them wishing them to be forever united (Puram-367). She has sung about the chieftains also (Puram 140, 206, 91). Atiyaman Netuman Anji is one among the chieftains whom she liked and praised much. Once she sang about him and he was delaying to give her presents. She got angry and condemned his attitude. He realized his folly and offered her his royal presents in no time. There developed a deep friendship between them from that day onwards. He sent her once as an ambassador to his enemy Tontaiman who received her and showed her his archery. She found the weapons fresh and in docoration. She told him that his weapons were unused and therefore fresh whereas Atiyan's were used and they had often been sent for repair. Thus she subtly pointed out the amateurish skill of Tontaiman at war and the mature skill of Atiyan. As a result of this clever negotiation war was averted.

Once Atiyaman happened to get an Indian gooseberry (nelli fruit) which was supposed to give a long life to the eater. He thought that it was better for the welfare of the country if the poetess would live long. Hence he offered this fruit to her not revealing the fact that she would live long after taking the fruit. The poetess was moved so much after knowing the intention of the chieftain that she wished him immortality like Lord Shiva. This act of charity of the chieftain has also been praised in Sirupanarruppatai (99-103).

Avvaiyar's mastery in creativity is revealed in her songs of munificence and elegies. Her elegy on the death of Atiyan is noteworthy (Puram 235). The spear that pierced into the breast of Atiyan, which caused his death fell into the bards' vessels and after perforating them, went into the hands of the suppliants, passed through their eyes to the tongue and remained there. There would be no one to sing hereafter and if at all there would be some to sing, then there would be no one to offer them presents. Apart from this, she has sung more elegies also on the eve of the cremation of Atiyan and the final rites (Puram 231, 232). Her mastery in creativity is also evidenced in her songs on bravery (Puram 93). She has also sung on Pokuttezhini, the son of Atiyan (Puram 96, 102, 302). She used to call herself a singer.

She held that the greatness of the land depends on nothing but the culture of the people of the land (Puram 187). The everlasting Nature, lisping children and the loving couple are some of the themes of the perennial verses.

Some assumed that she was the sister of Tiruvalluvar. There are also several stories about Avvaiyar of the later period. There are many stray verses (Tanippatal) found in the name of Avvaiyar where various references to her are available. These also cannot be taken into consideration as they lack historical evidence. Apart from these stray verses, there are also some didactic works viz., Atticudi, Konraivendan, Muturai (Vakkuntam) and Nalvazhi found in the name of Avvaiyar. These works, though simple, are pregnant with ethical ideals which suit all age groups. Her poetry and philosophy are broad-based on life, bound up with the normal experience of the average human being. Hence their eternal appeal to the mind.

AWARA MASIHA (Hindi), biography of the Bengali novelist Saratchandra Chattopadhyaya, is a magnum opus of Vishnu Prabhakar published in 1974. Written in the format of an interesting novel, it is perhaps the best biography ever written in Hindi. With an artistic equipoise he has successfully re-created the rather complicated personality of Saratchandra.

Even in Bengali, though articles and memoirs on Sarat were written, yet no authentic biography has been attempted to date. As the author says: "Many books have been published presenting his life in the form of an imaginary story. Yet instead of presenting his true personality they rather made it more complicated". His life had, moreover, been the subject of a lot of rumours. Vishnu Prabhakar had to put in strenuous efforts for as many as fourteen years for accomplishing this challenging task. He has not tried to present Sarat as too good or too bad a person (saint or satan),he has rather presented Sarat as a normal human being with usual weaknesses and virtues. But this human being has inherent faith in human dignity.

The book is divided in three 'parvas' (Parts). Though separate the three are interlinked according to its inner plan. The first 'parva'-Dishahara–presents his early life divided into many chapters in details. The second 'parva'–Dishant–presents the vast background of his literary creation in chapters variously divided from 'Srijan Ka Swarna Yug' to 'Nishkamp Dipshikha'.

On the whole the work itself is a conclusive proof of the fact that no arm-chair fantasies have been resorted to and genuine research of facts about the life of one of the greatest writers, who formed the subject of innumerable rumours, and controversies, has been undertaken without prejudice and favour. The facts about Sarat's relations with Nirupama Devi may be cited as an example. Vishnu Prabhakar has unearthed a number of facts about it. Women characters suffering from the agony of unfulfilled love whether it is Parvti of Devdas or Madhavi of Bari Didi or some other women characters–are typical of Sarat's novels.

The author is so much concerned with the variety of facts in Awara Masiha that he goes on giving a string of proofs. Under this authenticated creative process, Vishnu Prabhakar has presented the life history of Sarat which is gripping and interesting like a novel. It is a thoroughly reliable biography. It presents a complete image of Sarat as a person, a political thinker and a litterateur. One finds the biographical art at its best–a factual infrastructure moulded into a spontaneous creative composition. Vishnu Prabhakar has been honoured for this work by Soviet-Land Nehru Award and has also received the Pablo Neruda Honour. The National Book Trust of India, New Delhi got the biography translated into seven other Indian languages. Undoubtedly, it is a landmark in the field of biography writing in Hindi literature.

AWARA SAJDE (Urdu) is the third collection (Jhankar and Akhire Shab released in the forties being the other two) of the poetry of Kaifi Azmi (b. 1920; real name Athar Husain Rizvi, one of the leading lights of the Progressive Writers Association of India. Despite his lack of formal education (which is confined to passing the Oriental title examination in Urdu and Persian) Kaifi has made his mark as a poet of unusual gifts and has won many honours and distinctions at national and international levels, like Padmasri and Nehru Soviet Land Award, besides literary awards of the U.P. and Maharashtra Urdu Academies. He started writing when he was barely a child. During the last forty years or so he occupied a position in the front rank of modern Urdu poets and there has been practically no movement in Urdu literature in which he has not participated without of course losing his basic identity as one of the pillars of the Progressive Writers movement.

Awara Sajde comprises thirty seven poetic compositions including five ghazals and represents selections from his poetic works spread over the last three decades or so.

Despite its comparatively slender size, the book is fairly representative of Kaifi's thought and style. The compositions are not arranged in chronological or any other definite order and except for those who have been reading his poetry all these years, it is difficult to date. Almost throughtout one finds the same Kaifi as he has been known all these years, a poet committed to life and a social order based on equality, fraternity and liberty. He sings of love, of the family of man and of peace and progress in a highly idealised manner. His poem Awara Sajde is on the parting of ways of Russia and China who together could perhaps have changed the course of history and ushered in that utopia of which the poet had many a lofty dreams. His poems on Nehru, Lenin, Farghana, Telangana, Tashkand, Moscow or Bangla Desh are topical poems marked by narrative style.

The book was awarded the Sahitya Akademi prize in 1975.

AWARDS (National)

Prior to the establishment of the Sahitya Akademi in 1954 there was no award in India to secure an all-India recognition to writers in different languages of the country. At the inaugural meeting of the Akademi, Union Minister for Education Abul Kalam Azad announced that the Government of India had accepted a scheme "to give prizes of Rs. 5,000 every year for the best work in each of the fourteen languages mentioned in the Schedule to the Constitution" and that the awards would be given on the recommendation of the Sahitya Akademi. The first Awards for the most outstanding books published since Independence in 1947 were announced in 1955 by the Government of India, on the recommendation of the Sahitya Akademi. Since then, every year, the Awards have been declared and given by the Sahitya Akademi itself for outstanding books published during the preceding three years.

The procedure followed for selecting books for the first Awards in 1955 was fairly simple. Each Member of the Akademi was to recommend three books which, according to him, were the most outstanding in that language. The choice was not necessarily to be limited to literature in the orthodox sense of the term, but might extend to any work dealing with any branch of the Humanities, provided the writing was creative and was an outstanding contribution to language, literature or knowledge. Even a translation was eligibile if it was considered by itself a literary creation of outstanding merit. Members of the Akademi were free to consult recognised literary associations and individual writers and critics before making their recommendations. The Executive Board of the Akademi was to make the final selection, taking into account all the recommendations.

This openness was soon given up and confidentiality at all levels in processing the recommendations was maintained from 1959. Whether the names and opinions of the advisers at various stages should be kept secret or not was a matter which was debated frequently. The matter was raised in the Parliament of India in 1968. After taking into account the views expressed by the Members of Parliament, Minister for Education Triguna Sen, observed that the names of the eminent advisers who served on the panels for Awards should not be confidential to Parliament and henceforth after the announcement of Awards they might not be treated as such. The suggestion of the Minister was not accepted by the Akademi and the names of advisers continued to be kept secret until 1981 when the Akademi decided to make public the names of the Readers in the Final Panels at the time of declaration of the Awards.

The rules and procedure governing the Sahitya Akademi Awards have been under constant review: six committees, specially constituted for the purpose, had reviewed them: the chairmen were: C.D. Deshmukh (1959), K.G. Saiyidain (1962), Zakir Husain (1967), K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar (1973, 1977) and V.K. Gokak (1978).

The present procedure for selecting a book for the Award is as follows: A ground list of eligible and deserving books in each language is compiled with the help of an expert as also of recognised literary associations. This list is sent to twenty-five preliminary advisers who are requested to recommend not more than five books each, either from the list or outside it. The recommendations thus received are collated and referred back to the twenty-five preliminary advisers who are requested to recommend only one book each from the list, which they consider most deserving. The short-listed books are sent to three readers who are invited to give their detailed evaluations of each book separately. The evaluations of the three Readers, along with the recommendations of the Preliminary Advisers, are placed before the Executive Board of the Akademi which declares the Awards.

In 1961, translations were excluded from the purview of the Awards. In 1962, posthumous publications were declared eligible only if they were published within three years of the author's death. In 1964, research theses submitted for University degrees were excluded from consideration. Fresh collections of writings, published earlier in book form were normally not eligible for the Award unless the collection in question contained substantial writing which was new and hitherto unpublished in book form.

The early Sahitya Akademi Awards were confined to books published in the languages mentioned in the 8th Schedule of the Constitution of India: Assamese, Bengali, Gujarati, Hindi, Kannada, Kashmiri, Malayalam, Marathi, Oriya, Punjabi, Sanskrit, Tamil, Telugu and

Urdu. In 1956 two Awards were instituted for Sanskrit: "one for creative writing in Sanskrit, the other for outstanding contribution to Sanskrit Studies, written in English or any of the Indian languages." (Due to procedural difficulties, the two Awards were combined into one in 1969 and brought in conformity with the Awards for other languages.)

Later, books published in other languages recognised by the Sahitya Akademi were also declared eligible: English, Sindhi (later included in the Constitution of India), Maithili, Dogri, Rajasthani, Nepali, Manipuri and Konkani. Thus, at present Sahitya Akademi Awards are given to books published in twenty-two languages of the country: fifteen included in the Constitution of India and seven other recognised by the Sahitya Akademi as independent modern literary languages of the country.

The Award in the form of a casket containing an inscribed copper plaque is presented to the recipient by the President of the Akademi, along with a cheque. The cash award till 1982 was Rs. 5,000 which has since been raised to Rs. 10,1000.

Of the 438 authors who were chosen for the Award till 1984, 5 declined to receive it: while V.R. Narla, Deshbandhu Dogra Nutan and Suresh Joshi took umbrage and rejected the Award, G.A. Kulkarni returned it as the eligibility of his book was questioned in press and Swami Anand due to his vow not to accept any pecuniary benefit from his writings.

Genre-wise break-up of the Awards is: Poetry, 150: Fiction, 125; Drama, 18; criticism, 36; biography, 16; autobiography, 11; history of language, literature, culture or society, 23; religion and philosophy, 10; treatises and commentaries, 16; belles lettres, 23; others, 10.

39 Awards were given to authors below 40; 209 Awards to authors between 40 and 60; and 152 to authors above 60; the youngest to receive the Award was 28, and the oldest 84.

Sahitya Akademi Awards have enabled writers whose reputation has hitherto been confined to their own region to be known all over the country. In some cases, they have paved the way for their international recognition. Few had known Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai outside Kerala before 1957; the Akademi Award made him known throughout India, his novels were soon translated into many languages, his fame spread abroad, and for a long time he has been the most widely translated and read Indian novelist. Amrita Pritam received the Award for 1956, when she was only 37, and soon became an internationally known writer. The declaration of the Akademi Awards every year brings the chosen authors into national focus.

While the Sahitya Akademi selects a book for its annual Award as the most outstanding book in that language in the preceding three years, it does not seek to claim that it is the most outstanding book in all the Indian languages. To choose one book or one author as the most outstanding one in India of a given period from so many languages is a challenging task. Bharatiya Jnanpith, a research and cultural institution founded in 1944 by the noted industrialist Shantiprasad Jain, took up the task and decided to institute in 1961 an annual Award of one lakh rupees (raised to one and a half lakh rupees from 1981) to the best and most outstanding creative writing in the fifteen languages listed in the 8th Schedule of the Constitution of India. Details of the scheme were worked out and the Award was formally instituted in 1963, and the first Award announced in 1965.

Proposals are invited from literary institutions, language departments of Universities, well-known critics, and other "suitable agencies and individuals". Any one can send a proposal in the prescribed form. An Advisory Committee for each language examines the proposals received and makes its recommendation to the Selection Board; it need not confine itself to the proposals received but may make a recommendation on its own; the idea is to ensure that no deserving book or author is left out of consideration. Recommendations of the various Language Advisory Committees are screened and assessed under the supervision of the Selection Board which makes the final choice, taking into account the total literary contribution of the author. All possible materials are prepared for its consideration: to provide a common base for final evaluation, the short listed works are even translated into Hindi or English.

The period of eligibility for each Award varies and is determined and announced in advance. For the first Award in 1965, books published from 1920 to 1958 were considered; for the second Award in 1966, books published from 1925 to 1959 were considered; for the third Award in 1967, books published from 1935 to 1960 were considered; for the fifteenth Award for 1979 books published from 1968 to 1972 were considered. A book must have been published at least five years before it becomes eligible for consideration.

The first Selection Board was constituted by the Bharatiya Jnanpith and consisted of men of eminence. The Board consists of not less than seven and not more than eleven members. Vacancies on the Board are filled on the recommendation of the Board itself. The present Chairman of the Selection Board is P.V. Narasimha Rao. The chairmen and members of the Selection Board included Rajendra Prasad, Kaka Kalelkar, Sampurnanand, Karan Singh, Hazari Prasad Dwivedi, Umashankar Joshi and V.K. Gokak.

Bharatiya Jnanpith Literary Award winners are: G. Sankara Kurup, Tarasankar Bandyopadhyay, K.V. Puttappa, Umashankar Joshi, Sumitranandan Pant, Firaq Gorakhpuri, Viswanadha Satyanarayana, Bishnu Dey, Ramdhari Singh Dinkar, D.R. Bendre, Gopinath Mohanty, V.S. Khandekar, P.V. Akilandam 'Akilon', Ashapurna Devi, K. Sivarama Karanth, Ajneya, B.K. Bhattacharya, S.K. Pottekkatt, Amrita Pritam, Mahadevi Verma, Masti Venkatesa Iyengar and Thakazhi Sivasankara Pilai. Almost all these Jnanpith Award winners had earlier won the Sahitya Akademi Award.

There may be other national awards, but they are either not exclusively meant for literary works or not universally recognised as national. All other literary awards are, by and large, regional in character.

D.S.R.

AWARDS (Assamese) The Publication Board, Assam, confers an annual literary award under the name 'Publication Board Award'. The aim of the award is 'to provide outstanding authors of books in Assamese with public recognition and encouragement for creative work'. The award is conferred upon the author of the work adjudged the best among those of the three preceding years. The prize carries in cash rupees five thousand, a silver plaque, and a citation. Instituted in 1973, this is the highest and most prestigious literary award of Assam.

The Asom Sahitya Sabha awards the following prizes out of its various endowment funds: Kamla Devi Trust Fund Prize (instituted in 1923) on books for children; Digboi Sahitya Sabha Samiti Prize (instituted in 1965) for the best play of the year; Premadhar Datta Samiti Prize (instituted in 1970) for children's literature; Mohan Chandra Sarma Trust Fund Prize (instituted in 1971) for the best book of non-fictional prose of the year; Ugratara Trust Fund Prize for the best book of verse of the year, awarded every two years; Bishnuram Medhi Trust Fund Prize (instituted in 1972) for children's literature; Gopal Chandra Barua Prize (instituted in 1979) for popular scientific literature; Giridhar Sarma Prize (instituted in 1980) for the best novel of the year; Raghunath Chowdhury Literary Award, given every two years, for the best book of verse.

The Government of Assam awards life-time monthly pensions of four hundred rupees a month, known as literary pensions, to worthy men of letters as a public recognition of their merit, as well as material relief for uninterrupted pursuit of their literary activities.

The Sahitya Prakash, a firm of publishers situated at Gauhati, organises a 'talent-search competition' for new novelists, and the best three novels are published by them. No cash award, however, is given to the writers.

P.K.

AWARDS (Bengali) There have been quite a few literary awards in Bengali. Apart from the literary prizes conferred by such learned bodies as the Calcutta University, Asiatic Society, Bangiya Sahitya Parishad, etc., most of the literary awards, that have now earned a deserved reputation, were started after Independence.

In West Bengal, for instance, Rabindra Memorial Prize was initiated by the Government of West Bengal in 1950. Three prizes are awarded each year under this head:–(1) one for the best creative or intellectual writing in Bengali during preceding three years; (2) one for the best Bengali scientific book of the year; and (3) one for a noteworthy book on any aspect of Bengali culture written in a language other than Bengali. Upto 1974 the money value of each of these three prizes was Rupees five thousand. But from 1975 the amount has been enhanced to Rupees ten thousand. This prize is awarded each year on the birthday of Rabindranath Tagore (25th Vaisakh of the Bengali calendar).

Of late the West Bengal Government have introduced two more prizes of Rupees ten thousand each, one in the name of Bankimchandra Chatterjee, and the other in the name of Iswarchandra Vidyasagar. Bankim Memorial Prize was given only once, in 1975, the recipient being the veteran prosodist and historian, Prabodhchandra Sen of Santiniketan. Vidyasagar Prize, introduced since 1976, is divided into two sections, one reserved for the best prose writer since 1941 upto the present, and the other meant for the best writer of juvenile literature of the year. The recipients in this genre of prizes have been Sunirmal Basu, Sibram Chakravarty (both posthumously) and Lila Majumdar for juvenile literature and Annadasankar Ray for his overall contributions to prose literature.

The Ananda Bazar Patrika group of newspapers have introduced two prizes carrying the general name of Ananda Puraskar since 1950, one in the name of Sureshchandra Majumdar and the other in the name of Prafulla Sarkar, the two being the joint founders of the Ananda Bazar Patrika. Upto 1970 the money value of the prizes was Rs. 1,000/- each, but from 1971 onwards the amount has been increased to Rs. 5,000/-. On the other hand, the Amrita Bazar-Jugantar group of newspapers have been declaring prizes in the memory of the founders of the Amrita Bazar Patrika every year since 1958, one named 'Sisirkumar Prize' for the best essayist and critic of the year, the other 'Matilal Prize' for the best creative writing of the year. Each prize is of Rs. 1,000/-.

Sarat Smriti Samity, the association devoted to the task of promoting the memory of Saratchandra Chatterjee, and currently engaged in publishing his works serially, has of late introduced a prize in the name of this popular novelist of Bengal, carrying a money value of Rs. 10,000/-. Among the recipients of the prize were Bibhutibhusan Mukherjee and Charuchandra Chakrabarti, pen-named 'Jarasandha'.

Of the older prizes Calcutta University provides for Jagattarini Medal, Sarojini Basu Medal and Sudha Basu Medal in recognition of the merit of distinguished litterateurs, while it sanctions each year a special prize for the best lady writer entitled 'Lila Puraskar'. Bangiya Sahitya Parishad, one of the oldest literary institutions of Bengal, allots for a number of prizes of which 'Rampran Gupta Prize' is the most notable.

Mention may be made of 'Narasimha Das Puraskar' of the Delhi University, 'Nazrul Puraskar' of Nazrul Academy, Churulia, 'Mauchak Puraskar' for juvenile literature, 'Prasad Puraskar' for drama and poetry, 'Prantosh Smriti Puraskar' and 'Ranjit Smriti Puraskar' for juvenile and other worthwhile writing.

AWARDS (Dogri) Two state awards are available for literary excellence in Dogri–(1) The Jammu & Kasmir Academy (of Art, Culture and Languages) Awards given every year to outstanding works in the languages recognised by it, and Jammu & Kashmir Academy Award for the best playscripts in languages recognised by it.

Jammu & Kashmir Academy instituted the literary awards for languages like Kashmiri and Dogri, recognised by it soon after its establishment in 1958. The first award of Rs. 1,000/- was given to the late Narendra Khajuria for his collection of plays for children called As Bhag Jagane Ale An in 1961. The Academy has instituted two awards for each year in each of the recognised languages. Earlier, the award money was Rs. 1,000/- and the awards were given to the best and the second best books assessed by a panel of judges. About four or five years back, the award money was enhanced to Rs. 2,000/- each. A rule was also framed to ensure that a book getting the Sahitya Akademi Award would not be eligible for an award by the State Academy. A number of Dogri authors have received these awards. These awards have been given for books of poetry, short stories, novels and a book of essays, entitled, Duggar da Jum Darsan.

The third category of awards–i.e. the awards given by Jammu & Kashmir Academy for play-scripts are intended to encourage playwrights to write good plays which when published can make good reading as well as good stage performances. These awards are also limited to the languages recognised by the State like Kashmiri, Dogri, Urdu, Hindi. The award money is less than Rs. 1,000/-. Over a dozen Dogri play scripts have been awarded this prize so far.

No Awards were given in 1955, 1956, 1957, 1958, 1959, 1961, 1962, 1964, 1966, 1968, 1970, 1972, 1973 and 1974.

AWARDS (Hindi). Giving due recognition and appreciation to outstanding writers has been a time-honoured tradition in this ancient land of India. The feudal era of India saw the poets being liberally awarded and honoured by their royal patrons. Many of them were trusted friends, lively company and discreet courtiers of their royal patrons. Many a time they proved to be skilled fighters, too. If Chand Vardai was a personal friend of Prithvi Raj and Rahim was one of the valued 'nine gems' of Mughal king Akbar's court, then poet Gang also occupied a very honourable place as a court poet. The poets of 'Riti Kal' were occasionally bestowed with lavish honours by their patrons which assumed different forms in different contexts. On all joyous occasions, too, they received bounteous presents from their patrons.

In accordance with the times, these awards underwent a sea-change with the advent of modern age. One such change manifested itself in titles like 'Sitare-e-Hindi' and 'Bhartendu'. When literary creativity re-established a link with social obligation and transformed itself into a serious and meaningful pursuit, popular will and voluntary organisations began to extend due honour to creative talent. The major awards and award-giving Hindi organisations may be enumerated as follows:

1. Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varansi (1893); the oldest premier Hindi organisation awards a number of prizes and medals instituted after eminent public and literary personages for outstanding literary works: Raja Baldevdas Birla Puraskar, Batuk Prasad Puraskar, Ratnakar Puraskar, Chhannulal Puraskar, Jodh Singh Puraskar, Madhavidevi Puraskar, Shyam Sunder Das Puraskar, Bhairav Prasad Puraskar, Mandalik Puraskar, Hiralal Swaranpadak, Dwivedi Swarnapadak, Sudhakar Padak, Greaves Padak, Radha-Krishna Das Padak, Baldevdas Padak, Gulari Padak, Vasumati Padak, Bhagwati Devi Rajoria Padak.
2. Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Prayag (1910)—another premier Hindi organisation, established at the instance of the Nagari Pracharani Sabha, also awards a number of prizes to eminent authors for their literary achievements. These prizes, subject to different rules and awarded on different subjects, are enumerated: Mangala Prasad Paritoshik, Jain Paritoshik, Radha Mohan Gokulji Paritoshik, Narang Puraskar (awarded only to Hindi poets of the Punjab), Gopal Puraskar and Ratnakumari Puraskar.
3. Hindustani Academy Puraskar:- A number of prizes are awarded on outstanding original works in Hindi by the Hindustani Academy (estd., 1927).
4. Harjimal Dalmia Puraskar:- This award, instituted to perpetuate the memory of Harjimal Dalmia, has been given to a number of Hindi authors over the years.
5. U.P. Govt. Prizes:- The U.P. Govt. has consistently tried to encourage creative effort in Hindi through the award of a large number of prizes every year on works of outstanding merit. The biggest amount of the various prizes is Rupees One lac which has thus far gone only to Smt. Mahadevi Verma.
6. Sudhindra Puraskar, Devilal Samar Puraskar, Rangeya Raghav Puraskar, Dev Raj Upadhyaya Puraskar and Kanhaiyalal Sahal Puraskar:– These are awarded for poetry, drama, fiction, essay, criticism and works in other genres such as literary sketches, reminiscences,reportage, etc. Each of the prizes carries a cash award of Rupees Two thousand only.
7. Rashtra Bhasha Hindi Prachar Sabha Puraskar:- This prize is earmarked for Hindi writings of a Non-Hindi Speaking Literature.
8. Madhya Pradesh Govt. Prizes:- The biggest of the numerous prizes awarded by the M.P. Govt. consists of a cash of Rupees Twenty Two thousand. The awardees so far have been Bhawani Prasad Misra and Shri Kant Verma.
9. Dev Pursakar:- This yearly cash award of Rs. 2000/- goes alternately to works in Braj Bhasha and Khariboli. Among the recipients of this award have been Dularelal Bhargave, Ram Kumar Verma and Shyam Narain Pandeya.
10. Om Prakash Sahitya Samman:- This prize, instituted to prepetuate the memory of Om Prakash, founder of M/s. Radha Krishna Prakashan, is awarded every year to an author of not over 39 years of age on a meritorious literary work. It went to Girdhar Rathi on his poetic collection Bahar-Bhitar in 1980, to Mrinal Pandey on her short story collection Shabdabedhi in 1981 and to Mangalesh Dabral for his collection of poems Pahar Pal Lalten in 1982. It entitled the awardee to a sum of Rs. 500/- every month for a year.
11. Bharat Bhusan Agarwal Puraskar:- This prize is awarded in the memory of the poet, Bharat Bhushan Agarwal. This award is given on the best poem of the year penned by a young author (of not more than 35 years of age). Arun Kamal and Uday Prakash have so far been the recipients of this award.

Gov. R.

AWARDS (Kannada). Kannada Literature has always enjoyed royal patronage from the very beginning. The best works in the classical traditions were in no small measure the result of royal munificence. This royal patronage continued even under the modern rulers of the erstwhile Mysore State like Krishnaraja Wodeyar IV and Jayachamaraja Wodeyar. But then, these two rulers extended their patronage to scholars and poets who continued to write in the classical mould.

During the reign of Chamaraja Wodeyar, Karnataka Vidyawardhaka Sangha came into being (20-7-1890) in Dharwad, one of the main objectives of which was to give fillip to writing books in Kannada. It should be noted in this connection that the northern part of the present Karnataka State was at that time a part of the erstwhile Bombay Presidency, and Kannadigas had to seek higher education through Marathi. A prerequisite for education through the mother tongue was production of books. And hence the need of the hour was to encourage writing of books. With this end in view, Karnataka Vidyawardhaka Sangha gave cash awards amounting to Rs. 22,365 to 225 books during 1890-1951. The Government of Bombay extended financial assistance to this project.

Kannada Sahitya Parishat of Bangalore also had this objective when it was established in 1915, but its activity in this regard was rather sporadic.

During the twenties of the 20th century, Devaraja Bahadur, a scion of the royal family, instituted an endowment in the Education Department of the Government of Mysore for awarding three cash prizes to books selected by a Committee. Though the prize-amount is very modest, it has all along been a coveted prize.

The promoters of the renaissance in Kannada literature realised the need of incentives for its growth on right lines. The Karnataka Sangha of Central College, Bangalore, which was doing yeoman's service to the promotion of modern Kannada literature through its quarterly Prabuddha Karnataka instituted an annual award called Muddana Swarnapadaka (the Muddana Memorial Gold Medal) for the best story by an undergraduate. K.V. Puttappa and 'Ananda' (A. Sitaram) who later became major short-story writers were the first two recipients of the much coveted medal. The Sangha had to stop giving this annual award after three years due to paucity of funds.

Another equally coveted award was the Rajatamamahotsava Swarna Padaka (Silver Jubilee Kannada Gold Medal) instituted by B.M. Srikantia, then Registrar and Honorary Professor of Kannada in the Mysore University and a 'royalist' to the core, in commemoration of the Silver Jubilee (1928) of the ascension of Krishnaraja Wodeyar to the throne. It was to be given to the best narrative poem of at least 300 lines in length, written in modern metre by an undergraduate of the Mysore University; the composition could be either a translation or an adaptation of an English poem or an original one. The idea behind the conditions of the award was to encourage sustained versification of considerable length. It was again K.V. Puttappa who bagged the very first medal for his poem 'Kumidini', an adaptation of Wordsworth's 'Laodamia'. Among the other awardees may be mentioned G.P. Rajaratnam, S. Anantanarayana, Raghava and C.P. Krishna Kumar for their original poems.

It is well known that the Sahitya Akademi and the State Akademi have been awarding prizes to the best Kannada books of the year. The State Akademi selects every year four or five litterateurs and scholars for cash awards (Rs. 500/- in the beginning; Rs. 5000/- at present). These are given in recognition of their outstanding services to Kannada language and literature.

Another new type of award introduced by the State Akademi is meant for the best book of the year in the creative and non-creative sections of literature.

M.V.S.R.

AWARDS (Kashmiri). During the last two decades, the distinguished poets and prose writers of the Kashmiri have been receiving incentives and encouragements in respect of some literary awards at the State level through the Jammu & Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages and at the National level through the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi.

The Jammu & Kashmir Cultural Academy came into existence in 1960 with Bakshi Ghulam Muhammad, the then Prime Minister of Jammu & Kashmir State, as its pioneer President and with Mirza Kamal-ud-Din as its first Secretary. The pioneer President of this Academy proved to be a great patron of Kashmiri, particularly of its folk poetry and folk music. He gave a start to the Award-system from his special grant of Prime-Minister's Fund at first instance. But upto 1963, the system was quite haphazard and no record thereof is available in the Academy. It is, however, learnt that the award holders of that period included Master Zinda Kaul and Mohi-ud-Din Hajini. Master Zinda Kaul was given this award for his anthology of Kashmiri poems entitled Sumarun, while Hajini received it for his compilation of some prose pieces entitled Kaashri Nasrich Kitab.

After 1964 a systematic method of judging the best book of the year was evolved in the Academy which has undergone some additions and alterations till 1984. The Award-results in favour of the Kashmiri during these two decades are now available in various records of the Academy.

There is no other institution in Jammu & Kashmir State at the government or private level with such a creditable patronage of Kashmiri literature. A private organisation namely Sadiq Memorial Committee, however, deserves a special mention, which under the Secretaryship of Ali Muhammad Lone (a famous Kashmiri writer) has introduced some awards for literary activities in the valley. During the last five years, the committee has given Sadiq awards to such persons and organisations whose dedicated service to Kashmiri language and literature deserved encouragement. Such award-winning persons include Ghulam Nabi Dulwal (Jaanbaz Kistawari) and Kailash Mehra, while the Sadiq Award-winning organisations are 'Adbi-Markaz Kamraaz' and 'Bhagat-Theatre Akingam.'

AWARDS (Maithili). The Dhauta-Pariksha was a great award instituted by the Maharajadhiraja of Darbhanga which was given to scholars in recognition of their learning. The Darbhanga Raj patronised a host of celebrated Sanskrit and Maithili scholars who were known as Raja-Panditas. They constituted an academic body and held annually an examination known as Dhauta-Pariksha. The highest award was dhoti (a loin cloth) which was coveted by the distinguished scholars of the day. It was based on the old Maithila system of salaka-pariksha where the candidate was allowed even to have his books by his side when experts took his viva-voce. Besides this, another government institution also existed which awarded the graded degrees of seniority to the Professors (Pandits) such as Upadhyaya, Mahopadhyaya and Mahamahopadhyaya. The title of Pandita was also conferred on distinguished poets and writers and one such recipient was the celebrated Maithili poet, Lala Das, who was honoured with this title by the Maharaja of Darbhanga, Rameshwar Singh.

The establishment of the Chetana Samiti in Patna about twenty-five years ago gave a great impetus to Maithili learning. The Samiti organises the Vidyapati Parva every year in November on the birthday of the great poet, Vidyapati and awards certificate of merit and shawl to celebrated Maithili scholars in recognition of their specific contributions to Maithili. The seminar held on this occasion is a great feat in which almost all the top Maithili writers participate, and its proceedings are regularly published in book form.

The recognition of Maithili by the Sahitya Akademi as a major language was yet another step in this direction which served as a great morale-booster to the cause of Maithili in general. Traditional Sanskrit scholars who had so long ignored Maithili, started composing works in their mother-tongue which resulted in some great publications meriting awards from the Sahitya Akademi.

The establishment of the Maithili Akademi, on the pattern of the Sahitya Akademi, by the Government of Bihar, has given it yet another fillip by providing lecture-series, Gaurinath-bhashan-mala every year. Only the celebrated scholars are given the honour of delivering speeches in this series which are properly remunerated and regularly published.

These awards have proved to be a boon to the growing literature which has the distinction of producing the celebrated poet, Vidyapati who commands equal respect from the Assamese, Bengali and Oriya speaking people, besides the Maithilas.

AWARDS (Malayalam). The hereditary kings or other chieftains of the three erstwhile major political divisions of Kerala, i.e. Travancore, Cochin, and Malabar, encouraged literary luminaries by conferring titles, presenting gold bracelets, granting certain privileges or pension or giving a special place in the courts. Punam Namboodiri, Melpathur Narayana Bhattathiri, Kunchan Nambiar, Unnayi Varier and Irayimman Thampi were, to mention only the best known, are some of the recipients of one or the other of the honours mentioned above. When Kumaran Asan, one of what has come to be known as the poetic trinity of Kerala, was honoured by being presented with a gold bracelet and a silk shawl in recognition of his contribution to literature in 1922 by the Prince of Wales, he was following that old tradition.

However, the term award became popular only with the establishment of the Sahitya Akademi and Kerala Sahitya Akademi in the 1950s and the subsequent commencement of the practice of encouraging literary efforts by offering prizes for outstanding contributions. The first recipient of the Sahitya Akademi award for Malayalam was R. Narayana Panikkar (1955) for his six-volume history of Malayalam Language and Literature entitled Kerala Bhasha Sahitya Charitram. I.C. Chacko, Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai and K.P. Kesava Menon were some of the other Malayalam writers to be honoured in this way. The Kerala Sahitya Akademi selects the best work in each of the genres, viz. story, novel, drama, criticism, essays and poetry and honours their authors by giving away awards to them. All these are annual awards carrying cash prizes together with citations.

Besides these there are certain other awards for which also the Kerala Sahitya Akademi selects the works. They may be called 'endowment awards' because it is the interest accruing each year on some endowments made by interested persons or parties that is utilized for the purpose. The Erkara Raman Namboodiri award for the best Vedic or Sastraic study, the I.C. Chacko award for the best scientific or linguistic work, the Balarama Varma award for the best work in children's literature and the C.B. Kumar award for the best studies or essays belong to that type.

When G. Sankara Kurup received the most prestigious national award, the Jnanpith, for his poetical collection Odakkuzhal, he set apart one-fourth of the prize amount as an endowment for another award in the name of that collection. It is known as Odakkuzhal award given for the best literary work in Malayalam every year.

The award mentioned last is a private one in the sense that the state has nothing to do with it. There are a few others like that. Of these, the best known and the most prestigious in Kerala is the Vayalar Rama Varma award, instituted in the name of the poet and composer of lyrics Vayalar Rama Varma; it carries a cash prize of Rs. 25,000. The others are the Sahitya Pravartaka Award administered by the Sahitya Pravartaka Co-operative Society, the Edassery Award for poetry started in the name of the poet Edassery Govindan Nair, the Sakti Award in the name of Cherukad Govinda Pisharodi and the Asan awards sponsored by the Asan Academy. The last, in memory of the poet Kumaran Asan, is unique in that it annually selects the best poetical work not only at the state level but also at the national and international levels.

AWARDS (Manipuri). Jamini Sundar Guha Memorial Gold Medal–a three–yearly award for any original AWARDS (Marathi). The origin of the practice of distributing prizes to Marathi writers can be traced to the 17th century. Shivaji Maharaj, after his coronation in 1674, ordered his Special Minister Pandit Rao to distribute Dakshina (Prizes) to learned Brahmins in the auspicious month of Shravan. This traditional practice was followed by his sons Sambhaji and Rajaram. In the reign of Shahu Maharaj, the work of distributing the Dakshina was assigned to Senapati Dabhade.

Later, Bajirao–the first, in 1749, transferred the work to his own family. Till 1818, the work remained with his family. When the English rulers conquered India, this traditional practice was abolished. In 1736, an amount of Rs. 16,354 was distributed as Dakshina to Brahmins. Whereas in 1789, an amount of Rs. 2,25,254 was distributed; in the year 1818, this amount was raised to 10 lakhs. The distribution of prizes was restricted to Brahmins only. A sum of Rs. 15,000 was reserved by Elphinstone, the then Resident of Poona for starting a Sanskrit Pathshala. In 1821, the English rulers changed this practice and prizes for the best books in Marathi were distributed. This fund was called 'Dakshina Fund', and with the efforts of Madhav Govind Ranade, this work was assigned by the Government to the Deccan Vernacular Society. This institution was established on 29th Oct., 1894. It was the aim of the institution to give encouragement to Marathi literature and distribute prizes to Marathi writers. A similar institution was already established in Bombay and it had a fund of Rs. 4,000 in the name of Weelobi. This amount was transferred to the Maharashtra Granthottejak Sabha on 2nd Feb., 1895. Since then, the work of distributing the prizes is being conducted by the institution till today.

The government of Maharashtra every year gives awards to encourage the writiers and recognise the literary merit of their works. The book in different genres like poetry, drama, short story, biography autobiography, criticism, aesthetics, grammar and linguistics, children's literature etc. are considered for awards. Other institutions giving awards to literary works are Kesari Trust, Pune (Kelkar Paritoshak); Maharashtra Sahitya Parishad, Pune; Ichalkaranji Trust, Inchalkaranji; Pune University, Pune (V.G. Apte Paritoshak, Vishnushastri Chiplunkar Paritoshak); Bombay University, Bombay (Tarkhadkar Paritoshak); Mahanubhav Vishvabharati, Nandgaon Khandesvar (for Mahanubhav works); Maharashtra Rajya Granthalaya Sangh, Bombay (V.V. Bhat Satkar Nidhi Paritoshak for books on library science); Venus Prakashan, Pune (Prof. R.S. Jog Smriti Paritoshak); R.N. Sabnis Trust, Narayangaon (for literature on rural development); Maharashtra Vangmaya Mandal, Karad (Karad Puraskar); Valmik Prakashan, Bombay (Valmik Paritoshak), Bombay Book Depot, Bombay (Bombay Book Club Paritoshak); Majestic Book Stall, Bombay; Capt. G.G. Limaye Paritoshak (for short story).

The institutions giving grants for publishing books are-Maharashtra Rajya Sahitya Sanskriti Mandal, Mantralaya, Bombay-32; Pune University Pune-7 and Dainik Sakal, Pune-2.

Besides there are other types of books such as, literary criticism including history of Oriya literature (7), essay-collections both reflective and discursive on contemporary topics including a comprehensive account of the evolution of Greek civilization (9), travelogues (3), autobiographies of administrators and freedom fighters (4), as well as one biography, two translations, a few books on scientific topics and a number of books for children. In a way Orissa Sahitya Akademi awards have given a good boosting to contemporary literature and particularly to new writers.

Besides Orissa Sahitya Akademi which is a semi-Government institution, there are a few other private organizations in Orissa that have also instituted literary awards to writers and best books on an annual basis. Currently, probably the most important of these awards, is Sarala Award, named after the great 15th century epic-poet of Orissa and instituted by Indian Metal and Ferro Alloys Ltd., a private company based at Bhubaneswar. Though usually an important book is chosen for the Award, the writer's total achievement is also taken into consideration. So far the Award winners are Surendra Mohanty the novelist, story-teller and biographer; Manoj Das, the story-teller; Chandrasekhar Rath, the essayist and story-teller; Mohapatra Nilamoni Sahu the story-teller, novelist and essayist; Ramakanta Rath, the poet; and Sitakant Mohapatra, the poet and essayist. But the older organization is Prajatantra Prachar Samiti, at Cuttack, a business-cum-literary organization, which has been giving awards though in a limited way, confined to the writers of its monthly Jhankar and daily newspaper Prajatantra, for the last 30 years. It is only during the last 2 years that it has started to give an award annually to an important writer generally, but still in a way related to its journal and newspaper. The two recipients so far are Sitakanta Mohapatra, the poet, and Natabar Samantray the critic. Apart from these institutions mention may also be made of Utkal Sahitya Samaj, Cuttack, that occasionally announces awards, and Kalahandi Sahitya Parishad in the ex-state Kalahandi, in the western Orissa, that gave two awards in two consecutive years on an all-Orissa basis, about 35 years ago, when such awards were a rarity. These were awarded to Lala Nagendrakumar Roy for his drama entitled Kalinga Vijaya (Victory over Kalinga) and to Nilakanta Ratha for his book of narrative poetry in traditional Oriya metres called Sitaprema Tarangini (The Stream of Sita's Love).

Normally the poets have taken pride of place, in winning awards closely followed by short story writers, poetry or short story being the two rich genres in Oriya Literature. Though individually Gopinath Mohanty, probably the greatest living Oriya writer, has received the most prestigious literary award in India, that is, Jnanpith Award, and Manoranjan Das, the dramatist, is the only Oriya writer to have received awards from both Sahitya Akademi and Sangeet Natak Akademi; probably Sitakant Mohapatra, the poet, has bagged the maximum number of awards (7) beginning from Sahitya Akademi award to Sarala award. Of course awards can be erratic and do not always conclusively prove the merits of the awardee. But they generally keep the literary atmosphere competitive and alert, and to that extent significantly contribute to the promotion of literature.

AWARDS (Punjabi) Sahitya Akademi set the tradition of awards for Punjabi writings. The Punjabi Sahit Samikhia Board evaluates the contemporary Punjabi literature annually and gives its awards in the form of shields and certificates on the best works published during the year. The Board also confers the title of "Sahit Shirumani" on the best writer of the year. At their function, the Board publishes every year a journal detailing literary careers of the award winners along with a brief introduction about the award winning book.

The Punjabi Sahit Trust, has been honouring Punjabi writers for the past few years. The trust has instituted one award in the memory of the poet, Bawa Balwant.

Keeping in view the services of Balraj Sahni, in the fields of Punjabi literature and culture, the trust has included another award in his name. Each award consists of Rs. 1100 (Eleven hundred) and a shawl.

The Punjabi Vikas Committee of Delhi Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee has also come forward for the first time to honour Punjabi writers, journalists, Punjabi societies and organisations which are engaged in the welfare of Punjabi language and literature. Since the inception of Punjabi Academy (Delhi Administration) cash awards are given for the books or authors selected for the purpose.

P.S.K.

AWARDS (Sanskrit) No major award for books written in Sanskrit seems to have been instituted so far in any state of the Union. Sanskrit is not a regional language of the country, but Sahitya Akademi has accepted it as a language of creative literature and has been awarding its annual prizes for the best books written in Sanskrit or on Sanskrit Topics in other languages since its inception. AWARDS (Tamil) Sangam poetry is replete with instances of poets and singers being put on the pathway to the abodes of patrons and reurning with gifts under the nomenclature arru-p-patai. Such awards were not of a set pattern, but later during the course of centuries they got moulded to suit occasions of an ad hoc nature. One such award of sixteen lakhs of gold coins was given to Katiyalur Uruttirankannanar for his poem Pattinappalai as mentioned by Jayankontar in his Kalinkattupparani. In the Sankara Cholan Ula and the Tamil-vitu-tutu, the same accounts gets a confirmation with the alteration of the figure to sixteen crores. The stone inscription at Tiruvellarai in Tiruchirappali District speaks of a sixteen pillared 'mandapam' for the 'arangerram' of the work Pattinappalai, standing intact in the palace of the Cholas, in the midst of the war fought between Sundara Pandiyan and Rajarajan III. Sixteen is a significant number. Poetic exaggeration apart, gift of gold coins sixteen times a hundred or thousand cannot be ruled out. That poets were the beneficiaries of gold coins get further confirmed from the Patirruppattu eulogising the Chera kings. Kappiyarru-k-kappiyanar got a coveted present of 40 lakhs of gold coins, poetess Kakkaipatiniyar Nachellaiyar 9 'tulams' of gold and a hundred thousand gold coins, Aricilkilar 9 lakhs of gold coins and Perunkunrur-k-kilar 32,000 gold coins. Kumattur-k-kannanar was given the ownership of 500 villages by Imaiyavarampan Netuncheralatan.

During the Sangam period, a poet could get a tusker as a gift from the chieftain, if given with due courtesy. Poet Perunchittiranar and his family were steeped in acute poverty. He says:

> Yet though I were to gain a mighty elephant
> With shining tusks, I take not gift thrown to me in scorn.
> Should thou with pleasure give a courteous boon
> Though small as kunri's berry, grateful I receive.
> O Kumanan, whose spear is keen, this is the boon > that praising thee I want. (Purananuru, 159)

And Kumanan, the chieftain of the Mutiram Hill endowed the poet Perunchittiranar with ample wealth to relieve his family of all their wants and more to spare.

Bid all the world!
Give thou to all my housewife dear!
The Lord of Mutiran's fruitful hill,
Kumanan, Lord of the mightly spear,
Hath given this wealth, which all shall share.

(Purananuru, 163)

Ottakkuttar, the Poet Laureate of the Chola monarchs, composed three Ulas on three successive Chola kings, Vikraman, Kulottugan II and Rajarajan III (12th century A.D.). When Rajaraja Cholan Ula came up for getting the seal of approval in an assembly of poets-'aranger-ram', the monarch gave the poet a thousand gold coins for each of the 'kannis' in the Ula. This information can be gathered from references in the Sankara cholan Ula and the Tamil-vitu-tutu.

A Kovai of Amrita Kavirayar, written in praise of Raghunatha Setupati, who ruled over the Marava country between Madurai and Ramesvaram from 1645 to 1670, was awarded the ownership of the village Ponnankal for hereditary enjoyment by himself and his descendants. It is said that while the 400 poems were explained by the poet, the ruler gave him a golden cocoanut for each of the poems in appreciation. One of the poems excelled the others and the golden coconut presented carried a precious diamond within.

Tirikutarajappa Kavirayar was the author of the most famous Tiru-k-kurrala-k-kuravanchi, a dance drama, to this day not excelled by any of its kind. This was approved by a conclave of pandits at Tiru-k-kurralam. King Muttu-vijayaranga Chokkalinga Nayakkar honoured the poet with the title of temple vidvan of Tiru-k-kurralam and granted him lands adjacent to the temple, which to this day are known as Kuravanjeimedu. This is born, out by a copper plate dated the 12th of the Tamil month Tai of the year 1640 of the Salivahana Era corresponding to the year 891 of the Kollam Era or 1718 A.D. The copper plate grant is in the possession of the descendants of the poet.

The Madurai Tamil Sangam instituted prizes in 1903 for outstanding performances in the examinations on Tamil literature and grammar conducted by them. Gold wrist band worth Rs. 100/- and medal worth Rs. 70/- were given as the first and the second prizes in the Pandit final Examination. Gold medals worth Rs. 70/- and Rs. 50/- were given as the first prize for the Junior Pandit and the Pandit Entrance Examinations respectively. With the discontinuance of these examinations, the awards are no longer in vogue.

A poet yearns for recognition. Subramaniya Bharati, the poet of renaissance, in a message dated the 2nd May 1919 to the Raja of Ettaiyapuram, Sri Venkateswara Ettappa Bhupati, wished him long life and appealed to him to listen to his poems recited in court with proclamations of victory. The Raja honoured him with shawls and presented gold, and palanquin to ride on, with attendants.

Cash awards: For over a quarter of a century, the Kalaimagal gives annually an award of Rs. 1,000/- to the author of the best novel in Tamil, commemorating Narayanaswamy Aiyar. A cash award of Rs. 20,000/- to the author of the best Tamil work on creative literature is given on alternate years in memory of Raja Sir Annamalai Chettiyar, founder of the Annamalai University, by the M.A.C. Charitable Trust, Madras. The Tamil Development Directorate gives an annual award of Rs. 10,000/- named after poet Bharatidasan to the author of the best poetical work on subjects dear to the former, since 1978. Annual award of Rs. 10,000/- by the same directorate is also given to a writer for his cumulative writings in Tamil and contribution to Tamil literature, named after Tiru V. Kalyanasundar Mudaliar.

AWARDS (Telugu) The credit of instituting the first incentive award in Telugu goes to Kandukuri Veereslingam Pantulu, who, in his zeal for promoting the then new literary genre, which he himself sired, hit upon the idea of announcing a prize of Rs. 75 in 1892 for the best novel accepted for publication in the literary monthly, Chintamani (1898-1905) which he edited conjointly with Nyapati Subba Rao Pantulu. The novelist Chilakamarti Laksminarasimham, hailed as Andhra Scott, began his career as a novelist with the incentive award of Chintamani for his first novel Ramachandra Vijayamu. Other novelists benefited by these awards were Khandavalli Ramachandrudu, Tallapreggada Suryanarayana Rao, Goteti Kanakaraju, and Tekumalla Rajagopala Rao. The second best used to receive a cash award of Rs. 50. These awards gave a fillip to novel-writing in the nineteenth century. Comparable with this is the award instituted by Kundurti Anjaneyulu, in 1967. A leader of free verse movement, he wants to encourage free verse writing against metrical or lyrical compositions, which according to him have lost their vitality. Though the Free Verse Front founded by Kundurti has been giving away prizes since 1967, the Free Verse Front Prize Trust came into being on 31 July, 1979 in Hyderabad. The amount of prize is Rs. 500. Its objective is to encourage the younger generation of poets who have published their poems in a book form. The first recipient of this annual award was Sila Virraru (1967) for his Kodigattina Suryudu.

The Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi has instituted several awards for women's and children's literature. The award for children's literature is reserved for women writers. The Akademi invites manuscripts on the topic chosen by it every year and rewards the winners with a cash prize of Rs. 3,000. Notable books have been written under this scheme. Grihalaksmi (1923), a women's monthly run by K.N. Kesari from Madras till 1960, used to reward women writers by presenting them with gold bracelets (Swarnakankanams).

The journalistic awards are common now-a-days. Weeklies like Andhra Prabha, Andhra Patrika and magazines mainly devoted to prose fiction like Yuva conduct competitions on occasions like Divali, Sankranti and Ugadi in the field of prose fiction and offer awards. The Telugu Bhasa Samiti (1946, Madras) used to award the meritorious authors in cash until the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi (1956) took over this function. Sahitya Akademi right from its inception in 1954, has been awarding Telugu writers along with the writers in other languages. Viswanatha Satyanarayana is a recipient of Jnanpith award. The A.P. Sahitya Akademi has instituted separate awards for poetry, novel, short story and criticism in addition to the incentive awards mentioned above. Members and ex-members of the General Council, previous award winners and outstanding men of letters suggest books of their choice in each genre of literature. Later they will be asked to choose only three from the consolidated list prepared on the basis of the suggestions. The three books selected will be sent to a panel of judges who will be given enough time to peruse and evaluate their relative merits. Their judgement is final. Books published in five years preceding the year of award alone are eligible for recommendation. The awardees are given cash award and citation usually in January of the succeeding year. In 1979, a voluntary organisation called Mutalapati Gangadharam Sahiti Kutumbam named after a modern poet, Nutalapati Gangdharam who died young of a snake-bite instituted an annual award called Nutalapati Sahitya Puraskaram consisting of a cash award of 1,116 plus a shawl. The governing body appoints judges every year on the recommendations of the advisory body. It announces its award every year in one of the branches of literature-poetry, novel and short-story, sufficiently in advance. Books published in the preceding five year period alone are eligible for consideration. Rajalaksmi Foundation (1979, Madras) founded by a philanthropic Andhra merchant and his family to encourage and promote cultural acitivities gives awards to poets, writers, musicians and others engaged in fine arts. It has instituted an annual award of Rs. 10,000. The awards are usually announced on August 15th, the date of birth of Smt. Mahalaksmamma, wife of P.V. Ramaniah (Raja) and presented on Nov. 19th, the birth-day of the donor. Sri Sri (1979) is the first recipient of this award. Telugu Cultural and Literary Association of Metropolitan N.Y., U.S.A. has come forward to endorse the award by sponsoring a free trip to the U.S.A. to the awardees, thus giving it a sort of international recognition.

AWARDS (Urdu). Literary awards have a varied history in Urdu literature. Poets in old times were honoured by Kings, Nawabs and important chieftains mainly for panegyrics written in their praise. Barring a few instances, these awards mainly carried cash, exceptions being of poets who were either appointed poet laureates or awarded titles. Literary history records instances of Sauda, Insha, Zauq and Ghalib who were so honoured.

After the eclipse of the ruling princes and India's emergence as a sovereign Republic, the Sahitya Akademi awards were instituted and barring a few occasions, Urdu writers have been receiving Akademi Awards almost every year. Zafar Hussain Khan was the first recipient in 1955; subsequent winners include such names as 'Jigar' Muradabadi, 'Firaq Gorakhpuri', Rajinder Singh Bedi, Kaifi Azmi, etc.

The prestigious Jnanpith Award has also been given once to an outstanding Urdu poet, 'Firaq' Gorakhpuri. The other important awards include 'Aiwan-i-Ghalib' awards for the best poetic and prose work in Urdu or best contribution to Scholarship, and 'Humsub Ghalib Award' for the best Urdu play.

After the institution of Urdu Academies in the states of the Union, prizes of different denominations are awarded to distinguished Urdu writers for their publications every year.

AWASTHI, DEVISHANKAR (Hindi, b. 1930, d. 1966) was a teacher by profession (Hindi Department, University of Delhi). He concentrated his critical faculties and efforts on a better and more discerning appreciation of the literary movement of 'Nai Kahani', during the mid-fifties and early sixties of the twentieth century. All worthwhile critical activity and thought reflecting diverse views on the subject during this decade found substantial representation in his compilation, Nai Kahani: Sandarbh aur Prakriti. With the effort to represent the different views on the subject, it was but natural that the overall impact of the compilation is one of the inner conflict and anomaly. In his thesis entitled Atharahvin Shatabdi ke Braj Bhasha Kavya mein Prema Bhakti, he presents a study of 'Madhurras' and the 'element of divine sport' (Lila Tattva) in a wider historical perspective. He adopts the critical method of 'internecine examination' in thoroughly analysing the literature belonging to 'Prema Bhakti' cult. He thus contributed to the tradition of research and critical analysis.

Sahitya Vidhaon ki Prakriti, is an edited and collected work which aspires to explain how the creative dimensions inherent in the nature of different literary genres undergo changes from time to time. Their role in expressing the racial culture is also underlined. A number of literary thinkers have contributed to this work.

Vivek Ke Rang is a collection of critical essays in appreciation of major literary works by some eminent critics and writers.

AWASTHI, RAJENDRA (Hindi; b. 1932) is a well-known short story writer, novelist and editor. Rajendra Awasthi started his literary career as a poet (pen name: Trishit) but later gave up writing poetry. A veteran editor he, at present, edits the Kadambini and Saptahik Hindustan, after putting in a number of years as editor of the Sarika and Nandan. Born in a middle class family and having gone through the vicissitudes of life, devoid of means of decent living and beset with scarcities and afflictions, his writing naturally deals with the middle class life, the stresses and strains and its frustations and aspirations. He was one of the precursors of Hindi 'Anchalik Novels'. He has written eight novels out of which Suraj Ki Chhaon and Jungle Ke Phool have brought him renown. The President's award has been given to him on his novel Jungle Ke Phool. It deals with the life of the tribal people. It has been translated into English, Russian, German, French and Swedish besides many Indian languages.

He is considered to be one of the leading lights of the Nai Kahani movement. Five collections of his short stories have so far been published. His short stories like 'Lamsena' and 'Dagarpole' written on the tribal life of Madhya Pradesh open new sociological avenues for investigation. Some of his other famous short stories are: 'Pratiksha', 'Bhuchal', 'Apna Shahar', 'Pidhian' and 'Woh Ek Akela'.

He has travelled widely and wrote two travalogues and edited five books.

All his writing is directed towards the discovery of truth and fight against untruth and is marked by a spirit for an earnest search for the good in man.

AWASTHI, SADGURU SHARAN (Hindi; b. 1901, d. 1973) was a playwright, essayist and critic. He was Principal of the BMSD College, Kanpur and received, Eminent Teacher's Award on the 26th January 1959. His Tulsi Ke Char Dal (1935) is an in-depth study of Tulsidas's literature. His earliest literary endeavour was a prose–poem titled 'Bhramit Pathik' which appeared in the Abhyuday in 1929. His one-act plays that followed in quick succession are imbued with artistic power understanding of the histrionic art and a realistic appraisal of situational details. Among his social one-act plays, 'Muddrika' became famous. His dramatic composition titled Majhli Maharani (1935) achieved a name based as it is on a miraculous transformation of Kaikeyi's character. Thoroughly ashamed and disgusted at her pivotal role in forcing an early end to her husband's life, Kaikeyi detaches herself completely from mundane life after duly enthroning the rightful successor, Rama.

Buddhi Tarang (1950) is a collection of his reflective essays. He has a style which is at once lucid, interesting and easy, though he does have a liking for word compounds and is not favourably inclined to the use of Urdu words.

His autobiography, Gahre Pani Paith, (1978) which represents a rich and lively account of contemporary literary, cultural and poetical activity, was published posthumously.

FURTHER WORKS: Hindi Gadya Gatha (1935); Phuta Shisha (1936); Ekadashi (1937); Vichar Vimarsh (1940); Hriday Dhwani (1941); Trimurti (1942); Do Ekanki (1942); Natak aur Nayak (1950); Amar Smritiyan (1972).

AYALKAR (Malayalam) is one of the best known novels of P. Kesava Dev. As the title implies, it is a story involving the inter-relations among three sets of people living in proximity to one another–Nairs at the top, Ezhavas next to them among the Hindus and a small cluster of Christians. The matriarchal system and intenecine quarrels undermined the stability and supremacy of the Nair community. The Ezhavas were united and strengthened as a result of common suffering, while the Christians, who knew how the wind blew, made good use of the facilities for education and became thriving businessmen and good agriculturists. With the decline of feudalism there emerged a secular middle class hopeful of India's bright future. It is against this background that representative members of the three communities are projected in the novel.

Padmanabha Pillai marries Madhava Kurup's niece Devaki and gives in marriage his sisters, Kamalakshi and Sarojini, to Madhava Kurup's brothers and the old feud between the two Nair families seems to be patched up. His third sister, Sumathy, is married to a young man in another village. But, too worried to see his brothers-in-law squandering their wives' wealth, Padmanabha Pillai calls his sisters back home and sends his own wife back to her uncle. The feud revives. A little later when a Nair youth falls in love with an Ezhava girl, there erupts a clash between the two communities. Padmanabha Pillai is accused of having incited his own men against the others. Prolonged litigation follows and Padmanabha Pillai, found guilty, is sent to jail. On returning from there he finds to his great dismay that his wife has died of some venereal disease caught from a rich neighbour. Sumathy has almost turned a prostitute and Sarojini's son Rajasekharan is in posession of the family properties. Unable to put up with such unforeseen developments, Padmanabha Pillai leaves for Kasi. His son, Indran, however, has become, by now, an all-India figure and the widowed sister Sumathy's son and daughter have begun a prosperous life. Thus a new generation comes into being, a generation that tries to bring about amity among Nair families and good relations between Nairs and others.

Though the plot is rather loose, Kesava Dev has succeeded in effectively portraying the times, and the major characters; his narration is powerful and delightful. Apart from all this, he seems to affirm his faith in the humanistic tradition of the country and in its power to rejuvenate itself in spite of onslaughts. No wonder the novel has already run into several editions since it was first published in 1963 and has won the Sahitya Akademi award (1964).

AYAMIK LEKHAN (Nepali) The Ayamik Lekhan (Dimensional Writing) movement in Nepali was launched in 1963 jointly by Indra Bahadur Rai (b. 1927), Tilbikram Kaila (b. 1937) and Ishvar Ballav (b. 1939). In May of that year they brought out from Darjeeling, their journal Tesro Ayam (Third Dimension) edited by Tilbikram Kaila.

The Ayamik writers aimed at putting in depth, the third dimension, in their writing. But this depth soon assumed the proportion of wholeness of life and experience; mere knowledge of the present age (Yugbodh) was considered inadequate by them. Depth was again increasingly interpreted to mean the depth of experience of living or, for that matter, its wholeness which they insisted should inform a genuinely literary and modern writing. This experience, 'anubhuti', would not be conveyed but would rather be falsified if not presented in the raw or in its actual state. Describing or reporting an experience is never an equivalence of experience in the real. The 'as is experienced–ness' of experience (sensation, perception, cognition) is in correspondence with the 'as it is–ness' of the material object, called 'objectness', Vastutva. Ayamik writing then is in a way the presenting of the 'objectness' of the experience of living, anubhuti, which is not to be confused with the accumulative experience of life, anubhava. These experiences of living are like windows located variously in space and time, looking through which one could gain a view of the wholeness, 'sampurnata', of living.

These expriences obviously could not be rendered in the practicalness–ridden language of social intercourse. The Ayamik writers had to forge a new language to transcribe this actuality (ya thvatya) and 'instantaneousness' (tatkshanya) of experience. They reformed the language in the likeness of the language of painting, for they felt experience (anubhuti) was material, existent and graphic. A very innovative use of language, of direct equivalance to that of painting, was opted for.

A similarly holistic and technically cubistic viewing was undertaken of the subject, thereby to view the wholeness of life which was the end subject of the Ayamiks. Wholeness of life did not mean the totality of the life span of an individual. The wholeness could be viewed in instance or instances of archetypal situations or recurring myths. The experiences are in themselves bereft of meanings or values as they are simply existent there in their 'objectness', Vastutva, unless they are related to men's living or survival. The Ayamik writer believed that efforts could be made to make a literary work a concretion of objectness itself.

The Ayamik Lekhan had within it or as a part of itself, consciousness of time, the fourth dimension. It did not aspire to become an 'ism' in that no philosophical theories bearing upon the world and man were sought to be thrust upon the writers. The Ayamiks were, however, agreed that they should write delving deeply into life. They among them have done as much of creative writings as they have done theorising about the Lekhan.

Indra Bahadur Rai's later short stories incorporate Ayamik Lekhan. One of his short stories, entitled 'Hami Jastai Mainaki Ama' (Maina's Mother, No Different From Us.) presents the diffidence as well as the determination of living at once of Maina's mother, Indian Nepalis and human society at large. The diversely episodic compositional units interact and the wholeness emerges, as in viewing cubistic paintings and even many of the non-figurative abstract paintings. The subject is embedded in the matrix of ever-the-same time.

Tilbikram Kaila's poem 'Ganga Neelo Bagehu' (Blue Flows the Ganga) presents Ganga as the objective correlative of time, consciousness, Life and nothingness. It is an attempt to grasp these not by intellectual reasoning but by intuition of which the poetic images are the carriers.

Ishvar Ballav's poem 'Ewta Saharko Kinarama' (On the Bank of a City which is a River) views back and forth in space and time the incessant procession of history and men. Everything has already happened here, nothing new happens, yet let's make way for the repetitions new.

AYURVEDA (Sanskrit). The origin of Ayurveda (The Science of Life) dates back to the few centuries before the Christian era. The amount of accurate scientific knowledge disclosed in these very ancient works is really surprising. The interaction between the Greeks and Indians in the field of medicine is quite obvious from the historical facts that two Greek physicians, Ktesias about 400 B.C., and Megasthenes about 300 B.C., visited, or resided in Northern India.

According to the Indian medical tradtion the knowledge of medicine had a divine origin. On the one hand it is said to be delivered by Lord Brahma through Indra and the sage Bharadvaja, to Atreya. On the other it is also said to have descended from Indra to Dhanvantari (also called Divodasa and Kashiraja) and from him to Sushruta. This tradition traces medicine from a mythical, through a semi-mythical, to an historical beginning. It may be taken to mean that Atreya, the physician and Sushruta, the surgeon, were understood to be the first founders in their respective departments of medicine as a science. The non-medical line of Indian tradition as preserved in the Buddhist Jatakas or Folklore refers to the teaching of medicine in the two universities of Kashi in the east and Taxila (on the Jhelum river) in the west.

Ayurveda is not only the Science of Life but the Life of Science as well. The longevity and the healthy life of man is the most essential, requisite of all progress, scientific as well as cultural, and it is the Medical Science that accomplishes the preservation of man in a perfect state of physical and mental activity. According to Charaka, a redactor of the Atreya system of medical science, ayus (life) is the combination of the human body, organs, mind and soul. Therefore it is that the ancient seers called Medical Science as Ayurveda, elevating it to the same status as is assigned to the divine revelation of knowledge, the Vedas.

In fact there are evidences to show that medical science was well known in the Vedic tradition as available in the Atharvaveda and Shatapathabrahmana; as also in the Smritis and Dharmashastra. Chakrapani Datta (a 11th century Bengali writer) commenting on the early medical compilation of Charakasamhita, says that the Atharvaveda is Ayurveda–Atharvavedasya ayurvedatvamuktambhavati. From the interal evidence in the Charakasamhita too it is seen that it is indebted to Atharvaveda on many topics. The Atharvaveda deals with the treatment of diseases (chikitsa) by advising the propitiatory rites (svastyayana), offerings (bali), auspicious oblations (mangalahoma), penances (niyama), purificatory rites (prayashchitta), fasting (upavasa) and incantations' (mantra).

Among the ancient Ayurvedic texts Charakasamhita by Agnivesha, the Sushrutasamhita by Sushruta, and Ashtangahridaya of Vagbhata are recognised as the Brihattrayi or the great triad. The Ayurveda has eight specialised branches-: Kayachikitsa or internal medicine; Shalakya or treatment of diseases of the organs in the head and neck; Shalyapahartrika or extraction of foreign bodies through surgery, etc., Vishagaravairodhikaprashamana or management of conditions caused by natural and artificial poisons; Bhutavidya or the treatment of psychic-diseases caused by the demoniac seizures; Kaumarabhritya or the management of the child; Rasayana or the administration of elixirs for the maintenance of youth and prevention of old age; and Vajikarana or the administration of aphrodisiacs. All these eight branches deal with the prevention and cure of diseases and morbid conditions in their respective specialised fields.

It is interesting to know the manner in which the technical medical matter is presented. In the Charaka for example, it is done as the record of proceedings of a seminar or debate, as a dialogue between the teacher and his disciple, and as a narrative of instructions. In fact the treatises specifically give details as to who are qualified to be the students and teachers in the field, as also the procedure of teaching. In the Vimanasthana of Charaka, there is a detailed treatment about the manner of free and frank discussions among medical experts.

A close study of Ayurvedic literature reveals that the early authors of the science thought it essential to introduce certain principles of the philosophies of Samkhya, Yoga, Nyaya, Vaisheshika, etc., with a view to developing that science. The literature contains, moreover many other interesting ethical instructions and reveals a view of life which differs considerably from that found in works on philosophy. The Ayurvedic speculations regarding embryology, heredity and other such points of general enquiry are likely to prove interesting even to a student of pure philosophy.

Besides attracting students of philosophical studies, the Ayurvedic literature is bound to interest those interested in literature too. The entire early literature is in simple beautiful Sanskrit. Off and on, one meets with simple homely figures of speech used by the writers to clarify or prove a particular topic on hand.

AYURVEDA IN KERALA (Malayalam). Ayurvedic treatment is popular in all parts of India, though in unequal degrees. It has a long history of being nourished by different types of contributions from different States depending on their peculiar conditions. Kerala has played a unique role in this process of nourishment.

Ashtangasamgraham and Ashtangahridayam, written by Vagbhatacharya, came out between the 5th and 7th centuries. It is said that Indu and Gajjada, the disciples of Vagbhata, settled in Kerala and made many disciples and followers. Indu, who wrote the Sasilekha commentary, on Ashtangasamgraham and Ashtangahridayam, is believed to have been a Keralite.

Ayurveda had its golden age between the 1st and the 9th century A.D. The setback that followed was the result of foreign invasions. But of late there has been a revival of interest in its study and practice throughout India due to the popularisation of Sanskrit and the sastras. In Kerala, the Ashtavaidya Brahmin families, some Ezhava families and such other sets of people studied Ashtangahridayam thoroughly and practised the system of Ayurveda as their hereditary occupation during this period. The Ashtavaidyas are so called because they were practitioners of Ayurveda having eight branches. Pulamanthole, Alyathiyoor, Kuttancherry, Thycaud (Trichur), Eletathu, Chirattamon, Vayaskara and Vellode are the Ashtavaidya families known today. These familes are strewn throughout Kerala. As their family profession, they used to study and propagate Ayurveda. There are other families also who practise Ayurveda as a family profession. Vaidyamatom Namboodiri family at Mezhathoor (Palghat) is an example. There are many families in Kerala who were specialists in one or more types of remedies like 'Uzhichil' (massage) 'Marmachikitsa' (treatment for diseases of certain vital parts), Balachikitsa, Netrachikitsa, Vishachikitsa, Bhutapasmara prativdhi (a kind of psychiatric treatment) and in remedies for wounds, fractures and bruises. Marco Polo, the famous traveller who visited Kerala in the last quarter of the 13th century, wrote that' here in Kerala there are many good doctors and astrologers. All these people were in one way or other learned in Ayurvda. There existed a system of indigenous medicine in Kerala even before the advent of Sanskrit books.

The literature on medicine in Kerala includes (1) Commentaries of classical texts and independent works depending on them (2) The compilations of prescriptions of medicines and practical directions occasionally scribbled by physicians and prevalent in the coutnry, (3) New works incorporating modern trends in scientific knowledge.

A book called Rasavaiseshikam (400 A.D.) containing four chapters and 486 sutras and dealing with rasanirupana, a discussion on the physiological and therapeutic values of the medicinal and dietetic articles and the fundamental principles of health based on the Ayurvedic tenets, and another book called Rasopanishat dedicated to Rasatantra (chemistry) have been published by the Trivandrum Granthavali. The author of the sutras of Rasavaiseshikam is believed to be one Bhaganta Nagarjuna and the commentator is one Narasimha. Another work Tantrayuktivichara by Vaidyanatha Neelamegha (900 A.D.) is also important. Vaidyamanorama, which contains some very effective recipes including some 'trick treatments' of Kerala and their applications which are not found in other books, is a famous book produced in Kerala. 'Dhara' is a special medical treatment of Kerala. A work called Dharakalpam on this method of treatment is renowned. Sinduramanjari containing methods to purify minerals like copper, iorn, sulphur, etc., is an independent work of Thychaud Narayanan Moosad. Alathur Manipravalam, believed to have been composed during the early Manipravalam period, is a celebrated medical text. Chikitsakramam, Sahasravogam, Yogaratnaprakasham, Vaidyamanijari, Yogamritam, Chikitsanul, Sannipatha Chikitsa, Netraroga Chikitsa, etc., are books containing the collections of the 'yogas' (medical recipes) and methods of treatment prevalent in Kerala and wellknown to the ancient families of physicians.

Arogyakalpadrumam is a famous paediatric text in Sanskirt written by Kaikulangara Rama Warrier. Arogyachintamani, a paediatric text written in Malayalam by the poet Vallothol, has medical and literary merits. Vallothol has composed two other books also in the field, namely Garbharakshakramam and Vaidyajivanam. It is not surprising if 'Uzhichil' and Marmachikitsa developed in Kerala, which is the foster home of Kalaripayattu (a method of physical culture) and Kathakali, the dance drama of Kerala. In these fields Kerala is unequalled even today. Kerala had a special tradition for the treatment of small-pox. Kerala, which is full of shrubs, hills and narrow paths in its villages, has been the playground of poisonous creatures including snakes from very early times. Kerala abounds also in a variety of medicinal herbs that are easily traceable and readily applicable. These may be the main stimulants for the developments of the treatment for poison in Kerala. Treatment for poison also developed depending on the Ayurvedic principle of 'Tridosha' as in the other seven branches mentioned above. For cure of poisoning 'Mantravidya' (A method of treatment for influencing the mind of the patient with verbal suggestions) was also popular, but the use of medicinal herbs was given more importance. Vishachikitsaprakarana in Ashtangahridayam is famous all over India. But Narayaniyam, Uddisam, Ulpalam, Haramekhala, Kalavanchanam, Lakshanamrita, Sarasamgraham, etc., are books known to Kerala only. Narayaniyam contains mostly 'mantric' practics (treatment with verbal suggestions). There are many other famous books based on them. Jolsnika and Prayoga Samuchayam are two of them. All these books are more or less based on classical Sanskrit works. Kerala, which stands in the forefront in honouring elephants in temple processions, has taken care to bring up, in scientific ways, elephants with good signs and features. Specialist Ayurvedic physicians in this field were many in Kerala. Matangalila is a book of Kerala origin. This book is infomative regarding elephants. This is a treasure of knowledge in the field of Ayurvedic treatment of elephants (Hastiayurveda).

There are some books in Sanskrit which have come out in the modern era in the twentieth century itself, giving comprehensive explanations of both the Eastern and Western principles of medicine with comparative studies on the subject. Among them, the works of some scholars of Kerala are significant. Ashtangasariram (1925) and Brihatsariram (1942), two profusely illustrated books in Sanskrit on anatomy and physiology respectively, written by Vaidyaratnam P.S. Varier, Sariram by L.A. Ravivarma, Anugrahamimamsa by Vadakkepattu Narayanan Nair, etc., are some of them.

The series of authoritative books, namely Pharmacognosy of Ayurvedic Drugs—Kerala, being published by the Department of Pharmacognosy of the Kerala University, give information from authentic Sanskrit books on the medicinal herbs and modern botanical descriptions and synonyms in various languages of the herbs easily available in Kerala.

AYYAPPA PANIKER, K. (Malayalam, b. 1930) took B.A. (Honours) degree in English Language and Literature and started his career as a lecturer in English. He took a doctorate in English Literature from Indiana University, U.S.A. and did post-doctoral work in Yale and Harvard Universities in the U.S.A. He is presently Head of the Department of English, University of Kerala. He has travelled widely. In addition to the U.S.A., where he studied, he visited Cuba and the Socialist countries of Europe, Western Europe and the Far East. He is an Associate Editor of the Journal of South Asian Literature, published by Michigan University; and Editor of Kerala Writers in English, a series published by Macmillan, Madras. A man of versatile talents, he has won Kerala Sahitya Akademi Awards for his poetry and ciritcal works. He has won the Sahitya Akademi Award (1984). His major contribution comprises two volumes of poems.

He established his reputation as a poet with his poem 'Kurukshetram' which despite its alleged indebtedness to Eliot's 'Wasteland' is considered to have revolutionised Malayalam poetry. With its unconventional exploitation of rhythm and metre and novel treatment of language, it opened a period of new sensibility in Malayalam poetry. The dictum that modernism is an offshoot of romanticism is fully applicable to the modern poetry of Paniker. Paniker's moorings are in romanticism; its melody is heard breaking in even in the most modernist of his works. He is obsessed with the dialectics of being and nonbeing; he resorts to poetry to resolve the crisis of his soul. The romantic veiw failing him, he exploits satire to overcome the tragic dilemma of the modern man caught between an age that is dying and an age yet unborn. He vehemently criticises the evils of the present day world in many of his lyrics; he also laughs at them. At the same time he places his trust in a secular humanism which shall give meaning to the world and significance to life. In Kurukshetram he writes;

If only we can come to life, In the divine navel of the dream we cherish
If only for a moment we can be human, We need not go to religions for salvation.

Paniker has written on the Dawn, on Death, 'Mrityu Puja,'on his family's history, about his life in the United States; about Pururava and Urvashi. He can pack words with deep and complex meanings, invent new rhythms, and renovate the traditional metre. He is a master of his art. However he is charged with obscurity, lack of spontaneity and whimsicality, all of which he on his part denies. Poetry to him is to trap sensibilities so far unapprehended by language; and he has succeeded in accomplishing this rare feat. He is hailed as the chief exponent of modernism in Malayalam poetry.

AYYAPPAN K. (Malayalam; b. 1889, d. 1968) He was born in the ancient Ezhava family of Kumbalattu Parambil. His father died when he was a boy. He was brought up by his mother and elder brother and he had his early education in Cherai. He did his Intermediate in Malabar Christian College, Calicut. He started a literary organisation in his home-town. Hurt by the injustice done to the community, he involved himself in the movements of social liberation, deriving inspiration from Sri Narayana Guru. On the advice of the Guru, he took his B.A. Degree from Trivandrum Maharaja's College. He became an associate of Kumaran Asan, the poet. In 1917 he started the movement of inter-dining with lower caste people. According to him all humans were 'sahodaras' or brothers. He founded 'Sahodara Sangham' (Society of Brothers) in 1920. Thereafter he was known as Sahodaran Ayyappan. He was a staunch advocate of inter–caste marriages. He faced severe opposition in his fight against caste-discrimination. For a time he worked as a teacher, which earned him the name, Ayyappan Master. Though he studied law, he did not take the degree. He started a monthly named Sahodaran in 1919 at Mattancherry and ran it till 1956. He was one of the first to instruct the Keralites on Marxism; he stressed the need for labour to organise itself and fight for its rights. He was the first editor of Yuktivadi, a periodical devoted to rationalism. He sought to liberate his people from superstitious practices. Ayyappan plunged into the sturggle for responsible government in Cochin. After Independence he was elected to the Cochin Legislature. For sometime he was its Deputy President; he served both Cochin and Travancore-Cochin as a Minister. By about 1953 he retired from active social and political work. He continued to write in the daily Kerala Kaumudi. Ayyappan died of heart attack. Ayyappan is revered by Keralites not so much as a literary man, but as a talented journalist and a powerful social reformer.

AYYAR, K.V. (Kannada; b. 1898, d. 1980), the physical culturist of fame, was also a connoisseur of literature and the fine arts. Educated at the Fort High School, Bangalore, he soon turned to physical culture, made a great name not merely as an exponent but also as an educator in the field and as a naturopath. A close friend of many leading Kannada writers of his generation, he was particularly close to the dramatist Kailasam, about whom he has written an intimate broachure. His first collection of stories, Deyyada Mane preceded his well-known novel Rupadarsi based on a story pertaining to Michael Angelo. His other novel Shantala is a moving account of the life and art of the Hoysala queen of that name. His other writings include Leena which is, in a way, an extension of his earlier novel Rupadarsi and Samudyata a collection of stories. He did not write much but he wrote with care and meticulous precision and, as such, as befits a true lover of literature that he was, all his writings have a polished quality. He was also deeply interested in amateur Kannada theatre and for a number of years was the guiding spirit behind the 'Ravi Kalavidaru' group which staged a large number of new Kannada plays and provided training ground for a number of promising young actors. Ayyar was honoured by the Karnataka State Sahitya Academy for his contribution to Kannada literature and theatre.

AYYUB ABU SAYEED (Bengali; b. 1906, d. 1982) was born in Calcutta. His family voluntarily embraced English education without divorcing itself from the traditional Islamic education through Arabic. Ayyub Abu Sayeed whose mother tongue was Urdu, also learnt Bengali at the age of sixteen, prompted by a desire to read Tagore in the original. His father Abul Makarem Abbad, a clerk in the Viceroy's office retired early in life, but Ayyub had to discontinue his studies due to indifferent health. He however finally took his M.A. degree in philosophy from Calcutta University. In the thirties he wrote some very illuminating articles in the leading literary journals which elicited immediate appreciation from persons like Tagore and Pramatha Choudhury. From the very beginning he was respected as an original and independent thinker. He had been a teacher in Philosophy in the Presidency College and for sometime in Calcutta Unviersity also. In 1950 he joined Visva-Bharati but ill health again cut short his stay there. As a fellow of the Rockfeller Foundation from 1954 to 1956 he worked on the 'Marxist Theory of Value'. Then for ten years he edited Quest. In 1961 he joined the Melbourne University but came back the next year. For a long time his reputation as a literary critic was based on his articles in different journals and on the preface he wrote to an anthology of modern Bengali poems (1940). In 1953 he edited another collection, Love Poems of Twenty Five Years. Only in 1968 when he was 62 his first book of literary criticism was published—Adhunikata-O-Rabindranath. He was instantly recognised as one of the most serious and original Tagore scholars. In 1969 he was awarded Rabindra Puraskar for his original critical writing. Two other books came in quick succession—Panthajaner Sakha (1974) and Pather Sesh Kothai (1977). An English volume of criticism of Tagore's poems came out in 1980. His philosophical and social writings have been partially compiled in another volume Varities of Experience (1980). He tanslated into Bengali the poems of Ghalib and those were published in 1975.

AZAD, ABDUL AHAD (Kashmiri; b. 1903, d. 1948), the first revolutionary poet, literary historian and critic was born in a learned family. His father, Sufi Sultan Dar, himself a scholar, trained him in Persian and Arabic and then sent him to a school where he passed his middle class examination. Azad was appointed a primary school teacher in 1919. He was deeply influenced by the freedom struggle and socialism. In 1935 he made acquaintance with Mahjoor and their reciprocal influence became a significant event in the history of Kashmiri poetry. Azad's early poems, mostly in imitation of earlier lyricists, did not show any promise. He gradually developed his individual style which was in harmony with his revolutionary message. He showed a bold departure from the existing poetic tradition but at the same time he did not ignore the importance of tradition; as he writes, 'Literature also changes its form in response to the change in human life, but every new literature has a deep relation with the old one'. He believed in the essential nobility of mankind and had a sincere, even fanatical, passion for that. In his famous poem, "Tsa Osukh gatajaruk noor" (you were the light of wisdom!) he bewails man's having ignored his state and his values of love and brotherhood. As a young rebel and socialist, he abhorred and condemned the capitalists, feudal aristocrats and priests whom he considered the root of all social evils. In fact it was an age of revolutions and Azad was profoundly responsive to the spirit of his age. Azad had an uncommon taste for personification and made the objects of nature, generally wild, speak and propagate for him his revolutionary message so that mankind is reborn; 'daryav' (river) 'arival' (a wild rose) and 'abashar' (water fall) etc. are the vehicles of his spontaneous and exuberant emotions. He possessed an unmatched spontaneity and a passion for the musical qualities of words, but this very predilection for music at certain places produces a sort of frothy exuberance of words and a rhythm for their own sake. His rhythm is breathless and unremitting.

The first and the last collection of his poem is Sangarmal ('Precipice' in 7 volumes). The book contains, besides his ghazals, several short poems also. Recenly a manuscript of his masnavi Qamaru Zaman (titled on the name of its central character) has been found which is still unpublished. Azad found the whole of Kashmiri literature scattered in hazardous condition and he was the first man to devote his time to collect and evaluate it. His monumental work Kashmiri Zuban aur Shairi (Kashmiri language and poetry) which is in Urdu, is a remarkable contribution to the development of research and literary criticism. The book was published posthumously in 1959. He also edited Maqbul's poetry Kalam-i-Maqbul and Kulyat-e-Maqbul.

AZAD, ABUL KALAM (Urdu; b. 1888 d. 1958) who was born at Mecca was a precocious child. Kalam Azad Ghulam Mohi-ud-Din, later known as Abul, belonged to a well-to-do and educated family. His father Maulvi Khair-ud-Din was known for his piety and erudition. Arabic was the mother-tongue of Azad. His family came to Calcutta when he was hardly ten years old. Azad was educated informally by some reputed teachers and by the age of fifteen, had mastered Arabic, Persian and Urdu. Later he learnt English also. He could translate with ease from Arabic or Persian into Urdu and vice versa. In his younger days he started writing poetry but gave it up in preference to prose in which he excelled himself and developed a distinguished style of his own.

Maulana Azad had immense journalistic capabilities. In 1900, at the tender age of twelve, he started editing a weekly Al-Misbah. In 1903, he brought out a monthly journal, Lissan-us-Sidq, which soon gained popularity. In recognition of his talents, A'llama Shibli Nomani appointed him Sub-editor of Al-Nadwa in 1905. For some time he edited Vakil of Amritsar and Dar-ul-Saltanate of Calcutta.

Azad travelled to Iraq, Egypt and Turkey in 1908, where he came into contact with some revolutionary leaders of those countries. He was inspired by their activities; and; on his return to India, he joined the Revolutionary Party of Shyamsunder Chakravarti. By then his imagination had been fired by the ideal of freeing his country from the Britishers. To progpogate this cause, he started publishing his famous weekly Al-Hilal from Calcutta in 1912. The British government soon took exception to his writings and later banned the publication of his page Al-Hilal At tal in 1914. Azad brought out his second famous paper, Al Balagh. Within five months of its publication, he was charged with sedition and was ordered to leave Bengal under the provisions of the Defence of India Act.

In 1916, Azad left Calcutta for Ranchi, where he was put under house arrest. This was the beginning of his long ordeal in British jails where he had to spend ten years off and on. However, the period of leisure during the imprisonment proved the proverbial silver lining in the dark clouds and Azad could finish four of his famous books during those years, viz. Tarjuman-ul-Quran,Tazkir-ah, Qaul-e-Faisal and Ghubar-e-Khatir. In 1927, he again brought out his own paper Al-Hilal, but could not continue it for long.

Maulana Azad met Mahatma Gandhi in 1920. This laid the foundation of a lifelong friendship and mutual respect. Azad became a firm believer in the policies of Gandhi and joined the Congress Party. In 1923 he presided over the Delhi Session of the Congress. After this he remained in the forefront of India's struggle for freedom along with other leaders of the first echelon. Under the leadership of Gandhi, he took active part in the Non-Cooperation, Civil Disobedience and Quit India movements.

He was elected President of the All India Congress Party in 1940 and held that office till 1946. He was Union Minister for Education which office he held till his death in 1958.

The last book authored by Azad, India wins Freedom could only be published in 1959 after his death. As Minister of Education, Azad established the Education Commission in 1948, introduced the Secondary Education in 1952 and also instituted the University Grants Commission.

Azad was a man of sterling qualities and possessed a charming and impressive personality. He was a born orator and kept his audience spell-bound by his elequences. He was loved and respected by all his compatriots, some of whom became his lifelong friends. Azad was an undaunted crusader for the cause of Hindu-Muslim unity and proved a beacon of light to nationalist Muslims in pre-Partition days.

AZADI (English), Chaman Nahal's second novel, was published in the year 1975. It is a presentation of the tragedy of the Partition of India in its human dimensions. The emphasis is on love, harmony and amity in place of hatred, fear and violence. The chief merit of the work lies in its poweful delineation of the traumatic experiences of ordinary men and women in the course of the unhappy event.

Kanshi Ram, a tradesman of Sialkot, and the members of his family become victims of the political decision. They have to abandon their place of living, which they have been sharing with Choudhuri Barkat Ali. The creation of Pakistan and the influx of refugees bring tumult into the lives of these people. The characters are caught up in communal frenzy. Kanshi Ram's son and daughter are estranged. Arun loses not only his beloved Nur, sister of his friend Munir, but also his new-found love, Chandni. He witnesses the rape of the beautiful Sunanda, daughter of the late Amarviti. Sunada loses her husband, Suraj Parkash, who is killed. Ishar Kaur also loses her husband Niranjan Singh. The novel is fast-moving in its sweep with its account of the murders, abductions and migrations which marked that period of travail in the land, and sensitive in its delinetation of the tragedy of the people caught in the turmoil and the anguish of those uprooted, of those dispossessed not only of their lands and houses but of their human environment of family and friends.

As a novelist dealing with the Partition, Chaman Nahal is distinct from others because of the underlying optimism of his novel, and also its suggestion of regeneration amidst the holocaust. The birth of the child on the train is indicative of hope for the future. Kanshi Ram reveals an admirable freedom of mind and spirit. The futility of hatred is suggested by the whirling of Sunanda's machine. The values which emerge in the novel are compassion and forgiveness, abiding human love and respect for the lowly and the downtrodden. A Sahitya Akademi Award was given on this book in 1977.

AZAD, JAGANNATH (Urdu; b. 1908) is the son of the late Tilokchand Mehrum an illustrious Urdu poet who was the head master of a high school. His father gave him all elementary education at home. However, when he was five years old and his father was transferred to Klor Kot, Jagannath was admitted to the school. He passed his VIII class at the age of 12. By this time he had started composing poetry.

He matriculated from Mianwali and did his F.A. from D.A.V. college, Rawalpindi. It was at about this time that he had begun to write regular poems which were published in various literary journals. He wrote a paper on (Iqbal aur uski manzarnigari) Iqbal and his natural imagery which was published in the magazine Makhzan edited by the late Sheikh Abdul Qadir.

He then shifted to Lahore, where he met Tajwar Najibabadi, who influenced him a lot. Here he joined college to do his B.A. and also started wroking on part time basis in the daily Milap. After completing his M.A., he joined Sikandar Hayat in his political activities and also worked for the paper Jai Hind.

After partition of the country in 1947 he shifted to Delhi. His yearning for the homeland that he was forced to leave, is reflected movingly in a number of his poems of the period. He joined the Central Information Service and was for sometime in Ajkal (Urdu) as Asstt. Editor.

After his retirement from service he worked for a short time in the Urdu Department in Jammu University as Professor. His lifelong devotion to the study of the poetry of Iqbal has influenced him enormously. His poetic works include:

Bekaran, (collection of Poems) published in 1949, 1954 and 1956 (Delhi); Sitaron Se Zarron Tak (Collection of poems) (Delhi, 1951); Watan Mein Ajnabi collection of Poems) (Delhi, 1958). Nawae pareshan, (Collection of Poems) (1961); Intikhab-e-Azad, (Selection of poems) (Aligarh 1957).

His prose works include: Tilokchand Mahrum, biography of his father (1959); Iqbal aur uska ahad, (1960), Iqbal aur Maghrabi Mufakkirin, (1975). Iqbal Ki Kahani(1976) Muraqqe-e-Iqbal (1977) Mere Guzashta Shab-o-Roz; Autobiography (1965). Iqbal: His Mind & Art (Pakistan, 1982).

Besides a number of writers like Firaq Gorakhpuri, Al-e-Ahmed Isuroor and Saha-ud-Din Abdur Rehman etc. have written on his works. Two collections of these writings have come out:

AZAD, MUHAMMAD HUSAIN (Urdu; b. 1830 d. 1910) was educated in Delhi College and was associated with the Delhi Urdu Akhabar. He left Delhi after the 1857 holocaust and travelling through Lucknow, Madras, Bombay, Jind, Jagraon and Ludhiana reached Lahore in 1861 where he was appointed in a junior post first in the Postal and later in the Education Department. He came in contact with Lietnir, Principal, Government College, Lahore and served as his Urdu Munshi and as an active member of his Shikha Sabha. Azad was sent to Iran and Central Asia on a political mission. In 1866, after some 8 months' employment in the Central Government's Foreign Department, and after a short visit to Calcutta, Azad returned to Lahore and was appointed first as Secretary, Anjuman-i-Punjab and then as Assistant to Pearson for the compilation of text books. Later he became an Assistant Professor in Arabic in the Government College, Lahore.

In 1874, he organised a series of mushairas (poetical symposia) at the suggestion of Colonel Holroyd, Director of Education which introduced compact poem as a poetic genre in Urdu for the first time. Instead of ghazals written on a given rhyme scheme, these compact poems were to be written and read in a mushaira on given themes and had in effect the appearance of versified essays.

In 1884 his services were transferred to the Oriental College where he was appointed Professor for teaching Urdu and Persian. He retired on a monthly pension of Rs. 50/- in 1890, and the last twenty years of his life were spent in a state of insanity.

Such was the colourful and dramatic life of Azad that he has been rightly described by an eminent critic as the Hero of Urdu-i-Mualla. A multi-dimensional personality he greatly influenced the literary development of Urdu for generations to come as critic, literary historian, poet, lingusist, text book writer and stylist par excellence.

Though no great poet himself, he will always be remembered as the father of the new poetic genre 'Nazm' which started as a consequence of his mushairas of Anjuman-i-Punjab where poems on given themes were read. The mushairas set a new trend in Urdu poetry and influenced many important poets, among them Hali.

As a linguist, he was the first among the modern to write a whole book Sukhandan-i-Fars on the etymology of Persian and trace morpholgical and semantic changes in various linguistic principles. Again, he was among the first few to discúss in his preface to Ab-i-Hayat, the origin and development of Urdu language and its close affinity to Braj Bhasha on the one hand and to Sanskrit and Persian, the common Aryan languages, on the other.

As an educationist, he could be said to be second only to Nazir Ahmed who also wrote text books in Urdu for various classes covering different topics in an interesting manner.

As a historian, he has to his credit, an epochmaking book Darbar-i-Akbari dealing with the personalities, policies, culture and social norms of the period of the Mughal Emperor, Akbar in a style which brings back to life the men and the milieu of the bygone days.

As a literary historian, he will live eternally as the author of Ab-i-Hayat, the first history of Urdu and Urdu poets which is written not merely as an analysis of the poetic trends but as an album of living thumbnail sketches of most of the memorable poets of Urdu. Though Azad has often been criticized for his colourful style and inadequate information, yet his critical opinions still prevail, barring of course, his overdrawn picture of his ustas Zauq. For the first time, Azad objectively analysed and identified the various epochs of literary history and spelt out their characteristics and gave a panoramic view of Urdu poetry with a well-informed, sympathetic, yet perceptive criticism of its general weaknesses for similies, metaphors etc.

Perhaps his greatest contribution was in the field of essay and prose style. As a stylist, he has practically no parallel. Barring perhaps Ghalib's prose letters, no prose writings evoke such aesthetic delight, such colourful panorma of life, such myriad imagery as Azad's prose. Writing on any subject, he is at ease with his style. Every work of prose bears the unmistakable imprint of his personality. His allegorical essays of Nairang-i-Khayal (1928) cover a wide range of topics and unfolds a new world of images.

Muhammad Sadiq has traced the sources of many of his essays included in Nairang-i-Khayal to essays in English by Johnson and Addison. These, however, have been so recast and adapted in the enchanting prose style of Azad that they exude an aroma of their own.

His incomplete play on Akbar also bears testimony to another dimension of his greatness, as also a large number of his books written during the period of insanity, a close study of which can be rewarding. His publications include Ab-i-Hayat, Nairang-i-Khayal, Sukhandan-i-Fars, Nigaristan-i-Fars, Darbar-i-Akbari, Diwan-i-Zauq, Akbar (drama), Nazm-i-Azad, Khumkada-i-Azad, Nasihat-i-Kiranphul, Qasa-i-Hind, Qawaid-i-Urdu and some sixteen other publications. These do not include seven publications written during his period of insanity and five unpublished books and dozens of manuscripts also written during this period. He remains the most outstanding prose stylist of urdu, a pioneering literary historian and critic.

AZIM, MUZAFFAR (Kashmiri; b. 1934,) has as his first name Mohamad Muzaffar Mir. He was born in a learned family. His father's grandfather, namely Miraza Mir, was also a poet whose satirical poem "moqdam nama" is the only poem extant. Azim did his B.Sc from S.P. College Srinagar and was then appointed as teacher in the Education Department. He was later on appointed in the Sericulture Department where he is working as Director at present. Azim began his literary career in 1955 by writing Vatan (an old form of love lyrics) of the conventional nature. His first collection of poetry Zolana (Chains, 1963) introduced him as a poet of love and nature. Like his contemporaries, he too was influenced by the revolutionary ardour, but it did not suit his romantic temperament. When he is in his proper vein, he sings of the beauty and marvel of trivial and familiar things. He revels in the beauty of nature but everywhere is piognantly aware of his personal situation. His major poems Azim Chu faqath lol (Azim is love incarnate), 'Hussan ta Zindagi' (beauty and life) 'Lagzish' (interruption) 'Awalun' (vortex) and 'Manikaman' (Passion) show the essential qualities of his poetry, an astonishing combination of sensuous suggestion and verbal melody. He has no message to convey, he has no philospophy. It is futile to search for any profound meaning in his poetry. His first collection Zolana was awarded the first literary prize of the J & K cultural Academy in 1964. His second collection Manikaman (Passion, 1974) contains some short poems also in which he seems to have given his yearning for music and preferred an oblique and metaphorical expression. Azim has succeeded in translating Tolstoy's famous novel War and Peace into Kashmiri published in four volumes by the J & K Cultural Academy, which got him the Soviet Land Nehru prize in 1978.

AZIZ LUCKNAVI (Urdu; b. 1882, d. 1935) Mirza Muhammad Hadi 'Aziz', son of the well known scholar and astronomer Mirza Mohammad Ali, was born at Lucknow. He lost his father at the tender age of seven. After completing his study of the Quran, which he learnt at the feet of Maulana Hafiz Sheikh Iklaq Husain turned to secular education which he imbibed from Maulvi Muhammad Husain and Maulvi Syed Lutuf Husain. He was initiated into the realm of literature by such known masters of the day as Maulvi Abu-ul-Hassan Pyare Mirza Maulvi Sheikh Fida Hussain Shams-ul-e-ma, a Maulvi Abdul Majid, Farangi Mahal and Maulana Mohd. Nasim. Saf-hi Lucknavi was Aziz's Ustad in Urdu Poetry.

He received his instruction in Persian from Syed Aulad Husain Belgrami and that peerless teacher Agha Syed Muhammad Hazik who also initiated him into Persian poetry. Aziz had inherited the scholarship and literary traditions of his forefathers who had come to Lucknow from Shiraz via Kashmir. His thorough grounding in Persian and Arabic greatly influenced the lofty sentiments of his poetry and equippped him with many new ideas. For about 8 years he was with Mirza Bahadur Mirza Muhammad. Abbas Ali Khan 'Jigar' Deputy Commissioner and Rais-e-Azam, Lucknow also consulted him and sought his guidance in his poetic pursuits. This period is often regarded as an important phase of the flowering of Aziz's poetic talent. Later he took up employment as a Persian teacher in the Aminabad High School where he also guided several college and university students. For several years he served as an Examiner of the University in Eastern languages and literature.

In 1920 he was picked up by the Maharaj Sahib of Mehbubad and appointed teacher (Ataliq) of the heir apparent. Recognizing Aziz's unusual hunger for knowlede, the Maharaja made him the librarian of the State Library which stocked some of the finest collections of literary writings of the past. He spent almost his entire life in the pursuit of knowledge and there was hardly a book in that great literary which he had not read and throughly grasped from beginning to end.

This scholarship in Urdu, Persian and Arabic was profound. His poetry was chiselled and polished by that fund of knowledge which he had gathered by personal studies of life and literature. He has gratefully acknowledged the influence of masters like Hafiz Urfi and Naziri on his Persian and Mir and Ghalib on his Urdu poetry. It is often said that it was Aziz who first liberated the Ghazal of Mir and Ghalib from the Nishatia Shairi (exotic poetry) of his period, and restored to it all its old glory and honour. Aziz touched both Ghazal (lyrical poem) and Qasida (panegyric) with equal ease and grace. His output in Ghazal like Ghalib's was small but profound. Akbar Allahabadi the great humourist and poet and a profound scholar is reported to have once remarked that after the death of Ghalib no poet of comparable talent (if not genius) in Urdu Ghazal arrived till Aziz Lucknavi.

Sukhan Mein aur to ahle tamiz he hain fakt Shahid Jalwa-e-Mehini Aziz his hain fakt.

Akbar Allahabadi and Aziz respected and understood each other. Their friendship is revealed in Magateeb-e-Akbar Allahabadi Banam Aziz, a collection of 250 letters, full of lengthy conversations and exchange of wits and views on matters concerning life, religions, philosophy, theology, literature and the art particularly of the Urdu poetry and its form, subject matter and intellectual manifestations. Akbar regards Aziz as extension of Mir and Ghalib.

Similar expression of praise for of Aziz's poetry may be seen in the History of Urdu Adab by Abdul Lais Sidiqui. Maulana Azad also finds Aziz and Ghalib closest to each other. Iqbal confessed that he not only admired Aziz but derived positive inspiration from his poetry.

Almost all great contemporaries of Aziz and those who followed him have paid him similar tributes.

Aziz was a deeply religious man and yet most secular in his outlook. The influence of Gandhi made him write patrioitc verse of high calibre.

Aziz was a great reader and a prolific writer of both prose and poetry. His published writings include Gulkada, Anjum Kada (both collections of his ghazals), Saheefa-e-Vila (collection of Qasidas), Swane Umri Allama Mufit Syed Mohd. Abbas, Noor-e-Stare-dar halat-e-shahid-r-Rabe and Aziz-ul-Lughat. These alone comprise about half a million words.

There are also complete manuscripts entitled Islami- e-Adabi Mazamin Ka Majmua, Swane Umri Janab Maulana Syed Hamid Husain, Lughat-ul-Masadir Kashkol-e-Adab, Taz-Karwal-Muasrin and Qawad-e-Urdu, which have not been published so far. Aziz was a great writer who transcended barriers of race, religion, creed and geography.

AZMAT-UL-LAH KHAN (Urdu; b. 1887, d. 1927), a distinguished poet and writer, was born into a learned family of religious leanings. His education commenced with conventional lessons in Persian and study of the Quran at home. Regular education followed at Hyderabad and later at Ajmer where he did his B.A. He studied Hindi and Sanskrit and acquired proficiency in Bengali, English and French. At Hyderabad, he was appointed Naasim-e-Taaleemat (Director of Education). There he took to writing articles.

As a poet, he made his mark as an experimenter with the subtle and the new forms of Urdu Nazm and Geet (poems and lyrics). Drawing upon the dulcet founts of Brajbhasha (The legendary dialect of Mathura and adjoining areas), he enriched the lyrical realms of Urdu with nuances of idiom and strains of folk-lore.

Azmat-ul-lah Khan died too young to leave a published collection of his works. The thematic content of his poetry emanates and develops from the aesthetic, sensuous and romantic entity of Indian women as reflected in their homely environs. The rhythmic beauty and poetic exuberance of his creations lie in their sonorous rendition replete with profundity of feeling and sweep of emotions. His longer lyrics are masnavis in substance and lyrical in exposition. His representative lyrics, inter-alia, go by captions like 'Peet Ki Maari Sati Shairah Rupmati' (The love-lorn poetess Roopmati), 'Barsat Ki Raat Dakkan Mein' (A rainy night of Decan) and 'Barkha Rut Ka Pehla Meinh' (The first shower of the rainy season).

AZMI KHALIL-UR-REHMAN (Urdu; b. 1927, d. 1978) son of Maulana Muhammad Shafi, a deeply religious man, was born at village Seda Sultanpur, Dist. Azamgarh, (U.P.). He matriculated from Shibli National High School, Azamgarh in 1945, graduated in 1948 and did his M.A. (Urdu) in 1951 from Aligarh. He was awarded Doctorate (Ph. D.) in Urdu by Aligarh Muslim University in 1957 on his thesis Urdu Mein Tarraqui Pasand Adabi Tahrik.

He joined the post-graduate Department of Urdu, Aligarh University in 1952 as Lecturer, was elevated as Reader in 1956 and continued in that post till his death on 1st June, 1978. Azmi was a versatile writer of both prose and poetry. He started writing from his early school days, when he composed poems for children for Payami Talim. One of the pioneers in developing modern sensibility in Urdu Ghazal, he is considered to be one of Urdu critics, who could discuss problems of literary criticism in the new idiom. During the early years of his literary career, he wrote on 'Aatish'. His Maquala was serialized in Nigar, Lucknow and was appreciated in all quarters of Urdu's literary world. He associated himself with the progressive writers' movement of Urdu literature and was imprisoned in 1949 for his political views. He edited Aligarh Muslim Gazette as also the Aligarh Magazine in Urdu. His important publications include Kagzi Pairhan (Collection of Ghazals and Nazms), 1953; Naya Ahad Nama (Collection of Ghazals), 1965; Nai Nazm Ka Safar (edited 1972); Fikr-o-Fan, 1956; Zawiay-e-Nigah, 1966; Tarraqui Pasand Adabi Tahrik, 1972 and Mazamin-e-Nau (literary criticism), 1977.

B

BACHCHAN, HARIVANSH RAI (Hindi; b. 1907) was born in a family known for its scholarship in Persian and its devotion to Vaishnava faith, Bachchan combines in his poetry the best of Sanskrit and Persio-Arabic poetic traditions. He wrote his Ph. D. dissertation on 'W.B. Yeats and Occultism' and received a Doctorate from the Cambridge University.

His first collection of poems Tera Har was published in 1932. A long poem, Madhushala was published in 1935. It is a collection of quatrains, which employ a range of symbols, especially that of wine, much as in the tradition of Persian poetry. As in all great poetry, the meaning of these symbols operates at many levels. In its section, Madhubala Bachchan elevated human love to the level of metaphysical experience. The mood continued in the section Madhukalash where the poet confirms his renewed faith in human love as it works out its course on this earth. In poems like Pagadhvani in 'Madhubala', the poet imparts a high and romantic status to the woman.

Madhushala established the poet as a singer of vast sensuous longings, grouping for an enternal unity with his beautiful beloved. In 1938 was published Nisha Nimantran, a collection of lyrics, expressing feelings of deep grief and pessimism. In it the poet tried to evolve his own version of sonnet, suited to Hindi language and in harmony with its own poetic tradition. A collection of 100 lyrics, it begins with a cry of loneliness and ends with an assurance that the tears of the poet can quench the thirst of a tired world. In these poems, the inner state of mind has been expressed in terms of the outer, thus creating a universe of symbols. The next collection, Ekant Sangit was published in 1939, and Akul Antar in 1943. According to Bachchan's own statement in the Introduction to Akul Antar, the darkness into which he entered in Nisha Nimantran led him to listen to the 'Ekant Sangeet', the songs of solitude, and the music led him to 'Akul Antar', the restless heart, from where the end of the tunnel was quite close. Satrangini (the rainbow of a hundred hues) was a collection published in 1945. The great Bengal Famine of 1946, caused the poet to move away from his earlier concerns. His new involvement in the human predicament resulted in the collection, Bangal Ka Kal, which was translated by Bhupendranath Das in Bengali in 1948. Aware of the human sufferings by a sensibility sharpened by private grief, he published Halahal in the same year (1946).

The next two collections, Khadi Ke Phul and Sut Ki Mala mourn the death of Mahatma Gandhi.

Milan Yamini (1950) and Pranay Patrika (1955), named after Tulsidas's Vinay Patrika, express a happy mood after a long time. The physical dimensions of Madhubala give place to an ideal love, made gratifying by care and attention. The poems of these two collections transcend the sensuousness of Bachchan's early poems.

Ghar Ke Idhar Udhar (1957) is a work of transition in which the poet is gradually returning to share the glory of his race and family. Arati Aur Angare (1958) celebrates this return to one's own heritage.

In the opinion of Bachchan himself Budha aur Nachghar (1958) is the turning point of his poetic career. Once again we have the challenging voice of an unbending lover and an unyielding youth. A man crushed under a train leaves his marks on the wheels which his hands tried to push away before he breathed his last. Bachchan has expressed the lust for life in all his poetry which has elemental grief and rage. In Budha aur Nachghar he stands and looks out at the society around him and, angered by what he sees, mocks it. In Tribhangima and Char Kheme Chaunsath Khunte he experiments with the language of folklore, Ubharati Pratima ke Rup (1968) and Katati Pratimaon ki Awaz (1969), have been published under one cover and titled Rup aur Awaz (Delhi, 1979). This collection together with Jal Sameta (1973) has all the experimental poems with which Bachchan takes his place in the modern movement of Hindi poetry. Kavitai Ki Adhisadi (Delhi, 1981) includes 46 poems chosen from a poetic career of 50 years.

In the translation of Shakespearian tragedies Bachchan has not only stuck to the natural rhythm of spoken Hindi but has tried to remain as close as possible to the dramatic tonality of the original. He has translated 64 Russian poems and also 101 poems of W.B. Yeats.

He has translated the Bhagavadgita in sweet Awadhi (Jangita, 1958) and also in modern Hindi (Nagargita, 1966).

His greatest achievement in prose is as a writer of autobiography, which has appeared in 3 parts. It is distinguished by its graceful confession and intimate account of his innermost feelings in situations of great tragic dimensions. They are titled Kya Bhulun Kya Yad Karun (1969), Nid Ka Nirman Phir (1970) and Basere Se Our (1977). His Do Chattanen received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968.

Bachchan's selected poems have been translated into many Indian and foreign languages.

BADAJENA, BRAJANATH (Oriya; b. 1739, d. 1800), a distinguished poet of the ornate style was born in Dhenkanala (a tributary State) during the rule of the Marhattas. The scattered accounts of his genealogy and life can be found in his works. From his Kelikalanidhi (Full moon of erotic sports) it is known that he was a descendant of Raghu Araksita, a great devotee of the 16th century, residing at Puri.

He was patronized by the ruling chief of Dhenkanala and Keonjhar as their court-poet, but being a man of independent spirit, he could not stay permanently at Dhenkanala and had to move from one place to another (Keonjhar, Darpani, Bhilingi) for his livelihood, even at his old age. Samara Taranga (Waves of War, 1781) was written at the instance of the Raja of Dhenkanala in his praise, but the grief of the poverty-stricken poet has been pathetically reflected in his Rajananku Chalokti (Twisted address to the Raja), which is autobiogrophical in spirit. He spent his last days at Puri during the reign of Dibyasimha Deva II, to whom he dedicated his poem Gundica Bije (Procession to Gundica), written in Hindi. He was a scholar of repute, a powerful poet and an artist too.

Besides Oriya, he was well versed in Sanskrit, Prakrit, Khoratha (Hindi), Bengali and Telugu. Descriptions in Sanskrit, Hindi, Prakrit and Bengali are to be found in his famous work Ambika Vilasa (Love-sport of Ambika).

He has to his credit quite a good number of poems in ornate style and a prose fiction (Katha). His Ambika Vilasa is based on the theme of the union of Siva and Parvati and the birth of Kumara. This poem as well as Syama Rasotsaba (Rasa festival of Syama), Bichaksana

(The artful heroine) and Kelikalanidhi (a fictional poem) bear testimony to his scholarship, grandeur of description, rhetorical devices, and poetic vision too. Though he has exhibited his craftsmanship modelled on the literary style of the famous ornate poet Upendra Bhanja, still his departure from the style of the latter in some aspects enhances the quality of his poetry in that it brings in also an element of modernity. His Samara Taranga (vivid and realistic description of a war fought between the Raja of Dhenkanala and the Marhatta Governor in 1781), Gundica Bije (a vivid description of the world famous Ratha Yatra of Lord Jagannatha) and Chatura Vinoda (four stories in prose full of humour and satire), where characters have been taken from common life such as that of merchant, harlot, boat-man, dancer, etc. bear testimony to the above fact. Besides this, he has composed some Chaupadis, Jananas, Dandaka Churnaka and Dohas (Dandaka and Churnaka adapted from Sanskrit and Doha from Hindi). Simplicity and clarity in language, vividness in description, sense of humour and lucidity in style mark the beauty of his composition. In appreciation of the poet it can be said about him that he witnessed and welcomed the dawn of the modern age in Oriya literature.

BADALI (Rajasthani), first published in 1941, is supposed to be the first work of modern poetry in the language. The author Chandrasingh seems to be an expert at composing Duhas, the most popular metre in the language. That might be the main reason for his opting for this metre in this composition. The traditionality of the metre, however, has not adversely affected in any way his thoughts and style of expression. The poem, consisting of 131 stanzas in all, describes the necessity, urgency, pleasures and curative power of the rains in the desert villages. The sequence of the seasonal calendar is maintained throughout and the problems of agriculture and drinking water are highlighted. The entire poem is addressed to the cloud and is full of requests, entreaties, advices and directions in the interest of the desert land. The descriptions are realistic and natural. The poet's observations of the natural phenomenon are very minute and thought-provoking. One has to be born and spend his early years in a distant desert village to understand and appreciate the importance of rains in such a land. The joys and sorrows of not only the human beings but the entire world of animals and plants rest only on the rains. The book reflects them in an effective way. The modernity of the poem consists in the style and way of treatment, in the simplicity and lucidity of expression and language, and in the underlying spirit of welfare of the people in general. Every stanza of the poem is a picture in itself, as it has transformed the spirit and the essence of a particular moment into carefully selected words. The onomatopeic richness of a number of stanzas describing the rains in full swing has lent an extra force to the description. The traditional 'Vainasagai' figure of speech, prescribed as an essentiality for all compositions in Duha metre, has been avoided by the author without losing in the least the quality of his creative art.

BADARAYANA (Sanskrit). Several writers and teachers are known under the title Badarayana. The real identity of the man has not as yet been ascertained nor can the meaning of the word be understood through etymological derivation. Although many authors are known thus the name is especially associated with the sage Vyasa, who is said to be the author or compiler of the Mahabharata, Vedantasutras and other works. The poetic genius of Vyasa is just the proper essence of the great muni-scholar that Vyasa really was. Especially his Mahabharata consists of a mass of poetry which bears the style and impress of a single, strong, but an unusual mind, differing in his manner of expression and thought. In the well known anthologies many beautiful verses are to be found under the name of Vyasa.

BADHEKA GIJUBHAI, BHAGWANJEE (Gujarati; b. 1885, d. 1939) was an eminent educationist who ushered a new era in the field of education. In his times, authoritarianism reigned supreme in the sphere of child education. He prescribed and practised a novel curriculum which suited and developed the individuality of a child and inculcated a sense of freedom among the little pupils. Gijubhai was greatly influenced by Madam Montessori's system and his preceptor in this field was his maternal uncle, Hargovind Pandya.

Gijubhai left a flourishing legal practice to join Daksinamurty Educational Institute of Bhavnagar where with a team of devoted co-workers he made a number of bold experiments and introduced new trends in teaching.

He has more than a hundred publications to his credit. He has written fifteen books on education. For his juvenile readers he had produced a substantial literature consisting of stories, verses, plays, travelogues and biographies. Thus, he acquainted his young readers with the pleasures of reading and opened a veritable treasure house of folklore before them. He inspired an interest in acting among children by writing plays specially for them.

Gijubhai also contributed to jounalism. He was the editor of the two journals Daksinamurty and Siksan Patrika. He has also written pamphlets and textbooks on adult education.

BADVI, LUTF ALLAH (Sindhi; b. 1904, d. 1968) was an eminent Sindhi prose writer, historian, research scholar and poet. He was the son of a well-known Sindhi poet Haji Imam Bakhsh Khadim (1861-1918). Luft Allah received primary education in Sindhi and Persian from his father. After passing the vernacular final examination in 1920, he started his career as a school teacher and finally retired as Professor in Sindhi from Government College, Shikarpur, Sindh. Lutf Allah entered the literary field by publishing his poems and research articles in Sindhi periodicals. Initially, his pseudonym was Jogi (Ascetic), but, later on, he changed it to Badvi (A Bedouin).

Lutf Allah 'Badvi' has written about eighty books on varied subjects out of which twenty-nine works have been published and the rest are in the manuscript form. His important published works are:— Novels: Kamini (1927), Rata Ja Gorha (Tears of blood, 1935), Abela (1959), Mujahidin (1962); Plays: Dodo Chanesar (1957), Mir Behram; Qisas Retold: Char Darvesh (1959); Saif-ul-Maluk (1960); Literary Criticism: Kulyat-e-Khadim (1958), Kandiria Waran Jo Kalam (Poetry of Saint Poets of Kandiri, 1964); History: Tarikh Pakva Hind (History of Pakistan and India, first volume 1948, second volume 1952); Tarikh Andals (1955); Biograpahy: Hayat-e-Iqbal (1952). The most commendable contribution of Lutf Allah Badvi is Tazkirah-Lutfi (1943 and 1946) in three volumes. The work deals with the history of Sindhi poetry from early times to the end of the 19th century. In each volume, the writer has briefly discussed political situations in Sindh and then discussed the development of Sindhi poetry by describing chronologically the lives and works of the poets. The first volume was published in 1943. It deals with the development of Sindhi poetry upto the end of Kalhora rule (1782). The third volume, published in 1953, delineates the evolution of Sindhi poetry during the British period upto the poetry of Mir Hasan Ali Hasan, (1824-1909). In this commendable work, Badvi has briefly discussed in each volume Persian poetry produced in Sindh and its impact on the Sindhi poetry. This book is a basic research work on the growth of Sindhi poetry and has proved to be the main source of information for later writers.

BAGADAVAT (Rajasthani) is a big folk ballad of Rajasthan composed in prose and verse with a heroic theme. It is popular in every part of Rajasthan and in Malwa, but it is immensely so mainly in the present Bhilwara and Ajmer districts where the principal places of the actions of the twenty-four 'Bagadavat' brothers are situated. The 'Gatha' is popular in three forms, the first one deals with the complete story (Lakshmikumari Chundavat's edition) the second upto the death of Bagadavat brothers (K.K. Sarma's edition) and the third with Devnarayan only (Mahendra Bhanuvati's edition). Being the sons of Baghji Bagrao, they were collectively known as 'Bagadavat'. They were Gurjar by caste. There is a great deal of controversy about their period. According to one view, they belonged to the 10th century of Vikram Samvat era while, according to another, they lived between 1200-1400 (Vikram-Samvat era). The first view appears to be nearer the truth. It is noteworthy that the historicity of the ballad is confined to certain characters, places and events, while the rest speaks of the creative imagination of the folk psyche. The chronological aspect and the rationalistic interrelation of causes and effects have assumed a secondary importance. The story of the ballad has been moulded after the folk ideals of the age and time and accordingly, the literary traditions and events have been incorporated. On the pattern of the Mahabharata it also contains a fine depiction of side narratives and supporting events. The language of the prose portion is idiomatic and rich with proverbs. The diction of the verse is precise, apt and appealing. It has recently been rescued in its entirety from the age old oral tradition of the 'Bhopas' (Singers of ballads) and published, (ed., L.K. Chundavat, Devnarayan Bagadavat Mahayacha, Rajkamal Prakashan, Delhi). Being thus handed orally, the colloquial differences in the language and also those in the facts are but natural. Broadly speaking, the language represents the spoken dialect of the people of Bhilwara, Ajmer and Chittoor which also incorporates words from certain dialects of adjoining districts. The composer of the original ballad is believed to be one of the characters in the story. It is, however, well nigh impossible to sort out the original from the available material.

The form in which the ballad is presented is also important. The persons who sing the ballad are called the 'Bhopas' of Devji or Devnarayanji. It is usually recited at night during the winter season. A fabric screen, known as 'Fada' is also displayed, on the site, which bears coloured pictures depicting the various deeds of the Bagadavats. While reciting the ballad, the singer also points with a stick to the picture of the specific incident being narrated. Devji (Devnarayanji) Bagadavat is believed to be an incarnation of Vishnu. He is worshipped in and out of Rajasthan at numerous places. Temples dedicated to him are found at various sites, but the chief place for his worship is at Asind (Bhilwara District). The central point of interest in this ballad is 'Jaimati', who is also known as Jelu. The entire plot revolves around her. She was the main cause of the battles of Bagadavat. Her various forms are depicted as wearing the signs of the twenty-four Bagadavats. Beside the famous temple of Sawaibhoj, a temple is also dedicated to her. There is also an old temple of Jelu Ma (Mother Jelu) at Ran Village. The ballad describes her variously as Devi, Sakti, Sita and Draupadi.

Harishingh, the nephew of Bisaldev Chauhan, ruler of Ajmer, lived under his uncle's guardianship. He had a son called Baghji who had the face of a lion and the body of a human being. Baghji had twenty four sons from twelve wives. They were Tejoji, Ninyoji, Bhojoji, (Sawaibhoj), Bhanoji and others, who were collectively known as Bagadavats. They had immense wealth and innumerable cattle. Their villages were known as 'Gothas'. The foremost among them was Sawaibhoj. Impressed by his intellect and valour Lord Siva bestowed upon him twelve years of endless wealth and a similar period of imperishable body together with a jewel known as 'Parasmani,' etc. All the brothers expressed views on how such a huge amount of wealth could be best spent. Bhoj's younger brother Niyoji was of the opinion that it should be lavishly spent on enjoyment. This suggestion appealed to everyone of them. Mounting their horses, they set off for the alien territory and having encamped at the Navlakha garden of Ran city, began their life of dissipation. At this, the Rana of the place deputed his brother Nima to study the situation. Being convinced of their prowess Nima thought it wise to change turbans with the brave Bagadavat Niyoji and thus befriend him as a brother. The Rana was an aged person. He, too, approved of this friendship. He offered them a very warm welcome. The Bagadavat brothers also reciprocated by inviting him to a party of drinks and merriments at the Mekhta hill. A great deal of wine was consumed. So much so that it overflowed on the floor. The flow of the wine forced its way through the thirteen layers of the earth and entered the subterranean region known as 'Patal' where it tinkled, at the place of the serpent king—Vasuki. He reported the matter to Vishnu. Vishnu set out to test Bagadavat in disguise. They, however, recognised him and offered their respects. Having been pleased Vishnu granted Bhoja's wife Sadhu a boon that she would get him as a son not through birth but as a child to be breastfed, also adding that he would be known as Devnarayan and would avenge the killing of Bagadavat brothers.

In order to deceive the Bagadavats, Vishnu deputed Durga to be born as a daughter to the Solanki ruler of Boonval. The same girl came to be known as Jaimati. When she came to marriageable age, the king asked his priest to search a suitable groom for Jaimati. Jaimati told the priest that she should be betrothed to the man who had 23 brothers and possessed the 'Paras' jewel and the mare known as 'Bunli'. Sawaibhoj fulfilled all these conditions and so the priest handed over the mark of betrothal to him. Knowing that he was not of competent status for this alliance, he accepted the said mark on behalf of the Rana of Ran. The Rana too, gladly gave his consent for the wedding. All the Bagadavats accompanied the Rana in his marriage party. The bravery, grandeur and magnanimity of the Bagadavats was much talked about in every quarter. Jaimati first went through a ceremony of marriage with the sword of Sawaibhoj and then, on the next day the formalities were completed with the Rana. When the Bagadavats prepared to return to their houses and the bride was to reach for the groom's place at Ran, Jaimati asked Bhoj's brother, Niyoji as to when he would come to take her to his place. Niyoji explained that he would come after six months. When the groom's party reached the city garden of Ran, Jaimati halted the chariot and told the Rana that six storeyed separate palace be constructed for her and she would enter the city only on its completion. This was, in fact, a clear device on her part to while away the period of six months as promised by Niyoji. On completion of the palace she occupied it, but managed to terrify the aged Rana by magical performance during the night. A message was sent to Sawaibhoj, on receipt of which the Bagadavats sent an army to take away Jaimati by force. When they had encamped at the Navlakha garden, Jaimati requested the Rana to set out for hunting, while she herself reached the garden. The 'Bagadavats' took her away easily. On his return from hunting and knowing of the incident, the Rana sent a message to the Bagadavats demanding immediate surrender of the queen. He also, requested their Guru, Roopnathji to advise his disciples to execute compliance.

Roopnathji rejected the demand for the return of the abducted queen. The Rana also sought the help of Baghji, the father of the Bagadavats, but to no avail. Enraged at this the Rana attacked Baghji and killed him. On receipt of the news all the Bagadavats prepared to take revenge. Knowing them to be invincible when united, Jaimati thought of a device and advised them to fight individually one by one, like a brave warrior, to which they all agreed. This had the desired effect and thus every one of them along with their sons, fell a prey to the device and died fighting. Sawaibhoj's daughter Deepkanvar, was also killed in the battle. Niyoji too was slain. At the end, Sawaibhoj and Jaimati entered the battle field and they too died. The eldest of the Bagadavat's Tejaravat, fled from the field. Except Bhoj's wife, Sadhu, everyone of the Gurjar ladies died on the funeral pyres of their husbands. The Rana plundered their 'Gothas'. At this very moment, God Devanarayan manifested himself in a lotus flower and reached the breasts of mother Sadhu. The ramparts of the Rana's palace gave way and his bed began to shake. The Brahmana informed him that a son had been born to Sawaibhoj who would take revenge upon him. The Rana asked the Brahmins to fetch the new born prince. They tried to lift up the baby by managing to send Sadhu to fetch water, and force him into a well guarded on all sides by serpents but had to return disappointed. Devnarayan spent his infancy and childhood at his mother's parental house at the palace of the king of Ujjain. When of age, he returned home and sent 'Chhochoobhat', the bard of the Bagadavats to Ran. Thereafter, he killed the Rana and devastated Ran. It was thus that he took the revenge of the Gurjars.

BAGAL, JOGESHCHANDRA (Bengali; b. 1903, d. 1972) was an eminent historian and journalist. After passing the B.A. examination of the Calcutta University in 1926, Jogeshchandra came to be the sub-editor of Prabasi and Modern Review, monthlies published from Calcutta in Bengali and English respectively, both edited and owned by the illustrious journalist Ramananda Chatterjee (1865-1943). Except for a short spell of about five years (1935-1941), he served these two journals with efficiency from 1929 to 1961. During the break he served the now famous Bengali weekly Desh. Jogeshchandra wrote about four hundred informative articles in English and Bengali which centred on the Indian Renaissance with special reference to Bengal. These appeared in Prabasi, Modern Review and other journals of distinction. Bagal's writings threw new light on the life of eminent persons and institutions that heralded the renaissance and national awakening in the country. He also published about fifty books in English and Bengali. Jogeshchandra was intimately associated with the Bangiya Sahitya Parishad (Bengal Academy of Literature) in various capacities for more than 40 years. He was also associated with the Indian Historical Records Commission and Regional Records Commission of West Bengal. In 1958 and 1968, he was invited by the Calcutta University to deliver the Vidyasagar Memorial lectures and Saratchandra Chatterjee Memorial lectures. In 1962, the University of Calcutta honoured him with the award of the Sarojini Gold Medal in recognition of his pioneering research work to the enrichment of the Bengali literature. Unfortunately, Jogeshchandra suffered from loss of eyesight during the last 9 years of his life. Undaunted he carried on with his research work and studies with the help of assistants till death.

BAGCHI, JATINDRAMOHAN (Bengali; b. 1878; , d. 1948) was a well-known poet. Having begun his poetic career under the shadow of distinct Tagorean influences Jatindramohan soon developed a style of his own and became specially known for his compositions with a rural theme as well as those dealing with the domestic commonplaces of the town-dwelling middle class people. Simplicity of expression, picturesqueness, easy command over metre and diction are some among the chief qualities that mark his poems and distinguish them from other writings of the kind. He also wrote quite a number of narrative poems in the manner of Tagore's famous book of poems Palataka. Bandhur Dan (The Offerings from a Friend, 1918) is the name of the work which contains the poems. One of these is his well known 'Simhagarh' which has by now become a classic. His was a very sympathetic nature and sufferings of the womenfolk in particular moved him deeply. His poem 'Andha Badhu' (The Blind Bride), for instance, is evocative of the most poignant feeling that can touch a human heart.

Jatindramohan was a skilled composer of children's verses also. His 'Kajla Didi' may be cited as his most representative poem of its kind. There was a time when hardly a child existed in Bengal who did not learn by rote at least the first two lines of this touchingly mournful poem which are; Bans baganer mathar upar chand uttechhe oi, Mago amar solakbala Kajla-didi koi? (The moon has risen on the tops of the jungle of bamboo trees, Oh my mother! where is at this time my Kajladidi who used to regale us by her merry chanting of Slokas).

FURTHER WORKS: lekha (The Scribblings, 1903), Rekha (The Lines, 1910), Aparajita (The Clitoria Flower, 1913), Nagkesar (The flower of the same name, 1917), Bandhur Dan (1918), Jagarani (Poems that awaken, 1922), Niharika (The Nebula, 1927), Mahabharati (1936), etc.

BAGESWARI SILPA PRABANDHAVALI (Bengali) During the years 1921-29 Abanindranath Tagore delivered a series of twenty nine lectures on Art and Aesthetics from the chair of Bageswari Professor of Fine Arts of Calcutta University. These lectures were compiled in a book form later on and published by the University in 1941. The University edition having been exhausted Rupa & Co (Calcutta) published a second edition of this book in April 1962. This magnificent book is not at all a grammar of aesthetics. This book gets an easy entry into the inner shrines of his aesthetic sanctuary. It has been possible only because of that inimitable style of prose writing which is Abanindranath's own. Abanindranath, an artist of unique personality, painted a good number of superb pictures with the subtle touches of his fine brush and simultaneously used a different instrument in writing prose, as if he were not writing but drawing pictures with words. The result of this is that the unfamiliar and enchanting prose style of Abanindranath with its fluency remains inimitable. It is quite unthinkable how could he so easily extend his field of interest from Rodin-Millet-Braquement-Hatton-Jackson-Spearing to Rigveda–Upanisada Hitopodesa-Kumarsambhava-Bharata-Mammata while discussing the theories of literature, painting and art as a whole. Abanindranath's intimate and lucid style easily introduces us to his rarefied moods of cloistered emotions. Critics like the poet Bishnu Dey, Parimal Goswami, Kanai Samanta, Kalyan K. Gangopadhyay highly praised such a collection of articles on art-analysis enriched with profound thoughts. The Hindustan Standard once said, 'The thing that makes it timeless is its sheer readability and the fascinating way in which even abstruse points of aesthetics have been discussed'.

BAGH-O-BAHAR (Urdu) is the Urdu title of a translation of the Persian work entitled Qissa-e-Chahar Dervish containing four stories narrated by Amir Khusrau to regale his preceptor Hazrat Nizam-ud-din Auliya. John Gilchrist (1759-1848), Director, Fort William College, got the Persian work rendered into Urdu by Mir Aman Dehlvi coming of a learned family patronized by Mughal rulers. As a matter of fact the work was originally entrusted to Tahsin but his work had to be revised and re-written by Mir Aman because the translation done by Tahsin contained words and phrases not in common use. Mir Aman has referred to Gilchrist's efforts and patronage in the beginning. He has not, however, mentioned the efforts put in by Tahsin.

Bagh-o-Bahar, according to Arabic-Persian chronogram (abjad), yields up 1861 as the year of its completion. Mir Aman quotes Amir Khusrau as saying that Hazrat Nizam-ud-din Auliya was glad to pronounce a blessing on its listeners.

The story briefly runs as follows: A king disappointed beyond measure on account of his having no offspring began visiting graveyards and offering prayers. One evening disguised as a common man, he was out as usual. In a dimly lit room he encountered four dervishes kept awake by one of them sneezing hoarsely. Thus roused from sleep they decided upon each narrating his story. The first one, raising the wick of the earthern lamp, began narrating that he was the son of a reputed and wealthy trader belonging to Yemen. His father passed away leaving him an orphan. He lost all his inheritance and had to fall back upon his sister who, despite her welcoming him warmly and giving him a good amount of money, advised him to set up as a trader instead of incurring bad name by depending upon her. He went ahead and met the princess of Sham. The story proceeds showing him passing through the vicissitudes of life until his turning a dervish.

The second dervish then described how he a prince of Faras (Persia), came to meet a wounded princess and how incidents ran into incidents until he took to ascetic life.

The third dervish then sat up to narrate his anecdotal incidents. He claimed to be the former ruler of Ajam. Incidents relating to a trader, a European princess and the narrator's involvement with them followed in quick succession reducing him to the condition of a mendicant.

The fourth dervish, describing himself as the ex-ruler of China, then told the sad plight that overtook him and reduced him to the level of a dervish.

Bagh-o-Bahar has no plots and characterizations and yet the book is quite interesting especially because of the neatly drawn social conditions of the times. Because of its intimate and colloquial style and simple language, the book was very popular with the Englishmen, and was included in the curriculum for examinations they had to take on taking over as officers. It was indeed a milestone in the evolution of Urdu prose.

BAHRI, HARDEV (Hindi, b. 1907) is one of the senior linguists in Hindi who has been consistent and steadfast in his work in the twin fields of theoretical as well as practical and applied linguistics and the whole output is not only impressive but also entitles him to a place of honour in this none-too-rich field of academic pursuits.

Born in Attock (Punjab) Hardev Bahri spent the early part of his life in West Punjab (Now in Pakistan) and migrated later to Allahabad. Barring a short interlude, he taught in the Deptt. of Hindi for nearly two decades in that University till his retirement.

Bahri's academic work may be classified into three categories viz. literary criticism and assessment, theoretical linguistics, and applied linguistics. He started his academic writing with historical and developmental study of poetic styles, genres and authors from a literary point of view, his attention soon turned to and crystallised in linguistic studies and analyses of different kinds. His earlier line of study resulted in works like Hindi Ki Kavya Shailion Ka Vikas (1947), Prakrit aur Uska Sahitya (1952), Hindi Sahitya Ki Ruprekha (1955), Prasad Kavya Vivechan (1958), etc. which are studies of a routine nature with nothing much out of the ordinary. However, his work in the field of theoretical linguistics is not only significant but also pioneering. He initiated indepth study in the field of semantics. His Hindi Semantics marks a unique and valuable contribution to which he later added works like Lahanda Phonetics and Lahanda Philology as also Shabda-Siddhi which are important studies in their own right. Equally important are his lexicographical efforts which also represent two broad categories: study of dialectal vocabularies, Bhojpuri Shabda Sampada (1981) and Chhattisgarhi Shabda Sampada and two bilingual dictionaries. The most important of his contributions is indeed his Comprehensive English-Hindi Dictionary (1960) which, being a one-man work represents a herculean effort. Running into about 1700 pages, it satisfies the needs of translators and authors of scientific and technical literature to a very large extent. The coverage of the dictionary in terms of entries as well as in terms of semantic range and nuances is commendable. His latest the Shiksharthi Kosh, is also a remarkable work in its own way and it reflects Bahri's effort to view language in its varied and multifaceted richness.

BAHURUPI (Marathi) means assumer of different forms. Chitamanarao Kolhatkar, the author of Bahurupi was himself a bahurupi, in the sense that he was an actor. He had made a name for himself as an actor of great distinction. With the advent of the talkies and the closure of the theatres all over Maharashtra this fine actor had fallen on bad days, and in the last stretch of his life he felt that he should write an account of his career. Bahurupi (1957) however is cherished mainly for the brilliant portraits and character-sketches of contemporary dramatists that it contains. The dramatists treated in this manner ranges from Kirloskar to Bedekar, covering almost the entire span of the first fifty years of the modern Marathi stage. The story of his own life is almost commonplace and it is for the most part also the story of almost all his contemporary actors. But the one thing he was most fortunate in was his personal knowledge of the distinguished dramatists of his time; and it is obvious that his keen perception of minute details of character renders the personalities vividly alive and picturesque. He was an artist to his finger-tips and watching his portrait-gallery is an enchanting experience.

A Portrait-painter is likely to be prejudiced by his own vision of the person who so to say sits for him.

The protrait he paints may be coloured with his subjective approach. This artist knew some of the sitters quite intimately, while some he knew only from a distance and meagrely. Some of the sitters like Kirloskar, Deval, Khadilkar he almost worshipped, and was proud to sit at their feet; while some of the eminent sitters like Kolhatkar and Kelkar he did not much like, and had scant respect for them. Again, some of his distinguished sitters like Gadkari were his intimate friends, while Khare and particularly Savarkar were like gods to him. The portraits are not free from this bias. He does not always keep to himself his likes and dislikes, sometimes he even loudly proclaims them rather for all to hear.

This inevitably means considerable unevenness in the writing. Those he knew well receive full-fledged portraits as in the case of Khare and Gadkari, those he did not know well, or did not care to, remain vague and sketchy outlines. And, of course, those like Kelkar and Kolhatkar, against whom he had real or imaginary grudges, though revered writers themselves, tend to be dissmissed with a few contemptuous references.

Despite the effect of strong prejudice some of his portraits are really remarkable, and the most remarkable among them is the book-length protrait of Gadkari. For this young dramatist of undoubted greatness he had all the affection and regard in the world and at the same time there was a feeling of awe for his extraordinary literary merit.

This portrait of Gadkari is extremely vivid and colourful, and brings out certain traits of the man, such as were till then obscure or unknown. The Gadkari-stories that he relates are sometimes funny, sometimes tragic, but all the time the stress is on minute observation and accurate delineation.

Another portrait, that of Savarkar, is an act of pure worship. Such devotion could only come of the author's sense of total identification with Savarkar's idealism and lifelong dedication to a political creed. Chintamanrao had prevailed on Savarkar to write a play for him, that play, Sanyasta Khadga as one would expect is a complete exposition of the latter's political and ethical doctrines. Chintamanrao relates a moving incident, which reveals the man, who to him was almost Godlike. He had once gone to Ratnagiri in a private car to pay his respects to Savarkar, who was detained there for some years. While he was bidding farewell to Savarkar, the Master implored him to take him for a car ride on the beach. This humble request filled Chintamanrao's eyes with tears. Such personal anecdotes add piquancy to the writing. There are, for instance, two such significant incidents that reveal the clay feet of the author's idol, Gadkari. Gadkari was so fond of Balkavi Thombare, a younger poet of great potentiality, that he did not mind removing the tragic murder of a child from his play Punya-Prabhav just because Balkavi could not bear the sight of a murdered child. This incident shows the sentimental side of Gadkari's character. There is also one with a cynical touch. After dictating a powerful oration on the evils of drink for his play Ekach Pyala, we are told, Gadkari asked his friend, Chintamanrao to take out a bottle so that they could get drunk. The brilliant portraits of dramatists in Bahurupi come out alive because, in the making of them, such trifles have been used to perfection. The book got the Sahitya Akademi award in the year 1958.

BAIDEHISHA BILAS (Oriya) is the largest and best of the eighteenth century poet Upendra Bhanja's four Rama-Kavyas, Baidehisha Bilas, Rama Lilamrita, Solapoi and Abana Rasa Taranga. Conforming to the Sanskrit Kavya tradition dealing with the Rama story, the poet deals with the subject matter of all the Kandas except the Uttara Kanda. Towards the end of his kavya, he justifies the exclusion of Uttarkanda on the ground that the sentiment (Rasa) therein, has been distorted (Bibhanga). The poet, like other poets of the Riti school, laid stress on syllable-principle, i.e. to keep one syllable like 'ka' or 'ba' in the beginning of every line. Accordingly, the poet accepting 'ba' syllable calls this work Baidehisha Bilas and divides his work into 'Baan' (fifty two) chhandas, and ends every chhanda in such a number that it bears the syllable 'ba' such as 'bais' (Twenty two) 'batisi' (Thirtytwo) etc.

Upendra Bhanja was very fond of using different types of metres, and alankaras in his kavyas. The use of Chitra Kavya principle or Bandhas was another characteri stic of his kavya. He has composed a separate kavya for it, called Chitra kavya Bandhodaya. In Baidehisha Bilasa he has used some of the Bandhas. They are Briksha Bandha (Tree), Gada Bandha (Mace), Sara Bandha (Arrows), Ratha Bandha (Chariot), Naga Bandha (Serpents), and Chakra Bandha (Wheel). In this Bandha form of poetry, the poet arranges the letters of alphabet in a specific pictorical manner like a tree, or a mace, or an arrow, or a chariot or a serpent, or a wheel etc. but taking care that each arrangement forms into a poem and gives a meaning.

The subject matter of Baidehisha Bilasa can conveniently be divided into different Kandas of Valmiki as follows:-

	Chhandas of	No. Of verses
Val kanda	1-16	816
Ayodhya	17	52
Aranyaka	18-26	474
Kiskinoha	27-33	434
Sundara	34-39	322
Lanka	40-52	626
		2724

Although the poet refers to the Mahakavya of Valmiki, Mahanataka of Hanuman, Kavya of Kalidas (Raghubansha) Champu of Bhanja Naresh and Gita of Kripasidha, that is Jagamohan Ramayana of Balaram Das, 17th century Oriya epic poet, he has generally followed both Valmiki and Balarmana in the arrangement of sequences. Some of his deviations, particularly from Balaram Das are as follows :

1. The poet just after the benedictory verses, has given the birth story of Ravana and his conquests.
2. The birth of Sita (Canto III) is described before the birth of Rama (Canto V)
3. The mention of Rama as Purnavatara (Canto VI, 46).
4. Jarata as the mediator in the marriage of Santa with Risyasringa, the Rishi.
5. The direction received by Viswamitra from a heavenly voice to bring Rama and Laxman to his hermitage.
6. The story of Ahalya.
7. The description of only the facial beauty of Sita by Vishwamitra.
8. The episode of the boatman.
9. Sita seeing Rama entering Mithila falls in love.
10. The conversation between Ravana and Sita.
11. The episode of Saptasala, and
12. The mention of Vajra Panjara Kavacha.

Besides these main deviations the poet's originality may also be seen in a number of other changes he brings in his kavya. That is, he always tries to give a new meaning, or a new interpretation to the traditional Rama story. An interesting example may be seen in the consultations among the ministers of king Dasaratha at the time of Rama's installation as Yuvaraja (Baidehisa Bilash, XVII, 1-5).

Sumantra the minister told the king that Rama would pay the debts of his ancestors by killing Ravana, the killer of Anaranya. Basistha and Ramadeva the other two ministers, consulted the horoscope of Rama. Bamadeva said that Rama would not be installed because of the planetary position of Vrihaspati. Basistha said that it would make him as honourable as 'Isvara'. (Basistha's use of the word 'Isvara' had the suggestion that Rama would lead a hermit's life). When Dasaratha intervened in their discussion and wanted to know its purport. Basistha said that Rama would enjoy 'Divyabhuti', conquer 'Bisravana' (i.e. Ravana), and mount 'Puspaka'. All these words were used by Basistha with double meaning. He meant by them that Rama would smear ashes on his body like Isvara, conquer Ravan and mount the chariot named Puspaka. But Dasaratha took them otherwise. He thought that Rama would be worshipped like god, possess wealth more than even Kuvera and put on armlets decked with gems.

Baidehisa Bilasa is among the most popular Kavyas of medieval Oriya literature. Despite its profuse use of words not current in the language, the varieties of difficult poetical rhetoric, and treatment of erotic scenes, its popularity continues undiminished, particularly among the rural people, primarily because of the musical quality of its chhandas and its use of puns.

BAIRAGI ALURI (Telugu, b. 1925, d. 1979) occupies a very high place among the modern Telugu poets. He was a humanist. His words were always charged with deep meaning. He believed that agony was a synonym for poetry. His poetry is thought–provoking and inspiring.

Bairagi hailed from Itanagram (Tenali Taluk Guntur

District). He was born in a middle class peasant family. He studied Telugu upto second standard only. His father encouraged him to study Hindi. Bairagi was equally proficient in Telugu as well as Hindi. He participated in Hindi Kavi Sammelan when he was only 15 years old. He learned English on his own. He studied the various trends of foreign languages through English. He understood the political humanism and was a member of the Political Democratic Party for some time.

Bairagi was a bachelor. He worked as a Hindi teacher, a sub- editor for a Hindi journal and a translator and tried his hand at many odd jobs.

Bairagi published his Hindi anthology Padayam in his early poetic career. Bairagi's first anthology of poetry in Telugu is Cheekati Needalu (The shades in darkness). Nootilo Gonthukalu (Voices singing out of empty cisterns) is his Magnum opus. Bairagi feels that there is a dark curtain between the fancy and reality, the precept and practice. He describes the horrible life of the poor. He believes that the riches are only the result of the sweat and blood of the people of the slums. He predicts that one day the anger in the eyes of the poor will grow into a typhoon and smash the forts and the multi-storeyed buildings of the rich.

Bairagi portrays the pitiable conditions of a prostitute in the poem 'Vesya' (Prostitute). The rolled-gold necklace and bangles, one anna flowers and a cheap 'pan' with hungry looks in her eyes make the prostitute an object of ridicule in the sham world.

One of Bairagi's best poem is 'Akali' (Hunger), where he likens hunger to an animal which scratches the sensitive and vital parts of human bodies. Hunger dampens the courage of man and makes the blood black. Hungry ears can not hear thunder. Hungry eyes cannot see the world. All the cultures, morals never satisfy the hungry people. The sound in the stomach of hungry people is like the roar of the sea.

Bairagi describes life as the missing link in a garland. His best poem in Cheekati Needalu is 'Tajmahal Padagotandoi' (Demolish the Tajmahal). He thinks that Tajmahal is an indignity heaped on the love of a poor man. He feels that Tajmahal is a symbol of forced human labour and an insult to the homeless poor. So he preaches the demolition of the Tajmahal brick by brick.

Bairagi represents the poor and warns the rich that "We will be the thorns, in your life's rose bush. We will be the bad dream in your sound sleep. We will pour our tears in your gold cup of sweet drinks. We will die as flies in your tea–cups. He makes the well settled people's hopes shatter and makes them realise that they will not be safe unless the poor have the requirements of life.

Bairagi feels that Death is the only certainty in life. He describes death as the germ in a flower. He portrays the clouds as the torn love-letters and moon–light as the passing solace. He describes the shades in night as the shades of time–past and those shades represent the down–trodden.

In Bairagi's Nootilo Gonthukalu' (Voices singing out of empty cisterns) he borrowed his title from T.S. Eliot's words 'And voices singing out of empty cisterns'.

These empty cisterns and exhausted wells could be the vacuous and vitiating sorroundings in which human individuals drag on their existence in contemporary society. The entire modern civilisation itself, of the West or of the East, could be seen as a waste land because of its futility and purposelessness, its sick hurry its perpetual motion without proper direction and its senseless activity without worthwhile action.

Bairagi describes the dilemma of modern man in Nootilo Gonthukalu. He takes well–known characters like Arjuna, Hamlet and Raskalnikov who found themselves perplexed at the moment of decision. He makes no secret of his sympathy for heroes who appear to be between the horns of dilemma in taking decisions because they are thoughtful and contemplative.

Bairagi dislikes literary critics. He thinks that a critic always spoils the beauty of the poem. That is why the poet explained his aim of Nootilo Gonthukalu in a brief introduction. The poem describes the human dilemma. Hamlet, Arjuna and Raskalnikov represent three types of human dilemma. The dilemma of Hamlet is before his action, the dilemma of Arjuna is before the war and the dilemma of Raskalnikov is after the action. Through the three dilemmas Bairagi portrays the dilemma of modern man. He thinks that man cannot achieve perfection with out agony and distress.

Bairagi feels that the poet can express perfectly only when he identifies himself with the suffering of the world. He feels that words always play hide and seek with the poet. Every poet experiences his inability while searching for the right word. The poet always misses the muse of poetry by a hair's breadth.

Bairagi feels that voices of the suffering sing melodiously like the candles cut in their end. He thinks that knowldege is a journey from the unknown to the unknown. He is terrible as he is humorous. He prays to God for giving the mane to the lion and ivory to the elephant. He requests God to listen to his prayers when he is not attending a matinee-show. Bairagi is an eternal optimist. He prays that:-

Grant me a grain of faith
And I will pulverise the hills
And throw out the tomato sun and the pancake moon
And make a clean sweep of the sky.
I will crush the universe in my arms
And wipe out the destiny of destitute man with a single strike of my pen. And neck out injustice and inequity from the mighty mansion of life. And a lot more I will do. But grant me a grain of faith.

Bairagi's other works Aagama Geeti (Future poem), Papa Poemdi (Baby is no more) and his Hindi writings also reveal his power. Bairagi never followed any literary movement, but he is an institution by himself. Many writers of present generation were influenced and inspired by his works. He was awarded the Sahitya Akademi Award posthumously in the year 1984.

BAIT (Punjabi) is an Arabic word, meaning a couplet of verses. It is used in Punjabi poetry in the work of Sultan Bahu entitled Abiyat (plural of bait). The term seems to have got extended to signify a stanza of four lines of a long metre. Most of the stanzas in Waris Shah's famous work, Hir, are composed of four such lines, the metrical length of which, according to the system is Persianarabic 'failan failab failab, failan failan failab failan'. According to the Pubjabi metrical system, the line consists of 40 varnas or aksharas, with a break in the middle. In some kissas of Hir, earlier than Waris Shah's also, the stanza structure is the same, especially in Mukbil's Hir, which seems to have been taken by Waris Shah as his model. Subsequently the term has been exclusively applied to this stanza form, in which the number of lines has been increased according to the taste and capacity of the poet as also in some way to the unit of meaning.

BAKHAR (Marathi) is a chronicle or record of historical events. It is a genre available in medieval Marathi literature. In the administrative lexicon, Rajya Vyavahara Kosha (17th century), it is defined as a tale or a narrative (Akhyayika Bakhar). The word is either a metathesis of an Arabic word 'Khabar' or a Persian word, both meaning 'the news, information or narration of past events'. Bakhar literature in Marathi is, thus, mainly a prose narration of the historical events of the past. It is the earliest work of its kind so far as historical and temporal writings in Marathi are concerned. Bakhars were an expression of the political and wordly aspirations of the Marathi speaking people between the 16th and 19th centuries.

Among the available works of this kind Mahikavatichi Bakhar is the first. It is part prose and part verse; it is a compilation of works of three different authors, Keshavacharya, Bhagwan and Datta during 15th and 16th centuries. Its prose section, written by Keshavacharya dates as far back as 1455. This is the first effort at evoking among the Marathi speaking people a spirit of unity and solidarity during the dark period of Bahamani rule. A claim by a noted historian V.K. Rajwade (1864-1926) that Shalivahanachi Bakhar, etc. are prior to this work, has not been substantiated by evidence.

The tradition of Bakhar writing really begins with the biography of Shivaji written at Fort Jinji in 1697 by a courtier of Shivaji, Krishnaji Anant Sabhasad by name. Next comes the 91 Kalmi Bakhar supposed to have been written by Shivaji's chronicler and recorder Dattaji Trimal Waknis. Its original manuscript is lost now and some scrappy extracts from it, made probably a generation later by Khando Annaji Malkare, between 1720 and 1740, have come down to us. This work is full of interpolations and interspersed with legends and supernatural elements. Sabhasad Bakhar therefore is still the most valuable but brief account of Shivaji's life. It was rendered into English, first by Jagannath Laxman Mankar in 1880. The Calcutta University published another translation in 1920 by a noted Bengali scholar Surendranath Sen. Mankar's was a free rendering, while Sen's appears to be quite faithful to the original.

No less than eleven other Bakhars, describing the life, work and achievements of Shivaji, written between 1697 and 1850 are available and they have served as useful source material for modern historians and biographers of Shivaji in the 20th century. Of these, the works other than Sabhasad are either adaptations or elaborate paraphrasings of Sabhasad's original biography. The last of them written in the 19th century, viz., the Chitnis Bakhar (1810) and Shivadigvijaya are much more elaborate and voluminious. Of these, the Shivadigvijaya published from Baroda in 1895 is full of fictional and imaginative accounts by some anonymous modern author. These later biographers offer a detailed geneological tree of the ancestors of Shivaji in the fashion of the writers of the Puranas. They trace his ancestry to the Solar dynasty, which is just an effort to glorify his noble lineage. Such efforts clearly show a tendency to model the writing on the lines of the Puranas. The Bakhar tradition has been merely factual.

In the introductory sentences of some of these works, the writers offer the customary excuse that their efforts have their origin in the request of a royal personage or patrons or friends. There are a few compositions which do not seem to have been written at any such explicit behest. A remarkable feature of these Bakhars is that their authors prefer to remain anonymous and hence efforts of scholars to ascertain the authorship of these Bakhars have yielded very little success.

Biographical Marathi Bakhar writing can broadly be divided into two classes. (1) Bakhars pertaining to the family of Shivaji i.e. the Chatrapatis and (2) Those relating to Peshavas and their lieutenants. They can be further classified into five divisions as follows:—

1. Biographical Bakhars dealing with the lives of such historical personages as Shivaji, Sambhaji, Rajaram, Shahu, Brahmendra Swami, Swami Ramdas, etc.

2. Autobiographical Bakhars by Nana Phadnis (1742-1800). Malhar Ganesh, Bapu Kanho, Gangadhar Shastri Patwardhan (1775-1815) etc.

3. Bakhars describing particular historical events viz. Bhausahebanchi Bakhar, Panipatachi Bakhar, Sashtichi Bakhar, Khardyachya Swarichi Bakhar, etc.

4. Histories of important families viz. Bhosal Vamsha-Charita, Holkaranchi Kaifiyat, Harivamshachi Bakhar, Peshavyanchi Bakhar, Nagpurkar Bhosalyanchi Bakhar, etc.

5. General: Skeleton chronologies known as Shakavalis, works relating to Maratha polity (Ajnyapatra, Rajaniti, etc) and traditional and mythological Bakhars such as Shri Samarthanchi Bakhar, Pandavachi Bakhar, Ramarajyachi Bakhar, etc.

About 200 Bakhar works have been printed so far. Some 50 of them possess excellent qualities. Innumerable minor works have remained and are likely to remain unpublished. If we set apart three or four Bakhars, (i.e., Sabhasad, 91 Kalmi and Ajnyapatra) all the remaining Bakhar literature appears to have been written in the Peshava period and particularly during the period 1760 and 1850.

Of the biographical Bakhars of the Chatrapatis, that of the chronicler Malhar Ramrao Chitnis (d. 1823) stands foremost. He was a great grandson of Shivaji's celebrated Chitnis–Balaji Avaji and was in the royal service of the last ruler of Satara. He has written seven Bakhars, six of them being biographies of Chatrapatis and the seventh one being a treatise on political diplomacy (Rajaniti). His biography of Shivaji is voluminous and divided into seven chapters. Chitnis claims that he has used many Sanskrit works and old State papers. In spite of this, his biographies remain mainly anecdotal. His detailed accounts of Shivaji's administrative system is valuable and bears the mark of authenticity. The historian, Grant Duff (1789-1858), was writing his History of the Maharattas (1820) at the same time as Malhar Ramrao was engaged in writing his Bakhars. Grant Duff had tried to procure State papers in Malhar Ramrao's custody, but in vain. A comparative study of these two contemporary chroniclers shows the difference in their attitudes, Grant Duff feels that Malhar Ramrao has not made good use of the valuable letters and records in his possession.

It is noteworthy that the Bakhar writers were conscious that they were treading in the footsteps of the ancient writers of Puranas. They consciously imitate their method of giving accounts of Vamsha (Dynasty) and Vamshanucharita (doings of those born in the dynasties). This explains the presence of a great deal of mythological and imaginary matter in the Bakhars. In keeping with the traditional definition of the Puranas, (viz., Pura navam bhavati, i.e., that which is old as well as new) they try to relate the contemporary times to the ages of the past.

Sabhasad, the first work, is the shortest and Shivdigvijaya, the last one is the most voluminous. It appears that the later chroniclers are expansive. Narration, devoid of chronology seems to have been their sole idea of writing history. They narrated what legends or facts they could compile from traditions, hearsay and available papers in their custody without much critical discrimination. V.K. Rajwade, subjected the Marathi Bakhars to a scathing criticism. He observes that they contain only a few grains of historical truth buried under a heavy mass of fictional matter. They must be interpreted carefully with the help of other historical evidence.

Bakhars written by contemporary writers have been honoured as valuable historical documents by modern historians as the main source of information from the Maratha side. Others have been discarded as unauthentic. Though from the point of view of political history, these Bakhars cannot be trusted, they are important to the students of cultural history of Maharashtra. As a source material for Maratha culture they are invaluable.

The style of these Bakhars shows the influence of Persian and Arabic. As is well known, there is a large deposit of words of Persian derivation in the Marathi language. Later chronicles have attempted to shake off that influence. The Sanskrit element became a dominant force in their style of writing.

Scot Waring, the first English Historian of Maratha History, admires the simplicity of style and the impartial attitude of Marathi chroniclers. He says "Their historians (some will deny them the name), write in plain, simple and unaffected style, content to relate passing events in opposite terms, without seeking turgid imagery or inflated pharaseology. No attempt is made to make the worse apepar the better reason. Victory and defeat are briefly related; if they pass over the latter too hastily, they do not dwell upon the former with unnecessary minuteness. They do not endeavour to bias or mislead the judgement". (History of the Marathas, Preface (1980)).

All the same, as works of history the Bakhars have a limited value; they are more significant as early masterpieces of Marathi prose. Bhausahebanchi Bakhar is notable for its high literary qualities. It is unmatched in its style, characterisation and depth of understanding of the working of the human mind. Similarly The Shivadigvijaya and several works by Malhar Ramrao are noteworthy for their descriptive details. Works describing the family histories such as Holkaranchi Kaifiyat, Harivamshachi Bakhar, and Peshava Bakhar, etc. are well known for their high literary qualities. They are marked by spectacular portrayals of panorama of historical events in the Holkar, Patwardhan and Peshava families respectively. Ajnyapatra by Ramachandrapant Amatya shows his deep knowledge of Hindu polity as well as his first-hand knowledge of Shivaji's administration. The autobiography by Nana Phadnis which can be said to be the first of its kind in Marathi is notable as much for its free and frank discussion of his early life as for its highly stylised prose.

Though written primarily as records and chronicles the Bakhars evolve unconsciously into creative works. They present a variety of characters with different attitudes, emotions and feelings. Bakhar literature is thus the expression of the thoughts and feelings, ideas and aspirations, realities and problems which are brought to the surface by the contradictions implicit in the life of Maharashtra in the Maratha period. Apart from their closeness to the social situation they are distinguished by the profound sincerity evinced by the chroniclers. This imparts to their work a high degree of candour, elegance and expressivensess. Thus Bhakhars exhibit qualities inherent in all forms of literary expression, they have form, structure and a purpose. It is in the Bakhars that we find the beginnings of that nostalgia which often manifests itself in literature as a glorification of the Marathi way of life.

However attractive may be the fictional and other literary qualities of these writings, one should guard against treating the Bakhars as perfect art form. They cannot be accepted either as real literature or as true history, they form an independent genre, a combination of history and literature.

Among the scholars who have done eminent service in the editing and rehabilitation of these works, Kashinath Narayan Sane (1851-1927) stands foremost. He collected many manuscripts from different places, went through the Modi scripts and published highly valuable variorum editions of the different recensions of the texts, together with introductions and copious explanatory notes. His scrupulous fidelity to the original texts marks the beginning of textual criticism in Marathi. D.B. Parasnis, V.K. Rajwade, Vasudeoshastri Khare, S.N. Joshi, V.S. Vakaskar, G.H. Khare and others have edited some important Bakhars from the original manuscripts. Critical editions published by R.V. Herwadkar, B.B. Kulkarni among others mark the third generations of students of the Bakhar iiterature.

BAKSHI, CHANDRAKANT KESHAVLAL (Gujarati, b.1932) is a novelist, short-story writer, playwright, scholar and essayist. He was born at Palanpur (Banaskantha). He passed his B.A. Examination with distinction from St. Zavier's College, Calcutta, followed by the degrees of M.A. and LL.B. He conducted business activities and looked after his cloth-shop in Calcutta for 12 years. In 1969 he came to Bombay for settling there permanently. He joined Mithibai College, Bombay,in 1970 as Professor of History and Political Science and retired in 1982 when he was a Principal.

His novels have won great popularity. Of these mention may be made of Padgha Doobi Gaya (1957), Roma (1959), Ekaltana Kinara (1959), Aakar (1963), Ek Ane Ek (1965), Paralysis (1967), Jatak Katha (1969), Honeymoon (1971), Ayanvrutta (1972), Atitvan (1973), Lagnani Aagli Rate (1973), Zindani (1974), Surkhab (1974), Aakashe Kahyun (1975), Reef Marina (1976), Disha-Tarang (1978), Baaki Raat (1979), Hun Konarak Shah and Lili Nasoman Pankhar. Vivid narration of events and excellent mode of expression happen to be creditable aspects of Bakshi's writing. He has been careful enough in maintaining the literary merit of his works, and has succeeded in becoming a popular novelist. Especially his novels Aakar, Paralysis and Jatak Katha are known for their literary quality.

He has also been successful to a great extent, in giving expression to the impact of Existentialism on him. The world of his characters suffering from frustration and despair, and yet striving to exist, is interesting. He has also written historical novels like Atitvan and Ayanvritta. Some of his novels have been translated into Hindi, Marathi and other languages as well.

His short stories are collected in various books, such as Pyar (1958), Ek Sanjni Mulakat (1961), Mira (1965), Mashal (1968), Kramashah (1971), Bakshini Ketlik Vartao (1972) and Paschim (1976). Some of his short-stories depict complexities of urban life, atmosphere of battlefield, etc. His story titled 'Kutti' had given rise to a great controversy.

His plays are collected in volumes like Parajay (1976) and*Juthika* (1977). These plays have become popular on account of their dialogues and description of conflict.

Ketlik American Vartao (1972) and Aajni Soviet Vartao (1977) contain stories of respective countries translated into Gujarati by him. Based on similar lines, there is yet another volume, titled Yatrano Ant. All these speak highly in favour of his art as a translator.

Bakshi seems to have cultivated special aptitude for history and culture. He has produced a good number of books on this topic, analysing the societies and civilizations of different countries, in simple and lucid style. Such books are Mesopotamiani Sanskriti (1972), Greeceni Sanskruti (1973), Cheen-ni Sanskriti (1974); Yahudi Sanskriti (1975), Egyptni Sanskriti (1976), Roman Sanskriti (1971) and Mahajati Gujarati (1982). Gujre the Hum Jahan-se (1981) is a sensitive study of his tour to Pakistan. His style of presentation is admirable and effective.

His articles are collected in various volumes, such as Abhang (1976), Tawarikh (1977) and Picnic (1982). These compilations have a specific value of their own, owing to his fearless responses to current events and trends in literature, as also literature in general.

In the context of modern literature, Bakshi has ever remained an experimenter and modernist writer, and yet he has been effective and popular. His position is reckoned very high among the most widely read of Gujarati writers.

BAKSHI, PADUMLAL PUNNALAL (Hindi; b.1894), born in the former Khairagarh state, inherited his love for literature from his father and grandfather. He started his literary career as a poet. He is one of the important litterateurs of the Dwivedi era. He contributed romantic poems between 1916 to 1925 to many contemporary journals. Later he published his first collection of poems titled Shatdal (Lotus flower).

Bakshi was an essayist and a critic of repute. In his first two works of criticism–Vishva Sahitya (world literature) and Hindi Sahitya Vimarsh (Reflections on Hindi literature)–he made a comparative study of the basics of Hindi and Western literature. As an essayist Bakshi is an elegant and unique stylist. He wrote essays on a variety of subjects including religion, culture and society. He rendered valuable services in the sphere of Hindi Journalism. Acharya Dwivedi offered him the editing work of Saraswati. For nearly seven years (1920-1927), Bakshi edited the magazine with distinction. He also remained the editor of Chhaya, a magazine published from Allahabad. His travel-book Yatri has an enchanting description of the 'eternal journey'.

FURTHER WORKS : Hindi Kahani Sahitya (Short-story in Hindi); Hindi Upanyas Sahitya (Novel in Hindi); Collection of Essays:– Panch Patra, Padam Van (The Lotus Forest), Kuchh, Aur Kuchh and Yatri. Yatri.

BAKSHI, RAMAPRASAD PREMASANKAR (Gujarati ; b. 1894) is a Gujarati literary critic and a scholar of Sanskrit language and literature. After obtaining his school education from Rajkot in 1914 he graduated from the Gujarat College, Ahmedabad. Thereafter he joined Anandilal Poddar High School as a teacher and retired from the principalship of the same school after a prolonged service. He also served Mithibai College, Bombay, as honorary professor of Gujarati for some years. He is also connected with other educational institutions in various capacities. He was the president of the 28th session of the Gujarati Sahitya Parashad. A keen student of both Sanskrit and English literatures, Bakshi is a representative of the period known in the history of Gujarati literature as 'Panditayuga'. At the same time he greatly sympathises with the latest trends, works, and authors that have emerged on the literary scene of Gujarat.

During his long career Bakshi has written extensively, but not all his writings have been so far collected into book form. But whatever has been so far published bears the testimony of his erudite scholarship. His works Natyarasa (1959) and Karunarasa (1963) deal with the Indian dramatic theories. In the first work he discusses at length different theories of 'rasa', tries to evaluate them in the light of the western thought and points out their significance and relevance to the present day drama and literature. The second work deals with the Greak concept of tragedy and the concept of 'Karunarasa' as propounded by the Indian aestheticians. He has also discussed in this work the causes and reasons for the lack of tragic plays in the Sanskrit literature.

His critical essays and articles have been collected in Vanmayavimarsa (Ist edn. 1963, 2nd edn. 1970). This includes scholarly articles on Sanskrit and Western poetics, analytical studies of literary terms and concepts, and indepth reviews of some literary works, movements and forms. In Govardhanaramanum Manorajya (1976) he has collected his articles on the life, works and philosophy of Govardhanarama Madhavarama-Tripathi. These articles display his keen observation, clear understanding of the complex literary structures and patterns and command over expression. Till date, many of his critical articles remain unpublished. From amongst such articles mention may be made of his articles on and reviews of poetic works of Umashankar Joshi, Manisankara Rathaji Bhatta, 'Kanta', and Tribhuvanadasa Luhana, 'Sundaram'.

Bakshi's Gujarati translation of Gujarati Language and Literature by Narasimharava Divetiya, Gujarati Bhasha-ane-Sahitya, vols. 1-2 was published during 1936-1957. He has also edited the original English version of the scrap books of Govardhanarama Madhavarama Tripathi and subsequently translated the same into Gujarati. Similarly he has edited diaries of Narasimharava Divetiya which were published in 1953 under the title Narasimharavanirojanisi. He also has to his credit a book Kathasarita (1977) based on the Kathasaritsagara and Gujarati translation of the Sikh religious work, Sukhamani (1935).

BAKSHI, RAMESH (Hindi; b. 1936) is a Hindi novelist and short-story writer. His writings are marked by his protest against traditional norms and values. His novels and stories express, invariably, the futility of family relations. He feels that the institution of marriage has outlived its utility and pleads for new sexual mores. He ruthlessly exposes middle class morality.

The hero or anti-hero of his novels is an individual who is free from the compulsions of society or social commitment. His first two novels Ham Tinke (1963) and Ghisa Hua Chehra (1963) went unnoticed. They tended towards moral writings. His later novels attracted notice : Kisse Upar Kissa (1964) for its bold and experimental treatment, Atharah Suraj Ke Paudhe (1965) and Baishakhiyon Wali Imarat (1966) for their anti-tradition and anti-family stance, Chalta Hua Lava (1969), and Khule Aam (1975) for their attempt to liberate and the accompanying agony, representing mature attempts at novel writing.

The thematic motives of his stories are identical with those of his novels. The themes are repetitive. His short story collections are : Mez Par Tiki Kuhaniyan (1963), Duhari Zindagi (1964), Katati Hui Zameen (1966), Ek Amurta Taklif (1972), Pita Dar Pita (1973), and Meri Priya Kahaniyan (1976).

His other writings include plays, like Devayani Ka Kahana Hai (1971) and Teesara Hathi (1973).

BAKULESH (Gujarati ; b. 1910, d. 1957) is the pen name of Ramji Arjun Gajkandh. This writer of short stories was born in a Kutchhi family. He attained name and fame as a writer of stories for the lowly and the lost. Much of his writing was left-oriented. It was written in a style which was different from others. It was poetic and at the same time down to earth. That style and method pioneered a new style of writings stories. He died comparatively at a very young age. He had worked as a journalist both for films as well as newspapers. Recently a collection of his short stories has been published under the title Bakuleshni Vartso. His other works are Kharan Pani (Salty Waters) and Kadavnan Kanku (The Vermillion growing out of Mud).

BALA NANDAKISORA (Oriya, b. 1875, d. 1928) was a well-known Oriya poet. Born in a middle-class family he received his B.A. from Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, and served as a teacher and later as an Inspector of Schools. He is one of the chief figures of the renaissance in Oriya literature in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Bala is famous for his lyrical poetry which depicts his love for the Orissa countryside, its scenic beauty and the life of its people. He is rightly called the 'pallikavi' or the poet of the countryside in Oriya literature.

His first collection of lyrics, Pallichitra (Pictures of the countryside, 1896) is divided into three sections, the first describing the different socio-cultural institutions of the Orissa village like temple, school, fair and cremation ground. The second depicts the scenery of the countryside through the six seasons, and the third presents a picture of social life in the village. Realism is the hallmark of these lyrics. In a few pieces like 'Grishma' 'Barsha' and 'Gremakhala' the poet with a penetrative insight, is able to capture the very spirit of rural Orissa. One serious defect with most of these lyrics, however, is their total dependence on raw facts. Imagination seems to have played no role in their making. As such they become quite faithful pictures but not poetry. The other disconcerting feature is their didacticism from which Bala could never free his art. His second collection, Nirjharini (The stream, 1900) contains such popoular pieces as 'Nababarsha Bhabana' 'Barshamangala' and 'Kakabarata'. One of the most interesting features of these poems is the use of Oriya folk songs and proverbs not only as a structural device but for reanimating personal experience and raising it to almost a mythic level. Of the 16 poems in the collection 'Ke' is perhaps the best for its compact structure, its philosophical insight and its fusion of thought and feeling.

Other poems in the lyrical mode have been published in eight collections: Basanta Kokila (The Cuckoo in Spring, 1901), Charu Chitra (Beautiful pictures, 1902), Nirmalya (The sanctified rice 1903), Janmabhumi, (Motherland, 1903), Nanabaya Gita (Lullabies, 1915), Tarangini (The river, 1926), Prabhata Sangita (Morning song, 1928) and Sandhya Sangita (Evening song, 1928). Basanta Kokila contains lyrics dealing mostly with the bliss of conjugal love. 'Madhusajya' captures well the dramatic quality of his experience on the very first night of his conjugal life. Bala's love lyrics including those in Tarangini are characterised by an excess of idealism which raises doubts about its sincerity. This weakness is more pronounced in Charu Chitra, Janmabhumi and Nirmalya which contain patriotic poems as well as pieces depicting the poet's zeal for social reform. His reflections on God in Nirmalya are immature, stereotyped and dull. But Nanabaya Gita occupies a unique place in children's literature in Oriya. These lyrics are noted for their consummate artistry, expression of parental love and for their evocation of the highly imaginative and creative world of children. The Oriya lullaby, from which these poems borrow their form, diction, and rhythm, undergoes an imaginative reinterpretation in the hands of the poet. The last two collections, however, have very little to offer. They repeat the themes and style of earlier lyrics and reveal his poetic talents as already on the decline.

The three narrative poems are clearly didactic in their tone and temper. Sita Banabasa (Sita's life in exile, 1901) narrates the story of Sita since her banishment by Rama till her disappearance into the womb of the earth. Krishnakumari (1901) deals with the historical character of a Rajput princess of Mewar, and Sarmihtha (1901) depicts the suffering and the sacrifice of the daughter of Brishaparba in the Mahabharata. Bala's talents were ill-suited to the needs of the narrative. He however succeeds in emphasizing the values he respected through the characterisation of the three women.

Bala's prose works include nine essays, five pieces of literary criticism, two fictional exercises, a short story 'Lakshmi' and a novel called Kanaklata (1913). He fares better in his appreciation of the merits and defects of his contemporaries like Radhanatha, Fakiramohana and Madhusudana, than in his reflections on society in the essays which have neither formal coherence nor an analytical style. The short story records its author's protest against the dowry system. The first part of Kanaklata was published in 1913 followed by the second, twelve years later. The novel deals with two problems of contemporary society–the dowry system and the widow marriage.

BALAKA (Bengali) is a collection of 45 poems, written between May 1914 and May 1916 and published in 1916. English translations of almost all the poems are compiled in Fruit-gathering, Lover's Gift, Crossing and The Fugitive.

Balaka (the flight of swans) is the first and major collection of poems of Rabindranath's post-Nobel prize period. The Gitanjali-strain is perceptible in a few poems, but a totally different note is discernible in all the rest. Rabindranath at 53 felt himself rejuvenated. Balaka begins with and ends in invocations to eternal youth of mankind. The First World War broke out in September 1914. Poem 37 (The Oarsmen) is Rabindranath's most significant war-poem.

Exquisitely beautiful poems of the collection are 6,7,8 and 36. Krishna Kripalani, Rabindranath's biographer in English, says that poem 6 (The Picture) is addressed to 'the beloved angel of the poet's life, the deceased sister-in-law, Kadambari.' 'Are you a mere picture?' asks the poet at the sight of her photograph. 'No' is the answer; 'If you are not before my eyes, it is because you are the very light that shines in them,.....No one knows, not even I–that you are the music in my songs, the poet within the poet.' (Tr. Kripalani). Poem 7 addressed to Shah Jahan, the builder of the immortal Taj Mahal, reveals Rabindranath's outlook on human life. Man is an artist, a lover, but his soul is a tireless traveller from one life to another.

The poet's cosmic vision of the universe is expressed in poems 8 and 36. Translated as 'The Fugitive', poem 8 is based on the imagery of the river. 'Darkly you sweep on, Eternal Fugitive, round whose bodiless rush, stagnant space frets into eddying bubbles of light.' The name of the collection is derived from the poem 36. One evening he saw a flock of swans winging their way to unknown destination. This flight symbolized for him the fundamental truth that the universe is always in motion and ceaselessly changing towards perfection. These sublime lyrics have found appropriate rhythm in uneven run-on lines of rhymed metrical composition.

BALAKRISHNA PANICKER, V.C. (Malayalam; b. 1889 d.1915) was a pioneer of the Romantic movement in poetry. Born in poor circumstances, he could not undergo any formal education, but acquired some knowledge of Sanksrit under the scholar-poet, Ettan Thampuran of Patinjare Kovilakam. At 14, he composed Manavikramiyam, a treatise in verse on Alankarasastra and dedicated it to his guru. Journalism, though not covetable in those days, was the profession he chose and in 1905, at the age of 16, he became the editor of Keralachintamani, a tri-monthly published from Trichur. After three years, he shifted to Calicut to edit the weekly Malabari and soon after to Cochin to be in charge of the weekly Chakravarti. He died of tuberculosis at the very young age of 26. As editor, he fearlessly fought against the vagaries of bureaucracy with a sharp and powerful pen.

His fame rests mainly on his poetic contributions. He wrote altogether 17 books, which included kavyas such as Naganandam, Minakshi, Samrajyagita and Mankigita, stotras such as Durgashtakam and Devistavam and dramas such as Kumaracharitram and Indumatiswayamvaram. Most of these follow the conventional, neo-classic patterns of style and composition; but two works stand apart, Oru Vilapam (A Lament) and Vishvarupam (The cosmic form). In these two short works, the first of 27 stanzas and the second of 56 stanzas, the poet sharply departs from his own earlier style and also from the prevailing norms of poetic composition. In Oru Vilapam, written while he was just nineteen, he identifies himself with a young man who laments over the death of his sweetheart; the deft handling of pathos on the one hand and the philosophic broodings on life and death on the other make this poem a classic in Malayalam poetry and is considered to be a pioneering work in Romanticism. The majesty and grandeur of the cosmic form kindles in the mind of the poet awe and wonder and the confrontation with the inscrutable mystery of creation makes him thoughtful. All these find expression in Vishvarupam, which is noted for its fine imagery and chaste diction.

BALAKRISHNA PILLAI, A. (Malayalam ; b.1889, d. 1960) was a well known thinker, researcher, journalist and literary critic. His father was Damodaran Kartha, a scholar of some repute, and mother Parvathi Amma. He had his primary education in Trivandrum and Quilon. He took his B.A. in history from the Maharaja's College, Trivandrum with distinction. Immediately after passing out from the college in 1909, he started his career as a teacher in the Women's College, Trivandrum. For some time he served the Maharaja's College also. While he was working in the Women's College, he studied law and took his B.L. degree. In 1917 he resigned from the Women's college and started his practice as a lawyer in Trivandrum. But he was not a successful lawyer and so in 1922, he switched over to the profession of a journalist and took charge as the editor of the Samadarsi, a weekly. In journalism he felt at home. Immediately after taking charge of Samadarsi, he began to issue three numbers in a week. This was a great success.

He was free and fearless in his approach to social, political and literary problems. He fought for the freedom of the press which was under cruel restrictions in Travancore at that time. He criticised the rulers mercilessly for their lapses, in the columns of his journal. The Manager of Samadarsi could not tolerate the progressive ideas of Balakrishnan Pillai for long. He expressed his unhappiness over this and consequently Balakrishna resigned in 1925.

He undertook an extensive tour in and out of India and collected a fund for starting a journal of his own. Thus the Prabodhakan, a weekly published every Wednesday, was started in June 1930. It contained articles on politics, art and literature. The political opinions expressed in the journal were against the ruling group in Travancore. So the Government cancelled its registration in September 1930. Without getting dispirited, he immediately started publishing another journal Kesàri, the first issue of which came out on September 30, 1930. The very first article in Kesari was a powerful argument for the freedom of the press and democrary. Thenceforward his was a relentless war against the despotic rule of the rulers of Travancore. In 1935, the government cancelled the licence of the Kesari also and the press in which it was printed was confiscated. This ended his career in Trivandrum and the rest of his life was spent at Paravoor.

He was a polyglot, knowing a number of European languages too. He was a scholar in French and German. He was an inspiration to progressive movements in Kerala, and supported students' movements, leftist ideology in the national front and all progressive ideas in literature and society. He was the first to introduce French and German literary ideas in Malayalam.

He advocated the use of other disciplines like sociology and psychology in literary criticism. His introductions to the poems of poets like Changampuzha Krishna Pillai and G. Sankara Kurup remain as guidelines for literay critics in Kerala. He translated many works from European languages. His original works include Navalokam, Sankethika Nirupanangal Sahitya Nirupanangal and Rupamanjari.

BALAKRISHNAN NAIR, CHIRAKKAL. T. (Malayalam; b. 1907, d. 1977) was a scholar, writer, musicologist and folklorist. His research work on Cherusseri and the folk-lore of Malabar area made him a memorable literary figure.

His father was Ramavarma Valia Raja of Chirakkal Palace and mother Kalyanikutty Valiakettilamma. He had his education in the local schools and the Presidency and Loyola Colleges. Madras. After taking his B.A. degree from the University he could not continue his studies because the freedom struggle including the Home Rule and the Quit India Movement gave him little time for anything else. Closely associated with Annie Besant, Rajendra Prasad and Jayaprakash Narayan, he was jailed for a term and on being released in 1945, he devoted his attention mainly to the building up of the Indian Socialist Party in Kerala.

Though born in a princely family Balakrishnan Nair was never well off. He attended teacher's training course when he was 41 and took his B.T. degree to become a teacher in Chirakkal Rajah's High School, an institution established by his father.

He concentrated his attention on the study of folklore subsequent to his retirement from active politics. He was the most wanted speaker in literary gatherings. He collected hundreds of folk songs hitherto unpublished and recited them before literary gatherings in his melodious voice. Most of these songs were later published by Kerala Sahitya Akademi in book form, under the title Kerala Bhasha Ganangal. His research in medieval Malayalam literature led him to unearth Cherussery Bharatam, a hitherto unknown work probably of Cherussery, the author of the celebrated Krishna Gatha. This was also published by the Kerala Sahitya Akademi. His indepth study of Cherusseri and his life is seen in the scholarly introduction to the book.

He was active in the Teacher's movement of the time and became the President of Private School Teachers' Association of Kerala in 1968. He was also a member of the Kerala Sangita Nataka Akademi, a member of the Executive Board of Samastha Kerala Sahitya Parishat (1938) and a member of the Editorial Board of Parishat Masika.

His main works include: Cherussery Bharatam (ed. 1974), Kerala Bhasha Ganangal (1979) Thiranjedutta

Prabandhangal (Selected Essays, 1981), Kerala Varma Ramayanam (ed.)

P.

BALAKRISHNAN, P.K. (Malayalam; b, 1927) had a brilliant academic career. He had a first rank in the S.S.L.C. Examination of Cochin princely state and bagged the Gold Medal for that distinction. While a college student he participated in the Quit India Movement and was jailed and he had to discontinue his studies. On being released he plunged into the struggle for freedom and became an ardent socialist worker. For a long time he was a journalist, editing first the Dinaprabha and then the Kerala Kaumudi. His works include Chantu Menon-Oru Padhanam, Kavyakala Kumaran Asaniloode, Siddhiyum Sadhanayum, Tippu Sultan, Pluto Priyapetta Pluto, Sri Narayana Guru and Ini Jnan Urangatte. The last is a novel based on the Mahabharata with Karna as the central figure and it won him the Vayalar Sahitya Award. His later books on Ezhuttacchan, the patriarch of Malayalam poetry, and on Kerala history reveal a difference in his style and approach and the originality of his analytic method.

BALAMANI AMMA, NALAPPAD (Malayalam; b. 1909) is a noted poetess. She is a niece of the poet Nalappat Narayana Menon. She had no formal education but learnt English and Sankrit at home. She took to writing poetry at a young age. Married at the age of 19 to V.M. Nair, she was at Calcutta for a long time. Kamala Das, the Indo-Anglian poetess, is her daughter. Her first collection of poems, Kuppukai, came out in 1930. Some of her 15 collections of poems are Amma, Kutumbini, Strihridayam, Bhavanayil, Prabhankuram, Kalikotta, Muttassi, Lokaantharangalil, Mazhuvinte Katha and Sopanam. Muttassi won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1965. She deals mainly with the intimate world of women, the woman's varied roles as wife, mother, and grand mother. The home is the temple that gives her joy much holier than that given by the temple of the Gods; and the child symbolises her yearning for the divine; her role as mother, she realises, will have its total fulfilment only when she becomes not merely the mother of her own little child but of the whole world. This approach endows her poetry with rich philosophic dimensions, with no loss of its essential intimacy and emotional fervour. And at a later stage, she transcends the limits of the woman's world to deal squarely with the deeper questions of repentance and retribution, of quest and self-realisation, in some of her long narrative poems on puranic characters like Parasurama and Viswamitra, composed in the form of dramatic monologues.

BALAN, PUNALUR (Malayalam; b. 1928) holds post-graduate degrees in Malayalam and Education and is working as Asstt. Director in the State Institute of Languages, Trivandrum.

He started writing poetry quite early in his life. His first collection Tudikkunna Taalukal was published before he left school. His other works include Raman Raghavan, Kottayile Pattu, Mritasanjeevini and Aram—all collections of poems. Kottayile Pattu won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award for 1975. He has compiled and edited an anthology of poems entitled Kalaghattathinte Kavitakal (The poems of the Age). Balan is a poet who raised his voice against social injustice and heralded a new revolution. His revolutionary zeal remains undaunted though his poetic art has mellowed and matured. His lyrics and narrative poems bear the stamp of traditional ballads. His cartoon poems are coloured with the sharp hues of social criticism.

BALARAMADAS (Bengali) In the mediaeval Bengali Vaishnava literature as many as 19 poets by the name of Balaramadas are to be found. Of these five deserve special mention as composers of lyrics. All of them belong to the post–Chaitanya era.

(i) Mention may be made first, of Balarmadas of the Dogachia village in the Burdwan District in West Bengal. He was a devotee and follower of Nityanandaprabhu. Probably it was this Balaramadas to whom the Bengali lyrics of high quality can be attributed.

(ii) The second Balaramadas lived in the Telia-Budhri village in the Murshidabad District in West Bengal. He was a disciple of Ramchandra Kaviraj, himself a famous composer of vaishnava lyrics and the elder brother of Govindadas Kaviraj, the celebrated vaishanva lyricist. Perhaps it was this Balarmadas who composed the ornate Brajabuli lyrics.

(iii) The third Balaramadas belonged to the Srikhanda Village of Burdwan. He was born in 1537 to Atmaramdas and Soudamini Devi. He received his religious initiation from Jahnavi Devi, the wife of Nityananda prabhu and it was she who gave him the name of Balaramadas. He authored Premavilas, a vaishnava biography in verse, and it is for this reason that he is presumed to be the composer of some other vaishnava lyrics.

(iv) The fourth Balarmadas was the author of Krishnalilamrita, a narrative verse, composed under the 'bhanita' (poetic signature) of 'Deena Balarama'. It is possible that some Bengali lyrics of ordinary merit were composed by him.

(v) As the fifth Balarama wrote some vaishnava verses under the 'bhanita' of 'Basu Balarama' he can be presumed to be a poet other than the Balaramadas as mentioned above.

Many of the distinguished vaishnava scholars are of the opinion that it was the first Balaramadas who composed the best of Bengali lyrics expressing beautifully the 'Vatsalya' (parental affection), 'Sakhya' (Friendly compainonship) and 'Madhura' (divine love) rasas. He was born in the middle of the 16th century when Sri Chaitanyadeva had already passed away. He was born in a respectable Pashchatya Vaidic family. After his religious initiation from Nityanandaprabhu he left his ancestral home at Shrihatta and settled at Dogachia. The temple founded by him and the idol of Balagopal installed therein can still be seen in that village. The sacred turban given to him by Nityanandaprabhu is also preserved there. Various vaishnava biographers referred to him with great reverence. Balaramadas was a devotee of Balagopal though he was a family man. He married at the insistence of his preceptor Nityanandaprabhu and had five sons.

Balaramadas was a poet of considerable distinction and he earned for himself a niche in the temple of fame alongside Vidyapati, Chandidas, Gobindadas and Jnanadas, the four major vaishnava poets. His renderings of 'purvaraga' and 'anuraga', 'abhisara','sambhoga', 'vasakasajja', 'khandita' and 'mathur' padas on Radha-Krishnalila are commonplace and stereotyped. But his lyrics with the leitmotiv of 'vatsalya' (parental affection) and 'sakhya' (friendly companionship), particularly in the 'gostha' (the pastoral activities of Krishna, Balarama and their friends) category are exquisitely beautiful. "Balaram's best poems include", according to Sukumar Sen, "songs describing the mother Yashoda's anxious love for Child-Gopala (Krishna)". They are really matchless in poetic excellence. His padas on 'Nauka-vilas' (love-play of Radha and Krishna during pleasure trips on a boat) and 'Danakhanda' (tax-collection episode of Krishna) are also charming. Simplicity and sincerity are the hallmarks of Balaramadas's compositions. He was very deft in creating poetic imageries which were very touching. His padas on 'Nityananda-Vandana' (homage to Nityananada) bear the stamp of an eye-witness's depictions and intimacy. In his padas on Gourangadeva he revealed many hitherto unknown facts and events of the life of Chaitanya. It was Balaramadas who pioneered the allegorical padas relating to 'Hat-pattana' (an account in which vaishnava qualities were being marketed by Nityananda and others) episodes of vaishnava literature.

The Brajabuli padas under the 'bhanita' of Balaramadas are rich in ornamentation but lack poetic tenderness. His padas on 'sringararasa' (amorous love of Radha and Krishna) are marked by amazing simplicity and purity.

The 'Dehatattva-padavali' (the realisation of the transitoriness of human body) under the signature of Balaramadas are dull. It is often conjectured that they were composed by some other poet.

BALCHANAMA (Hindi) is one of Nagarjuna's major novels published in 1952. Among the progressive fiction writers, Nagarjuna stands out as one who has a deep understanding of the realities of rural life. He is deeply attached to the soil of Mithila. In Balchanama, as also in Baba Batesarnath, this relationship is most touchingly discernible. Thus Balchanama is rightly considered as a novel signifying the local colour in all its richness and variety.

Balchanama is a farmer like Hori of Godan but unlike the latter, who is subject to dejection, fatalism and pessimism, he struggles untiringly for what he thinks to be his rights. His revolt fails because the forces he has to content with were stronger and he dies in harness. If Hori symbolises the disintegration of peasantry, Balchanama signifies its reorganisation. Hori loses his piece of land, while Balchanama fights to regain it.Nagarjuna uses the peasant unity as a means to highlight the collective revolutionary consciousness. In him the social realism of Premchand becomes 'socialistic realism'.

The rebel in Balchanama rose from his personal and social conditions. The first incident in his early life that had left an indelible mark on him was that for plucking Kisun bhog his father was so cruelly beaten up by his master that his thigh, back and arm bore permanent scars. He is made to graze buffalo when he is yet a child. He is also required to do various domestic chores which included pressing the legs of the master's wife. He is fed upon abuses, humiliation and insult as he grows and discovers to his dismay that the younger of his masters has an eye on his land and the middle one has developed an infatuation for his sister. When he appeals to Phul Babu for help he expresses his inability to come to his rescue as he thinks it is a matter between the farmer and the landlord.

Balchanama's sufferings help Nagarjuna to re-capture the realism of his age and project Balchanama as the symbol of peoples' revolution against the feudal and capitalist system. Balchanama knows who his real enemy is, who the people that have oppressed him are, and where he has to fight them. He consciousness about revolution and militancy is born out of adverse circumstances. He is greatly embittered when he sees the landlord's cruelty, dissolute life, inhuman treatment meted out to the farmers and their appalling exploitation at the hands of the landlord. When the landlord invokes God and attributes every thing to Him, Balchanama reflects, "Well, every thing that happens is ordained by God. If my father died leaving behind four souls, is it also God's act. My grandmother satisfies her hunger my swallowing the powder of Guthli, this is also God's doing". And on the other hand, God almighty bestows on our masters all kinds of luxuries. Still they want a small field of ours to be added to their orchard when all we grieve for is a handful of grains to fill our belly with. How beneficient God almighty is!"

The tragic and painful experiences of life give him the strength to identify the enemy and fight against the anti-social and re-actionary forces. He is thoroughly disillusioned. While distributing the amount of relief fund Phool Babu enters the sum of Rs. 525 each against the names of 20 persons whereas the amount disbursed comes to Rs. 206 only. Kunti tells Balchanama, 'they are so tyrannical, son! They enter ten on paper and give just 2! Patently dishonest!"

Nagarjuna understood the role of the peasantry in the struggle for freedom and socio-economic change. The focal point of his novel Balchanama is the life of the peasantry. Minor incidents in Balchanama's life have helped the writer to bring out the facts of the hero's struggle for existence based on class consciousness.

Nagarjuna has used the common man's language in Balchanama. Nevertheless his idiom is creative and has the innate power of Maithili. Its structural beauty lies in the spoken idiom and the manner of speech. Nagarjuna has fully and cleverly exploited the local resources.

BAL-E-JIBRIL (Urdu) (Gabriel's wing), often acknowledged as Allama Iqbal's best in Urdu, Bal-e-Jibril appeared in 1935. It contains Rubaiyat (Quatrains), Qitaas, Ghazals and poems. As Iqbal had devoted himself almost exclusively to Persian poetry for a long time, his return to Urdu verse, with this monumental work was enthusiastically acclaimed by the Urdu speaking world throughout the length and breadth of the sub-continent. Many critics of his time, as also those who came later, regard this collection as touching the zenith of poetry in Urdu. The book touches several topics which Iqbal had already dealt with in his Persian poetry.

Among the great pieces (there are many) of poetry contained in this collection are the famous poems : Jibril-o-Iblis (Gabriel and Satan), Lenin Khuda ke Hazur Mein (Lenin in the Court of God), Punjab ke Dehqan Se (To the Punjab Peasant), Tartari ka Khuwab (The Tartar's dream), Masjid-e-Qurtaba (The Mosque of Cordoba), Pir-o-Murid (Master and Disciple), Falsafa-e-Mazhab (The Philosophy of Religion), Javed ke Naam (To Javed) and Saqi Nama. Iqbal's veering round towards socialism may remain debatable, yet the fact remains that Bal-e-Jibril does have mention of Lenin, and Marxist-like ideas here and there.

The Rubaiyat, Qitaas and Ghazals contained in this volume are equally significant and thought-provoking. He seeks to create in his countrymen the much needed self confidence and self respect and while he does not show any disrespect for the West, he warns Indians against getting bewitched by the western institutions and culture.

The sum total of the message of Bal-e-Jibril shows Iqbal as a poet of mankind rising above all religious and racial considerations.

BALI (Marathi) is an unusual novel by Vibhavari Shirurkar, the author of two such sensational books as Kalyanche Nishvas and Hindolyavar. Both the books generated heated controversies. Then after a lapse of more than fifteen years appeared Bali in 1950. The Bali (The victim) is a more mature work in comparison with the earlier works of the author. The Bali seems to have been influenced by Vishram Bedekar's Ranangan, both in structure and style. Both deal with a handful of persons in a limited locale and the narration is bare, brisk and to the point.

The Bali deals with the fate of the unfortunate inmates of a criminal tribal settlement camp near Solapur. The novelist had first hand knowledge of the locale. She had very minutely studied the human problems besetting the settlement; problems, human as well as administrative. The settlement, surrounded by barbed-wire, housed together the members of the (so-called) criminal tribes. They with their families were compelled to live a miserable life. The adult inmates were treated like prisoners and sent to distant mines for a long-day's labour and paid poorly. So, starvation of all sorts was rampant in the settlement. Contact with the world beyond the barbed-wire was totally forbidden and they led a life of dissolute relationships. Branded as criminals they were herded together in a sort of concentration camp and the government management of the camp which was callous, inefficient and corrupt in the extreme only added insult to injury.

The novel tells the story of an innocent inmate of such a criminal tribal settlement camp. Aba is a boy in his teens. His father Gana and mother Changuna were the inmates of the camps and this boy Aba was only one of their many children, one who had the looks of a 'gora', foreigner. This clever lad was awarded some kind of scholarship and had gone out to stay in some distant boarding school. There he had acquired the habits and the culture of the middle-class society. After passing his Vernacular Final examination he has returned to the settlement camp of his parents. The story starts unfolding from this point.

The very first sight which greets the prodigal's eye is that of his mother and her progeny along with the mongrel community picking and devouring food-particles from some dunghill near the barbed wire, and he feels revolted by this first encounter with reality. With the new understanding and experience education has given him, he feels ashamed of his kith and kin and the miserable way of livelihood that was unjustly inflicted on them. He tries very hard to acclimatize himself to this environment, suffers unbearable torment and mental anguish on account of his inability to reconcile the two worlds—the world inside and the world outside the barbed wire compound. He is almost forced to rape the sex-starved delinquent girl, Nami, and frets inwardly because he cannot realize his true love for Rai, his heart-throb. In the meantime, he is shocked to find his mother stealing out of the barbed-wire and offer her body to satisfy the carnal lust of the soldiers on the prowl. In the end, the terrible truth downs on him that there is no way out. Finally, Aba is charged with theft which he had never committed, and, in the mob violence, meets his end even while exhorting his friends to eschew violence. The narrative creates a strong impression that the story of one Bali (victim), Aba, is not the story of one person alone, but that of the countless victims of a society and circumstances.

Many readers, conditioned by conventional literary tastes and cultural outlooks became uneasy by the bold style of her writing. She could because of her deep human interest dare to write a novel on the problems of this community when Marathi writers were mainly involved in revealing the life of upper class people. There was a great controversy regarding the literary merits of this novel when it was published because the very subject and treatment was a new thing. Now the time has passed and Bali has been accepted as one of the great novels. It is also a well-known fact that Vibhavari Shirurkar is none else than the famous social worker, thinker and writer Malatibai Bedekar, who has studied very deeply the problems of outcast people while working with them. It is because of her first-hand knowledge of the life of outcast people, the novel has become authentic in the subject matter and she is also successful in transforming this subject into a good work of art.

BALIDARSANAM (Malayalam) is a poem by Akkittam Achyuthan Namboodiri, a pioneer of modern trends in Malayalam poetry. It is in five parts. Published in a single volume in 1970, it won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1973. The poem lacks the depth and power of Akkittam's earlier works like The Epic of the Twentieth Century. Nor does it have the coherence of impression which is typical of the exquisite pieces of his 'Crumbling Universe'. Even the movement of the 'Keka' verse is here weak at times. But it presents a graphic analysis of what the poet diagnoses as the spiritual ailment of our time. He does not set out to cure the ill, though ample indications are given as to what line one could adopt if one wanted to rectify it.

As the title suggests, the poem deals with a long vision that came to the protagonist who is often identified with the poet himself. After a sumptuous Onam feast he is reclining in the afternoon. The idols and floral patterns found in the yard remind him of the splendour of the past, of the glory that surrounded life in the days of yore. The bright image of Maha Bali, the symbol of magnificence and excellence, emerges filling his eye and filling the atmosphere. What follows in the next three sections is a contrast of the wretched conditions today with the rich heritage of the past. Modern man finds his roots in the past broken. The sad awareness of the light departed from our lives makes the poet reflect on his own hand to mouth existence. Living was a meaningful process in the past, Life was the fourfold expression of a single and vital truth in the good old days. It was four dimensional–the fourth one being the central spiritually, the aspect that is 'unseen' underlying a multitude of phenomena. In the last section Bali, in an autobiographical mood, points out to the poet the gift of such spirituality. It is the ultimate negation of the Ego that qualifies one for the infinite joy of immortality. The poem concludes with the picture of the protagonist turned golden within and without, radiating spiritual lustre. And then it is time for the evening tea; the poet's spouse duly appears with the steaming cup and the vision fades out. However, the poet retains the precious link with the past which he has rediscovered in his vision.

'Darsanam' also means philosophy, faith. Here is the credo of a major poet brought forth in his own characteristic style with a compelling charm. The technique of working an image through well designed effects is employed by Akkittam consistently in this poem too. And if it does not maintain the sharpness and intensity of some of his illustrious works, it contains a totality of vision and this is precisely what is required by the rootless generation of our time.

BALKAVI (Marathi; b. 1890, d. 1918) was a poet of nature. His real name was Tryambak Bapuji Thomare. He was a contemporary of N.V. Tilak, Govindagraj and others who were included in the Keshavsut school of modern Marathi poetry that influenced the major poets in the first two decades of 20th century. New traits and trends in modern poetry were conspicuously different in ancient Marathi poetry which was mainly confined to spiritual life and experiences. During the last decades of 19th century the intelligensia in Maharashtra was inspired by a new outlook of life, new approach to social problems and new poetic vision. Social awakening was accepted as one of the objectives of poetry. But Balkavi did not subscribe to this view.

He confined himself and his poetry to Nature which to him was sublime and full of beauty. Balkavi felt that human life was imperfect, incomplete and transitory. On the contrary Nature was perfect, complete and eternal. A human life is full of material griefs while life in Nature is blissful. 'Jadatela Khiluni Rahi/Hridaya Bandh Ukalat Nahi' (Life is chained to the material universe hence the heart can never be free). This is the gist of Balkavi's views towards human life. All-pervading bliss is everywhere is what Balkavi experienced in Nature. He realised that the Nature is full of divine music. A man learnt this divine music which is the essence of life, Balkavi has said in one poem. The mind of a man is easily attracted where he finds his unfulfilled desires fulfilled. It is true with Balkavi himself, and it explains why Balkavi had so much fascination for Nature and why his poetry was confined only to the Nature.

It appears that Balkavi has written three types of poems about Nature. In some poems he has vividly described the enchanting beauty in Nature; while in some poems he had personified Nature and in some other poems he had propounded his philosophical views on human life and Nature.

Balkavi's poems about Nature are rich in poetic imagery. The whole grandeur of his poetry lies in the use of similes, metaphors, allegories and such other figures of speech. Tunefulness and songlike qualities are inherent in his poetry; his melodious compositions are rhythmical, elegant and graceful. Purposeful use of alliteration adds to these features and enriches the diction of Balkavi.

BALKAVICHI KAVITA (Marathi) The collection of all poems of Balkavi was published years after his death. Some of his selected poems were published in the form of tiny booklets even earlier. But Balkavi did not live long enough to see any of his collected poems in book form.

Balkavi's merit as a poet had come to be recognized in his young age, and the budding poet was entrusted to the care of the senior poet Tilak with the hope of well-nurtured flowering. Tilak willingly adopted him and fondly cherished the ward's poetic qualities. Balkavi's earlier compositions were influenced by Tilak, both stylewise and contentwise. But when he came into his own, there was little time left for his progress as a poet. He died when he was only 28.

Balkavi is rightfully acknowledged as a poet of nature, but his nature-poems do not follow any set pattern. These poems can be divided into three categories. Poems like 'Nirzaras', 'Sandhyatarak', 'Astadishancha Gopha' and 'Tarakanche Gane' personify some objects or phenomena in nature and attribute to them divine qualities. Balkavi's 'Phulrani' tells the story of a tiny flower's love for a ray of the Sun and its consummation in marriage.

There is an another group of Balkavi's poems like 'Shravanmas' and 'Audumbar' which describes an early scene in autumn and a simple pastoral scene with an eye for picturesque detail. 'Audumbar' is in a way an incomparable poem, which sketches the pastoral panorama with a painter's skill of colourful portrayal.

There is still a third group of Balkavi's nature-poems, in which the poet identifies himself with some object in nature, but it is only to express his own vision of life. Such poems like 'Pakharas' and 'Parava' reveal the poet's disillusionment with life and a wishful longing for death.

Balkavi is particularly well-known as the composer of a poem 'Anandi Anand', in which he dwells on the joy of life and feels that life is full of happiness. But this is only a passing mood, while his general outlook towards life is utterly pessimistic. The very titles of some of his poems like 'Udasinata', 'Nirasha' and 'Shunya Manacha Ghumat' express the melancholy moods, which ultimately melt into a heartfelt craving for death. Balkavi was a gifted poet and his exquisite poems are remarkable in many ways.

BALLAD (Assamese) Ballads in Assamese were handed down from generation to generation among the rural folk of Assam by verbal transmission. The poets of these ballads are not known. Some of the ballads so far recovered are complete and some are fragmentary. Ballads in Assamese could be classified into three categories: (1) historical (2) legendary and (3) imaginative. To the first category belong Barphukanar Git (The song of Barphukan), Haradatta-Viradattar-Git (The song of Haradatta and Viradatta), Maniram-Dewanar-Git (The song of Maniram Dewan), Chikan-Sariyahar-Git (The lay of Chikan Sariyah), Naharar Git (The song on Nahar Deka), Jayamati Kuwarir-Git (The song about Jayamati Kuwari) and Gaurinath-Simhar-Git (The song of Gaurinath Simha). The persons involved in the above ballads are historical figures, some of whom have left indelible marks on the history of Assam. The ballad on Nahar Deka appears to be the earliest, because the hero Nahar was an adopted son of Khora Raja who reigned in the later half of the sixteenth century (1552-1603). The ballads on Maniram Dewan, a martyr of 1857 rebellion, appears to be the latest historical ballad. Nahar Deka being a favourite adopted son of one of the queens of Khora Raja, in fact a paramour in the guise of an adopted son, became very oppressive for which he was killed by the nobles. His haughty and oppressive dealings and the tragic end constitute the topic of the ballad. Chikan Sariyah was the brother-in-law of king Jayadhvaja Simha (1650-1683). He had six brothers. They conspired against the king as a result of which all the brothers were executed for treason. Jayamati Kuwari was the wife of Prince Gadadhar who absconded to avoid the royal assassins employed by his arch rival king Chulikpha or Lora Raja (1679-1681). In his absence the king caught hold of his wife Jayamati and tortured her to death to extort information about her absconding husband. The ballad brings out her tragic self-sacrifice. The ballad on Gauri-nath Simha (1780-1795) depicts his love-adventure with a girl of low origin. It is erotic in tone and devoid of the usual tragic note of historical ballads. Barphukanar Git narrates how Badan Barphukan, the last viceroy of the Ahoms at Gauhati, escorted the marauding Burmese force which not only put an end to the Ahom rule but also ravaged Assam thrice within a span of three years. The ballad recalls the entire process of Assam's destruction from the departure of Barphukan to Burma via Calcutta and ends with the assassination of the traitor to the country. Strangely enough the bard is sympathetic to the traitor and makes derisive remarks against the then Prime Minister Purnanada who has been uniformly described by all historians as a patriotic and efficient officer. Maniram Dewan who tried to restore the Ahom monarchy in the wake of the rebellion of 1857 and who was hanged for his alleged complicity with the mutiny is projected by the ballad poet as a hero deserving admiration, sympathy and woe. It should be mentioned here that almost all the historical ballads have a tragic ending.

Among the second category of ballads based on legendary figures, Janagabharur-Git, Phul-Kowar-Man-Kowarar Git, Radhika-Shantir-Git, and Kamala-Kuwarir-Git deserve speical mention. Janagabharur-Git (The song of the maiden Jana) has some superficial resemblance with Gopichandrer-Gan of North Bengal. The names of the hero and his mother and the country of Amazons where Matsyendranath was a captive, bear some resemblance with those of the Assamese ballad. The ballad describes a series of adventures undertaken by Prince Gopichandra while trying to overcome the hurdles put up by queen Jana to test the strength and skill of her suitors. He ultimately wins Jana and sets free nine hundred captive suitors. Phul-Kowar-Man-Kowarar-Git introduces a flying horse riding on which the hero Phulkowar lands on the withered garden of a Princess. The garden suddenly turns to be a blooming one at the arrival of the prince. The female gardener (Malini) serves as a go-between and finally the union of the lovers takes place followed by a tragic ending. Kamala Kuwarir Git depicts the self-sacrifice of princess Kamala to remove drought which adversely affected her kingdom. Radhika-Shanti belonged to a community considered to be low in the social rung. By sheer force of her chastity, it is narrated, she succeeded in fetching water from the Brahmaputra in a fishing basket having too many pores.

As regards purely imaginary ballads, Kanya Baramahi, Dubala-Shantir-Git, Lilavatir-Git, Jaydhan Baniyar Git, Madhumatir Git, Sita Baramahi are some of the known songs, fully or partly recovered from the lips of rural folk. The main theme of these imaginary ballads is love-in-separation. The pining lady being separated from her lover or husband who has gone to a distant land with merchandise, gives vent to her feeling of unbearable separation in different seasons and months. The reaction of the changing beauties of nature in different seasons and months on the lady is vividly narrated. Chastity of the lady in separation is also tested in some of the ballads.

The ballads have some common characteristics. Quick metrical rhythms of the verses, frequent use of an unfamiliar metrical foot for the sake of completing the verse and producing harmonic sound-effect, uniform use of tripadi (three-footed measures) in almost all the ballads, reflection of rural life and social atmosphere of the Ahom period (13th to the 19th centuries) and the use of supernatural elements occasionally, are some of the common salient features of the ballads.

BALLAD (Bengali) is a narrative song. There are folk-ballads and literary ballads. The folk-ballads are sung sometimes in accompaniment with dance and the literary ballads are recited. The western definition of ballads cannot obviously be wholly applicable to India where a different tradition has developed about it. The western folklorists define it as a 'short narrative', but in India it is very rarely short. In metrical structure the western ballads are divided into stanzas, but Indian ballads do not have any division in the course of its metrical narration. It is continued without any break in to any stanzas or chapters. In the western ballads heroism is the main sentiment on which the theme is based, but in India besides heroism there are other sentiments like love, sacrifice and spiritual achievements which are the basic themes of ballads. As a matter of fact a very rich tradition of folk-ballad developed in India during the late medieval period. Ballad is not generally an element of tribal culture though it is very common with the folk-culture of almost every region of India. But due to historical reasons there are certain regions like Kashmir, Punjab, Rajasthan and Bengal which are particularly rich in this aspect of folk-literature.

From a ballad recovered from Bengal as early as 1873 by G.A. Grierson, the distinguished linguist and the then Director of the Linguistic Survey of India, it appears that Gopichandra or Govindachandra was a king who ruled over the eastern regions of Bengal during the 11th century (1021, according to an inscription discovered in Orissa). He is the hero of the ballad. This was also the period during which vernacular languages were born all over India. Therefore, it seems that we can draw the earliest limit of the origin of Indian ballads as far back as the 11th century. The ballad was published in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal in the year 1878 with not only an English translation, but also with the entire text printed in Devnagari script under the title of The Song of Manikchandra. Manikchandra was the father of the hero of the ballad, Gopichandra Or Govindachandra. Subsequently other versions of the ballad also have been published under different titles by other academic institutions including the Calcutta University. It is practically an all-India theme for old ballads from Assam to Maharashtra. It has been utilized in composing orally a number of folk-songs, folk-dramas and ballads, throughout India, Northern India in particular. This is a rare example of almost an all-India theme of folk-ballad. Otherwise all the other themes are generally regional. This also indicates that the theme of Gopichandra or Govindachandra is a very ancient one and there must be some historical element behind it.

There must be another reason for such wide popularity of this ballad. It is, in a sense, a vehicle of Natha-cult which was an all India phenomenon from a very early period. Some preceptors of Natha community known as Siddhacharyas and their spiritual activities have been glorified in this ballad. Inspite of this fact it does not come under sectarian literature; it has a universal and human appeal throughout. Its wide popularity irrespective of caste, creed and linguistic barrier is a proof of this point.

In 1923 was published a collection of Bengali folk-ballads by the University of Calcutta under the editorship of D.C. Sen. He rendered the ballads into English and published them from the Calcutta University under the title Eastern Bengal Ballads. Subsequently, more collections in Bengali under the title of Purba-Vanga-Gitika were published by the University, edited by D.C. Sen. The University appointed qualified salaried collectors for the collection of ballads and a satisfactory collection was made as early as the first quarter of the present century. This is the first attempt of any Indian University to pay attention to the study of the folk-ballads of this country. Their literary excellence has been recognized by the critics all over the world. A Czechoslovakian scholar Dusan Zbavitel being attracted by the literary qualities of the English translation of the ballads came to Bengal, studied the local language and visited the rural areas from where they were collected in order to study their authenticity. Subsequently, in his work entitled Bengali Folk-Ballads from Mymensing and the Problem of their Authenticity, published by the Calcutta University in 1963, he expressed satisfaction at their genuineness and high poetic merit.

From the references of the historical personages made in these ballads it is supposed that none of them originated prior to the 16th century when Muslim power both politically and socially was consolidated over the eastern region of Bengal.

Names of historical characters occur in a number of Indian ballads from as early as the 8th or 9th century, like the emperor of the Pala dynasty of Bengal. But that does not mean that the ballads describe any historical event. Therefore, it is wrong to claim any such ballad as 'historical' in character. Poets' imagination always plays an unrestricted role in the composition of the ballads, both folk and literary.

There are ballads in every language of India, but they have not been uniformly collected. The collection was started by a group of civilians and christian missionary workers who had little or no proper access to the languages of the people. As a result, most of the ballads have now been lost.

BALLAD (Dogri) is generally known as 'Lok-gatha'. In Dogri, however, folk singers classify the long poems that they sing into two broad categories, viz. 'Karak' and 'Bar'. The classification, though vague and unscientific has been current among the folk, for centuries.

'Karakas' are sung by 'Jogis' or 'Garadis'. 'Jogis' are house-holder 'Nathpanthis' (followers of Nath sect) and are considered as Brahmins. They sing their ballads with a folk instrument called 'King' or 'Chakara'. 'Garadis' are from scheduled castes and their accompanying instrument is a drum. 'Garadis' are descended from 'Garudi', a community of experts who cured snake bite with certain 'mantras'.

'Bars' were usually sung by Darheses (derived from 'Darvesh'–wandering 'faqirs') who were followers of Islam. The heroes of their 'Bars' were mostly Hindu warriors. With the partition of the country in 1947, 'Darheses' migrated to Pakistan. 'Bars' are also sung by 'Jogis' and 'Garadis' now.

'Karaks' are mainly narratives of the lives of those who have died before time, by accident or self-sacrifice or because of injustice and of the supernatural powers that get attached to them after such death. Some 'Karakas' are in praise of local deities and 'Pauranic' gods and goddesses. 'Karak' is derived from the 'Vedic Karika'. Dogra psyche is characterised by its propensity to idolise common people for their virtue and valour. There are several instances of ordinary human beings raised to the pedestal of village deities because of the extraordinary circumstances of their death, often self-imposed death. Such persons are called 'Shid', 'Data', or 'Baba', if men and 'Sajawati' 'Sheelvanti' or 'Dati', if women. An unmarried young Brahmin dying like this is called 'Brahmadeo'. Every village deity has a 'Karak' composed by some anonymous 'Jogi' or 'Garadi'. Such 'Karakas' are sung on festive occasions or annual functions at the shrines of village deities.

The aim of singing 'Karakas' is to propitiate powers controlling worldly affairs. The aim of 'Bars', on the other hand is to commemorate incidents of valour. Both are meant to be sung and this is a mark of their external resemblance. They also have an internal communality; in both types of ballad, death acts as a catalyst. That is why some elegies composed by folk-singers are placed in the category of 'Bars'.

Thus 'Bars' are not limited to poetic narratives of valour. According to local tradition, relatives of the hero of a 'Bar', get a Samadhi or Shiv-mandir built for the peace of the soul of the deceased, particularly in the case of some loved member of the royal family. For the deity of a 'Karak', the believers get idols of stone made, which are called 'Mohare'. These 'Moharas' are installed in small temples called 'Dehris'. These 'Dehris' are normally five feet square in size and are got built in farms or some other convenient places. In Himachal Pradesh, they are built near step-wells called 'Baolis' or under 'Pipal' trees.

Both 'Bars' and 'Karkas' have a pre-dominance of 'Karuna rasa' but 'Bars' show 'Vir rasa' in their first halves.

'Karakas' have been classified into two main types:–

1. Ballads of Puranic gods and goddesses like those about Shiva popular in Badrawah or those about Pandavas or those about the goddess of Bahu fort, i.e. Mahakali.

2. Ballads of local deities like (a) those of Vaishnodevi, Sukraladevi, Chichimata who do not figure in Puranic literature and (b) men and women who have sacrificed their lives for some cause and have been idolised as village deities, like 'Karakas' of Bawa Jitto, Data Ranu, Baba Brahmadev, and Dati Mahapurakhani. It is curious that women deities are usually satis who died with their husband's dead bodies or when they had nobody to support them economically.

There are three main types of 'Bars' in Dogri:–
1. Virgatha or ballads of valorous deeds like those of Raja Jagata, Zorawar Singh, Mian Dido and Ramsingh Pathania. 2. Premgatha–ballads of love like that of Dohd Badshah. 3. Shokgatha–ballad of sorrow like those of Mahru Daya and Maharaja Pratap Singh.

'Bar' appears to be derived from 'Dina-Bar' which is a ritual observed in the memory of the deceased. 'Bar' also denotes the day of the week or cycle of time. Thus 'Bar' is a narrative showing the chronology of a person's life cycle. 'Bar' contains noble sentiments of family pride, patriotism and description of martial exploits. The 'Bar' of Dogra general, Zorawar Singh illustrates this well. 'Bar' of Mian Dido who stood for struggle against the Punjab ruler Maharaja Ranjit Singh's expansionist activities, 'Bar' of Raja Mandalik who fought for protection of 'Dharma' and of Raja Kirpal Dev and Miannath Dalpatia who sacrified themselves for their master are some other representative 'Bars'. There are a few 'Bars' about highwaymen also. There is also a 'Bar' about Mangtu Brahmin who lost his life for sheer selfishness. The essence of the inspiration behind the composition of a 'Bar' and its popularity among the folk is its appeal to the psyche of the people. Instances of battle and struggle in the first half create 'vir rasa' and the latter half of the 'Bar' is full of 'Karunarasa' with the hero dying and the two have a tremendous appeal. Some 'Bars' are historical or semi-historical. 'Karakas' are popular among the Hindus because they are connected with Hindu ritualism. They can also be termed as ritualistic ballads. Their approach is analytic. 'Bars' on the other hand, are usually good examples of cultural synthesis, for example, these three lines in translation.

'God Himself planted a tree in Heaven. It bears two fruits, viz., Hindus and Muslims. Hindus remember Lord Rama, Muslims recite Kalma.'

Briefly, it can be said that a large number of 'Karakas' are ballads whose central characters had to die for upholding 'dharma' and fighting 'adharma' and whom common folk idolised and raised to the pedestal of a god or goddess with super-natural powers and folk-singers composed them to praise and propitiate these supernatural powers.

'Bars' are poems of praise of valorous men. The hero, after death in battle, goes straight to heaven and does not need any ritual. His spirit of struggle and acts of valour give a certain historical identity to the community, and inspire future generations. The character of the heroes of Dogri 'Bars' reflects the character of Dogra society.

Dogri ballads present a mirror to Dogra society and its beliefs and values. They also show that Dogra folk consciousness looks for the super-natural in the natural and for the worldly in the worldly beliefs. They point to a social structure founded on fear of God.

Om.G.

BALLAD (Gujarati) was in vogue in medieval poetry, especially in folk poetry. In folk poetry ballad was known as Rasdo; while the equivalent of ballad in non-folk poetry is Pavado. This word for ballad is prevalent in Marathi also. There are some poems in folk poetry which though they have not been labelled as Rasdo are in content and mode of expression ballads. Jhaverchand Meghani, who had done intensive research in folk literature, has published such folk ballads under the caption Sorathi Geet Katho (tales in song from Sorath) in 1931. These poems were sung by professional bards known as Charan. The plots of these ballads are based on facts and they are mostly love poems. The love usually ends in tragedy because of caste restrictions and parental opposition. These ballads are composed in couplet form known as Doha. Though the story is about real person some imaginary incidents are interwoven to achieve the desired effect.

Some ballads depict love episodes of Meh-Ujli, Lodan-Khimro, Hemi-Sur, Nag-Nagamde, Son-Halaman, Shenivi-Jananda and Suhini-Mehar. In all these ballads lovers pine for each other and ultimately one of them dies. In them female characters are more powerful than male characters, because the male easily succumbs to the social taboos.

Even in expression of their feeling women are more aggressive. These ballads are mostly tales and no descriptive element is found there. Jasma Odenno Rasdo deals with an incident from history in which Siddhraj Jaisingh, the 12th century king of Gujarat, took liking for labour woman who rejected his overtures, and after cursing the king killed herself. There are ballads eulogising the bandits who looted the rich and helped the poor. Jumlano Rasdo, Mirkhanno Rasdo are ballads narrating the episodes from the life of bandits. These Rasdos were narrated by professional folk singers called Barthari. Some folk ballads are called Pavado like Gopinayakno Pavado. The metres used in the ballads are Doha, Chaupai, Lavni and Savaia.

Among the medieval literary works Ranmal Chhand (ballad of Ranmal) by Shridhar (1392) is a ballad eulogising the bravery of Ranmal, King of Idar who defeated a muslim invader. Vidyavilas Pavado (ballads of Vidyavilas, 15th century) by Hiranand Suri is a ballad based on the popular story of Vidyavilasini. Madhavanala Kamkandala Chaupai (Madhavanala-Kamkandala story in Chaupai metre, the 16th century) is also a ballad depicting the love of Kamkanadala with Madhavanala.

With the introduction of English education, these poems were printed. They ceased to be sung and listened to hence, typical Gujarati ballad form became extinct. In 1865 Harjivan Travadi (pseudonm Rushiray) wrote Chavada Charita (account of Chavada King) eulogising the king of a small state in western Gujarat in medieval ballad style. In the same year Ranchhod Galuram wrote Fadiano Rasdo (ballad of Fadia) describing the dacoity on a village. It is also a ballad of the traditional type. In 1952 Ardesar Khabhardar wrote Gandhi Bapuno Pavado (ballad of Mahatma Gandhi). Though the composer called it a ballad it is not a ballad in the strict sense. Some poets being inspired by ballad form have made Gujarati adaptation of English ballads. They are Vithalray Awasthi, Jhaverchand Meghani and Kalapi. The poems became popular.

BALLAD (Hindi). Ballad in Hindi, as in other Indian languages, is folk-poetry in simple couplets or quatrains meant for singing collectively or singly. The story is simple—heroic exploits or romance. But the rhythm has a haunting quality. The most important ballads are the Alha Khand and Chandayan on the heroic and romantic themes respectively. Alha Khand (1173) by Jagnik Bhat deals with exploits of two Mahoba heroes, Alha and Udal. The ballad is usually sung in the rainy season in North and Central India. Chandayan (also known as Lorik aur Chand) is popular in Uttarpradesh and Chhatisgarh, and its Maithili and Bengali variations are also prevalent. Another ballad with a religious theme is Bagdavat. Lorik aur Chanda deals with the theme of love. Lorik is the central figure and the hero. The Bagdavat stories have got mixed up in the folk-lore with a kind of legendary, mythological episode. Devnarayan, one of the Bagdavats, started a faith with a large following today. When this particular story is told, it is in verse and played on Jantar with songs. The man who tells the story sings and dances, thereby enhancing the interest of the narrative.

BALLAD (Kashmiri) is a narrative song in short stanzas or couplets with end-rhymes, often with refrain or the first line repeated at regular intervals and usually of popular origin and orally transmitted. The earlier ballads are simple in metrical structure and show little of the fineness of a deliberate art. Their authorship is unknown. The latter ballads have been composed by the known poets but in these too the simplicity of style and sincerity of tone like the earlier ones do not at all suffer. Kashmiri ballads vary in length.

Ballads in Kashmiri have arisen among the people of a locality or a village who have shared the same habits, customs and thoughts for generations. A gifted man among them may weave some folk-tale or a legend or an important event into a song and other persons add to it or change the lines and hand them on to the next generation. Besides, a professional minstrel called 'geven vol' or a bard known as 'Ladi Shah' also composed ballads. A ballad in Kashmiri is not an offshoot of any dance. It was sung for the story it told and not merely as dance accompaniment; sometimes, for the sake of entertainment dance was also performed along with the singing of a narrative song.

Kashmiri had become the popular language of Kashmir even earlier than the 12th century when Kalhana lived and wrote his Rajatarangini and Kashmiri balladry must have gone back to the early past but no ballad of that old and far off time has come down to us. A narrative poem in Kashmiri, Banasurvadha composed in the 15th century is the oldest narrative poem and it narrates a mythological story. It is during the early Sultan period in Kashmir that Kashmiri language got the high status that it deserved and naturally from the 15th century onwards we find the art of balladry grow vigorously.

The characteristics of a Kashmiri ballad are its straight-forwardness, rapidity of narration and its simplicity. They deal with passions and motives that pulsate through all human beings. Many of the Kashmiri ballads have immense dramatic power and simple and regular metrical beauty.

Ballads in Kashmiri may roughly be divided into four kinds according to the source, content and even style and diction.

Many Kashmiri ballads are connected with religious and semi-mystic themes. "Epic and Puranic episodes, like 'Sudama Charita,' 'Radha Swayamvara', 'Siva-Lagan' were selected by the ancient wandering minstrels of Kashmir and passed down through the ages by word of mouth". Parmanand (1791-1885) though primarily famous for his devotional songs, also composed ballads based on these episodes drawn from the lives of Lord Krishna and other Hindu gods. The ballads of this class, though composed in Kashmiri, contain many Sanskrit words here and there.

Famous are also the narrative songs like 'Ramavataracharita', a tale of Rama with a sequel entitled 'Lavakusacharita', 'Krishnavataralila', 'Sivaparinaya'. All these have been composed by one Prakash Pandit in pure Kashmiri.

There are ballads of purely Kashmiri origin based on Kashmir folk-tales like 'Himal Nagraye', 'Bombur and Lolre', 'Zora Khotan and Hayaband', 'Shabrang', etc. The stories of Kathasaritsagar by Somadeva, who flourished about 1070 also have inspired some ballads.

A collection of tales in prose and ballad form known as 'Hatima's tales' were recited by one Hatim, an oilman by profession.

Ramzan Bat's ballad of Akanandan is a marvellous narrative poem. According to the historian Sufi "the poem is a ballad. Its style is simple, vigorous and forceful". Akbar Lone, a less known poet, also composed a fascinating ballad 'Ziny Mazoor' (The woodcutter) on a pathetic story.

Several ballads are based on incidents centering on real persons; for example there are ballads which relate the exploits of a kind-hearted and generous thief known as Mahadev Bishta.

In the later quarter of the 18th century a kind of ballad called 'Rang' emerged, which consisted of a stanza of four lines and a whole song of such seven stanzas. The adept in this kind of poetry was Qazin Ganai. In these songs that poet used to sing the romantic episodes of some ancient lovers.

There are cherished ballads based on Persian themes and history. These include 'Yusuf and Zulaikha' and 'Laila Majnu' which deeply moved the ancient folklorist. The Arabic story of Hatim Tai has also been turned into a song. These forms, though composed by village folk in their native Kashmiri, are modelled on Persian poetry. In fact, the Kashmiri ballad singers have strung Persian pearls on Kashmiri threads. They are composed in the couplet form employing Persian Bahar-i-hazaj. The poets have borrowed words, epithets and phrases of Persian.

By about the end of the 18th century the literary age of Kashmiri begins and Kashmiri poets like Muhammad Gami (d. 1885) have written ballads with a sweet flavour on Persian romance, as Gami's Sheikh Saman, Sheikh Mansoor, Pahil Nama and Yek Haqayat.

Though there is a long tradition of comic and satiric ballads, going back to the times of Sanskrit poet Kshmendra of the 11th and the 12th centuries it is only in the 19th century that we find ballads in Kashmiri most in vogue. These comic ballads describe the sad plight of the people under the onslaughts of the natural calamities like flood, famine and cruelties of the officials. These ballads known as 'shahar-aashob' are written in 'masnavi'-style couplets.

A unique kind of ballad, known as Ladi Shah, brings out wit and worldly wisdom of Kashmiri people. Among the modern satirical ballads Lakshman Razdan's Lalla Lachman is the most famous. It has a peculiar lure and a strange tone.

Ladi Shah ballads are sung by the minstrels in one single tune accompanied by the music created by stirring the iron rings strung on an iron rod. The other kinds of ballads acquire a unique charm when sung in chorus to the accompaniment of 'rabaab' or 'sarangi', 'tumbaknari' (a kind of tabla) and 'not' (an earthenware pot).

In the Kashmiri ballads accompanying dances and music are "embodied the heritage of Kashmir's dynamic past and the spirit of beauty vibrating through its bountiful nature".

BALLAD (Maithili) or Gitakathas as they are called in Maithili are very popular in Mithila. They have attracted the attention of every scholar of Maithili since the days of George Grierson. He collected two of the most poetical ones Salhas and Divabhadri. These ballads are either chanted or sung. They are long compositions and are the most interesting of all forms of folk literature.

Among other widely known ballads the Lorika Gita is perhaps the oldest. It is known to have been popular as early as 1324 when Jyotishvaras' Varma Ratnakara which mentions it as a dance song was composed. The story of Lorika is known all over the North-East India but its original is in Mithila, if for no other reason, than the fact that its place names are still celebrities and centres of pilgrimage. General Cunningham reported as early as 1883 in Archaeological Survey of India Report in North and South Bihar (1880-1881) that during his tour of Mithila he heard repeatedly of two brothers named Harwa and Barwa. Salhas and Lorika and their exploits are all told in excellent verse. Lorika was a hero of superhuman power. He deserted his wife and eloped with Chanayin to a place called Hardi. After a series of brave deeds he finally settled down. The Lorika song is also known as Maharai and is the norm of a ballad in Maithili. Grierson could publish only two more ballads Salhasak Gita and Dina Bhadrika Gita. Both of these are full of magic wonder, romance and chivalry. But perhaps more poetry and sentiment have gone to the other famous ballads. Particularly the story of Jalecha Katha is extremely pathetic, verging on the tragic. It is the story of the sacrifice of a daughter by a fisherman king so that his people may have water. Similarly, Bihola Katha is the story of a chaste woman who could fight death himself and rescue her husband in a most touching scene. Gopichanda, Maenavati Katha, Navaraka Katha, Rani Maruami and Raja Dhodhana Singh Ka Katha, Bamiddara, Dulaha Dayabisingh, etc. and scores of such traditional ballads have enriched Maithili folk literature.

The main features of these beautiful and chivalric tales are: music, rise and fall of sentiments, while entertaining and upholding the high moral virtues of life. These tales enrich life with illustrations of heroism, tenderness and affection.

They observe several conventions in the treatment of their stories and their style. These are sometimes so marked and stylized that one can easily distinguish a ballad as a folk form of excellence. The supernatural powers and human beings are allowed to mingle in these ballads on equal terms, the dimensions of characterization as well as narration are nearly always on an extended and exaggerated level, they are full of repetitions and jingling and meaningless expressions; they are frequently led on by the music of the minstrel singing them.

'Manipadma' has published some of these ballads in modern prose as novels, such as Lorika-Vijaya, Naika-Banijara.

BALLAD (Malayalam) as a literary genre, dates back to the early days of Malayalam when it started to separate itself from Tamil. The great poetical work of this period is Ramacharitam and many of the ballads, particularly those of South Kerala, are when linguistically considered, contemporaneous with it. That the language in the ballads might have undergone modifications and improvement from time to time, leaves the question of dating the compositions quite complex. S.K. Nair asserts that many of the ballads "are very recent compositions not older than 300 years." He goes on to say, "I am told that even today people in north Malabar hear ballads on current themes being composed in the same good old style with the same diction, imagery and figures of speech faithfully retained. This aspect of the ballads leads us to the theory that it is impossible for one to fix the date of composition of any ballad with the help of linguistic and phraseological evidence."

The ballads can be broadly divided into two: Northern songs (Vatakkan Pattukal) and southern songs (Tekkan Pattukal) and they can be further classified under diffferent groups, based on the themes they deal with 1. devotional songs, 2. heroic songs, 3. labourer's songs, 4. marital songs, 5. festival songs, 6. morality songs, 7. fairy tale-songs, 8. beauty, worship songs etc.

The ballads praising the ancient heroes and heroines of North Malabar, famous for their adventurous spirit, valour and dexterity as duellists are called Vatakkan Pattukal. A great majority of them are about two famous families, Puthuram house and Tacholi house. No reference is made about the other in the songs about one family, and it can therefore be presumed that they were written in two different periods. The older of these two can be said to be the one about Puthuram house, based on the antiquity of the theme. Percy Macqueen, I.C.S., points out that these songs belong to the 12th century.

Puthuram Pattukal relate to the family of Aromal Chevakar, the well known Ezhava hero. The large and important bulk of the Vatakkan Pattukal describes the fortunes of the Tacholi family. This belongs mainly to the 16th century. Another group of songs, dealing with the Kunjali Marakkars, the Moplah Admirals of the Zamorin, belongs to this period.

The authorship of the ballads also cannot be fixed beyond doubt. Only a few of them, particularly some of the Tekkan Pattukal, such as Ramakatha Pattu, etc. have been credited with definite authorship. Many of them may have been composed by poetasters and some jointly produced by more than one.

The language of the ballads contains unsophisticated and colloquial expressions of the village-folk. The Vatakkan Pattukal are generally written in a particular Dravidian metre. Often sounds, letters and words are shortened, lengthened, stopped or broken to suit the rhythm. No special training or skill is required to sing them. Commenting on the language, Percy Macqueen writes: "Malabar of course possesses many popular songs which exhibit the influence of Sanskrit language and the Hindu religion. But the historical ballads... are both in language and subject, pure Malayalam. Their language sounds strange to cultivated ears; it is purely Dravidian; almost uninfluenced by Sanskrit. It is quite distinct from ordinary written Malayalam and corresponds to the language still spoken by illiterate people." Malayalam, with all its unalloyed simplicity, vigour, subtlety, beauty and originality, can nowhere else be seen so effectively as in the ballads. Local differences in the spoken dialect add to the charm.

Vatakkan Pattukal has an important place in the history of Malayalam Literature. For a study of the social, cultural and such other aspects of the Nairs and Ezhavas of the ancient North Malabar, there is no more suitable source than these ballads. The system of Natuvazhis existed in North Malabar during the 16th and 17th centuries; the social set-up, the manners and customs, etc. can be observed in these songs. There are references to many kings and their despotic administration. Might was the order of the day, and as a result, duels, riots and murders were common. The Natuvazhis were generally cruel and despotic. The matriarchal system as depicted in the songs is an admirable social order. The social condition encouraged polygamy. As might was right, the mightiest could claim the prettiest. The attitude of the heroes and heroines to moral issues, though there may be some exaggeration owing to hero-worship, is not something admirable. But this does not reduce the cultural and linguistic value of the ballads.

Tekkan Pattukal are southern songs. In some Southern parts of Kerala, certain songs called 'Villatichan Pattu' or 'Villu Kotti Pattu' are being sung even today. The themes of some of these ballads are based on incidents that occurred in the 9th century. The composers of these songs were not famous poets. Nor were they great scholars. Uncultivated, colloquial Tamil, the local dialect of the common people, is the language in which they are written. The natural cadence, musical element and emotional appeal, as in the case of Vatakkan Pattukal, are extremely charming in these ballads also. The accompaniments used by the minstrels of Villatichan Pattu are a 'Villu' (bow), a 'Kutam' (pitcher) and 'Kolukal' (sticks). There are small bells hung on both ends of the bow, and sometimes, all along from one end to the other. These bells ring melodiously when the bow is being played upon with the sticks. The pitcher is made of metal and its face is covered with fine leather. The leader of the concert is called Pullavars, who sings and plays upon the bow and the assistants sing and play upon the pitchers.

Ullur has divided the ballads of South Kerala mainly into three: 1. Songs used for pleasing the demons 2. Songs dealing with local history, and 3. Songs used for worshipping gods. It was a common belief among the people that great men like adventurous heroes and heroines, patriotic knights, devoted religious leaders and chaste and modest ladies would, if they met with tragic death, become spirits and would go on haunting the living, unless they were made to rest by singing songs in praise of their past glories. It was also believed that singing such songs would bring forth general welfare to the society. This social background gave birth to 'Villatichan Pattu'. The social set-up of those days, history of the races, habits and customs of the people and other important details of the past are reflected in these songs. These ballads are confined to the southernmost part of present Kerala, the areas bordering Tamil Nadu. These areas, in past centuries, were inhabited mostly by Tamil-speaking people and hence the predominance of local Tamil in the language used in the ballads. Country-folk still sing these songs. The story of Chamundi of Ponnirattal, of Matan, etc. are some of the famous Villatican Pattukal. Apart from these, stories. taken from the epics also find expression in these songs. Another very popular Tekken Pattu is Iravikkutty Pillai Poru.

Margam Kali Pattu is very popular among the Christians of Central Travancore. Kerala is a state of festivals and round the year there are seasonal festivals here. There are a number of ballads related to these festivals. The songs related to Onam festival and temple festivals are of importance.

Marital songs form another branch of ballads. These are the songs sung in connection with the different functions of mariage ceremony. They vary from the songs describing the beauty of the bride and bridegroom and the decorated stage. There are songs describing the bathing of the bride and there are the songs on opening and closing of the doors of the bedroom (Vatilata Pattu and Vatiltora Pattu). The aim of all these songs is just to make the minds of the bride and the bridegroom cheerful and then to lead them on to a harmonious married life, narrating to them the need for mutual understanding and love. Sometimes the mood is that of gentle teasing also.

Devotional ballads are more colourful and varied in metre and rhythm and sometimes more awful also. The ancient country folk possessed all sorts of belief. They worshipped supernatural elements. They had many dreadful gods. To appease these powers and also to gain their blessings, the ancients used to follow different types of worship and songs were a part of all worship. The result of this culture was an invaluable store of devotional ballads.

Some of the ballads, even now sung by local minstrels, have not yet been collected and published.

BALLAD (Manipuri) A bulk of ancient and mediaeval Manipuri literature is folk in content and form which may very well be placed under ballad. So far, nobody has done anything worth the name by way of collection, editing and publication of the ballads in Manipuri but still they are gaining popularity among the people. This type of oral literature which has been transmitted for generations forming as it were the repository of the fertile imaginations of the communities of this state could be preserved only because of the keen interest evinced by the people.

Manipuri ballads can be broadly studied under four categories according to theme. They are (1) mythological and legendary ballad, (2) historical ballad, (3) ballad concerning the flora and fauna and (4) ballad of epic origin.
